lity; but I am as little to unreaſonable Diſtruſt and Suſpicion; if the one be Folly, the other is Madneſs. No prudent Man believes any thing, becauſe it is poſſible to be true, nor rejects any thing, merely becauſe it is poſſible to be falſe; but it is the prudence of every Man to weigh and conſider all Circumſtances, and according to them, to aſſent or diſſent. We all know it is poſſible for Men to deceive, or to be deceived, but we know there is no neceſſity of either; and that there is ſuch a Thing as Truth in the World; and though Men may deceive, yet they do not always ſo; and that Men may know they are not deceived. For elſe there could be no ſuch thing as Society among Mankind; no Friendſhip, or Truſt, or Confidence in the Word of another Perſon; becauſe it is poſſible that the beſt Friend I have may deceive me; and the World is full of Diſſimulation, muſt I therefore believe no body? This is the juſt conſequence of this way of Arguing, That we have reaſon to ſuſpect the Truth of theſe Matters of Fact, becauſe there have been many Frauds in the World, and might have been many more than we can now diſcover; for if this Principle be purſued, it will deſtroy all Society among Men; which is built on the Suppoſition of mutual Truſt and Confidence that Men have in each other: And although it be poſſible for all Men to deceive, becauſe we cannot know one another's Hearts, yet there are ſuch Characters of Honeſty and Fidelity in ſome Perſons, that others dare venture their Lives and Fortunes upon their Words. And is any Man thought a Fool for doing ſo? Nay, have not the moſt prudent and ſagacious Men repoſed a mighty Confidence in the Integrity of others? And without this, no great Affairs can be carried on in the World; for ſince the greateſt Perſons need the help of others to manage their Buſineſs, they muſt truſt other Men continually; and every Man puts his Life into the Hands of others, to whom he gives any Freedom of acceſs, and eſpecially his Servants: Muſt a Man therefore live in continual Suſpicion and Jealouſie, becauſe it is poſſible he may be deceived? But if this be thought unreaſonable, then we gain thus much, that notwithſtanding the poſſibility of Deception, Men may be truſted in ſome Caſes, and their Fidelity ſafely relied upon: This being granted, we are to enquire what that Aſſurance is which makes us truſt any one; and where ever we find a Concurrence of the ſame Circumſtances, or equal evidence of Fidelity, we may repoſe the ſame Truſt or Confidence in them. And we may ſoon find that it is not any one's bare Word that makes us truſt him; but either the reputation of his Integrity among diſcerning Men, or our long experience and obſervation of him: This latter is only confined to our own tryal; but the former is more general, and reaches beyond our own Age, ſince we may have the Teſtimony of diſcerning Perſons convey'd down to us in as certain a manner, as we can know the Mind of a Friend at a hundred Miles diſtance, viz. by writing. And in this Caſe, we deſire no more than to be ſatisfied that thoſe things were written by them; and that they deſerved to be believed in what they writ; thus, if any one would be ſatisfied about the Paſſages of the Peloponneſian War, and hath heard that Thucydides hath accurately written it, he hath no more to do, than to enquire whether this Thucydides were capable of giving a good Account of it, and for that, he hears that he was a great and inquiſitive Perſon, that lived in that Age, and knew all the Occurrences of it; and when he is ſatisfied of that, his next enquiry is, whether he may be truſted or no; and for this, he can expect no better ſatisfaction, than that his Hiſtory hath been in great reputation for its Integrity among the moſt knowing Perſons; but how ſhall he be ſure this was the Hiſtory, written by Thucydides, ſince there have been many counterfeit Writings obtruded upon the World? Beſides the Conſent of learned Men in all Ages ſince, we may compare the Teſtimonies cited out of it with the Hiſtory we have, and the Style, with the Character given of Thucydides, and the Narrations, with other credible Hiſtories of thoſe Times; and if all theſe agree, what reaſon can there be not to rely upon the Hiſtory of Thucydides? All learned Men do acknowledge, that there have been multitudes of fictitious Writings, but do they therefore queſtion, whether there are any genuine? Or whether we have not the true Herodotus, Strabo, or Pauſanias, becauſe there is a counterfeit Beroſus, Manetho, and Philo, ſet forth by Annius of Viterbo? Do any ſuſpect whether we have any of the genuin Works of Cicero, becauſe an Italian counterfeited a Book, De Conſolatione in his Name? Or whether Cæſar's Commentaries were his own; becauſe it is uncertian who writ the Alexandrian War that is joined with them? By which we ſee, that we may not only be certain of the Fidelity of Perſons we converſe with, but of all things neceſſary to our belief of what was done at a great diſtance of Time from the Teſtimony of Writers, notwithſtanding the many ſuppoſititious Writings that have been in the World.

But it may be ſaid, That all this only relates to meer Matters of Hiſtory, wherein a Man is not much concerned whether they be true or falſe; but the things we are about are Matters that Mens Salvation or Damnation are ſaid to depend upon, and therefore greater Evidence ſhould be given of theſe, to oblige Men to believe them.

To this I anſwer. 1. That my deſign herein, was to prove, that notwithſtanding the poſſibility of Deception, there may be ſufficient ground for a prudent and firm aſſent to the Truth of Things done at as great a diſtance of Time, and convey'd after the ſame manner, that the Matters of Fact reported in the New Teſtament are; and hereby thoſe general Prejudices are ſhewed to be unreaſonable: And all that I deſire from this Diſcourſe is, that you would give an aſſent of the ſame Nature to the Hiſtory of the Goſpel, that you do to Cæſar, or Livy, or Tacitus, or any other ancient Hiſtorian. 2. As to the greater Obligation to aſſent, I ſay it depends upon the Evidence of Divine Revelation, which is given by the Matters of Fact which are deliver'd to us. And here give me leave to aſk you; 1. Whether it be any ways repugnant to any conception you have of God, for him to make uſe of fallible Men to make known his Will to the World? 2. Whether thoſe Men, though ſuppoſed to be in themſelves fallible, can either deceive, or be deceived, when God makes known his Mind to them? 3. Whether on ſuppoſition, that God hath made uſe of ſuch Perſons for this end, thoſe are not obliged to believe them, who do not live in the ſame Age with them? If not, then God muſt either make no Revelation at all, or he muſt make a New one every Age: If they are, then the Obligation lies as much on us now to believe, as if we had lived and converſed with thoſe inſpired Perſons.

2. That there is no reaſon to ſuſpect the Truth of thoſe Matters of Fact which are reported in the New Teſtament; For ſince it is univerſally agreed among Men, that Humane Teſtimony is a ſufficient ground for aſſent, where there is no poſitive ground for ſuſpicion; becauſe deceiving and being deceived, is not the common Intereſt of Mankind;

therefore we are to conſider what the general grounds of ſuſpicion are; and whether any of them do reach the Apoſtles Teſtimony, concerning the Matters of Fact reported by them. And the juſt grounds of ſuſpicion are theſe; 1. If the Perſons be otherwiſe known to be Men of Artifice and Cunning, full of Tricks and Diſſimulation, and that make no Conſcience of ſpeaking Truth, ſo a Lye tends to their greateſt Advantage; which is too much the Papiſts caſe in their Legends, and Stories of Miracles. 2. If they temper and ſuit their Story and Doctrine to the Humour and Genius of the People, they hope to prevail upon, as Mahomet did, in encouraging War and Laſciviouſneſs. 3. If they lay the Scene of their Story at a mighty diſtance from themſelves, at ſuch an Age, wherein it is impoſſible to prove, or diſprove; which is the caſe of the Brachmans, as to their Brahmà, and their Veda; and was of the Heathens as to their Fabulous Deities. 4. If there be any thing contained in the Story, which is repugnant to the moſt authentick Hiſtories of thoſe Times; by which means the Impoſtures of Annius have been diſcovered. 5. If there be evident contradiction in the Story it ſelf; or any thing repugnant to, or unbecoming the Majeſty, Holineſs, Sincerity, and Conſiſtency of a Divine Revelation; on which account we reject Fanatick pretences to Revelations. If there were any thing of this nature in the Writings of the New Teſtament, we might then allow there were ſome ground to ſuſpect the Truth of what is contained therein: But I ſhall undertake, by the Grace of God, to defend that there is not any Foundation for Suſpicion as to any one of theſe.

1. As to the Perſons, ſuch who go about to deceive others, muſt be Men that are verſed in buſineſs, and know how to deal with Men; and that have ſome Intereſt already that they have gained by other Means, before they can carry on ſuch a Deſign as to abuſe Mankind, by Lies and Impoſtures in Religion: Therefore the Atheiſts lay the deceiving the World by Religion, to the Charge of Politicians and Law-givers, to Men verſed in the practice of Fraud, ſuch as Numa, or Lycurgus, or Xaca, or Mahomet, ſuch as underſtood the ways of cajoling the People; or to ſubtle Prieſts, that know how to ſuit the hopes and fears of the ſuperſtitious Multitude; whence came the multitude of Frauds in the Heathen Temples and Oracles. But would any Man in the World have pitched upon a few Fiſhermen, and illiterate Perſons, to carry on ſuch an intrigue as this? Men that were rude and unexperienced in the World, and uncapable of dealing in the way of Artifice with one of the common Citizens of Hieruſalem. When was it ever heard that ſuch Men made ſuch an alteration in the Religion of the World, as the Primitive Chriſtians did, againſt the moſt violent Perſecutions? And when they prevailed ſo much, the common Charge ſtill againſt them was, that they were a Company of rude, mean, obſcure, illiterate, ſimple Men: And yet in ſpight of all the Cunning, and Malice, and Learning, and Strength of their Adverſaries, they gained ground upon them, and prevailed over the Obſtinacy of the Jews, and Wiſdom of the Greeks. If the Chriſtian Religion had been a meer deſign of the Apoſtles to make themſelves Heads of a new Sect, what had this been but to have ſet the Cunning of twelve, or thirteen Men, of no Intereſt, or Reputation, againſt the Wiſdom and Power of the whole World? If they had any Wiſdom, they would never have undertaken ſuch an impoſſible deſign as this muſt appear to them at firſt View: And if they had none, how could they ever hope to manage it? If their aim were only at Reputation, they might have thought of thouſands of Ways more probable, and more advantageous than this: If we ſuppoſe Men ſhould be willing to hazard their Lives for their Reputations, we may ſuppoſe withal ſuch Men to have ſo much cunning as not to do it till they cannot help it; but if they can have Reputation and Eaſe together, they had rather have it. I will therefore put the Caſe concerning the only Perſon that had the Advantage of a learned Education among the Apoſtles; viz. St. Paul, and whom you ſeem to ſtrike at more than the reſt: Is it reaſonable to believe, that when he was in favour with the Sanhedrin, and was likely to advance himſelf by his oppoſition to Chriſtianity, and had a fair proſpect of Eaſe and Honour together; he ſhould quit all this, to join with ſuch an inconſiderable and hated Company, as the Chriſtians were, only to be one of the Heads of a very ſmall Number of Men, and to purchaſe it at ſo dear a rate as the loſs of his Friends and Intereſt, and running on continual Troubles and Perſecutions, to the hazard of his Life? Is it poſſible for Men that are deceived and mean honeſtly to do this; but it is ſcarce ſuppoſable of a Man in his Senſes that ſhould know and believe all this to be a Cheat, and yet own and embrace it, to ſo great diſadvantage to himſelf: When he could not make himſelf ſo conſiderable by it, as he might have been without it. Men muſt love cheating the World at a ſtrange rate, that will let go fair hopes of Preferment and Eaſe, and lead a Life of perpetual Trouble, and expoſe themſelves to the utmoſt Hazards, only for the ſake of deluding others. If the Apoſtles knew all they ſaid to be falſe, and made it ſo neceſſary for all Men to believe what they ſaid to be true; they were ſome of the greateſt Deceivers which the World had ever known: But Men that take pleaſure in deceiving, make uſe of many Artifices on purpoſe to catch the ſilly Multitude; they have all the Arts of Inſinuation and fawning Speeches, fit to draw in the weakeſt, and ſuch as love to be flatter'd; but what is there tending this way in all the Apoſtles Writings? How ſharply do they ſpeak to the Jewiſh Sanhedrin, upon the Murder of Chriſt? With what plainneſs and ſimplicity do they go about to perſuade Men to be Chriſtians? They barely tell the Matters of Fact concerning the Reſurrection of Chriſt, and ſay they were Eye-witneſſes of it, and upon the Credit of this Teſtimony of theirs, they preach Faith and Repentance to Jews and Gentiles: Was ever any thing farther from the appearance of Artifice than this was? So that if they were deceivers, they were ſome of the ſubtileſt that ever were in the World, becauſe there ſeems to be ſo little ground for any ſuſpicion of Fraud; and we cannot eaſily imagin Perſons of their Education, capable of ſo profound Diſſimulation and ſo artificial a Cheat. Beſides all this, we are to conſider how far ſuch Perſons do allow the liberty of Diſſimulation and artificial Juglings, eſpecially in Religion; we ſee the Papiſts could not practiſe theſe things, without being forced to defend them, by ſhewing how convenient it is for the People to be told ſtrange Stories of Saints, on purpoſe to nouriſh Devotion in them: To which end, they ſay, it ſignifies not much, whether they were true or no: And withal they aſſert the Lawfulneſs of Equivocations, and Mental Reſervations, and doing things, not otherwiſe juſtifiable, for the Honour of their Church and Religion; And I ſhall freely confeſs to you, if I found any countenance to ſuch things as theſe, from the Doctrine or Practice of the Apoſtles, it would give me too juſt a ground for ſuſpicion as to what they deliver'd. For if they allowed Equivocations or Mental Reſervations, how could I poſſibly know what they meant by any thing they ſaid? For that which was neceſſary to make the Propoſition true, lay without my reach in the Mind of another; and while they ſo firmly atteſted that Chriſt was riſen from the Dead, they might underſtand it of a Spiritual or Myſtical Reſurrection; but if they ſhould be found to allow Lying or Cheating for the Cauſe of Religion, their Credit would be gone with me; for how could I be any longer ſure of the Truth of one Word they ſaid? I ſhould be ſo far from thinking them Infallible, that I could not but ſuſpect them to have a deſign to deceive me. The firſt thing therefore we are to look at in Perſons who require our belief, is the ſtricteſt Veracity; if they falter in this, they expoſe themſelves to the ſuſpicion of all but credulous Fools. But we no where find greater plainneſs and ſincerity required, no where more ſtrict and ſevere Prohibitions of Diſſimulation in Religion, nor more general Precepts about ſpeaking Truth, than in the Writings of the New Teſtament. But might not all this be done with the greater Artifice to prevent ſuſpicion? Suſpicion is a thing, which he that ſet Bounds to the Sea, can ſet no Bounds to; if Men will give way to it, without Reaſon, there can be no end of it. For the moſt effectual ways to prevent it, will ſtill afford new matter and occaſion for it. If Men do uſe the utmoſt Means that are poſſible, to aſſure others of their ſincerity, and they will not believe them, but ſtill ſuſpect the deſign to be ſo much deeper laid; there is no way left poſſible to ſatisfy ſuch Men; their ſuſpicion is a Diſeaſe incurable by rational Means, and ſuch Perſons deſerve to be given over as paſt all Remedy. If Men act like prudent Men, they will judge according to the Reaſon of Things; but if they entertain a jealouſie of all Mankind, and the moſt of thoſe who give them the greateſt aſſurance they have no Intention to deceive them, it is to no purpoſe to go about to ſatisfie ſuch Perſons, for that very Undertaking makes them more ſuſpicious. If the Apoſtles therefore gave as much ground as ever any Perſons did, or could do, that they had no deſign to impoſe upon the World, but proceeding with all the fairneſs and openneſs, with the greateſt Evidence of their Sincerity, there can be no reaſon to faſten upon them the Imputation of cunning Men who made it their buſineſs to deceive others.

2. This will more appear if we conſider the Matters deliver'd by them, and the nature of their Doctrine. For if the Chriſtian Religion were only a contrivance of the firſt Preachers of it, it muſt by the event be ſuppoſed that they were very ſubtle Men, who in ſo little time, and againſt ſo great oppoſition could prevail over both Jews and Gentiles; but if we reflect on the nature of their Doctrine, we can never imagine that theſe Men did proceed by the ſame Methods that Men of ſubtilty do make uſe of. If it were their own Contrivance, it was in their Power to have framed it as they thought fit themſelves; and in all probability, they would have done it in a way moſt likely to be ſucceſsful; but the Chriſtian Religion was ſo far from it, as though they had induſtriouſly deſigned to advance a Religion againſt the Genius and Inclination of all Mankind. For it neither gratifies the voluptuous in their Pleaſures, nor the Ambitious in their deſires of External Pomp and Greatneſs, nor the Covetous in their Thirſt after Riches; but lays a ſevere reſtraint on all thoſe common and prevailing Paſſions of Mankind; which Mahomet well underſtood, when he ſuited his Religion to them. Chriſtianity was neither accommodated to the Temper and Genius either of Jews or Gentiles: The Jews were in great expectation of a Temporal Prince at that Time to deliver them from the Roman Slavery; and every one that would have ſet up for ſuch a Meſſias, might have had Followers enough among them, as we find afterwards by the Attempts of Barchocebas and others. But the Meſſias of the Chriſtians was ſo directly contrary to their Hopes and Expectations, being a poor and ſuffering Prince, that this ſet them the more againſt his Followers, becauſe they were hereby fruſtrated of their greateſt Hopes, and defeated in their moſt pleaſing Expectations: But beſides, if they would have taken in the Moſaick Law, it might in probability have ſuceeded better; but this St. Paul would by no means hear of. But if they rejected Jews, methinks, they ſhould have been willing to have had ſome Aſſiſtance from the Gentiles. No, they charged them with Idolatry wherever they came; and would not join in any parts of their Worſhip with them, nor ſo much as Eat of the remainder of their Sacrifices. But ſuppoſing they had a mind to ſet up wholly a new Sect of their own; yet we ſhould think they ſhould have framed it after the moſt plauſible manner, and left out all things that were moſt liable to Reproach and Infamy: But this they were ſo far from, that the moſt contemptible part of the Chriſtian Religion, viz. A crucified Saviour, they inſiſt the moſt upon, and preach it on all Occaſions, and in compariſon of it, ſtrangely deſpiſe all the Wiſdom and Philoſophy of the Greeks. What did theſe Men mean, if Chriſtianity had been only a Contrivance of theirs? If they had but left out this one Circumſtance, in all human probability, the excellent moral Precepts in Chriſtianity would have been highly magnified among all thoſe who had been bred up under the Inſtructions of Philoſophers. Nay, they would not make uſe of the moſt commendable Methods of Human Wiſdom; nor do as the Jeſuits have done in China, make Men have a better Opinion of the Religion they brought, for their Skill in Mathematicks and Aſtronomy; but as much as it was poſſible, to let the World ſee it was no contrivance of Humane Wiſdom, they ſhunned all the Ways of ſhewing it in the manner of its Propagation. Nay, when the People would have given the Apoſtles Divine Worſhip, never were vain Men more concerned to have it, than they to oppoſe it; And do theſe things look like the Actions of Men that deſigned only to make themſelves great, by being the Heads of a new Sect of Religion?

3. Men that made it their deſign to deceive the World, if they had thought it neceſſary to bring in any matter of Story concerning the Author of their Religion would have placed it at ſuch a diſtance of Time, that it was not capable of being diſproved: As it is apparent in the Heathen Mythologie; for the Stories were ſuch, as no Perſon could ever pretend to confute them otherwiſe than by the inconſiſtency of them with the common Principles of Religion. But if we ſuppoſe Chriſtianity to have been a meer Device, would the Apoſtles have been ſo ſenſeleſs to have laid the main Proof of their Religion on a thing which was but newly acted, and which they were very capable of enquiring into all the Circumſtances that related to it, viz. The Reſurrection of Chriſt from the Dead. We may ſee by the whole deſign of the New Teſtament, the great Streſs of Chriſtianity was laid upon the Truth of this; to this Chriſt himſelf appealed before-hand; to this all the Apoſtles refer as the mighty confirmation of their Religion; and this they deliver as a thing which themſelves had ſeen, and had converſed with him for Forty Days together, with all the demonſtrations imaginable of a true and real Body: And that not to one or two credulous Perſons, but ſo many of them who were hard to be ſatisfied, and one, not without the moſt ſenſible Evidence; but beſides theſe, they tell us of 500 at once who ſaw him, whereof many were then living when thoſe things were written. Now I pray tell me what Religion in the World ever put it ſelf upon ſo fair a Trial as this? Of a plain Matter of Fact as capable of being atteſted as any could be. Why did not Amida, or Brahma, or Xaca, or any other of the Authors of the preſent Religions of the Eaſt-Indies? Why did not Orpheus, or Numa, or any other introducers of Religious Cuſtoms among the Greeks or Romans? Or Mahomet among the Arabians put the iſſue of the Truth of their Religion on ſuch a plain and eaſie tryal as this? If you ſay, That Chriſt appeared only to his Friends, who were ready to believe ſuch things, and not among his Enemies: I anſwer, That though they were his Friends, yet they were very hard to be perſuaded of the Truth of it at firſt; and afterwards gave larger Teſtimonies of their Fidelity than the Teſtimony of the greateſt Enemies would have been; for we ſhould have had only their bare Words for it, (if they would have given that, which is very queſtionable, conſidering their dealing with the other Miracles of Chriſt:) But the Apoſtles manifeſted their ſincerity by all real Proofs that could be thought ſufficient to ſatisfie Mankind; appealing to the very Perſons who were concerned the moſt in it, having a hand in the Death of Chriſt, declaring their greateſt readineſs to ſuffer any thing rather than deny the Truth of it, and laying down their Lives at laſt for it. If all this had been a mere Fiction, how unlikely is it, that among ſo many as were conſcious of it, no one Perſon by Hopes or Fears, by Flatteries or Threatnings, could ever be prevailed upon to deny the Truth of it. If there had been any ſuch thing, what triumphing had there been among the Jews; and no doubt his Name had been recorded to Poſterity among the Writers both of Jews and Gentiles that were profeſſed Enemies of Chriſtianity. But they are all wonderfully ſilent in this matter; and inſtead of ſaying enough to overthrow the Truth of Chriſtianity, as you ſeem to ſuggeſt, I do aſſure you, I am mightily confirmed in the Belief of the Truth of it, by carefully obſerving the ſlightneſs of the Objections that were made againſt it, by its moſt profeſſed Enemies.

But you ſeem to imply, That all this Story concerning Chriſt was invented long after the pretended Time of his being in the World, Why may not you as well ſuſpect, that Julius Cæſar lived before Romulus; or that Auguſtus lived at the Siege of Troy? For you might as well reject all Hiſtory upon ſuch grounds as thoſe you aſſign; and think Mahomet as right in his Chronology, as the Bible. It is time for us to burn all our Books, if we have lived in ſuch a Cheat all this while. Methinks you might as well aſk, whether Lucretia were not Pope Joan? Or Alexander the Sixth, one of the Roman Emperors? Or whether Luther were not the Emperor of Turkey? For there is no greater evidence of any Hiſtory in the World, than there is, that all the Things reported in the New Teſtament were done at that time, when they are pretended to be.

4. Therefore we offer this Story of the New Teſtament to be compared with all the Circumſtances of that Age, delivered by any other Hiſtorians, to try if any inconſiſtencies can be found therein: Which is the moſt reaſonable way can be taken to diſprove any Hiſtory. If it could be proved, that there could be no ſuch Taxation of the Empire as is mention'd in the Time of Auguſtus, that Herod did not live in that Age, or that the Jews were not under the Roman Government, or that there were no High-Prieſts at that time, nor the Sects of Phariſees and Saducees, or that there were any other remarkable Characters of Time ſet down in the Hiſtory of the New Teſtament, which could be manifeſtly diſproved; there were ſome pretence to call in Queſtion the Truth of the Story; but there is not the leaſt Foundation for any ſcruple on this account; all things agreeing ſo well with the trueſt Accounts we have of that Age, both from Joſephus and the Roman Hiſtory. I ſhall not inſiſt on the particular Teſtimony of Joſephus concerning Chriſt, becauſe we need it not; and if thoſe who queſtion it, would proceed with the ſame ſeverity againſt many other particular Paſſages in good Authors, they might as well call them in queſtion as they do that; ſince it is confeſſed, that all the ancient Manuſcripts have it in them, and ſuppoſing that it doth not come in well, muſt we ſuppoſe it impoſſible for Joſephus to write incoherently? Yet this is the main Argument that ever I have ſeen urged againſt this Teſtimony of Joſephus. But I ſay, we need it not; all other things concurring in ſo high a degree to prove the Truth of the Hiſtory of Chriſt. Yet ſince you ſeem to expreſs ſo much doubtfulneſs concerning it, as though it were framed when there was no one living capable of diſproving it; give me leave to ſhew you the great abſurdity of ſuch a Suppoſition. 1. Becauſe we have the plain Teſtimonies of the greateſt Enemies of Chriſtianity, that there was ſuch a Perſon as Chriſt was, who ſuffered according to the Scripture Story. For Tacitus not only mentions the Chriſtians as ſuffering at Rome for their Religion in the Time of Nero, (Annal. 15.) but ſaith, That the Author of this Religion was one Chriſt, who ſuffered under Pontius Pilate, Procurator of Judea, in the Time of Tiberius; which is an irrefragable Teſtimony of the Truth of the Story concerning Chriſt, in an Age, when if it had been falſe, nothing could have been more eaſily detected than ſuch a Fiction, by the number of Jews which were continually at Rome: And neither Julian, nor Celſus, nor Porphyry, nor Lucian did ever queſtion the Truth of the Story it ſelf; but only upbraided the Chriſtians for attributing too much to Chriſt. 2. If there were really ſuch a Perſon as Chriſt was, who ſuffered as Tacitus ſaith, then the whole Story could not be a Fiction, but only ſome part of it; and theſe additional parts muſt either be contrived by the Apoſtles, or after their Time: Not after their Time, for then they muſt be added after Chriſtianity was received in the World, for that, as appears by Tacitus, was ſpread in the Apoſtles Times as far as Rome; and if theſe parts were not received with it; the Cheat would preſently have been diſcover'd as ſoon as broached, by thoſe who had embraced Chriſtianity before: And beſides, Tertullian in his Time appeals to the authentick Writings of the Apoſtles themſelves, which were then extant, wherein the ſame things were contained that we now believe: If theſe things then were forged, it muſt be by the Apoſtles themſelves; and I dare now appeal to you, whether ever any Story was better capable of being diſproved than this was, if it had not been true, ſince it was publiſhed in that very Time and Place where the Perſons were living, who were moſt concerned to diſprove it: As appears by the hatred of the Jews to the Chriſtians, both then and ever ſince: which is a very obſervable Circumſtance for proving the Truth of Chriſtian Religion; for the Jews and Chriſtians agreed in the Divine Revelations of old, the Chriſtians believed moreover, that Chriſt was the Meſſias promiſed; this Chriſt lived and died among the Jews his Enemies; his Apoſtles preached, and wrought Miracles among their moſt inveterate Enemies, which Men that go about to deceive never care to do: And to this Day the Jews do not deny the Matters of Fact, but look on them as inſufficient to prove Jeſus of Nazareth to have been the Meſſias: Nay, Mahomet himſelf, who in all probability would have overthrown the whole Story of the New Teſtament, if he could have done it with any colour, yet ſpeaks very honourably of Chriſt and of the great Things which were ſaid and done by him.

5. That there is nothing in the Chriſtian Religion, unbecoming the Majeſty, or Holineſs, or Truth of a Divine Revelation. As to the Precepts, you acknowledge their excellency; and the Promiſes chiefly refer either to Divine Grace, or future Glory; And what is there herein unbecoming God? And as to what concerns the Truth of it, we have as great Characters of that throughout, as it is poſſible for us to expect; there appearing ſo much Simplicity, Sincerity, Candour, and Agreement in all the parts of it. Some Men would have been better pleaſed, it may be, if it had been all written by one Perſon, and digeſted into a more exact Method, and ſet forth with all the Lights and Ornaments of Speech. This would have better become an Invention of Men, but not a Revelation of God: Plainneſs and Simplicity have a natural greatneſs above Art and Subtilty; and therefore God made choice of many to write, and at ſeveral times, that by comparing them we may ſee how far they were from contriving together, and yet how exactly they agree in all things which Men are concerned to believe. But you ſay, We have many Infirmities of the Apoſtles diſcovered therein, their Heats and Animoſities one againſt another. But I pray conſider; 1. How came you to know theſe things; Is it not by their own Writings? And if they had been ſuch, who minded only their Applauſe, had it not been as eaſie to have concealed theſe things, and would they not as certainly have done it, if that had been their aim? If St. Paul ſeems to boaſt, doth he not do it with that conſtraint to himſelf, as a Man that is forced to do it for his own vindication againſt malicious Enemies? And who ever denied a Man of a generous Mind the liberty of ſpeaking for himſelf? 2. But ſuppoſe they had Infirmities and Heats among them, doth this prove that God could not make uſe of them as his Inſtruments to declare his Truth to the World? Then it will follow, that God muſt never reveal his Will by Men, but by Voices from Heaven, or Angels, or the aſſumption of the Humane Nature by the Divine. But, if God be not denied the liberty of imploying meer Men, we cannot find ſo great evidences of Piety and Zeal, of Humility and Self-denial, of Patience and Magnanimity, of Innocency and univerſal Charity in any Men as were in the Apoſtles; And therefore did appear with the moſt proper Characters of Embaſſadors from Heaven. And I dare venture the compariſon of them with the beſt Philoſophers, as to the greateſt and moſt excellent Virtues, for which they were the moſt admired; notwithſtanding the mighty difference as to their Education; allowing but the ſame Truth as to the Story of the New Teſtament, which we yield to Xenophon, or Diogenes Laertius, or any other Writers concerning them.

But what is it then which you object againſt the Writings of the New Teſtament, to make them inconſiſtent with the Wiſdom of God? I find but two things in the Papers you ſent me. 1. Want of the continuance of the Power of Miracles, which you ſay is promiſed. Mark 16. 17.

2. The number of the Beaſt in the Revelations. But, Good Sir, conſider what it is to call in queſtion a Divine Revelation for ſuch Objections as theſe are? Muſt there be no Revelation, unleſs you underſtand every Prophecy, or the extent of every Promiſe? Be not ſo injurious to your own Soul, for the ſake of ſuch Objections, to caſt away the great Aſſurance which the Chriſtian Religion gives us, as to the pardon of Sin upon Repentance here, and eternal Happineſs in another World. Would you reject all the Writings of Plato, becauſe you do no more underſtand ſome part of his Timæus than the number of 666? You muſt have a very nice Faith, that can bear with no Difficulties at all, ſo that if there be but one or two hard things that you cannot digeſt, you muſt throw up all the beſt Food you have taken; at this rate you muſt ſtarve your Body, as well as ruin your Soul. But of theſe places afterwards.

3. I have hitherto removed the Grounds of Suſpicion, I now come to ſhew the poſitive Teſtimonies of their Sincerity which the Apoſtles ſhewed, which were greater than were ever given to any other Matter of Fact in the World. I will then ſuppoſe the whole Truth of the Chriſtian Doctrine to be reduced to this one Matter of Fact, Whether Chriſt did riſe from the dead or no? for (as I have ſaid already) it is plain, the Apoſtles put the main force of all that they ſaid upon the Truth of this; and often declared, that they were appointed to be the Witneſſes of this thing. Now let us conſider how it is poſſible for Men to give the higheſt aſſurance of their Sincerity to others; and that muſt be either by giving the utmoſt Teſtimony that Men can give; or by giving ſome Teſtimony above that of Men, which cannot deceive, which is the Teſtimony of God.

1. They gave the utmoſt Teſtimony that meer Men could give of their Fidelity. I know no better way we have for a full Aſſurance, as to any humane Teſtimony, than to conſider what thoſe Circumſtances are, which are generally allowed to accompany Truth, and if we have the Concurrence of all theſe, we have as much as can be expected: For nothing that depends on Teſtimony can be proved by Mathematical Demonſtration. But notwithſtanding the want of this, either we may have ſufficient ground to aſſent to Truth upon Teſtimony, or there can be no difference known between Truth and Falſhood by Humane Teſtimony; which overthrows all Judicial Proceedings among Men; the Juſtice whereof doth ſuppoſe not only the Veracity of Humane Teſtimony: But that it may be ſo diſcerned by others, that they may ſafely rely upon it. Now the main things to be regarded as to the Truth of Humane Teſtimony, are theſe: 1. If Men teſtifie nothing but what they ſaw. 2. If they teſtifie it at no long diſtance of time from the thing done. 3. If they teſtifie it plainly, and without doubtful Expreſſions. 4. If a great number agree in the ſame Teſtimony. 5. If they part with all that is valuable to Mankind, rather than deny the Truth of what they have teſtified! And where all theſe concur, it is hardly poſſible to ſuppoſe greater evidence to be given of the Truth of a Thing; and now I ſhall ſhew that all theſe do exactly agree to the Apoſtle's Teſtimony concerning the Reſurrection of Chriſt.

1. They teſtified nothing but what they ſaw themſelves. The Laws of Nations do ſuppoſe that greater credit is to be given to Eye-witneſſes than to any others, thence the Rule in the Civil Law, Teſtimonium de auditu regulariter non valet: Becauſe, ſay the Civilians and Canoniſts, Witneſſes are to teſtifie the Truth, and not barely the Poſſibility of things.

That which Men ſee, they can teſtifie whether they are or not: That which Men only hear, may be, or not be; and their Teſtimony is not of the Fact, but is looked on as more uncertain, and ought to have greater Allowances given it; but the Apoſtles teſtified only what they ſaw and handled; and that after the moſt ſcrupulous enquiry into the Truth of Chriſt's Body, and after many Doubts and Suſpicions among themſelves about it; ſo that they did not ſeem haſtily and raſhly to believe what they afterwards declared to the World. Now a Body was a proper Object of Senſe, and no Tryal could be greater, or more accurate than theirs was; nor any ſatisfaction fuller than putting their Fingers into the very Wounds of the pierced Side.

2. They did not ſtay till the circumſtances might have ſlipt out of their Memories, before they teſtified theſe things; but very ſoon after, while the impreſſion of them was freſh upon them: If they had let theſe Matters alone for any long time, the Jews would have aſked them preſently, if theſe things were true, why did we not hear of them as ſoon as they were done? Therefore we ſee the Apoſtles, on the very Day of Pentecoſt, a little after Chriſt's Aſcenſion to Heaven, openly and boldly declare the Truth of theſe things, not in private Corners among a few Friends, but in the moſt ſolemn Meeting of their Nation from all Parts, which was the worſt time could have been choſen, if they had any intention to deceive.

3. They teſtifie it in as plain a manner as is poſſible, on purpoſe to prevent all Miſtakes of their meaning, This Jeſus hath God raiſed up, whereof we all are witneſſes; Therefore let all the Houſe of Iſrael know aſſuredly, that God hath made that ſame Jeſus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Chriſt. Men that had a mind to deceive, would have uſed ſome more general and doubtful Words, than theſe were. Acts 2. 32. 36.

4. If this had been teſtified by one ſingle Witneſs, the World would have ſuſpected the Truth of his Teſtimony; for according to the Rule in the Civil Law, in the Caſe of Teſtimony, Vox unius, vox nullius eſt: But this was teſtified by very many, not merely by the Twelve Apoſtles, but by Five hundred at once; among whom ſome might be ſuppoſed to have ſo much Honeſty, or at leaſt capable of being perſuaded to have diſcovered the Impoſture, if they had in the leaſt ſuſpected any.

5. But that which adds the greateſt weight to all this, is, that there was not one of all the Apoſtles, and ſcarce any one of the reſt, but expoſed themſelves to the utmoſt Hazards and Dangers, rather than deny or retract the Truth of what they had witneſſed. If the People had been careleſs and indifferent about Religion, it is poſſible Men might have gone on in a Lie ſo long, till they had gotten Intereſt enough to maintain it; but no ſooner did the Apoſtles appear, witneſſing theſe things, but they met with an early and vigorous oppoſition, and that from the chiefeſt Men in Power, who made it their buſineſs to ſuppreſs them. Now in this Caſe they were put to this Choice, if they would renounce or conceal the Truth of what they teſtified, they might preſently enjoy Eaſe, and it may be Rewards too; but if they went on, they muſt look for nothing but the ſharpeſt Perſecution; and this they met with almoſt in all Places; and is it conceivable, that Men ſhould be ſo fond of a Lie, to forſake all and follow it, and at laſt to take up their Croſs for it? If Credit and Intereſt in the Hearts of People, might carry a Man on a great way in the Deluſion, yet he would be loth to die for it; and yet there was never a one of the Apoſtles, but ventured his Life for the Truth of this; and all but one, they tell us, did ſuffer Martyrdom for it. I pray, Sir, conſider, where you ever meet with any thing like this, that ſo many Men ſhould ſo reſolutely die, for what themſelves, at the ſame time, knew to be a Lie; and that they muſt certainly do, if it were all a Contrivance of their own Heads.

2. But although in theſe things they went as high as it was poſſible for humane Teſtimony to go, yet they had ſomething beyond all this, which was a concurrence of a Divine Teſtimony, in the miraculous Gifts and Operations of the Holy Ghoſt. And this we aſſert to be the higheſt Teſtimony can be given in the World, of the Truth of any thing, becauſe God will not employ his Power to deceive the World. And as all other Truth hath a Criterion proper to it; ſo this ſeems to be the proper Criterion of a Divine Teſtimony, that it hath the power of Miracles going along with it. For if we do ſuppoſe God to make known his Mind to the World, it is very reaſonable to believe there ſhould be ſome diſtinguiſhing note of what is immediately from God, and what comes only from the Inventions of Men; and what can be more proper to diſtinguiſh what comes from God, and what from Men, than to ſee thoſe things done, which none but God can do? But againſt this you object ſeveral things, which I ſhall eaſily and briefly anſwer.

1. You cannot tell what it is that Miracles do atteſt; not all their Doctrine, ſince Paul ſaid, ſome was not from the Lord. Anſw. Miracles do atteſt the Veracity of the Speaker, and by conſequence, the Truth of the Doctrine; not that you ſhould believe that to be from the Lord, which he ſaid was not; but that which he ſaid, was from the Lord. But when he makes ſuch a diſtinction himſelf, it is very unreaſonable to urge that as an Argument, that he had nothing from the Lord; it is much rather an Argument of his Candor and Ingenuity, that he would not pretend to Divine Revelation, when he had it not.

2. You would have it ſignified, what Doctrine it is which is atteſted by Miracles, ſince the Doctrines of Scripture lie in heaps and confuſion. Anſw. To what purpoſe ſhould any Doctrines be ſingled out to have the Seal of Miracles ſet to them, ſince it is their Divine Commiſſion to teach and declare the Will of God, which is ſealed by it? And what they did ſo teach and declare, is eaſily known by their Writings.

3. But why do not Miracles ſtill continue? Anſw. Becauſe there are no Perſons employ'd to teach any new Doctrines, and no Promiſe of Scripture doth imply any more: For the Signs which were to follow them that believe, were ſuch as tended to the firſt confirmation of the Chriſtian Faith; which being effected, their uſe ceaſed; and ſo to aſk why God doth not continue a Gift of Miracles to convince Men that the former were true, is to the ſame purpoſe as to aſk why God doth not make a New Sun, to ſatisfie Atheiſts that he made the Old?

4. But doth not the Scriptures ſay, that Wonders are not always to be taken as Confirmations of the Truth of Doctrine, ſince falſe Prophets may work Wonders, Deut. 13. 1. Anſw. That ſignifies no more, than that Wonders are not to be believed againſt the Principles of Natural Religion; or Revealed Religion already confirmed by greater Miracles: And that thoſe who would value ſuch a particular Sign above all the Series of Miracles their Religion was firſt eſtabliſhed by, may be juſtly left to their own Deluſions. You might as well object the lying Wonders of the Man of Sin, againſt all the Miracles of Chriſt and his Apoſtles. If God hath once done enough to convince Men, he may afterwards juſtly leave them to the tryal of their Ingenuity; as a Father that hath uſed great care to make his Son underſtand true Coyn, may afterwards ſuffer falſe to be laid before him, to try whether he will mind his being cheated or no?

5. But you may yet farther demand, What the Teſtimony of Miracles doth ſignifie to the Writings of the New Teſtament? Anſw. 1. The Miracles do ſufficiently prove the Authority of that Doctrine, which was delivered by thoſe who wrought Miracles, as Chriſt and his Apoſtles. 2. If there had been the leaſt ground to queſtion the Truth and Authority of theſe Writings, they had never been ſo univerſally received in thoſe Ages, when ſo many were concerned to enquire into the Truth of theſe things; for we ſee ſeveral of the Books were a long time examined, and at laſt, when no ſufficient reaſon could be brought againſt them, they were received by thoſe Churches, which at firſt ſcrupled the receiving them: And I am ſo far from thinking the Doubts of the firſt Ages any Argument againſt the Authority of a Book, that by the Objections of ſome againſt ſome of them, I am thereby aſſured, that they did not preſently receive any Book, becauſe it went under the Name of an Apoſtolical Writing: As I am the more confirmed in the belief of the Reſurrection of Chriſt, becauſe ſome of the Diſciples were at firſt very doubtful about it.

6. You may yet aſk, What doth all this ſignifie to the Writings of the Old Teſtament, which were written at a longer diſtance of Time from us, and in a more ignorant Age of the World? Anſw. There cannot be a more evident Proof of the Old Teſtament, than by the New: For if the New be true, the Old muſt be ſo, which was confirmed ſo plainly and evidently by it; our Saviour, and his Apoſtles appealing to Moſes and the Prophets on all occaſions. So that the ſame Miracles which prove their Teſtimony true, do at the ſame time prove the Divine Authority of the Old Teſtament, ſince it is ſo expreſly ſaid in the New, That Holy Men of God did ſpeak as they were moved by the Holy Ghoſt.

But after all this, you urge, That you have diſcover'd ſuch things in theſe Writings, as could not come from God, as

1. Contradictions in them. 2. Some things inconſiſtent with the Wiſdom of God. 3. Promiſes made that were never fulfilled. 4. Things ſo obſcure as no one can tell the meaning of them. Under theſe Four Heads I ſhall examine the particular Allegations you bring againſt the Scriptures.

1. Under the Head of Contradictions, you inſiſt on the Prophecy, Gen. 15. 13, 14, 15, 16. made to Abraham, concerning his Poſterity; compared with the Accompliſhment mentioned, Exod. 12. 40, 41. And the force of your Argument lies in this, That the Prophecy in Geneſis doth imply that the Servitude of the Children of Iſrael in Egypt was to be 40 Years; or 430 ſaith Exod. but both theſe are repugnant to other places of Scripture, which make their abode in Egypt not to exceed 215 Years; or at the higheſt, by the number of Generations could not exceed 350 Years, ſtretching them to the utmoſt advantage. To this which you lay ſo much weight upon, I anſwer diſtinctly,

1. By your own Confeſſion, ſuppoſing the 430 Years to begin from the Covenant made with Abraham, the accompliſhment mentioned, Exod. 12. 40. doth fall out exactly in the time of the Children of Iſraels going out of Egypt, for you have proved from Scripture, that from the Covenant with Abraham to Jacob's being in Egypt, were 215 Years; to which you add, that Coath being ſuppoſed 5 Years old at the going into

Egypt; and that at 70 Years he begat Amram, and that Amram at 70 begat Moſes, to which Moſes his 80 Years being added, makes up the other 215 Years, whereby we have the full 430 Years, by your own Computation. Now, Sir, I pray conſider what reaſon you have to charge the Scripture with Contradiction in a matter your ſelf acknowledges, ſo exactly accompliſhed in this way of Computation?

2. But you ſay, the Words will not bear this; becauſe they ſpeak of the 400 Years to expire in their ſervitude in Egypt. Anſw. For this we muſt conſider the importance of the Words both in Geneſis and Exodus. There is not a Word of Egypt mentioned in Geneſis, but only in general it is ſaid, Thy Seed ſhall be a Stranger in the Land that is not theirs, and ſhall ſerve them, and they ſhall afflict them 400 Years; and it will conduce very much to the right underſtanding this Prophecy, to conſider the main ſcope and deſign of it, which was not to tell Abraham how long they ſhould be in ſervitude to the Egyptians, but how long it would be before his Seed would come to the poſſeſſion of the promiſed Land: And it ſeems Abraham, by the Queſtion, Gen. 15. 7, 8. did expect to have the Inheritance of this Land in his own time: To this therefore God anſwers, by telling him, he meant no ſuch thing, but it was intended for his Seed, and that not ſuddenly neither, for they were to tarry till the iniquity of the Amorites ſhould be full, which would not be till the fourth Generation; and then his Seed ſhould after 400 Years, come to the Poſſeſſion of the promiſed Land; but in the mean time they were to ſojourn in a Land that was not theirs, and to meet with many hardſhips and difficulties. This is plainly the ſcope of this Prophecy, and by attending to it, the great Objections preſently appear without force; for the Land of Canaan, notwithſtanding the Promiſe, was by the Patriarchs themſelves looked on as a Land wherein they were Strangers. So Abraham ſaith, Gen. 23. 4, I am a Stranger and a Sojourner with you; and which is more remarkable in the Bleſſing of Jacob by Iſaac, to whom the Promiſe was made, it is ſaid, And give thee the Bleſſing of Abraham to thee, and to thy Seed, that thou mayeſt inherit the Land wherein thou art a Stranger, which God gave unto Abraham, Gen. 28. 4. Where the very ſame Word is uſed concerning Jacob, that is expreſſed in the Prophecy, Gen. 15. 13. So that the Patriarchs looked on themſelves as Strangers in the Land of Canaan, ſo long after the Promiſe made, and after the increaſe of the Seed of Abraham: And therefore the Land of Canaan was called Terra Peregrinationum, the Land wherein they were Strangers; Gen. 36. 7.— 37. 1. And when God was calling the People of Iſrael together out of Egypt, yet then the Land of Canaan was called by the very ſame Title, the Land of their Pilgrimage, wherein they were Strangers: Exod. 6. 4. And Pſ. 105. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13. where we have a full account of the Promiſe made to Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob, concerning the Inheritance of that Land, it is ſaid, that they were few, and Strangers in it, when they went from one Nation to another, from one Kingdom to another People. Which doth fully explain the meaning of the Prophecy in Geneſis, and that it is not to be reſtrained to the Servitude of the People of Iſrael in Egypt, but to be underſtood of their State of Pilgrimage for 400 Years, wherein they were to ſuffer great Hardſhips, before they ſhould come to the Inheritance of Canaan. This is no forced or unnatural Expoſition of the Words, as you ſeem to ſuggeſt; but to my Apprehenſion, very plain and eaſie, if we attend to the main ſcope and deſign of them, which was to acquaint Abraham how long it would be before the Prophecy were accompliſhed, and what the Condition of his Seed ſhould be the mean time, viz. That they ſhould have no Land which they ſhould call their own by Inheritance all that time, but they ſhould be expoſed to great Hardſhips, yea even to Servitude; but that Nation whom they ſhould ſerve, ſhould at laſt ſuffer for their ill uſage of them, and they ſhould come out of that Captivity with great Subſtance; and all this to be done in the Fourth Generation of the Amorites, when their Iniquities ſhould be arrived at the full height. All which Particulars were ſo remarkably accompliſhed at ſuch a diſtance of Time, and under ſuch improbable Circumſtances, that this very Prophecy were enough to convince an unprejudiced Mind, that it came from Divine Inſpiration. For where do we meet with any thing like this in the Hiſtories of other Nations? viz. A Prophecy to be accompliſhed 400 Years after, and the very manner foretold, which no humane Conjecture could reach to, ſince the manner of Deliverance of the People of Iſrael out of their Captivity in Egypt, was to all humane appearance ſo impoſſible a thing, eſpecially at ſuch a time when the Spirits of the People were ſunk and broken by ſo long a Slavery: And not only the manner foretold, but the accompliſhment happened to a Day, according to Exodus 12. 41. And it came to paſs at the end of the 430 Years, even the ſelf-ſame Day it came to paſs, that all the Hoſts of the Lord went out from the Land of Egypt. But againſt this you object, That the ſojourning is ſpoken of the Children of Iſrael in Egypt for 430 Years; which cannot hold good any ways; ſince, to make it up, the Times of Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, muſt be taken in, who could not be called the Children of Iſrael. Anſw. For the 430 Years, I grant, that according to St. Paul, they did commence from the Covenant made to Abraham, Gal. 3. 17. and that the 400 Years began from Iſaac's being owned for the Promiſed Seed; between which time the 30 Years were paſſed; and all appearance of difficulty is avoided, if we admit the reading of the beſt Copies of the L X X, which is in theſe Words, Ἡ δὲ παροίκησις τῶν υἱῶν Ἰσραὴλ, ἣν παρῴκησαν ἐν γῇ Αἰγύπτῳ, καὶ ἐν γῇ Χαναὰν, αὐτοὶ ϗ οἱ πατέρες αὐτῶν ἔτη τετρακόσια τριάκοντα, Now the ſojourning of the Children of Iſrael, who dwelt in Egypt and Canaan, they and their Fathers was 430 Years. This is the reading of our Alexandrian Copy, and the Complutenſian, and that of Aldus, and of Euſebius in his Chronicon, and of St. Hierome in his Tranſlation of it; and of the Church in St. Auguſtine's time, and afterwards; and leſt any ſhould reject this as a late Interpolation, or Gloſs received into the Text, beſides theſe Teſtimonies of the Antiquity of it, we find the very ſame in the Samaritan Copy, which the Enemies of it do allow to be as ancient as our Saviour's time. And that which very much confirms the Truth of this reading is, that the Jews themſelves follow the Senſe of it, who are the moſt eager Contenders for the Authority of the Hebrew Copy; who all agree, that the beginning of the Computation of the 430 Years is to be taken before the Children of Iſraels going into Egypt; and Menaſſeh Ben Iſrael contends with many others, that the 430 Years did begin from the Promiſe made to Abraham, and the 400 from the time of Iſaac, to which their moſt ancient Books of Chronology do agree, and to the ſame purpoſe ſpeak both Philo Judæus, and Joſephus; who although in one place he ſeems to make the Iſraelites affliction in Egypt to have been 400 Years, yet when he ſpeaks more particularly of it, he makes the time of their abode in Egypt to have been only 215, and the 430 to begin from Abraham's entrance into Canaan: The Targum of Jonathan begins the 430 from the Viſion of Abraham, and the 400 from the Birth of Iſaac; all which I mention, to let you ſee that the Jews themſelves do in Senſe concur with the Samaritan and Greek Copy; and therefore we have more reaſon to ſuſpect ſomething left out in the preſent Hebrew, than any thing added in thoſe Copies. But doth not this take off from the Authority of the Scripture? Not at all: For the only Queſtion is about the true Reading: And having the Conſent of the Samaritan, Alexandrian, and other Copies of the LXX, and of the ancient Church, and of the Jews themſelves, as to the Senſe of it, we have reaſon to look on this as the truer Reading; which is making no addition to the Scripture, either as to Perſons or Places, but only producing the more authentick Copy; much leſs is this Adding or Changing as we pleaſe, for if we did this without ſo much Authority as we have for it, you might as eaſily reject it as we produce it.

3. After all this, I do not ſee the mighty force of your Reaſon to charge the Scripture with Contradiction, ſuppoſing the 400 Years were to be ſpent in the Servitude of the Children of Iſrael in Egypt. I confeſs, when I found the Scripture ſo boldly, ſo frequently charged with no leſs than Contradiction, I expected ſomething like Demonſtration in the Caſe, eſpecially in this place which you choſe to put in the Front of all; but I do not find any thing like ſuch a proof of a Contradiction, ſuppoſing we ſhould allow the 400 Years to be ſpent in Egypt. Yes, ſay you, Coath was 5 Years old when he came down into Egypt, and when he had lived there 65 Years, he begat Amram, and Amram being 70 Years old, begat Moſes, to which Moſes his 80 Years being added, we have only 215 Years. But ſince the Scripture doth not aſſign, the particular Age of any of theſe, when they begat their Children, I ſee, no impoſſibility or repugnancy in the Suppoſition, that 400 Years ſhould paſs from Levi's going into Egypt, to the Eightieth of Moſes, any more than from Salmon's entrance into Canaan to the time of David, for no more are reckoned in Scripture than Boaz the Son of Salmon, by Raab, and Obed, and Jeſſe: So that by the ſame way, this latter may be explained, the former may be ſo too. If it be ſaid, That either they begat their Children at a great Age, or that the Scripture in Genealogies doth not ſet down all the intermediate Parents, but only the moſt eminent, (as Caleb is called the Son of Eſron, 1 Chron. 2. 9, 18. although there was at leaſt one between them) the very ſame Anſwer will ſerve to clear this part of the Chronology of Scripture from any appearance of Contradiction. Theſe things you might have found more largely deduced and fully handled by thoſe Learned Perſons, who have undertaken to clear the Chronology of Scripture; who were Men of more Judgment, than from any difficulty of this nature, to call in queſtion the Truth and Authority of the ſacred Scriptures! and although the Opinions of Chronologers, are like the City Clocks, which ſeldom agree, yet ſome come nearer the time of the Day than others do; and therefore you ought to examine and compare them before you pronounce ſo peremptorily about Contradictions in Scripture, which you have no reaſon to do, till you find that no one Hypotheſis among them will ſerve to free the Scripture from Contradiction: For otherwiſe, you do but blame the Sun, becauſe you cannot make the Clocks agree.

This is all I can find in your Papers under the Head of Contradictions; and I leave you now ſoberly to conſider, whether this place did afford you ſufficient ground for ſo heavy a Charge; but if you ſay, you have a great many more by you, but you ſent me this only for a Trial of my Skill; before you ſend any more, I beſeech you, Sir, to conſider,

1. How eaſily things do appear to be Contradictions to weak, or unſtudied, or prejudiced Minds, which after due conſideration appear to be no ſuch things. A deep prejudice finds a Contradiction in every thing; whereas in Truth, nothing but ill-will, and impatience of conſidering, made any thing, it may be, which they Quarrel at, appear to be ſo. If I had been of ſuch a quarrelſome Humour, I would have undertaken to have found out more Contradictions in your Papers, than you imagine, and yet you might have been confident you had been guilty of none at all. When I conſider the great Pains, and Learning, and Judgment, which hath been ſhewn by the Chriſtian Writers in the Explication of the Scriptures; and the raw, indigeſted Objections which ſome love to make againſt them, if I were to judge of things barely by the fitneſs of Perſons to judge of them, the diſproportion between theſe would appear out of all compariſon. A modeſt Man would in any thing of this nature ſay with himſelf, methinks, if there were ſuch Contradictions in the Bible, as now ſeem to me; ſo many Perſons of incomparable Abilities in the Firſt, and latter Ages of the Chriſtian Church, who have made it their buſineſs to enquire into theſe things, would have diſcerned them before me: And yet they retained a mighty veneration for the Scriptures, as coming from God himſelf; and therefore it may be only weakneſs of Judgment, want of Learning, or ſome ſecret Prejudice may make me ſuſpect theſe things; or elſe I muſt ſuſpect the honeſty of all thoſe Perſons who have pretended ſuch a Devotion to the Scriptures, and yet have believed them full of Contradictions.

2. Wherein the Contradiction appears. Is it in the main and weighty parts of the Religion revealed herein; or is it only in ſome ſmaller Circumſtances as to Time and Place? The great thing you are to look after, are the Matters thoſe Scriptures tell you your Salvation depends upon; and if there be a full Conſent and Agreement therein, you find enough for you to believe and practiſe. And if ſome Contradictions ſhould ſtill appear to you in ſmaller Matters, what follows from thence, but only that the ſame care was not taken about little, as about great things? And you ought to ſet that appearance of Contradiction in ſmall Matters, together with the real conſent in the Things of the higheſt Importance; and from thence rather to infer, that this was no Combination or deſign to deceive others; for ſuch Perſons take the greateſt care to prevent ſuſpicion, by their exactneſs in every minute Circumſtance; and ſometimes the over-much care to prevent ſuſpicion doth raiſe it the more.

3. What ways have been uſed by Men of Judgment and Learning, to clear thoſe places from the charge of Contradiction. For, not one of the Objections you can ſtart now, but hath been conſidered over and over; and all the difficulties that belong to it examined; If you will not take the Pains to do this, it is plain you do not deſire ſatisfaction, but only ſeek for a Pretence to cavil; eſpecially, if you only ſearch the weakeſt or moſt injudicious Writers on the Scriptures, and endeavour to expoſe their Opinions, without taking notice of what others have ſaid with more clear and evident Reaſon. This ſhews either want of Judgment in chooſing ſuch Expoſitors, or want of Candor and fair dealing and a deſire of taking any advantage againſt the Scriptures.

4. How hard a matter it is for us at this diſtance to underſtand exactly the grounds of Chronology, or the manner of computation of Times uſed ſo long ago: and therefore in all difficulties of this nature, we ought to make the faireſt allowances that may be, conſidering withal, that Eſcapes and Errors are no where more eaſily committed by Tranſcribers, than in numbers: and that it is a very unreaſonable thing, that a Book otherwiſe deſerving to be thought the beſt Book in the World, ſhould be ſcorned and rejected, becauſe there appears ſome difference in the computation of Times. We do not ſo exactly know the manner of the Hebrew Chronology, nor, the nature of their Year, or Intercalations, nor the Cuſtoms of their Genealogies, nor the allowance to be made for Interregnums, ſo as to be able to define peremptorily in theſe things; but it is ſufficient to ſhew, that there is no improbability in the Accounts that are given; and no ſufficient reaſon can be drawn from thence to reject the Authority of the Scriptures.

2. I come to conſider the places you object, as containing things inconſiſtent with the Wiſdom or Goodneſs of God, according to a rational perſwaſion; and thoſe are either, 1. From the Laws of Moſes. 2. From the expreſs Story of the Bible, or Actions of the Prophets.

1. From the Laws of Moſes: Your firſt Objection is from Exod. 21. 7. Where a Man is ſuppoſed to ſell his Daughter; which you ſay, it is incredible to believe that God ſhould permit; becauſe it implies unnatural Affection and Covetouſneſs in the Father. But, Sir, 1. You do not conſider, that this is barely a proviſional Law, and is not the permiſſion of the thing, ſo much as the regulation of it, ſuppoſing it to be done, i. e. in caſe a Man ſhould part with his intereſt in his Daughter to another Perſon, upon an extraordinary caſe of Neceſſity, as the Jews underſtand it; yet then, ſhe was not to be in the Condition of a Servant, but to be either Betrothed to the Perſon who receiv'd her, or to his Son; which was intended for the reſtraint of promiſcuous Buying and Selling Daughters, merely for the ſatisfaction of Luſt. The Jews who certainly beſt underſtood their own Judicial Laws, do ſay, that this was never to be done but where there was a preſumption of ſuch a betrothing; for no Man could ſell his Daughter to thoſe to whom it was unlawful to marry by their Law; ſo that this was looked on as a kind of Eſpouſals of a young Girl, taken into Wardſhip by another; but ſo, that if ſhe were not Betrothed, ſhe was to remain her Six Years during her Minority, as the Jews underſtand it; unleſs ſhe were redeemed, or ſet Free, or the Jubilee came, or the Maſter died, or the time of her Minority expired.

2. The caſe of Neceſſity being ſuppoſed, it hath been thought lawful for Parents to make Advantage by their Children, not only by the Jews, but by other Nations, who have been in the greateſt Eſteem for Wiſdom. For by the Law of the 12 Tables, among the Romans, the Father had the liberty of Selling his Son three times for his own Advantage, as Dionyſ. Halicarnaſſeus relates; and before that time, it was not only in Uſe among the Romans, but in ſuch Eſteem among them, that upon the review of their Laws the Decemviri durſt not leave it out; but by one of the Laws of Numa Pompilius, it was reſtrained to times before Marriage, for in caſe the Son had the Fathers conſent to Marry, he could not ſell him afterwards, as the ſame Author tells us. This Law continued in force among them till Chriſtianity prevailed in the Roman Empire, for although there were a prohibition of Diocletian againſt it, yet that ſignified nothing, till Conſtantine took care, That ſuch indigent Parents ſhould be relieved out of the publick Charge, Cod. Theodoſ. l. 11. tit. 27. 2. And yet after this, the Cuſtom did continue, when the Parents were in great Want, as appears by a Law of Theodoſius, Cod. 3. tit. 3. Omnes quos Parentum miſeranda fortuna in ſervitium dum victum requirunt addixit, ingenuitati priſtinæ reformentur. And it farther appears, that even in Conſtantin's time, notwithſtanding the Law made by him, Parents would ſtill, when they thought themſelves overcharged with Children, part with their Intereſt in them to others for advantage, but it was chiefly while they were ſanguinolenti, as the Law expreſſes it, i. e. new Born. Cod. Theod. l. 5. tit. 8. By the Laws of Athens, before Solon's time, Parents might ſell their Children, as appears by Plutarch, in his Life; and the ſame Philoſtratus reports of the Phrygians, l. 3. vit. Apollon. Tyan. and the like Cuſtom doth obtain among the Chineſes to this Day, if Perſons do think themſelves unable to bring up their Children themſelves. And there are two things to be ſaid for it. 1. The natural Obligation lying on Children to provide for their Parents in Neceſſity, by any way they are able. 2. The probability of better Education under more able Perſons; and therefore the Thebans had a Law, That Parents in caſe of Poverty, were to bring their Children to the Magiſtrate, as ſoon as they were Born, who put them out to ſuch as were judged fit to bring them up, and to have their Service for their Reward.

Ælian. Var. Hiſt. l. 2. c. 7.

But however, you ſay, This place implies a toleration of having many Wives, becauſe it is ſaid, if he take him another Wife, ver. 10. I do not deny that the Moſaical Law did ſuppoſe the practice of Polygamy; but as it doth no where expreſly allow it, neither doth it expreſly condemn it. And although we ſay, the Chriſtian Law is far more excellent, which reduceth Marriage to its firſt Inſtitution; yet you will find it a hard Matter to prove ſuch a permiſſion of Polygamy as this was, to be ſo repugnant to the Law and Principles of Nature, as from thence to infer, that this Law of Moſes could not be from God: You might have ſaid the ſame about the Matter of Divorce, which was permitted them; Chriſt ſaith, for the hardneſs of their Hearts: Which ſhews, that God doth not always require that from Men which is beſt pleaſing to himſelf; and that as to his Political Government, he may not always puniſh that which is not ſo pleaſing to him.

The next Law you quarrel at is that Deut. 22. 13, &c. about the trial of Virginty: Which you object againſt, as immodeſt, and uncertain, and therefore unbecoming the Wiſdom of God. So, many Cuſtoms of thoſe elder Times of the World, and of the Eaſtern Parts to this Day ſeem very ſtrange to us, that are not ſo well acquainted with the Reaſons of them. Methinks, it better becomes our Modeſty in ſuch caſes, to queſtion our underſtanding thoſe Cuſtoms, than preſently to caſt ſo much diſparagement on the Author of them. If you had been offended at the literal Senſe of thoſe Words, many of the Jews themſelves ſay, they are to be underſtood Figuratively of the Evidence that was to be brought and laid open before the Judges, on behalf of the defamed Perſon. And both Joſephus and Philo omit the laying open the Cloth. But ſuppoſing it to be taken in the plaineſt literal Senſe, I have two Things to ſay in vindication of this Law. 1. That however uncertain ſome Phyſicians have thought that way of Tryal to have been in theſe parts of the World; yet it is generally agreed to have held for the Eaſtern parts, by the moſt ſkilful Phyſicians among the Arabians: And a Cuſtom of the ſame nature is ſaid by good Authors to have been obſerved among the Egyptians, and other Africans, as well as the Arabians; ſo that this could not be thought ſo ſtrange or immodeſt among the Inhabitants of thoſe Parts: And it is very probable that ſome particulars, as to the Practice of theſe Laws are not ſet down, which might very much tend to the certainty of them, as the Age of the married Perſons, which was moſt likely then, as it is to this Day in the Eaſtern parts, very early, the Jews ſay, at 12 Years old, which would make the Tryal more certain.

2. As to the Modeſty of it, you are to conſider, that the Law was intended to keep Perſons from unjuſt defamations, and ſuch a way of Tryal was therefore pitch'd upon to deter Perſons from ſuch defamations; which Men might otherwiſe have been more ready to, becauſe of the liberty of Divorce, and the Advantage they had in ſaving the Dower, if they could prove the Party vitiated before Marriage; therefore all the proof of that Nature was to be paſſed ſoon after the conſummation of Marriage, which being agreed then by all the Friends, there was to be no liberty left for Defamation afterwards; but in caſe any Man ſhould be guilty of it, the producing thoſe Evidences, which before they were agreed upon, ſhould be ſufficient to clear the Innocency of the Party accuſed. And therefore I look on this Law, as the Jews do on that of the rebellious Son, of which they ſay, that there is no inſtance of the practice of it; the Penalty threatned being ſo effectual to prevent the occaſion of it.

And ſuch in a great meaſure, I ſuppoſe the other Law mentioned by you to have been, viz. Of the Water of Jealouſy, which you make ſo ſtrange a matter of; and think it ſavours too much of a deſign to gratify the jealous Humour of the Jewiſh Nation: But you might have put a fairer conſtruction upon it, viz. That it was intended to prevent any occaſion of ſuſpicion being given to the Huſband, by too much familiarity with other Perſons; ſince the Law allowed ſo ſevere a Trial, in caſe the Wife after admonition did not forbear ſuch ſuſpected familiarity, but if you had looked on the Law, as it is, Num. 5. 12, 13, &c. you would have found, that the deſign of it was to keep Women from committing ſecret Adultery, by ſo ſevere a Penalty; yet withal allowing ſo much to a reaſonable Suſpicion, (for ſo the Jews underſtand it, with many Cautions and Limitations) that rather than married Perſons ſhould live under perpetual Jealouſies, he appointed this extraordinary way of Tryal, whereby Adultery was moſt ſeverely puniſhed, and the honour of Innocency publickly vindicated; which certainly are not ends at all unbecoming due Conceptions of God.

The laſt of the Jewiſh Laws, which you quarrel with is the prohibition of Uſury, in ſeveral places of Moſes his Law and the Pſalms: And from hence you fall into a long Diſcourſe to prove the lawfulneſs of Uſury: But to what purpoſe I beſeech you? For you were to prove, that God could never forbid it; you might have ſpared your pity for Men, as you think, blinded with Superſtition, and cheated with New and Aëry Notions: For by all that I can ſee by theſe Papers, ſome pretended Enemies to Superſtition have no better Eyes than their Neighbours, and are as eaſily cheated with groundleſs Fancies and Aëry Imaginations. The only thing to the buſineſs in that long Diſcourſe is this, That you cannot imagine that God ſhould make a Law ſo much to Mans inconvenience, and forbid him ſo nice and indifferent a thing, as moderate increaſe of Profit by letting out of Money, when it is allowed upon Lands, Houſes, and Trade, &c. To this I anſwer, That the Prohibition of Uſury to the Jewiſh Nation, was upon political Grounds peculiar to the Conſtitution of that People; as appears by the Words of the Law, Deut. 23. 19, 20. Thou ſhalt not lend to Uſury unto thy Brother— Unto a Stranger thou mayeſt lend upon Uſury; but none of the Laws which are founded upon common and moral Reaſons have ſuch Limitations as this; for God would never have ſaid, Thou ſhalt not commit Adultery with thy Brother's Wife; but with the Wife of a Stranger thou mayeſt. But there was this particular Reaſon for the prohibition of Uſury to the Jewiſh Nation: It pleaſed God to fix their Habitation, not upon the Sea-ſide, as Tyre and Sidon ſtood, but within Land where they had no conveniencies of Trading, but the Riches of the Nation lay in Agriculture and Paſturage: In which the Returns of Money are neither ſo quick nor ſo advantageous to make ſufficient compenſation for the Intereſt of the Money in the Time they have it: For the main thing valuable in Money is the advantage the Borrower makes of it; and where that is great, it ſeems reaſonable that the Perſon whoſe the Money is, ſhould have a proportionable ſhare of the Advantage made by it; but where Perſons borrow only for preſent Occaſions to ſupply their Neceſſities, there it is only an Act of Kindneſs to lend, and it would be unreaſonable to preſs upon, or take Advantage by anothers Neceſſities. And this ſeems to have been the caſe among the Jews; they were only the Poor that wanted Money for preſent Neceſſities; the Rich had no way to imploy it in Trading, unleſs that they lent to the Tyrian Merchants, which it was lawful by their Law to do; now if they took Uſury of their own People, it muſt be of thoſe whoſe urgent Neceſſity, and not hopes of a mighty Increaſe by it made them borrow, and therefore it was a very juſt and reaſonable Law to forbid Uſury among them: which I believe he would never have done, if he had placed the Jews upon the Coaſts of Phœnicia, where Trading was ſo much in requeſt.

Theſe are all the Laws which you have picked out of the whole Body of the Jewiſh Law, to repreſent it unbecoming the Wiſdom of God: And now I pray, Sir, look back again upon them, ſee how few, how ſmall, how weak your Objections are; and compare them with the Weight, and Juſtice, and Prudence, and Piety, expreſſed in all the reſt, and I hope you will find cauſe to be aſhamed of ſpeaking ſo harſhly of thoſe Laws, ſo well accommodated to thoſe Ages of the World, and the Condition of that People for whom they were appointed.

2. I now conſider what you object againſt the Story of the Bible.

1. That Paſſage of Moſes, Exod. 32. 32. Blot me out of thy Book which thou haſt written: Where your deſign is to ſhew, that Moſes prayed to be damned, and that this was a very irrational thing; and ſavouring more of Paſſion than of the Spirit of God. But what if Moſes meant no ſuch thing as Damnation? As there is not any word in the Context relating that ways, but all the deſign of that Chapter is about a Temporal Puniſhment, which was a preſent Deſtruction of the People for their Sins. And the Book out of which he prayed God to blot him, ſeems to me to be no other than the Roll of Gods choſen People, who were to poſſeſs the Land of Canaan: For ſo ספר properly ſignifies a Roll or Regiſter. Pſalm 69. 28. We meet with ספר חיים the Roll of the Living, or the Book of the Living we render it, becauſe all ancient Books were in the faſhion of Rolls. In that Chapter Moſes intercedes with God on behalf of the People, that he would make good his Promiſe to them, of bringing them into the Land of Canaan, v. 13. and v. 30. He goes up to make an Atonement for the People, i. e. as to the cutting them off in the Wilderneſs, and therefore he deſires rather than the People ſhould be deſtroy'd, that God would ſtrike him out of the Roll, that he might die in the Wilderneſs rather than the People: And God gives that anſwer to this purpoſe, v. 33. Whoever hath ſinned againſt me, will I blot out of my Book, the Senſe of which is the ſame with thoſe words of the Pſalmiſt, He ſware in his Wrath that they ſhould not enter into his Reſt, Pſal. 95. 11. And according to this interpretation, which is moſt natural and eaſie, all your long Diſcourſe againſt praying to be damned comes to juſt nothing; there being no pretence for it, either in the Text or Context.

2. The Story of Ruth doth not pleaſe you, as ſavouring in your Opinion of a great deal of Immodeſty; but you would have a better Opinion of it, if you conſider that the reaſon of her Carriage towards Boaz, in ſuch a manner, was upon Naomies telling her that he was one to whom the right of Redemption did belong, and by conſequence, by their Law, was to marry her, Ruth 2. 20. And this Ruth pleaded to Boaz, Ruth 3. 9. By which it appears, that ſhe verily believed that he was legally her Huſband; and Boaz we ſee ſpeaks of her as one that was a vertuous Woman, and known to be ſuch in the whole City, ver. 11. And he confeſſes he was her near Kinſman, only, he ſaith, there was one nearer, ver. 12. By which it ſeems, if there had not, Boaz had made no ſcruple of the matter: And the Jews ſay, in ſuch Marriages very little Ceremony was required, if the next of Kin did not renounce his Right, becauſe the Law had determined the Marriage before-hand. If you had but conſidered this one thing, you would have ſpared the many Obſervations you make on this Story.

3. You object againſt 2 Sam. 12. 8. As too much countenancing either Inceſt or Adultery, becauſe it is ſaid, that God gave to David his Maſter's Wives into his Boſom. But 1. It is very ſtrange to bring this place as a countenance to Adultery, which was purpoſely deſigned to upbraid David with the Sin of Adultery; and you will find it no eaſie matter, by the Conſtitution of the Moſaical Law, to prove Polygamy to be Adultery. 2. The Jews give a fair Interpretation of this place, for they ſay, that the Wife of a King could never marry after her Huſbands deceaſe, as the Gemara on the Title Sanhedrim expreſly ſaith, although ſome among them follow the Opinion of R. Jehuda, that ſhe might marry the ſucceeding King; but that is built chiefly on this place; of which the reſt give a better account, viz. that נשים doth not imply Saul's Wives, but the Maids of Honour, or Attendants on the Court of Saul, which all fell into David's Power, and out of whom he might chooſe Wives, without danger of Inceſt; and even ſome of thoſe who aſſert it lawful for one King to marry his predeceſſor's Wife, yet ſay in this caſe of David, that the Word only implies, that they were of Saul's Family, as Merab and Michal were, but not Saul's Wives. So that all the difficulty here ariſes only from the Interpretation of an unuſual Word, in which we have much more reaſon to truſt the Jews than other Writers.

Selden. Uxor Ebra. l. 1. c. 10. Schick. De jure Reg. c. 16. Theor. 19.

4. You are much offended at Hoſea's marrying an Adultereſs: But all the formidable Difficulties of that place will preſently vaniſh, if you allow the Prophetical Schemes, wherein thoſe things are ſaid to be done, which are intended only to repreſent in a more lively manner the things ſignified by them. And ſo you may ſee the Chaldee Paraphraſe, fully explains this place of Hoſea, and Maimonides purpoſely diſcourſeth on the Prophetick Parables, and brings this as one of the Inſtances of them; Maim. More Nevoch. l. 2. c. 46. and with him the reſt of the Jewiſh Interpreters agree. But you object againſt ſuch a way of Teaching, as tending to the encouragement of Vice, which it is very far from, being deſigned to repreſent the odiouſneſs of it: For the whole Scope of the Prophet is to let the People underſtand, that their Idolatry was as hateful to God as the Sin of Adultery, and that the conſequences of it would be their Miſery and Ruin. And yet that God expreſſed as much Tenderneſs to them, as a Man that was very fond of a Woman would do, in being unwilling to put her away, altho' he knew ſhe were falſe to his Bed: the former is intended in the firſt Chapter, and the latter in the third. And what is there tending to Immorality in all this? May not God make uſe of one Vice, whoſe evil is more notorious to repreſent another by, whoſe evil they are more hardly convinced of? May not he ſet forth a Degenerate People by the Sons of an Adultereſs? And by the Names given to them expreſs his Deteſtation of their Wickedneſs? Eſpecially when the Parabolical Terms are ſo clearly explained, as they are in the Second Chapter.

But you will ſay, theſe things are related as plain Matters of Fact; with the ſeveral Circumſtances belonging to them. It is true, they are ſo, but ſo Parables uſe to be; ſo was Nathan's to David; ſo is that of the Rich Man and Lazarus in the New Teſtament: ſo is Jeremy's going to Euphrates to hide his Girdle; Jer. 13. 4, 5. (for it is not very likely the Prophet ſhould be ſent 18 or 20 Days Journey into an Enemies Country for no other end:) So is Ezekiel's lying on one ſide for 390 Days, and ſhaving his Head and Beard, Ezek. 4. 5, 6. contrary to the Law, as Maimonides obſerves: And his digging in the Walls of the Temple at Ezek. 5. 1. Hieruſalem, while he was in Babylon: Ezek. 8. 8. And many other things of a like nature, which are ſet forth with as punctual a Narration of Circumſtances, as this of Hoſea, and yet they were only figurative Expreſſions. We that are accuſtomed to another way of Learning, think theſe things ſtrange; but this was a very common way in the elder Times, and it is to this Day much uſed in the Eaſtern Countries, to repreſent Duties to ſome, under the Parables of things as really done by others: As may be ſeen in Locman and Perzoes, beſides what Clemens Alexandrinus and others have ſaid, concerning the Antiquity and common uſe of this Parabolical way of Teaching.

I now come to your Objections againſt the New Teſtament; but I find them ſo few, and thoſe ſo ſlight and inconſiderable, as to the end for which you produce them, that I may eaſily paſs them over. To that about the continuance of Miracles, I have already anſwer'd: And I find not one Word in the places mentioned by you, which implies the neceſſity of the continuance of them in all Ages of the Chriſtian Church. That place, Mark 10. 29, 30. ſpeaks of no more but ſuch a recompence in this Life as is conſiſtent with Perſecution; and therefore muſt chiefly lie in inward Contentment; which all wiſe Men have valued above external Accommodations; although withal, by the Account St. Paul gives of himſelf, and his Brethren, God did abundantly provide for them one way or other. As having nothing, and yet enjoying all things: Which amounts to a Hundred-fold in this Life. 2 Cor. 6.10.

But certainly you are the firſt Man, who have objected the obſcurity of the Book of Revelations, againſt the Authority of the Scriptures; which is juſt as if one ſhould object the Quadrature of the Circle againſt Mathematical Certainty. If we grant that there are ſome things in that Myſtical Book, we do not yet well underſtand; what then? Muſt neither that Book, nor any other of the Bible be of Divine Revelation? I will not purſue the unreaſonableneſs of this way of arguing ſo far as I might, but I leave your ſelf to conſider of it; and of all that I have written, in order to your ſatisfaction. If you think fit to return an Anſwer, I pray do it clearly and ſhortly, and with that freedom from Paſſion, which becomes ſo weighty a Matter: And I beſeech God to give you a right underſtanding in all things. I am, A

PREFACE to the READER.

I Write not to increaſe the Controverſies of the Times, nor to foment the Differences that are among us; the one are by far too many, the other too great already. My only deſign is to allay the heat, and abate the fury of that Ignis ſacer, or Eryſipelas of Contention, which hath riſen in the Face of our Church, by the overflowing of that bilious Humour which yet appears to have too great predominancy in the Spirits of Men. And although with the poor Perſian I can only bring a handful of Water, yet that may be my juſt Apology, that it is for the quenching thoſe Flames in the Church, which have cauſed the Bells of Aaron to jangle ſo much, that it ſeems to be a Work of the greateſt difficulty to make them tuneable. And were this an Age wherein any thing might be wondred at, it would be matter of deſerved Admiration, to hear the noiſe of theſe Axes and Hammers ſo much about the Temple, and that after theſe nigh twenty Years carving and hewing, we are ſo rude and unpoliſhed ſtill, and ſo far from being cemented together in the unity of the Spirit, and the Bond of Peace. May we not juſtly fear that Voice, Migremus hinc, when we ſee the Veil of the Temple ſo rent aſunder, and the Church it ſelf made a Partition-wall to divide the Members of it? And ſince the wiſe and gracious God hath been pleaſed (in ſuch an almoſt miraculous manner) ſo lately to abate the Land-flood of our civil inteſtine Diviſions, how ſtrange muſt it needs ſeem, if our ſacred Contentions, (if Contentions may be called ſacred) like the Waters of the Sanctuary, ſhould riſe from the Ancle to the Knee, till at laſt they may grow unpaſſable? Muſt only the Fire of our unchriſtian Animoſities be like that of the Temple, which was never to be extinguiſhed? However I am ſure it is ſuch a one as was never kindled from Heaven, nor blown up with any Breathings of the Holy and Divine Spirit. And yet that hath been the aggravation of our Diviſions, that thoſe whoſe Duty it is to lift up their Voices like Trumpets, have rather ſounded an Allarm to our contentious Spirits, than a Parley or Retreat, which had been far more ſuitable to our Meſſengers of Peace. In which reſpect it might be too truly ſaid of our Church, what is ſpoken of the Eagle in the Greek Apologue:

Βλέπει τὸ στῆθος ἀετὸς τρωθὲν πάλαι,
Ἀλγῶν δὲ λοιπὸν, ἧστο πολλὰ δακρύων.
Βλέπων δὲ ὀϊστὸν, εἶπεν ἐπτερωμένον,
Βαβαὶ, πτερὸν με τὸν πτερωτὸν ὀλλύει.

The Eagle ſaw her Breaſt was wounded ſore,
She ſtood, and weeped much, but grieved more:
But when ſhe ſaw the Dart was feather'd, ſaid,
Woe's me, for my own Kind hath me deſtroy'd.

It is ſo long ſince that Verſion of the vulgar Latin, Pſal. 68. 15. Inter Domini cleros, might have been ſadly rendered to lie among the Pots; and Pierius Valerianus might have met with too many Examples to have increaſed his Book De Literatorum Infœlicitate; and in the next Age it might have been true again what Matthew Paris obſerves of the Clergy in the Conquerour's time; adeò literaturâ carebant ut cæteris ſtupori eſſet qui Grammaticam didiciſſet. But bleſſed be God who hath freed us from that Dœmonium meridianum of Ignorance and Barbariſm; may we be but as happily delivered from the plague of our Diviſions and Animoſities: Than which, there hath been no greater Scandal to the Jews, nor opprobrium of our Religion among Heathens and Mahumetans, nor more common objection among the Papiſts, nor any thing which hath been more made a Pretence even for Atheiſm and Infidelity. For our Controverſies about Religion, have brought at laſt even Religion its ſelf into a

Controverſie, among ſuch whoſe weaker Judgments have not been able to diſcern where the plain and unqueſtionable Way to Heaven hath lain, in ſo great a Miſt as our Diſputes have raiſed among us. Weaker Heads, when they once ſee the Battlements ſhake, are apt to ſuſpect that the Foundation its ſelf is not firm enough; and to conclude, if any thing be call'd in queſtion, that there is nothing certain. And truly it cannot but be looked on as a ſad Preſage of an approaching Famine, not of Bread, but of the Word of the Lord, that our lean Kine have devoured the fat, and our thin Ears the plump and full; I mean our Controverſies and Diſputes, have eaten ſo much out the Life and Practice of Chriſtianity. Religion hath been ſo much rarified into aery Notions and Speculations, by the diſtempered heat of Mens Spirits, that its inward Strength, and the Vitals of it have been much abated and conſumed by it. Curioſity, that Green-ſickneſs of the Soul, whereby it longs for Novelties, and loaths ſound and wholeſome Truths, hath been the epidemical Diſtemper of the Age we live in. Of which it may be as truly ſaid, as ever yet of any, that it was ſæculum fertile religionis, ſterile pietatis; I fear this will be the Character whereby our Age will be known to Poſterity, that it was the Age wherein Men talked of Religion moſt, and lived it leaſt. Few there are who are content with that Dimenſum which God hath ſet them; every one almoſt is of the Spaniſh Jeſuite's Mind, Beatus qui prædicat verbum inauditum, ſeeking to find out ſomewhat whereby he may be reckoned, if not among the Wiſe, yet among the Diſputers of this World. How ſmall is the number of thoſe ſober Chriſtians, of whom it may be ſaid as Lucian of his Paraſites, οὐκ ἠσχόλαζον νοσεῖν, they were not at leiſure to be ſick of this pica, (1 Tim. 6. 4.) ſuch as longed more to taſte of the Tree of Life, than of the Tree of Knowledge: And as Zenophon ſpeaks of the Perſians, τό ὑγρὸν ἐκποιοῦντες ἀνήλισκον, they conſume the fomes morbi, the Root of this Diſtemper by their ſerious Endeavours after Peace and Holineſs. But inſtead of this, the generality of Men let all their Religion run up into Briars and Thorns, into Contentions and Parties, as tho' Religion were indeed ſacramentum militiæ, but more againſt fellow-Chriſtians than the unqueſtionable Hindrances of Mens eternal Happineſs. Men being very loth to put themſelves to the trouble of a Holy Life, are very ready to embrace any thing which may but diſpence with that, and if but liſting Mens ſelves under ſuch a Party, may but ſhelter them under a Diſguiſe of Religion, none more ready than ſuch to be known by diſtinguiſhing Names; none more zealous in the defence of every Tittle and Punctilio that lies moſt remote from thoſe eſſential Duties wherein the Kingdom of God conſiſts, viz. Righteouſneſs and Peace, and Joy in the Holy Ghoſt. And hence all the ſeveral Parties among us have given ſuch glorious Names only to the outward Government of the Church; the undoubted Practice of the Apoſtles; the Diſcipline of Chriſt; the order of the Goſpel, and account only that the Church, where their own method of Government is obſerved; juſt as the Hiſtorian obſerves of Brutus and Caſſius, Ubicunque ipſi eſſent prætexentes eſſe rempublicam, they think the Church can never be preſerved, but in that Veſſel they are imbarked in: As though Chriſt could not have cauſed his Flock to reſt ſub Meridie, unleſs the Pars Donati had been in the South. And from this monopolizing of Churches to Parties, hath proceeded that ſtrange Uncharitableneſs towards all who come not up to every Circumſtance of their Way and Method, which is a piece of Prudence like that of Brutus, who when he had raiſed thoſe Flames in the Common-wealth, was continually calling Cæſar Tyrant; ita enim appellari Cæſarem, facto ejus expediebat. So when Men have cauſed ſuch lamentable Diviſions in the Church, by their ſeveral Parties and Factions, it concerns them to condemn all others beſides themſelves, leſt they moſt of all condemn themſelves for making unneceſſary Diviſions in the Church of God. This Uncharitableneſs and ill opinion of all different Parties, only gathers the Fuel together, and prepares combuſtible Matter, which wants nothing but the claſhing of an adverſe Party, acted upon Principles of a like nature, to make it break out into an open Flame. And ſuch we have ſeen, and with ſadneſs and grief of Heart felt it to be in the Bowels of our own Church and Nation, by reaſon of thoſe violent Calentures and Paroxyſms of the Spirits of Men, thoſe Heart-burnings and Contentions which have been among us, which will require both Time and Skill to purge out thoſe noxious Humours which have been the cauſes of them. I know no Preſcriptions ſo likely to effect this happy end, as an Infuſion of the true Spirits of Religion, and the Revulſion of that extravaſated Blood into its proper Channels: Thereby to take Men off from their eager purſuit after Ways and Parties, Notions and Opinions, (wherein many have run ſo far, that they have left the beſt part of their Religion behind them) and to bring them back to a right underſtanding of the Nature, Deſign and Principles of Chriſtianity.

Chriſtianity! a Religion, which it is next to a Miracle Men ſhould ever quarrel or fall out about; much leſs that it ſhould be the occaſion, or at leaſt the pretence of all that Strife and Bitterneſs of Spirit, of all thoſe Contentions and Animoſities which are at this Day in the Chriſtian World. But our only comfort is, that whatever our Spirits are, our God is the God of peace, our Saviour is the Prince of Peace, and that Wiſdom which this Religion teacheth, is both pure and peaceable. It was that which once made our Religion ſo amiable in the Judgment of impartial Heathens, that nil niſi juſtum ſuadet & lene, the Court of a Chriſtian's Conſcience was the beſt Court of equity in the World. Chriſtians were once known by their ἥμερον καὶ μειλιχὸν ἦθος, the Benignity and Sweetneſs of their Diſpoſition, by the Candor and Ingenuity of their Spirits, by their mutual Love, Forbearance and Condeſcenſion towards one another. But Aut hoc non eſt Evangelium, aut nos non ſumus Evangelici, either this is not the Practice of Chriſtianity, or it was never calculated for our Meridian, wherein Mens Spirits are of too high an elevation for it. If Pride and Uncharitableneſs, if Diviſions and Strifes, if Wrath and Envy, if Animoſities and Contentions were but the Marks of true Chriſtians, Diogenes never need light his Lamp at Noon to find out ſuch among us. But if a Spirit of Meekneſs, Gentleneſs and Condeſcenſion, if a ſtooping to the Weakneſs and Infirmities of others, if a purſuit after peace even when it flies from us, be the indiſpenſable Duties, and the Characteriſtical Notes of thoſe that have more than the Name of Chriſtians, it may poſſibly prove a difficult Inqueſt to find out ſuch for the Crouds of thoſe who ſhelter themſelves under that glorious Name. Whence came it elſe to be ſo lately looked on as the way to advance Religion, to baniſh Peace, and to reform Mens Manners, by taking away their Lives? Whereas in thoſe pure and primitive Times, when Religion did truly flouriſh, it was accounted the greateſt Inſtance of the Piety of Chriſtians, not to fight, but to die for Chriſt. It was never thought then that Bellona was a nurſing Mother to the Church of God, nor Mars a God of Reformation. Religion was then propagated, not by Chriſtians ſhedding the Blood of others, but by laying down their own. They thought there were other ways to a Canaan of Reformation, beſides the paſſing through a Wilderneſs of Confuſion, and a Red-Sea of Blood. Origen could ſay of the Chriſtians in his Time, οὐκέτι γὰρ λαμβάνομεν ἐπ' ἔθνος μάχαιραν, οὐδὲ μανθάνομεν ἔτι πολεμεῖν γενόμενοι διὰ τὸν Ἰησοῦν υἱοὶ τῆς εἰρήνης· They had not yet learned to make way for Religion into Mens Minds by the Dint of the Sword, becauſe they were the Diſciples of that Saviour who never preſſed Followers as Men do Soldiers, but ſaid; If any Man will come after me, let him take up his Croſs, (not his Sword) and follow me. His was ἥμερος καὶ φιλάνθρωπος νομοθεσία, his very Commands ſhewed his Meekneſs; his Laws were ſweet and gentle Laws; not like Draco's, that were writ in Blood, unleſs it were his own that gave them.

C. Celſum, l. 3.

His deſign was to eaſe Men of their former Burdens, and not to lay on more; the Duties he required were no other but ſuch as were neceſſary, and withal very juſt and reaſonable. He that came to take away the inſupportable Yoke of Jewiſh Ceremonies, certainly did never intend to gall the Necks of his Diſciples with another inſtead of it. And it would be ſtrange the Church ſhould require more than Chriſt himſelf did; and make other Conditions of her Communion, than our Saviour did of Diſcipleſhip. What poſſible reaſon can be aſſigned or given why ſuch things ſhould not be ſufficient for Communion with a Church, which are ſufficient for eternal Salvation? And certainly thoſe things are ſufficient for that, which are laid down as the neceſſary Duties of Chriſtianity by our Lord and Saviour in his Word. What ground can there be why Chriſtians ſhould not ſtand upon the ſame Terms now which they did in the Time of Chriſt and his Apoſtles? Was not Religion ſufficiently guarded and fenced in them? Was there ever more true and cordial Reverence in the Worſhip of God? What Charter hath Chriſt given the Church to bind Men up to more than himſelf hath done? or to exclude thoſe from her Society, who may be admitted into Heaven? Will Chriſt ever thank Men at the great Day, for keeping ſuch out from Communion with his Church, whom he will vouchſafe not only Crowns of Glory to, but it may be aureolæ too, if there be any ſuch things there? The Grand Commiſſion the Apoſtles were ſent out with, was only to teach what Chriſt had commanded them. Not the leaſt intimation of any power given them to impoſe or require any thing beyond what himſelf had ſpoken to them, or they were directed to by the immediate Guidance of the Spirit of God. It is not whether the things commanded and required be lawful or no? It is not whether Indifferencies may be determined or no? It is not how far Chriſtians are bound to ſubmit to a reſtraint of their Chriſtian Liberty, which now I enquire after, (of thoſe things in the Treatiſe its ſelf) but whether they do conſult for the Church's Peace and Unity, who ſuſpend it upon ſuch things? How far either the Example of our Saviour, or his Apoſtles doth warrant ſuch rigorous Impoſitions? We never read the Apoſtles making Laws, but of things ſuppoſed neceſſary. When the Council of Apoſtles met at Jeruſalem, for deciding a Caſe that diſturbed the Church's peace, we ſee they would lay no other burden πλὴν τῶν ἐπάναγκες τούτων, beſides theſe neceſſary things, Acts 15. 29. It was not enough with them that the things would be neceſſary when they had required them, but they looked on an antecedent neceſſity either abſolute or for the preſent ſtate, which was the only ground of their impoſing thoſe Commands upon the Gentile Chriſtians.

There were after this, great diverſities of Practice, and varieties of Obſervations among Chriſtians, but the Holy Ghoſt never thought thoſe things fit to be made matters of Laws, to which all Parties ſhould conform: All that the Apoſtles required as to theſe, was mutual Forbearance and Condeſcenſion towards each other in them. The Apoſtles valued not Indifferences at all, and thoſe things it is evident they accounted ſuch, which whether Men did them or not, was not of concernment to Salvation. And what reaſon is there why Men ſhould be ſo ſtrictly tied up to ſuch things, which they may do or let alone, and yet be very good Chriſtians ſtill? Without all Controverſie, the main In-let of all the Diſtractions, Confuſions and Diviſions of the Chriſtian World, hath been by adding other Conditions of Church-Communion than Chriſt hath done. Had the Church of Rome never taken upon her to add to the Rule of Faith, nor impoſed idolatrous and ſuperſtitious Practices, all the injury ſhe had done her ſelf, had been to have avoided that fearful Schiſm which ſhe hath cauſed throughout the Chriſtian World. Would there ever be the leſs Peace and Unity in a Church, if a Diverſity were allowed as to Practices ſuppoſed indifferent? yea there would be ſo much more as there was a mutual Forbearance and Condeſcenſion as to ſuch things. The Unity of the Church is an Unity of Love and Affection, and not a bare Uniformity of Practice or Opinion. This latter is extremely deſirable in a Church; but as long as there are ſeveral Ranks and Sizes of Men in it, very hardly attainable, becauſe of the different Perſuaſions of Mens Minds, as to the lawfulneſs of the things required. And it is no commendation for a Chriſtian to have only the Civility of Procruſtes, to commenſurate all other Men to the Bed of his own Humour and Opinion. There is nothing the Primitive Church deſerves greater imitation by us in, than in that admirable Temper, Moderation, and Condeſcenſion which was uſed in it, towards all the Members of it. It was never thought worth the while to make any ſtanding Laws for Rites and Cuſtoms, that had no other original but Tradition, much leſs to ſuſpend Men her Communion for not obſerving them. Εὔηθες γὰρ καὶ μάλα δικαίως ὑπέλαβον ἐθῶν

Hiſt. Eccl. l. 7. c. 19. ἕνεκεν ἀλλήλων χωρίζεσθαι, περὶ τὰ καίρια τῆς θρησκείας συμφωνοῦντες, as Sozomen tells us. They judged it, and that very juſtly, a fooliſh and frivolous thing, for thoſe that agree in the weighty Matters of Religion, to ſeparate from one another's Communion for the ſake of ſome petty Cuſtoms and Obſervations. Ὀυ γὰρ τὰς αὐτάς παραδόσεις κατὰ πάντα ὁμοίας κἂν ὁμόδοξοι εἶεν, ἐν πάσαις ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις εὑρεῖν ἐστίν· For Churches agreeing in the ſame Faith, often differ in their Rites and Cuſtoms. And that not only in different Churches, but in different Places belonging to the ſame Church; for, as he tells us, many Cities and Villages in Egypt, not only differed from the Cuſtoms of the Mother Church of Alexandria, but from all other Churches beſides, in their publick Aſſemblies on the Evenings of the Sabbath, and receiving the Euchariſt after Dinner: This admirable Temper in the Primitive Church might be largely cleared from that Liberty they allowed freely to Diſſenters from them in Matters of Practice and Opinion; as might be cleared from Cyprian, Auſtin, Jerome, and others; but that would exceed the Bounds of a Preface. The firſt who brake this Order in the Church, were the Arrians, Donatiſts, and Circumcellians, while the true Church was ſtill known by its priſtine Moderation and ſweetneſs of Deportment towards all its Members. The ſame we hope may remain as the moſt infallible evi- dence of the Conformity of our Church of England, to the Primitive, not ſo much in uſing the ſame Rites that were in Uſe then, as in not impoſing them, but leaving Men to be won by the obſerving the true Decency and Order of Churches, whereby thoſe who act upon a true Principle of Chriſtian Ingenuity, may be ſooner drawn to a Compliance in all lawful things, than by force and rigorous Impoſitions, which make Men ſuſpect the weight of the thing it ſelf, when ſuch force is uſed to make it enter. In the mean time, what cauſe have we to rejoice, that Almighty God hath been pleaſed to reſtore us a Prince of that excellent Prudence and Moderation, who hath ſo lately given aſſurance to the World, of his great Indulgence towards all that have any pretence from Conſcience to differ with their Brethren: The only thing then ſeeming to retard our Peace, is, the Controverſie about Church-Government, an unhappy Controverſie to us in England, if ever there were any in the World. And the more unhappy, in that our Contentions about it have been ſo great, and yet ſo few of the Multitudes engaged in it, that have truly underſtood the Matter they have ſo eagerly contended about. For the State of the Controverſie, as it concerns us, lies not here, as it is generally miſtaken, what Form of Government comes the neareſt to Apoſtolical Practice; but Whether any one individual Form be founded ſo upon Divine Right, that all Ages and Churches are bound unalterably to obſerve it: The clearing up of which by an impartial enquiry into all the Grounds produced for it, being of ſo great a tendency to an Accommodation of our preſent Differences, was the only Motive which induced me to obſerve Ariſtotle's wild Politicks, of expoſing this deformed Conception to the entertainment of the wide World. And certainly they who have eſpouſed the moſt the Intereſt of a jus divinum, cannot yet but ſay, that if the Opinion I maintain be true, it doth exceedingly conduce to a preſent Settlement of the Differences that are among us. For then all Parties may retain their different Opinions concerning the Primitive Form, and yet agree and pitch upon a Form compounded of all together, as the moſt ſuitable to the State and Condition of the Church of God among us: That ſo the Peoples Intereſt be ſecured by Conſent and Suffrage, which is the pretence of the Congregational-way; the due Power of Preſbyteries aſſerted by their joint concurrence with the Biſhop, as it is laid down in that excellent Model of the late incomparable Primate of Armagh; and the juſt Honour and Dignity of the Biſhop aſſerted, as a very laudable and ancient Conſtitution for preſerving the Peace and Unity of the Church of God. So the learned Iſ. Caſaubon deſcribes the Polity of the Primitive Church, Epiſcopi in ſingulis Eccleſiis conſtituti cum ſuis Preſbyteris, & propriam ſibi quiſque peculiari curâ, & univerſam omnes in commune curantes, admirabilis cujuſdam Ariſtocratiæ ſpeciem referebant. My main Deſign, throughout this whole Treatiſe, is to ſhew that there can be no Argument drawn from any pretence of a Divine Right, that may hinder Men from conſenting and yielding to ſuch a Form of Government in the Church, as may bear the greateſt correſpondency to the Primitive Church, and be moſt advantagiouſly conduceable to the Peace, Unity, and Settlement of our divided Church. I plead not at all for any Abuſes or Corruptions incident to the beſt Form of Government, thro' the corruption of Men and Times. Nay, I dare not harbour ſo low Apprehenſions of Perſons enjoying ſo great Dignity and Honour in the Church, that they will in any wiſe be unwilling of themſelves to reduce the Form of

of Church-Government among us, to its primitive State and Order, by retrenching all Exorbitances of Power, and reſtoring thoſe Preſbyteries which no Law hath forbidden, but only through diſuſe have been laid aſide. Whereby they will give to the World that rare Example of Self-denial, and the higheſt Chriſtian Prudence, as may raiſe an honourable Opinion of them, even among thoſe who have hitherto the moſt ſlighted ſo ancient and venerable an Order in the Church of God; and thereby become the Repairers of thoſe otherwiſe irreparable Breaches in the Church of God. I conclude with the Words of a late learned, pious and moderate Prelate, in his Via media; I have done, and now I make no other account, but that it will fall out with me, as it doth commonly with him that offers to part a Fray, both parts will perhaps drive at me for wiſhing them no worſe than Peace. My Ambition of the publick Tranquillity ſhall willingly carry me through this hazard; let both beat me, ſo their Quarrel may ceaſe; I ſhall rejoice in thoſe Blows and Scars which I ſhall take for the Church's Safety.

WEAPON-SALVE for the CHURCH'S-WOUNDS: OR,
The Divine Right of particular forms of Government in the Church of God, diſcuſſed and examined according to the principles of the Law of Nature, the poſitive Laws of God, the practice of the Apoſtles, and the Primitive Church, and the judgment of Reformed Divines.

PART I.

CHAP. I.

Things neceſſary for the Church's peace muſt be clearly revealed. The Form of Church Government not ſo, as appears by the remaining controverſie about it. An evidence thence, that Chriſt never intended any one form, as the only means to peace in the Church. The nature of a divine right diſcuſſed. Right in general either makes things Lawful, or elſe Due: For the former, a non-prohibition ſufficient, the latter an expreſs command. Duty ſuppoſeth legiſlation and promulgation. The Queſtion ſtated. Nothing binds unalterably but by vertue of a ſtanding Law, and that twofold. The Law of nature, and poſitive Laws of God. Three ways to know when poſitive Laws are unalterable. The divine right ariſing from Scripture Examples, Divine acts, and Divine approbation conſidered.

§. I. HE that impoſeth any matter of opinion upon the belief of others, without giving evidence of reaſon for it, proportionable to the confidence of his aſſertion, muſt either ſuppoſe the thing propounded, to carry ſuch unqueſtionable credentials of truth and reaſon with it, that none who know what they mean, can deny it entertainment; or elſe that his own underſtanding hath attained to ſo great perfection, as to have authority ſufficient to oblige all others to follow it. This latter cannot be preſumed among any who have aſſerted the freedom of their own underſtandings, from the dictates of an infallible chair: But if any ſhould forget themſelves ſo far as to think ſo, there needs no other argument to prove them not to be infallible in their aſſertions, than this one aſſertion, that they are infallible, it being an undoubted evidence that they are actually deceived, who know ſo little the meaſure of their own underſtandings. The former can never be pretended in any thing which is a matter of controverſie among men, who have not wholly forgot they are reaſonable creatures, by their bringing probable arguments for the maintaining one part of an opinion as well as another. In which caſe, though the arguments brought be not convincing for the neceſſary entertaining either part to an unbiaſſed underſtanding, yet the difference of their opinions is argument ſufficient that the thing contended for is not ſo clear as both parties would make it to be on their own ſide; and if it be not a thing of neceſſity to ſalvation, it gives men ground to think that a final deciſion of the matter in controverſie, was never intended as a neceſſary means for the peace and unity of the Church of God. For we cannot with any ſhew of reaſon imagine that our ſupreme Law-giver and Saviour, who hath made it a neceſſary duty in all true members of his Church, to endeavour after the peace and unity of it, ſhould ſuſpend the performance of that duty upon a matter of opinion, which when men have uſed their utmoſt endeavours to ſatisfie themſelves about, they yet find, that thoſe very grounds which they are moſt inclinable to build their judgments upon, are either wholly rejected by others, as wiſe and able as themſelves, or elſe it may be they erect a far different fabrick upon the very ſame foundations. It is no ways conſiſtent with the wiſdom of Chriſt in founding his Church, and providing for the peace and ſettlement of it, to leave it at the mercy of mens private judgments and apprehenſions of things, than which nothing is more uncertain, and thereby make it to depend upon a condition never like to be attained in this world, which is the agreement and uniformity of mens opinions. For as long as mens faces differ, their judgments will. And until there be an Intellectus Averroiſticus, the ſame underſtanding in all perſons, we have little ground to hope for ſuch an univerſal harmony in the intellectual world; and yet even then the ſoul might paſs a different judgment upon the colours of things, according to the different tincture of the ſeveral Optick-glaſſes in particular bodies which it takes a proſpect of things through. Reaſon and experience then gives us little hopes of any peace in the Church, if the unity of mens judgments be ſuppoſed the condition of it; the next enquiry then is, how the peace of the Church ſhall be attained or preſerved, when men are under ſuch different perſuaſions; eſpecially if they reſpect the means in order to a peace and ſettlement. For the ways to peace, like the fertile ſoils of Greece, have been oft-times the occaſion of the greateſt quarrels. And no ſickneſs is ſo dangerous as that when men are ſick of their remedy, and nauſeate that moſt which tends to their recovery. But while Phyſicians quarrel about the Method of cure, the Patient languiſheth under their hands; and when men increaſe Contentions in the behalf of peace, while they ſeem to court it, they deſtroy it. The only way left for the Church's ſettlement and peace under ſuch variety of apprehenſions concerning the means and method in order to it, is to pitch upon ſuch a foundation, if poſſible to be found out, whereon the different parties retaining their private apprehenſions, may yet be agreed to carry on the ſame work in common, in order to the peace and tranquillity of the Church of God. Which cannot be by leaving all abſolutely to follow their own ways; for that were to build a Babel inſtead of Salem, Confuſion inſtead of Peace; it muſt be then by convincing men, that neither of thoſe ways, to peace and order which they contend about, is neceſſary by way of divine command, (though ſome be as a means to an end) but which particular way or form it muſt be, is wholly left to the prudence of thoſe in whoſe power and truſt it is to ſee the peace of the Church be ſecured on laſting foundations. How nearly this concerns the preſent debate about the Government of the Church, any one may quickly diſcern. The main plea for forms of Government in the Church, is their neceſſity in order to its peace and order, and yet nothing hath produced more diſorder and confuſion, than our diſputes about it have done. And our ſad experience ſtill tells us that after all our debates, and the evidences brought on either ſide, men yet continue under very different apprehenſions concerning it. But if we more ſtrictly enquire into the cauſes of the great diſtances and animoſities which have riſen upon this controverſie, we ſhall find it hath not been ſo much the difference of judgments concerning the primitive form of Government which hath divided men ſo much from one another, as the prevalency of faction and intereſt in thoſe whoſe Revenues have come from the rents of the Church, and among others of greater integrity it hath been the principle or hypotheſis which men are apt to take for granted, without proving it, viz. that it is in no caſe lawful to vary from that form, which by obſcure and uncertain conjectures they conceive to have been the primitive practice. For hereby men look upon themſelves as obliged by an unalterable Law to endeavour the eſtabliſhment of that Idea of Government which oft-times affection and intereſt, more than reaſon and judgment hath formed within them; and ſo likewiſe bound to overthrow any other form not ſuitable to thoſe correſpondencies which they are already engaged to maintain. If this then were the cauſe of the wounds and breaches this day among us, the moſt ſucceſsful Weapon-ſalve to heal them, will be, to anoint the ſword which hath given the wound, by a ſeaſonable enquiry into the nature and obligation of particular forms of Government in the Church. The main ſubject then of our preſent debate will be whether any one particular form of Church-Government be ſettled upon an unalterable divine right; by vertue whereof all Churches are bound perpetually to obſerve that individual form? or whether it be left to the prudence of every particular Church to agree upon that form of Government which it judgeth moſt conducible within its ſelf to attain the end of Government, the peace, order, tranquillity, ſettlement of the Church. If this latter be made fully appear, it is then evident, that however mens judgments may differ concerning the primitive form of Government, there is yet a ſure ground for men to proceed on in order to the Church's peace. Which one conſideration will be motive ſufficient to juſtifie an attempt of this nature, it being a deſign of ſo great importance, as the recovery of an advantagious piece of ground, whereon different parties may with ſafety not only treat, but agree in order to a ſpeedy accommodation.

§. 2. We come therefore cloſely to the buſineſs in hand, and for the better clearing of our paſſage, we ſhall firſt diſcuſs the nature of a divine right, and ſhew whereon an unalterable divine right muſt be founded, and then proceed to ſhew how far any form of Government in the Church is ſettled upon ſuch a right. Right in the general is a relative thing, and the ſignification and import of it muſt be taken from the reſpect it bears to the Law which gives it. For although in common acceptation it be often underſtood to be the ſame with the Law its ſelf, as it is the rule of actions (in which ſenſe Jus naturæ, gentium, civile, is taken for the ſeveral Laws of Nature, Nations and particular States) yet I ſay jus, and ſo right, is properly ſomething accruing to a perſon by vertue of that Law which is made, and ſo jus naturæ is that right which every man is inveſted in by the Law of nature, which is properly jus per- ſonæ, and is by ſome call'd jus activum, which is defined by Grotius to be Qualitas moralis perſonæ competens ad aliquid juſte habendum aut agendum; by Leſſius to be Poteſtas legitima ad rem aliquam obtinendam, &c. So that by theſe deſcriptions, right is that power which a man hath by Law to do, have or obtain any thing. But the moſt full deſcription of it is given by Martinius, that it is adhærens perſonæ neceſſitas vel poteſtas recta ad aliquid agendum, omittendum aut permittendum, that whereby any perſon lies under a neceſſity of doing, omitting or ſuffering a thing to be, or elſe hath a lawful authority of doing, &c. For we are to conſider that there is a twofold right, either ſuch whereby a man hath liberty and freedom by the Law to do any thing; or ſuch whereby it becomes a man's neceſſary duty to do any thing. The opening of the difference of theſe two, and the different Influences they have upon perſons and things, is very uſeful to our preſent purpoſe; Jus then is firſt that which is juſtum; ſo Iſidore, Jus dictum quia juſtum eſt. So whatever is juſt, men have right to do it: Now a thing may be ſaid to be juſt either more generally, as it ſignifies any thing which is lawful, or in a more reſtrained ſenſe, when it implies ſome thing that is equal and due to another. So Ariſtotle diſtributes τὸ δίκαιον into τὸ νόμιμον ϗ τὸ ἴσον. The former ſenſe of it is here only pertinent, as it implies any thing which may be done according to Law, that is done jure, becauſe a man hath a right to do it. In order to this we are to obſerve, that an expreſs poſitive command is not neceſſary to make a thing lawful, but a non-prohibition by a Law is ſufficient for that. For it being the nature of Laws to bound up mens rights, what is not forbidden by the Law is thereby ſuppoſed to be left in mens power ſtill to do it. So that it is to little purpoſe for men to ſeek for poſitive commands for every particular action to make it lawful; it ſufficeth to make any action lawful, if there be no bar made by any direct or conſequential prohibition: unleſs it be in ſuch things whoſe lawfulneſs and goodneſs depend upon a mere poſitive command. For in thoſe things which are therefore only good becauſe commanded, a command is neceſſary to make them lawful, as in immediate poſitive acts of worſhip towards God; in which nothing is lawful any farther than it is founded upon a divine command. I ſpeak not of circumſtances belonging to the acts of worſhip, but whatever is looked upon as a part of divine worſhip if it be not commanded by God himſelf, it is no ways acceptable to him, and therefore not lawful. So our Saviour cites that out of the Prophet, In vain do they worſhip me, teaching for doctrines, the commandments of men, which the Chaldee Paraphraſt and Syriack verſion render thus, Reverentia quam mihi exhibent, eſt ex præcepto & documento humano, plainly imputing the reaſon of God's rejecting their worſhip to the want of a divine command for what they did. And therefore Tertullian condemns all thoſe things to be vacuæ obſervationis & ſuperſtitioni deputanda, as ſuperſtitious, which are done ſine ullius Dominici aut Apoſtolici præcepti autoritate, without the warrant of divine command. Although even here we may ſay too, that it is not merely the want of a divine precept which makes any part of divine worſhip uncommanded by God unlawful, but the general prohibition, that nothing ſhould be done in the immediate worſhip of God, but what we have a divine command for. However in matters of mere decency and order in the Church of God, or in any other civil action of the lives of men, it is enough to make things lawful, if they are not for-bidden. But againſt this, that a non-prohibition is warrant enough to make any thing lawful, this objection will be ſoon levyed, that it is an argument ab authoritate negativè, and thefore it is of no force: To which I anſwer, that the rule if taken without limitation upon which this objection is founded, is not true; for although an argument ab authoritate negativè as to matter of Fact avails not, yet the negative from authority as to matter of law and command is of great force and ſtrength. I grant the argument holds not here; we do not read that ever Chriſt or his Apoſtles did ſuch a thing, therefore it is not to be done; but this, We read of no law or precept commanding us to do it, therefore it is not unlawful not to do it; and we read of no Prohibition fobidding us to do it, therefore it may be lawfully done; this holds true and good, and that upon this twofold reaſon. Firſt, from God's intention in making known his will; which was not to record every particular fact done by himſelf, or Chriſt, or his Apoſtles, but it was to lay down thoſe general and ſtanding Laws, whereby his Church in all ages ſhould be guided and ruled: and in order to a perpetual obligation upon the conſciences, there muſt be a ſufficient promulgation of thoſe laws which muſt bind men. Thus in the caſe of infant-baptiſm, it is a very weak unconcluding argument to ſay that Infants muſt not be baptized, becauſe we never read that Chriſt or his Apoſtles did it; for this is a negative in matter of fact; but on the other ſide it is an evidence that infants are not to be excluded from baptiſm, becauſe there is no divine law which doth prohibit their admiſſion into the Church by it; for this is the negative of a law; and if it had been Chriſt's intention to have excluded any from admiſſion into the Church who were admitted before as infants were, there muſt have been ſome poſitive law whereby ſuch an intention of Chriſt ſhould have been expreſſed; for nothing can make that unlawful which was a duty before, but a direct and expreſs prohibition from the legiſlator himſelf, who alone hath power to reſcind as well as to make laws. And therefore Antipædobaptiſts muſt inſtead of requiring a poſitive command for baptizing infants, themſelves produce an expreſs prohibition excluding them, or there can be no appearance of reaſon given why the Goſpel ſhould exclude any from theſe privileges, which the law admitted them to. Secondly, I argue from the intention and end of laws, which is to circumſcribe and reſtrain the natural liberty of man, by binding him to the obſervation of ſome particular precepts. And therefore where there is not a particular command and prohibition, it is in Nature and reaſon ſuppoſed that men are left to their natural freedom, as is plain in poſitive humane laws; wherein men by compact and agreement for their mutual good in ſocieties were willing to reſtrain themſelves from thoſe things which ſhould prejudice the good of the community; this being the ground of mens firſt incloſing their rights and Common privileges, it muſt be ſuppoſed, that what is not ſo incloſed, is left common to all as their juſt right and privilege ſtill. So it is in divine poſitive laws, God intending to bring ſome of mankind to happineſs by conditions of his own appointing, hath laid down many poſitive precepts, binding men to the practice of thoſe things as duties which are commanded by him. But where we find no command for performance, we cannot look upon that as an immediate duty, becauſe of the neceſſary relation between duty and law; and ſo where we find no prohibition, there we can have no ground to think that men are debarred from the liberty of doing things not forbidden. For as we ſay of exceptions as to general laws and rules, that an exception expreſſed firmat regulam in non exceptis, makes the rule ſtronger in things not expreſſed as excepted; ſo it is as to divine prohibitions; as to the poſitives, that thoſe prohibitions we read in Scripture make other things not prohibited to be therefore lawful, becauſe not expreſly forbidden. As God's forbidding Adam to taſte of the fruit of one tree did give him a liberty to taſte of all the reſt. Indeed, had not God at all revealed his will and laws to us by his word, there might have been ſome plea why men ſhould have waited for particular revelations to dictate the goodneſs or evil of particular actions, not determined by the law of nature; but ſince God hath revealed his will, there can be no reaſon given why thoſe things ſhould not be lawful to do, which God hath not thought fit to forbid men the doing of. Further, we are to obſerve that in theſe things which are thus undetermined in reference to an obligation to duty, but left to our natural liberty as things lawful, the contrary to that which is thus lawful, is not thereby made unlawful. But both parts are left in mens power to do, or not to do them; as is evident in all thoſe things which carry a general equity with them, and are therefore conſonant to the law of nature, but have no particular obligation, as not flowing immediately from any dictate of the natural law. Thus community of goods is lawful by the law and principles of nature, yet every man hath a lawful right to his goods by dominion and propriety. And in a ſtate of community it was the right of every man to impropriate upon a juſt equality, ſuppoſing a preceding compact and mutual agreement. Whence it is that ſome of the School-men ſay, that although the Law of nature be immutable as to its precepts and prohibitions, yet not as to its demonſtrations (as they call them) as, Do, as you would be done to, bind always indiſpenſably; but that in a ſtate of nature all things are common to all: This is true, but it binds not men to the neceſſary obſervance of it. Theſe which they call demonſtrations are only ſuch things as are agreeable to nature, but not particularly commanded by any indiſpenſable precept of it. Thus likewiſe it is agreeable to nature that the next of the kindred ſhould be heir to him who dies inteſtate, but he may lawfully wave his intereſt if he pleaſe. Now to apply this to our preſent caſe, according to this ſenſe of jus for that which is lawful, thoſe things may be ſaid to be jure divino which are not determined one way or other by any poſitive Law of God, but are left wholly as things lawful, to the prudence of men to determine them in a way agreeable to natural light, and the general rules of the word of God. In which ſenſe I aſſert any particular form of government agreed on by the governours of the Church, conſonant to the general rules of Scripture, to be by divine right, i. e. God by his own Laws hath given men a power and liberty to determine the particular form of Church Government among them. And hence it may appear that though one form of government be agreeable to the word, it doth not follow that another is not; or becauſe one is lawful, another is unlawful; but one form may be more agreeable to ſome parts, places, people and times than others are. In which caſe that form of government is to be ſettled which is moſt agreeable to the preſent ſtate of a place, and is moſt advantagiouſly conducible to the promoting the ends of Church-Government in that place or nation. I conclude then according to this

ſenſe of jus, that the Ratio regiminis Eccleſiaſtici is juris divini naturalis, That the reaſon of the Church-Government is immutable, and holds in all times and places, which is the preſervation of the peace and unity of the Church; but the modus regiminis Eccleſiaſtici, the particular form of that Government is Juris Divini permiſſivi, that both the laws of God and nature have left it to the prudence of particular Churches to determine it. This may be cleared by a parallel inſtance: The reaſon and the ſcience of Phyſick is immutable, but the particular preſcriptions of that ſcience are much varied, according to the different tempers of Patients. And the very ſame reaſon in Phyſick which preſcribes one ſort of Phyſick to one, doth preſcribe a different ſort to another, becauſe the temper or diſeaſe of the one calls for a different method of cure, yet the ground and end of both preſcriptions was the very ſame, to recover the Patient from his diſtemper. So I ſay in our preſent caſe; the ground and reaſon of Government in the Church is unalterable by Divine Right, yea, and that very reaſon which determines the particular forms; but yet thoſe particular forms flowing from that immutable reaſon, may be very different in themſelves, and may alter according to the ſeveral circumſtances of times, and places, and perſons, for the more commodious advancing the main end of Government. As in morality there can be but one thing to a man in genere ſummi boni, as the chief Good, quo tendit & in quod dirigit arcum——— to which he refers all other things, yet there may be many things in genere boni conducentis, as means in order to attaining that end. So though Church-Government vary not as to the ground, end and reaſon of it, yet it may as to the particular forms of it: As is further evident as to forms of civil Government, though the end of all be the ſame, yet Monarchy, Ariſtocracy, and Democracy are in themſelves lawful means for the attaining the ſame common end. And as Alenſis determines it in the caſe of community of goods by the Law of nature, that the ſame reaſon of the Law of nature which did dictate Community of goods to be moſt ſuitable to man in the ſtate of innocency, did in his fal'n eſtate preſcribe a propriety of goods, as moſt agreeable to it; ſo that herein the modus obſervantiæ differed, but the ratio præcepti was the ſame ſtill; which was man's comfortable enjoyment of the accommodations of life: which in innocency might have been beſt done by community, but in man's degenerate condition, muſt be by a propriety. So the ſame reaſon of Church-Government may call for an equality in the perſons, acting as Governours of the Church in one place, which may call for ſuperiority and ſubordination in another.

§. 3 Having now diſpatched the firſt ſenſe of a divine right, I come to the other, which is the main ſeat of the controverſie, and therefore will require a longer debate. And ſo Jus is that which makes a thing to become a duty: ſo jus quaſi juſſum, and juſſa jura, as Feſtus explains it, i. e. that whereby a thing is not only licitum, in mens lawful power to do it or no, but is made debitum, and is conſtituted a duty by the force and vertue of a divine command. Now man's obligation to any thing as a duty doth ſuppoſe on the part of him from whoſe authority he derives his obligation, both legiſlation and promulgation. Firſt, there muſt be a legiſlative power commanding it; which if it reſpects only the outward actions of a man in a nation imbodied by Laws, is the ſupreme magiſtrate; but if the obligation reſpect the conſciences of all men directly and immediately, then none have the Power to ſettle any thing by way of an univerſal ſtanding Law, but God himſelf: Who by being ſole Creator and Governour of the World, hath alone abſolute and independent Dominion and Authority over the Souls of men. But beſides legiſlation, another thing neceſſary to man's obligation to duty, is a ſufficient promulgation of the Law made; becauſe though before this there be the ground of obedience on man's part to all God's commands, yet there muſt be a particular declaration of the Laws, whereby man is bound in order to the determination of man's duty. Which in poſitives is ſo abſolutely neceſſary, that unleſs there be a ſufficient promulgation and declaration of the will of the Law-giver, man's ignorance is excuſable in reference to them, and ſo frees from guilt and the obligation to puniſhment; but it is otherwiſe in reference to the dictates to the natural Law, wherein though man be at a loſs for them, yet his own contracted pravity being the cauſe of his blindneſs, leaves him without excuſe. Hence it is ſaid with good reaſon, that though man under the moral Law, was bound to obey Goſpel precepts, as to the reaſon and ſubſtance of the duties by them commanded, as Faith, Repentance from dead Works, and new obedience; yet a more full and particular revelation by the Goſpel was neceſſary, for the particular determination of the general acts of obedience, to particular objects under their ſeveral Modifications expreſſed in the Goſpel. And therefore Faith and Repentance under the moral Law, taken as a tranſcript of the Law of nature, were required under their general notion as acts of obedience, but not in that particular relation which thoſe acts have under the Covenant of Grace. Which particular determination of the general acts to ſpecial objects under different reſpects, ſome call New precepts of the Goſpel, others New light; but taking that light as it hath an influence upon the conſciences of men, the difference is ſo ſmall, that it deſerves not to be named a Controverſie.

But that which I am now clearing is this, that whatſoever binds Chriſtians as an univerſal ſtanding Law, muſt be clearly revealed as ſuch, and laid down in Scripture in ſuch evident terms, as all who have their ſenſes exerciſed therein, may diſcern it to have been the will of Chriſt, that it ſhould perpetually oblige all believers to the World's end, as is clear in the caſe of baptiſm, and the Lord's-Supper. But here I ſhall add one thing by way of caution; that there is not the ſame neceſſity for a particular and clear revelation in the alteration of a Law unrepealed in ſome circumſtances of it, as there is for the eſtabliſhing of a New Law. As to the former, viz. the change of a ſtanding Law as to ſome particular circumſtance, a different practice by perſons guided by an infallible ſpirit is ſufficient; which is the caſe, as to the obſervation of the Lord's-Day under the Goſpel: For the fourth Command ſtanding in force as to the morality of it, a different practice by the Apoſtles may be ſufficient for the particular determination of the more ritual and occaſional part of it, which was the limitation of the obſervation of it to that certain day. So likewiſe that other Law ſtanding in force, that perſons taken into covenant with God, ſhould be admitted by ſome viſible ſign, apoſtolical practice clearly manifeſted, may be ſufficient ground to conclude what the mind of Chriſt was, as to the application of it to particular perſons; and what qualifications are requiſite in ſuch as are capable of admiſſion, as in the caſe of Infants. Whereby it is clear why there is no particular Law or command in reference to them under the Goſpel, becauſe it was only the application of a Law in force already to particular perſons, which might be gathered ſufficiently from the Apoſtles practice, the Analogy of the diſpenſation, the equal reaſon of excluſion under the Law, and yet notwithſtanding the continual admiſſion of them then into the ſame Goſpel-Covenant; Circumciſion being the ſeal of the righteouſneſs of faith. Rom. 4. 8. But this by the way to prevent miſtakes. We muſt now by parity of reaſon ſay, that either the former Law, in thoſe things wherein it was not typical, muſt hold in reference to the form of Government in the Church of Chriſt, or elſe that Chriſt by an univerſal Law hath ſetled all order in Church Government among the Paſtors themſelves; or elſe that he hath left it to the prudence of every particular Church, to determine its own form of Government, which I conceive is the direct ſtate of the Queſtion about Divine Right, viz. Whether the particular form of Government in the Church be ſetled by an univerſal binding Law or no?

§. 4. But for a farther clearing the ſtate of the queſtion, we muſt conſider what it is that makes an unalterable Divine Right, or a ſtanding Law in the Church of God: for thoſe who found forms of Government upon a Divine Right, do not plead a Law in expreſs terms, but ſuch things from whence a Divine Right by Law may be inferred. Which I now come to examine; and that which I lay down as a Poſtulatum, or a certain concluſion according to which I ſhall examine others aſſertions concerning Divine Right, is, That nothing is founded upon a Divine Right, nor can bind Chriſtians directly or conſequentially as a poſitive Law, but what may be certainly known to have come from God, with an intention to oblige believers to the world's end. For either we muſt ſay it binds Chriſtians as a Law when God did not intend it ſhould, or elſe God's intentions to bind all believers by it muſt be clearly manifeſted. Now then, ſo many ways and no more as a thing may be known to come from God with an intention to oblige all perpetually, a thing may be ſaid to be of an unalterable Divine Right; and thoſe can be no more than theſe two; Either by the Law of Nature, or by ſome poſitive Law of God: Nothing elſe can bind univerſally and perpetually but one of theſe two, or by vertue of them, as ſhall be made appear. I begin with the Law of Nature. The Law of Nature binds indiſpenſably, as it depends not upon any arbitrary conſtitutions, but is founded upon the intrinſecal nature of good and evil in the things themſelves, antecedently to any poſitive declaration of God's will. So that till the nature of good and evil be changed, that Law is unalterable as to its obligation. When, I ſay, the Law of Nature is indiſpenſable, my meaning is, that in thoſe things which immediately flow from that Law by way of precept, as the three firſt commands of the Moral Law, no man can by any poſitive Law be exempted from his obligation to do them; neither by any abrogation of the Laws themſelves, nor by derogation from them, nor interpretation of them, nor change in the object, matter or circumſtance, whatſoever it be. Now although the formal reaſon of man's obedience to the precept of this Law, be the conformity which the things commanded have to the Divine Nature and goodneſs, yet I conceive the efficient cauſe of mans obligation to theſe things, is to be fetched from the Will, Command, and pleaſure of God: Not as it is taken for an arbitrary poſitive will, but as it is executive of Divine purpoſes, and as it engraves ſuch a Law upon the hearts of men. For notwithſtanding man's reaſon, conſidered in it ſelf, be the chiefeſt inſtrument of diſcovery what are theſe neceſſary duties of humane nature (in which ſenſe Ariſtotle defines a natural Law to be that which πανταχȣ̃ τὴν αὐτὴν ἔχει δύναμιν, hath every where the ſame force and ſtrength, i. e. as Andronicus Rhodius very well interprets it, παρ' ἀνθρώποις τοῖς τε ὀρθῶς ϗ ὑγιῶς ἔχȣσι, ȣ̓δὲ τοῖς νοσȣ̃σι τὰς φρένας ϗ διεστραμμένοις, among all that have the free uſe of their reaſon and faculties) yet I ſay, it is not bare reaſon which binds men to the doing of thoſe things commanded in that Law, but as it is expreſſive of an eternal Law, and deduceth its obligation from thence. And ſo this Law, if we reſpect the riſe, extent, and immutability of it, may be call'd deſervedly the Law of Nature; but if we look at the emanation, efflux, and original of it, it is a divine Law, and ſo it is call'd by Molina, Alphonſus à Caſtro, and others. For the ſanction of this Law of Nature, as well as others, depends upon the will of God, and therefore the obligation muſt come from him, it being in the power of no other to puniſh for the breach of a Law, but thoſe who had the Legiſlative power to cauſe the obligation to it. It appears then from hence, that whatever by juſt conſequence can be deduced from the preceptive Law of Nature, is of Divine Right, becauſe from the very nature of that Law (it being indiſpenſible) it appears that God had an intent to oblige all perſons in the world by it.

§. 5. The ſecond way whereby we may know what is of Divine Right, is by God's poſitive Laws; for God being the Supream Governour of the world, hath the Legiſlative power in his hands, to bind to the performance of what duties he pleaſe, which carry no repugnancy in them to his Divine Nature and Goodneſs. Hence ariſe all thoſe poſitive Laws of God which we have in Scripture; for God's end in his written Law was, that man ſhould have a copy of all Divine conſtitutions by him, that he might therein read what his duty was toward his Maker. The precepts of the Law of Nature, are by the Jews call'd משפטים and מצות abſolutely, without any addition; becauſe they are of ſuch things as do perpetually bind, which becauſe they are known to all by natural light, they ſometimes call them מצות הרעת præcepta ſcientiæ; and being that their righteouſneſs is ſo evident and apparent, they call them המישורים דברים verba rectitudinis: but the cleareſt difference between the precepts of the Law of Nature, and other poſitive commands, is that which the famous Iſ. Caſaubon takes notice of out of the Jewiſh Doctors. Obſervant doctiſſimi è Rabbinis inter מצות & חוקים hanc eſſe differentiam, quod Mitſvoth, ſive præceptorum ratio aperta eſt, ut Deum cole, honora patrem & matrem, at Chukin ſtatuta ſive decreta earum rerum eſſe dicunt quarum טעם ratio ſoli Deo ſit nota, ut circumciſionis & ſimilium. The reaſon of the Laws of Nature is evident, but of poſitive Laws there is no reaſon to be given אינו אלא גזירת מלך non eſt alia præter decretum regis: no other account to be given of them but the will of God. The Laws of Nature are by the LXX. often call'd δικαιώματα, and ſo uſed, Rom. 2. 16. by Juſtin Martyr, τὰ καθόλȣ ϗ φύσει ϗ αἰώνια καλά· by Joſephus, τῆς φύσεως δικαιώματα· but God's poſitive Laws are call'd ἐντολαί, thence we read of Zachary and Elizabeth, Luke 1. 6. πορευόμενοι ἐν πάσαις ταῖς ἐντολαῖς ϗ δικαιώμασι, walking in all the ordinances and commandments of God blameleſs, and thoſe are call'd νόμος ἐντολῶν ἐν δόγμασι, by St. Paul Eph. 2. 15. The Law of commandments in ordinances. Now although this difference be not always obſerved in the words in Scripture, yet there is a vaſt difference between the things themſelves though both equally com-

commanded by God. That which is moſt to our preſent purpoſe to obſerve, is, that poſitives being mutable and alterable in themſelves, a bare Divine command is not ſufficient to make them immutable, unleſs there be likewiſe expreſſed, that it is the will of God that they ſhould always continue. This was that which the Jews ſtumbled at ſo much, and do to this day, becauſe they are aſſured their Law came once from God, therefore it muſt of neceſſity have a perpetual obligation: as may be ſeen in their two great Doctors Maimonides and Abarbinel, who both of them make the eternity of the Law one of the fundamental Articles of their Creed. But Abarbinel ſplits this Article into two; whereof the firſt is, that the Law of Moſes ſhall never be changed; the other, that no other Law ſhall come in ſtead of it. The original of which grand error is from want of obſerving the difference between things commanded by God, ſome of which are good, and therefore commanded; others commanded, and therefore good. In which latter, if the reaſon of the command ceaſeth, the command its ſelf obligeth no longer. As the ceremonial Law was to be their παιδαγωγὸς εἰς Χριστὸν, which is not meant in regard of the ſharp ſevere nature of the Law to drive them unto Chriſt, as it is by many interpreted, but the Law is a Pædagogue in regard of its tutorage and conduct, as it ſignified him whoſe office it was to conduct Noblemens Children to the School (as a learned man obſerves.) This being then the office of the Law, when the Church was now entred into Chriſt's School, the office of this Pædagogue then ceaſed. And ſo the ceremonial Law needed no abrogation at all, expiring of its ſelf at Chriſt's coming, as Laws made for the times of war do when peace comes. Only becauſe the Jews were ſo hardly perſuaded that it ſhould expire, (the believing Jews conceiving at firſt the Goſpel came rather to help them to obey the Law of Moſes than to cancel the obligation of it) therefore it was neceſſary that a more honourable burial ſhould be given to it, and the Apoſtles ſhould pro roſtris declare more fully that believers were freed from that Yoke of ceremonies, under which the neck of their fore-fathers had groaned ſo long. It appears then, that a poſitive Law coming from God, doth not merely, by vertue of its being enacted by God, bind perpetually all perſons, unleſs there be a declaration of God's will adjoined, that it ſhould do ſo.

§. 6. It will be here then well worth our enquiry to find out ſome κριτήρια or notes of difference whereby to know when poſitive Laws bind immutably, when not; I ſhall lay down theſe following. Firſt, when the ſame reaſon of the command continues ſtill, then we cannot conceive how that which was inſtituted upon ſuch an account as remains ſtill, ſhould not have the ſame force now which it had at firſt. That poſitive Law under which Adam was in his ſtate of innocency touching the forbidden fruit, did not bind any longer than his fall; becauſe the reaſon of the command ceaſed, which was the tryal of man's obedience: For which, God made choice of a very facile and eaſie command, according to that rule of Politicians, In minimis obedientiæ periculum faciunt Legiſlatores, of which they give this rational account, Quia legiſlatoris ad obedientiam obligantis potius habenda eſt ratio quam rei de quâ lex eſt lata: thence aroſe that Law of the Ephori at Sparta, barbam tondere, to which no other reaſon was annexed but this, obtemperare legibus, to learn them to obey the Laws. This was God's aim in that eaſie command given to Adam, to make thereon an experiment of man's willingneſs to obey his maker, and wherein man ſoon loſt that Obſequii gloriâ, as he in Tacitus calls it, which as Pliny ſaith is in eo major quod quis minus velit. But had this Law been a ſtanding Law for all mankind, it would have continued its obligation ſtill; but ſince we ſee that it was only a perſonal, temporary, probative precept; for no ſooner was man fallen but its obligation ceaſed. So likewiſe thoſe precepts of the Judicial Law, which immediately reſpected the Common-wealth of the Jews as ſuch, their obligation reacheth not to Chriſtians at all, nor (as it is generally conceived) to the Jews themſelves, when out of the Confines of their own country, becauſe the reaſon of thoſe Laws doth neither deſcend to Chriſtians, nor did travel abroad with the Jews. But thoſe judicial Laws which are founded upon common equity do bind ſtill, not by vertue of that ſanction, but by virtue of common principles of equity, which certainly in the preſent ſhortneſs of humane reaſon cannot be fetched from a clearer fountain than thoſe Laws which once came from the fountain of goodneſs: none of whoſe conſtitutions can any ways be ſuppoſed to deviate from the exacteſt rules of juſtice and equity. And upon this very ground too, ſome part of the fourth commandment is abrogated, and the other continues to bind ſtill; For the reaſon of the ceremonial and occaſional part is ceaſed, and the reaſon of what was moral, continues. Therefore the School-men ſay right of the Sabbath day, Cultus eſt à naturâ, modus à lege, virtus à Gratiâ. Nature dictates that God ſhould be worſhipped, the Law informs what day and time to ſpend in his worſhip, Grace muſt enable us to perform that worſhip on that day in a right manner. And becauſe the ſame reaſon for God's worſhip continues ſtill, therefore it is a precept of the natural Law, that God ſhould be worſhipped. What time preciſely muſt be ſpent in God's worſhip (as one day in ſeven) though the reaſon be evident to the nature of it when it is made known, yet it is hard to conceive that nature could have found out the preciſe determination of the time. Although I muſt confeſs the general conſent of nations, as to the ſeventh part, (if it were fully cleared) would ſpeak fair to be the voice of nature, or at leaſt a tradition received from the Sons of Noah, which, if ſo, will be an evidence of the obſervation of the Sabbath before the Children of Iſraels being in the Wilderneſs. But granting that the ſeventh part of time was a poſitive Law of God, yet I ſay it binds immutably, becauſe there is as ſtrong a reaſon for it now as ever, and ratio immutabilis præcepti, facit præceptum immutabile. This I take to be the ſenſe of thoſe who diſtinguiſh between morale poſitivum, and morale naturale, i. e. that ſome things are ſo moral, that even nature its ſelf can diſcover them, as that God ſhould be worſhipped. Other things are ſo moral, that though the reaſon of them be founded in nature, yet there wants divine revelation to diſcover them to us; but when once diſcovered, are diſcerned to be very agreeable to common principles of reaſon: And theſe when thus diſcovered, are as immutably obligatory as the other, becauſe the reaſon of them is immutable. And of this nature is the determination of the particular time for God's worſhip, and limitation of it to one day in ſeven. But what was in that precept merely occaſional, as the firſt and original ground of its limitation to the ſeventh in order, God's reſting on that day from the work of Creation, and the further ground of its inforcement to the Jews, viz. their deliverance out of Egypt; theſe being not immutable but temporary and occaſional, may upon as great ground given, and approved of

Deut. 5. 15.

God for that end (as is evident by the Apoſtles practice) be ſufficient reaſon of the alteration of the ſeventh day to the firſt day of the week. By this may briefly be ſeen how irrationally thoſe ſpeak, who ſay we have no farther ground for our obſervation of the Lord's day now, than for other arbitrary Feſtivals in the Church, viz. The tradition of the Church of God. I grant, the tradition of the Church doth acquaint us with Apoſtolical practice, but the ground of our obſervation of the Lord's day, is not the Church's tradition, but that Apoſtolical practice conveyed by univerſal tradition, (which ſetting aſide the Feſtivals obſerved upon the Lord's day, can very hardly be found for any other.) But ſuppoſing univerſal tradition for other Feſtivals, I ſay here tradition is not only uſed as a teſtimony and inſtrument of conveyance, as in the other caſe of the Lord's day; but is it ſelf the only argument, and the very ground of the original obſervation: Between which two, what a wide difference there is, let any rational man judge. But for a farther clearing this obſervation, we muſt conſider, that the reaſon of the command, which we ſay is the meaſure of its obligation, muſt not be fetched from mens uncertain conjectures, (among whom dreams often paſs for reaſons) but it muſt be either expreſſed in the Law its ſelf, or deducible by apparent and eaſie collection from it; as is plain in the decrees of the Apoſtles about things ſtrangled, and offered to Idols, where the reaſon of the command is plainly implied, to wit, for preſent compliance with the Jews; and therefore no ſooner did the reaſon of the command ceaſe, but the obligation of it ceaſed too: but of this more afterwards. This is one way then to diſcern the difference between poſitive Laws, as to the obligation of them, by the ground and reaſon of the command. And therefore it is well obſerved by Divines, (which farther confirms what I now prove) that no command doth bind againſt the reaſon of the command; becauſe it is not the words, but the ſenſe and reaſon of a command which hath the greateſt obligatory force. Therefore Tully tells us that the ratio juris & legiſlatoris conſilium, is the beſt interpreter of any Law: who excellently and largely proves that the reaſon of the Law is the law, and not the words. So much for the firſt rule.

Acts 15.29.

Orat. pro A. Cacin.

§. 7. Secondly, Another way to know when poſitive Laws are immutable, is, when God's will is expreſly declared that ſuch Laws ſhall bind immutably. For it being granted on all hands that God may bind us to thoſe things which are left indifferent by the Law of nature, and likewiſe for what term he pleaſe; the only enquiry left, is to ſee in his word whether he hath ſo bound us or no; and if he hath, whether he hath left it in man's power to revoke his Laws. For as to poſitive Laws expreſly laid down in Scripture, the ground of which is only as the Jews ſpeak נרוית מלך the will of the King, i. e. God's own pleaſure, without any reaſon or occaſion of it ſelf expreſſed or neceſſarily implied, theſe do bind immutably, unleſs the ſame power which commanded them, doth again revoke them. For we cannot in any wiſe conceive that the wiſe God ſhould after the declaring his own will, leave it in the power of any corrupt fallible being to determine, or to diſpence with the obligation of his own Laws. Which to do, and inſtead of them to enforce others immediately upon the conſciences of men, as ſtanding Laws, is an attempt beyond that of the Giants againſt Heaven, (or the men at Babel) that being only an affectation of reaching Heaven, but this an actual uſurpation of God's ſupreme and legiſlative power and authority. But though man hath not, God always reſerves to himſelf a power to relax, interpret, and diſpence with his own poſitive Laws, which imply no repugnancy to his own nature. And this power is always to be underſtood in all Laws to be reſerved to God, where he hath not himſelf declared that he will not uſe it; which is done either by the annexing an oath or a promiſe, which the Apoſtle calls the two Heb. 6. 18. immutable things in which it is impoſſible for God to lie. For though God be free to promiſe, yet when he hath promiſed, his own nature and faithfulneſs binds him to performance; in which ſenſe I underſtand thoſe who ſay, God in making promiſes is bound only to himſelf, and not to men; that is, that the ground of performance ariſeth from God's faithfulneſs. For elſe if we reſpect the right coming by the promiſe, that muſt immediately reſpect the perſon to whom it is made, and in reſpect of which we commonly ſay that the promſer is bound to performance. But the caſe is otherwiſe in penal Laws, which though never ſo ſtrict, do imply a power of relaxation in the Legiſlator: becauſe penal Laws do only conſtitute the debitum pœnæ, and bind the ſinner over to puniſhment, but do not bind the Legiſlator to an actual execution upon the debt. Which is the ground that the perſon of a Mediator was admittable in the place of fallen man, becauſe it was a penal Law, and therefore relaxable. But becauſe the debt of puniſhment is immediately contracted upon the breach of the Law, therefore ſatisfaction was neceſſary to God as Law-giver, either by the perſon himſelf, or another for him; becauſe it was not conſiſtent with the holineſs of God's nature and his wiſdom as Governor, to relax an eſtabliſhed Law, without valuable conſideration. Now for the third kind of God's Laws beſides promiſſory and penal, viz. ſuch as are merely poſitive reſpecting duties, which become ſuch by vertue of an expreſs command: theſe, though they be revocable in themſelves, yet being revocable only by God himſelf, and his own power, ſince he hath already in his word fully revealed his will, unleſs therein he hath declared when their obligation ſhall ceaſe, they continue irreverſible. This is the caſe as to the Sacraments of the New Teſtament, which being commands merely poſitive, yet Chriſt commanding Chriſtians as Chriſtians to obſerve them, and not as Chriſtians of the firſt and ſecond ages of the Church, his mind can be no otherwiſe interpreted concerning them, Catech. Racov. cap. 4. than that he did intend immutably to bind all Chriſtians to the obſervance of them. For although the Socinians ſay, that baptiſm was only a Rite inſtituted by Chriſt for the paſſing men from Judaiſm and Gentiliſm to Chriſtianity, yet we are not bound to look upon all as reaſon that comes from thoſe who profeſs themſelves the admirers of it. For Chriſt's command no where implying ſuch a limitation; and an outward viſible profeſſion of Chriſtianity being a duty now, and the Covenant entred into by that Rite of initiation, as obligatory as ever, we have no Acts 3. 38. reaſon to think that Chriſt's command doth not reach us now, eſpecially the promiſe being made to as many as God ſhall call, and conſequently the ſame duty required which was then in order to the obtaining of the ſame ends. A third way to diſcern the immutability of poſitive Laws, is, when the things commanded in particular are neceſſary to the being, ſucceſſion, and continuance of ſuch a ſociety of men profeſſing the Goſpel, as is inſtituted and approved by Chriſt himſelf. For Chriſt muſt be ſuppoſed to have the power himſelf to order what ſociety he pleaſe, and appoint what orders he pleaſe to be obſerved by them; what Rites and Ceremonies to be uſed in admiſſion of Members into his Church, in their continuing in it; in the way, means, manner of ejection out of it; in the preſerving the ſucceſſion of his Church, and the adminiſtration of ordinances of his appointment. Theſe being thus neceſſary for the maintaining and upholding this ſociety, they are thereby of a nature as unalterable, as the duty of obſerving what Chriſt hath commanded is. How much theſe things concern the reſolution of the Queſtion propoſed, will appear afterwards. Thus we have gained a reſolution of the ſecond thing, whereon an unalterable Divine Right is founded; viz. either upon the dictates of the Law of Nature, concurring with the Rules of the written word; or upon expreſs poſitive Laws of God, whoſe reaſon is immutable, or which God hath declared ſhall continue, as neceſſary to the being of the Church.

§. 8. The next thing is to examine the other pretences which are brought for a Divine Right; which are either Scripture examples, or Divine acts, or Divine approbation. For Scripture examples: Firſt, I take it for granted on all hands, that all Scripture examples do not bind us to follow them; ſuch are the Mediatory acts of Chriſt, the Heroical acts of extraordinary perſons, all accidental and occaſional actions. Example doth not bind us as an example; for then all examples are to be followed, and ſo we ſhall of neceſſity go qua itur, non qua eundum, walk by the moſt examples, and not by rule. There is then no obligatory force in example it ſelf. Secondly, there muſt be then ſome rule fixed to know when examples bind, and when not: for otherwiſe there can be no diſcrimination put between examples which we are to follow, and which to avoid. This rule muſt be either immediately obligatory, making it a duty to follow ſuch examples, or elſe directive, declaring what examples are to be followed: And yet even this latter doth imply as well as the former, that the following theſe examples thus declared, is become a duty. There can be no duty without a Law making it to be a duty: and conſequently, it is the Law making it to be a duty to follow ſuch examples, which gives a Divine Right to thoſe examples, and not barely the examples themſelves. We are bound to follow Chriſt's example, not barely becauſe he did ſuch and ſuch things, (for many things he did we are not bound to follow him in) but becauſe he himſelf hath by a command made it our duty to follow him in his humility, patience, ſelf denial, &c. and in whatever things are ſet out in Scripture for our imitation. When men ſpeak then with ſo much confidence, that Scripture examples do bind us unalterably, they either mean that the example it ſelf makes it a duty, which I have ſhewn already to be abſurd; or elſe that the moral nature of the action done in that example, or elſe the Law making it our duty to follow the example, though in it ſelf it be of no moral nature. If the former of theſe two, then it is the morality of the action binds us, without its being incarnate in the example: For the example in actions not moral, binds not at all, and therefore the example binds only by vertue of the morality of it, and conſequently, it is the morality of the action which binds, and not the example. If the latter, the rule making it our duty, then it is more apparent, that it is not the example which binds neceſſarily, but that rule which makes it a duty to follow it; for examples in indifferent things do not bind without a Law making it to be a duty: And ſo it evidently appears, that all obligatory force is taken off from the examples themſelves, and reſolved into one of the two former, the moral nature of the action, or a poſitive Law. And therefore thoſe who plead the obliga-

obligatory nature of Scripture examples, muſt either produce the moral nature of theſe examples, or elſe a rule binding us to follow thoſe examples. Eſpecially, when theſe examples are brought to found a New poſitive Law, obliging all Chriſtians neceſſarily to the end of the world. Concerning the binding nature of Apoſtolical practice, I ſhall diſcourſe largely afterwards. The next thing pleaded for a Divine Right, is by Divine Acts. As to this, it is again evident that all Divine Acts do not conſtitute ſuch a Right; therefore there muſt be ſomething expreſſed in thoſe Acts when ſuch a Divine Right follows them; whence we may infallibly gather it was God's intention they ſhould perpetually oblige: as is plain in the caſes inſtanced in the moſt for this purpoſe; as God's reſting on Gen. 2. 2. the ſeventh day, making the Sabbath perpetual: For it was not God's reſting that made it the Sabbath, for that is only expreſſed as the occaſion of its inſtitution; but it was God's ſanctifying the day, that is, by a Law ſetting it apart for his own ſervice, which made it a duty. And ſo Chriſt's reſurrection was not it which made the Lord's day Sabbath of Divine Right; but Chriſt's reſurrection was the occaſion of the Apoſtles altering only a circumſtantial part of a moral duty already; which being done upon ſo great reaſons, and by perſons endued with an infallible ſpirit, thereby it becomes our duty to obſerve that moral command in this limitation of time. But here it is farther neceſſary to diſtinguiſh between acts merely poſitive, and acts donative or legal. The former confer no right at all, but the latter do; not barely as acts, but as legal acts, that is, by ſome declaration that thoſe acts do confer right. And ſo it is in all donations, and therefore in Law the bare delivery of a thing to another doth not give a legal title to it, without expreſs transferring of dominion and propriety with it. Matth. 16. 19. 18. 18. Thus in Chriſt's delivering the Keys to Peter and the reſt of the Apoſtles, by that act I grant the Apoſtles had the power of the Keys by Divine Right; but then it was not any bare act of Chriſt which did it, but it was only the declaration of Chriſt's will conferring that authority upon them. Again, we muſt diſtinguiſh between a right conferr'd by a donative act, and the unalterable nature of that Right; for it is plain there may be a Right perſonal as well as ſucceſſive, derivative, and perpetual. And therefore it is not enough to prove that a Right was given by any act of Chriſt, unleſs it be made appear it was Chriſt's intention that Right ſhould be perpetual if it oblige ſtill. For otherwiſe the extent of the Apoſtolical commiſſion, the power of working miracles, as well as the power of the Keys, (whether by it we mean a power declarative of duty, or a power authoritative and penal) muſt continue ſtill, if a difference be not made between theſe two: And ſome rule found out to know when the Right conferr'd by Divine Acts is perſonal, when ſucceſſive; which rule thus found out, muſt make the Right unalterable, and ſo concerning us, and not the bare donative act of Chriſt: For it is evident they were all equally conferr'd upon the Apoſtles by an act of Chriſt; and if ſome continue ſtill, and others do not, then the bare act of Chriſt doth not make an unalterable Divine Right. And ſo though it be proved that the Apoſtles had ſuperiority of order and juriſdiction over the Paſtors of the Church by an act of Chriſt, yet it muſt farther be proved, that it was Chriſt's intention that ſuperiority ſhould continue in their ſucceſſors, or it makes nothing to the purpoſe. But this argument, I confeſs, I ſee not how thoſe who make a neceſſary Divine Right to follow upon the acts of Chriſt, can poſſibly avoid the force of. The laſt thing pleaded for Divine Right, is Divine approbation, but this leaſt of all conſtitutes a Divine Right: For if the actions be extraordinary, God's approbation of them as ſuch, cannot make them an ordinary duty. In all other actions which are good, and therefore only commendable, they muſt be ſo either becauſe done in conformity to God's revealed will, or to the nature of things good in themſelves. In the one it is the poſitive Law of God, in the other the Law of Nature, which made the action good, and ſo approved by God, and on that account we are bound to do it. For God will certainly approve of nothing but what is done according to his will revealed, or natural; which will and Law of his, is that which makes any thing to be of Divine Right, i. e. perpetually binding, as to the obſervation of it. But for acts of a merely poſitive Nature, which we read God's approbation of in Scripture, by vertue of which approbation thoſe actions do oblige us; in this caſe I ſay it is not God's mere approbation that makes the obligation, but as that approbation ſo recorded in Scripture, is a ſufficient teſtimony and declaration of God's intention to oblige men: And ſo it comes to be a poſitive Law, which is nothing elſe but a ſufficient declaration of the Legiſlator's will and intention, to bind in particular actions and caſes. Thus now we have cleared whereon a neceſſary and unalterable Divine Right muſt be founded; either upon the Law of Nature, or ſome poſitive Law of God, ſufficiently declared to be perpetually binding.

Chap. II.

Six Hypotheſes laid down, as the baſis of the following Diſcourſe. 1. The irreverſible obligation of the Law of Nature, either by humane, or Divine poſitive Laws, in things immediately flowing from it. 2. Things agreeable to the Law of Nature may be lawfully practiſed in the Church of God, where there is no prohibition by poſitive Laws, enlarged into five ſubſervient Propoſitions. 3. Divine poſitive Laws, concerning the manner of the thing whoſe ſubſtance is determined by the Law of Nature, muſt be obeyed by vertue of the obligation of the natural Law. 4. Things undetermined, both by the natural and poſitive Laws of God, may be lawfully determined by the ſupreme authority in the Church of God. 5. What is thus determined by lawful authority, doth bind the conſciences of men ſubject to that authority, to obedience to thoſe determinations. 6. Things thus determined by lawful authority, are not thereby made unalterable, but may be revoked, limited, and changed by the ſame authority.

§. 1. Having ſhewed what a Divine Right is, and whereon it is founded; our next great enquiry will be, how far Church Government is founded upon Divine Right, taken either of theſe two ways. But for our more diſtinct, clear and rational proceeding, I ſhall lay down ſome things, as ſo many Poſtulata or general Principles and Hypotheſes, which will be as the baſis and foundation of the following diſcourſe; which all of them concern the obligation of Laws, wherein I ſhall proceed gradually, beginning with the Law of Nature, and ſo to Divine poſitive Laws; and laſtly to ſpeak to humane poſitive Laws. The firſt Principle or hypotheſis which I lay down, is, poſed to take off the obligation of it. Which I prove, both as to humane poſitive Laws and divine: Firſt as to humane. For firſt, the things commanded in the Law of Nature, being juſt and righteous in themſelves, there can be no obligatory Law made againſt ſuch things. Nemo tenetur ad impoſſibile, is true in the ſenſe of the civil Law, as well as in Philoſophy; as impoſſibile is taken for turpe, and turpe for that which is contrary to the dictates of nature. A man may be as well bound not to be a man, as not to act according to principles of reaſon: For the Law of Nature is nothing elſe but the dictate of right reaſon, diſcovering the good or evil of particular actions, from their conformity or repugnancy to natural light. Whatever poſitive Law is then made directly infringing and violating natural principles, is thereby of no force at all. And that which hath no obligation in it ſelf, cannot diſſolve a former obligation. Secondly, the indiſpenſableneſs of the obligation of the Law of Nature, appears from the end of all other Laws, which are agreed upon by mutual compact, which is the better to preſerve men in their rights and privileges. Now the greateſt rights of men, are ſuch as flow from Nature it ſelf; and therefore, as no Law binds againſt the reaſon of it, ſo neither can it againſt the common end of Laws. Therefore, if a humane poſitive Law ſhould be made, that God ſhould not be worſhipped, it cannot bind, being againſt the main end of Laws, which is to make men live together as reaſonable creatures, which they cannot do, without doing what Nature requires; which is, to ſerve God who made it. Again, it overturns the very foundation of all Government, and diſſolves the tye to all humane Laws, if the Law of Nature doth not bind indiſpenſably; for otherwiſe, upon what ground muſt men yield obedience to any Laws that are made? is it not by vertue of this Law of Nature, that men muſt ſtand to all compacts and agreements made? If Laws take their force among men from hence, they can bind no farther than thoſe compacts did extend, which cannot be ſuppoſed to be to violate and deſtroy their own natures. Poſitive Laws may reſtrain much of what is only of the permiſſive Law of Nature (for the intent of poſitive Laws, was to make men abate ſo much of their natural freedom, as ſhould be judged neceſſary for the preſervation of humane ſocieties) but againſt the obligatory Law of Nature, as to its precepts, no after Law can derogate from the obligation of it. And therefore it is otherwiſe between the Law of Nature and poſitive Law, than between Laws merely civil: for as to theſe the rule is, that poſterior derogat priori, the latter Law caſſates and nulls the obligation of the former; but as to natural Laws and poſitive, prior derogat poſteriori, the Law of Nature, which is firſt, takes away the obligation of a poſitive Law, if it be contrary to it. As Juſtellus obſerves it was in the primitive Church, in reference to the obligation of the Canons of the Councils, that ſuch as were inſerted in the Codex Canonum, being of the more ancient Councils, did render the obligation of later Canons invalid, which were contrary to them, unleſs it were in matters of ſmall moment. We ſee then, that ſuppoſing the Law of Nature doth not continue obligatory, the obligation of all humane poſitive Laws will fall with it (as the ſuperſtructure needs muſt when the foundation is removed) for if any other Law of Nature may be diſſolved, why not that whereby men are bound to ſtand to covenants and contracts made? and if that be diſſolved, how can the obligation to humane Laws remain, which is founded upon that baſis? And ſo all civil ſocieties are thereby overturned.

Hypoth. 1. That where the Law of Nature doth determine any thing by way of duty, as flowing from the principles of it, there no poſitive Law can be ſuppoſed

Grot. de jure belli, &c. lib. 1. cap. 1. ſ. 10.

Præfat. in Cod. Canon. Eccleſ. Afric. p. 14.

Thirdly, it appears from the nature of that obligation which follows the Law of Nature, ſo that thereby no humane Law can bind againſt this; for humane Laws bind only outward humane actions directly, and internal acts only by virtue of their neceſſary connexion with, and influence upon outward actions, and not otherwiſe; but the Law of Nature immediately binds the ſoul and conſcience of man: And therefore obligatio naturalis, and nexus conſcientiæ, are made to be the ſame by Leſſius, Suarez, and others. For Leſſius diſputing, Whether a Will made without ſolemnity of Law, doth bind in conſcience or no? He proves it doth by this argument, from the opinion of the Lawyers, that without thoſe ſolemnities there doth ariſe from it a natural obligation, and the hæres ab Inteſtato, who is the next of Kin, is bound to make it good; therefore it doth bind in conſcience. So then there ariſeth a neceſſary obligation upon conſcience, from the dictates of the Law of Nature, which cannot be removed by any poſitive Law. For although there lye no action in the civil Law againſt the breach of a meerly natural Law, as in the former caſe of ſucceſſion to a will not legally made; in covenants made without conditions expreſſed, in recovery of debts from a perſon to whom money was lent in his Pupilage without conſent of his Tutor; in theſe caſes though no action lie againſt the perſons, yet this proves not that theſe have no obligation upon a man, but only that he is not reſponſible for the breach of moral honeſty in them before civil Courts. In which ſenſe thoſe Lawyers are to be underſtood which deny the obligation of the Law of Nature. But however conſcience binds the offender over to anſwer at a higher tribunal, before which all ſuch offences ſhall be puniſhed. Thus then we ſee no poſitive humane Law can diſpence with, or diſſolve the obligation of the Law of Nature. Much leſs, Secondly, can we ſuppoſe any poſitive divine Law ſhould. For although God's power be immenſe and infinite to do what pleaſeth him, yet we muſt always ſuppoſe this power to be conjoyned with goodneſs, elſe it is no divine power: and therefore poſſe malum, non eſt poſſe, it is no power, but weakneſs to do evil; and without this poſſe malum there can be no alteration made in the nature of good and evil; which muſt be ſuppoſed, if the obligation of the natural Law be diſpenſed with. Therefore it was well ſaid by Origen, when Celſus objected it as the common ſpeech of the Chriſtians, that with God all things are poſſible, that he neither underſtood how it was ſpoken, nor what all theſe things are, nor how God could do them: and concludes with this excellent ſpeech, Δύναται δὲ καθ' ἡμᾶς πάντα ὁ θεὸς, ἅπερ δυνάμενος τοῦ θεὸς εἶναι, καὶ τοῦ ἀγαθὸς εἶναι καὶ σοφὸς εἶναι οὐκ ἐξίσταται. We ſay, ſaith he, that God can do all things which are reconcileable with his Deity, Goodneſs, and Wiſdom. And after adds, That as it is impoſſible for honey to make things bitter, and light to make things obſcure, ſo it is for God to do any thing that is unjuſt. Ἐναντίον γὰρ ἐστι αὐτοῦ τῇ θειότητι καὶ τῇ καθ' αὐτὴν πάσῃ δυνάμει, ἡ τοῦ ἀδικεῖν δύναμις. For the power of doing evil is directly contrary to the divine nature, and that omnipotency which is conſiſtent with it. To the ſame purpoſe he ſpeaks elſewhere, οὐδὲν μὴ πρέπον ἑαυτῷ ὁ θεὸς, βούλεται, God wills nothing unbecoming himſelf: And again, Φαμὲν δὲ ὅτι οὐ δύναται αἰσχρὰ ὁ θεὸς, ἐπεὶ ἔσται ὁ θεὸς δυνάμενος μὴ εἶναι θεὸς· εἰ γὰρ αἰσχρόν τι δρᾷ ὁ θεὸς οὐκ ἔστι θεός. We affirm that God cannot do evil actions, for if he could he might as well be no God. For if God ſhould do evil, he would be no God. So then though God be omnipotent, yet it follows not that he can therefore diſſolve the obligation of the preceptive Law of nature, ture, or change the natures of good and evil. God may indeed alter the properties of thoſe things from whence the reſpects of good and evil do reſult, as in Abraham's offering Iſaac, the Iſraelites taking away the Egyptians Jewels; which God may juſtly do by vertue of his abſolute dominion; but the change here is not in the obligation of the Law, but in the things themſelves. Murther would be an intrinſecal evil ſtill; but that which was done by immediate and explicite command from God, would have been no murther. Theft had been a ſin ſtill, but taking things alienated from their properties by God himſelf, was not theft. We conclude then, what comes immediately from the Law of nature by way of command binds immutably and indiſpenſably. Which is the firſt Hypotheſis or Principle laid down.

§. 2. The ſecond Hypotheſis is, that things which are either deducible from the Law of nature, or by the light of nature diſcovered to be very agreeable to it, may be lawfully practiſed in the Church of God, if they be not otherwiſe determined by the poſitive Laws of God, or of lawful humane authority. We ſhall firſt inquire into the nature of theſe things, and then ſhew the lawfulneſs of doing them. For the nature of theſe things, we muſt conſider what things may be ſaid to be of the Law of nature. They may be reduced to two heads, which muſt be accurately diſtinguiſh'd. They are either ſuch things which nature dictates to be done, or not to be done neceſſarily and immutably; or elſe ſuch things as are judged to be very agreeable to natural light, but are ſubject to poſitive determinations. The former are called by ſome jus naturæ obligativum; by others jus naturæ proprium, whereby things are made neceſſarily duties or ſins; the latter jus naturæ promiſſivum, and reductivum, for which it is ſufficient if there be no repugnancy to natural light. From theſe two ariſe a different obligation upon men; either ſtrict, and is called by Covarruvias obligatio ex juſtitiâ, an obligation of duty and juſtice; the other larger, obligatio ex communi æquitate, or ex honeſtate morali, an obligation from common equity, that is according to the agreeableneſs of things to natural light. The former I have ſhewn already do bind indiſpenſably, but theſe latter are ſubject to poſitive Laws. For our better underſtanding the obligation of theſe (which is more intricate than the former) we ſhall conſider men under a double notion, either in a ſtate of abſolute liberty, which ſome call a ſtate of nature, or elſe in a ſtate wherein they have reſtrained their own liberty by mutual compacts, or are determined by a higher Law. Theſe things premiſed, I lay down theſe propoſitions.

1. In a ſtate of abſolute liberty before any poſitive Laws were ſuperadded to the natural, whatſoever was not neceſſarily determined by the obligatory Law of Nature, was wholly left to mens power to do it or not, and belongs to the permiſſive Law of Nature. And thus all thoſe things which are ſince determined by poſitive Laws, were in ſuch a ſuppoſed ſtate, left to the free choice of a man's own will. Thus it was in mens power to join in civil ſociety with whom they pleaſed, to recover things, or vindicate injuries in what way they judged beſt, to ſubmit to what conſtitutions alone they would themſelves, to chooſe what form of Government among them they pleaſed, to determine how far they would be bound to any authority choſen by themſelves, to lodge the legiſlative and coercive power in what perſons they thought fit, to agree upon puniſhments anſwerable to the nature of offences. And ſo in all other things not repugnant to the common light of reaſon, and the dictates of the preceptive part of the Law of Nature.

2. A ſtate of abſolute liberty not agreeing to the nature of man conſidered in relation to others, it was in mens power to reſtrain their own liberty upon compacts ſo far as ſhould be judged neceſſary for the ends of their mutual ſociety. A ſtate of nature I look upon only as an imaginary ſtate, for better underſtanding the nature and obligation of Laws. For it is confeſſed by the greateſt aſſertors of it, that the relation of Parents and Children cannot be conceived in a ſtate of natural liberty, becauſe Children aſſoon as born are actually under the power and authority of their parents. But for our clearer apprehending the matter in hand, we ſhall proceed with it. Suppoſing then all thoſe former rights were in their own power; it is moſt agreeable to natural reaſon, that every man may part with his right ſo far as he pleaſe for his own advantage. Here now, men finding a neceſſity to part with ſome of their rights to defend and ſecure their moſt conſiderable ones, men begin to think of compacts one with another (taking this as a principle of the natural Law, and the foundation of ſociety, that all Covenants are to be performed.) When they are thus far agreed, they then conſider the terms upon which they ſhould enter into ſociety one with another. And here men deveſt themſelves of their original liberty, and agree upon an incloſure of properties, and the fences of thoſe properties; I mean, upon living together in a civil ſtate, and of the Laws they muſt be ruled by. This is apparently agreeable to natural reaſon, the things being in their own power, which they agree to part with.

Prop. 3.

Men entring upon ſocieties by mutual compacts, things thereby become good and evil which were not ſo before. Thus he who was free before to do what and how he pleaſed, is now bound to obey what Laws he hath conſented to; or elſe he breaks not only a poſitive Law, but that Law of nature which commands man to ſtand to Covenants once made, though he be free to make them. And therefore it is obſervable that the doing of things that were lawful before covenants made, and things thereby determined, may be ſo far from being lawful after, that the doing of them may contradict a principle of the obligatory Law of nature. Thus in a ſtate of liberty every one had right to what he thought fit for his uſe, but Propriety and Dominion being introduced, which was a free voluntary act, by mens determining rights, it now becomes an offence againſt the Law of nature, to take away that which is another mans. In which ſenſe alone it is that theft is ſaid to be forbidden by the Law of nature. And by the ſame reaſon he that reſiſts and oppoſeth the lawful authority, under which he is born, doth not only offend againſt the Municipal Laws of the place wherein he lives, but againſt that Original and fundamental Law of Societies, viz. ſtanding to Covenants once made. For it is a groſs miſtake as well as dangerous, for men to imagine that every man is born in a ſtate of abſolute liberty to chooſe what Laws and Governours he pleaſe; but every one being now born a ſubject to that authority he lives under, he is bound to preſerve it as much as in him lies; thence Auguſtus had ſome reaſon to ſay, He was the beſt Citizen, qui præſentem reipublicæ ſtatum mutari non vult, that doth not diſturb the preſent ſtate of the Common-wealth; and who as Alcibiades ſaith in Thucydides, ὅπερ ἐδέξατο σχῆμα τῆς πολιτείας, τοῦτο συνδιασώζει, endeavours to preſerve that form of Government he was born under. And the reaſon of it is, that in contracts and Covenants made for Government, men look not only at themſelves, but at the benefit of poſterity; if then one party be bound to maintain the rights of the others poſterity as well as of his perſon, the other party muſt be ſuppoſed to oblige his poſterity in his Covenant to perform obedience, which every man hath power to do, becauſe Children are at their parents diſpoſal; And equity requires that the Covenant entred ſhould be of equal extent to both parties: And if a man doth expect protection for his poſterity, he muſt engage for the obedience of his poſterity too, to the Governours who do legally protect them. But the farther proſecution of theſe things belongs to another place to conſider of; my purpoſe being to treat of Government in the Church, and not in the State. The ſumm of this is, that the obligation to the performance of what things are determined (which are of the permiſſive Law of nature) by poſitive Laws, doth ariſe from the obligatory Law of nature. As the Demonſtration of the particular Problemes in the Mathematicks, doth depend upon the principles of the Theoremes themſelves; and ſo whoever denies the truth of the Probleme deduced by juſt conſequence from the Theoreme, muſt conſequently deny the truth of the Theoreme its ſelf: ſo thoſe who violate the particular determinations of the permiſſive Law of nature, do violate the obligation of the preceptive part of that Law: Obedience to the other being grounded on the principles of this.

4. God hath power by his poſitive Laws to take in and determine as much of the permiſſive Law of nature as he pleaſe, which being once ſo determined by an univerſal Law, is ſo far from being lawful to be done, that the doing of them by thoſe under an obligation to his poſitive Laws, is an offence againſt the immutable Law of nature. That God may reſtrain man's natural liberty, I ſuppoſe none who own God's legiſlative power over the world can deny; eſpecially conſidering that men have power to reſtrain themſelves; much more then hath God, who is the Rector and Governour of the world. That a breach of his poſitive Laws is an offence againſt the common Law of nature, appears hence; becauſe man being God's creature, is not only bound to do what is in general ſuitable to the principles of reaſon in flying evil, and chooſing good; but to ſubmit to the determinations of God's will, as to the diſtinction of good from evil. For being bound univerſally to obey God, it is implyed that man ſhould obey him in all things which he diſcovers to be his will: whoſe determination muſt make a thing not only good, but neceſſary to be done, by vertue of his ſupreme authority over men. This then needs no farther proof, being ſo clear in its ſelf.

5. Laſtly. What things are left undetermined by divine poſitive Laws, are in the Churches power to uſe, and practiſe according as it judgeth them moſt agreeable to the rule of the Word. That things undetermin'd by the word are ſtill lawful, evidently appears: becauſe what was once lawful, muſt have ſome poſitive Law to make it unlawful, which if there be none, it remains lawful ſtill. And that the Church of God ſhould be debar'd of any privilege of any other ſocieties, I underſtand not; eſpecially if it belong to it as a ſociety conſidered in its ſelf, and not as a particular ſociety conſtituted upon ſuch accounts as the Church is. For I doubt not but to make it evident afterwards, that many parts of Government in the Church belong not to it as ſuch in a reſtrained ſenſe, but in the general notion of it, as a ſociety of men imbodyed together by ſome Laws proper to its ſelf: Although it ſubſiſt upon a higher foundation, viz. of divine inſtitution, and upon higher grounds, reaſons, principles, ends; and be directed by other Laws immediately than any other ſocieties in the world are.

The third Hypotheſis is this, Where the Law of nature determines the thing, and the divine Law determines the manner and circumſtances of the thing, there we are bound to obey the divine Law in its particular determinations, by vertue of the Law of nature in its general obligation. As for inſtance, the Law of nature bindeth man to worſhip God; but for the way, manner and circumſtances of worſhip, we are to follow the poſitive Laws of God: becauſe as we are bound by nature to worſhip him, ſo we are bound by vertue of the ſame Law to worſhip him in the manner beſt pleaſing to himſelf. For the light of nature, though it determine the duty of worſhip, yet it doth not the way and manner; and though acts of pure obedience be in themſelves acceptable unto God, yet as to the manner of thoſe acts, and the poſitives of worſhip, they are no farther acceptable unto God than commanded by him. Becauſe in things not neceſſarily determined by the Law of nature, the goodneſs or evil of them lying in reference to Gods acceptance, it muſt depend upon his command, ſuppoſing poſitive Laws to be at all given by God to direct Men in their worſhip of him. For ſuppoſing God had not at all revealed himſelf in order to his worſhip; doubtleſs it had been lawful for men not only to pray to God and expreſs their ſenſe of their dependence upon him, but to appoint ways, time and places for the doing it, as they ſhould judge moſt convenient and agreeable to natural light. Which is evident from the Scripture its ſelf as to places: for as far as we can find, ſacrificing in high places, (that is, ſuch as were of mens own appointment) was lawful, till the Temple was built by Solomon; as appears by the ſeveral examples of Gedeon, Samuel, David, and others; Indeed after the place was ſettled by God's own Law, it became wholly ſinful: but if ſo before we ſhould not have read of God's accepting ſacrifices in ſuch places as he did Gedeons, nor of the Prophets doing it, as Samuel and David did. It is a diſputable caſe about Sacrifices, whether the offering of them came only from natural light, or from ſome expreſs command: the latter ſeems far more probable to me, becauſe I cannot ſee how natural light ſhould any wiſe dictate, that God would accept of the blood of other creatures as a token of man's obedience to himſelf. And Rivet gives this very good reaſon why the deſtruction of any thing in ſacrifice cannot belong to the Law of nature, becauſe it is only acceptable as a ſign, and token of obedience, and not ſimply as an act of obedience; and this ſign ſignifying ex inſtituto (for mans deſtroying the life of a beaſt can never naturally ſignifie mans obedience to God) and therefore it muſt have ſome poſitive Law; for thoſe which ſignifie only by inſtitution, and not naturally, cannot be referred to a dictate of the Law of nature. To which purpoſe it is farther obſervable that God doth ſo often in Scripture ſlight the offering of Sacrifices, in reſpect of any inherent vertue or goodneſs in the action it ſelf, or acceptableneſs to God upon the account of the thing done. In which ſenſe God ſaith, He that killeth a bullock is as if he ſlew a man; and he that Sacrificeth a ſheep, as if he cut off a dogs neck, &c. For what is there more in the one than in the other, but only God's appointment, which makes one acceptable and not the other? So that it is no ways probable that God would have accepted Abel's ſacrifice rather than Cain's, had there been no command for their ſacrificing. For as to mere natural light, Cain's Sacrifice ſeems more agreeable to that than Abel's, Cain's being an Euchariſtical offering without hurt to other creatures, but Abel's was cruentum Sacrificium a Sacrifice of blood. But

Heb. 11.4. the chief ground of Abel's acceptance, was his offering in faith, as the Apoſtle to the Hebrews tells us: Now faith is a higher principle than natural light, and muſt ſuppoſe divine revelation, and ſo a divine command as the principle and ground of his action. Moſes his ſilence in reference to a command, is no argument there was none, it not being his deſign to write at large all the particular precepts of the oral Law, but to deduce the Geneaology of the Patriarchs down from Adam and the Creation. But ſuppoſing a command given from God, determining modes and circumſtances of ſuch things of which the ſubſtance depends on a natural Law, men are as well bound to the obſervation of them after their revelation, as the other before. The one being a Teſtimony of their obedience to God as clear and full as the other; yea and ſo much the clearer evidence of obedience, in that there could be no argument for the performing of thoſe things but a divine command. And even in doing things intrinſically good, the ground of purely religious obedience is, becauſe God commands men to do thoſe things more than that they are good in themſelves: Doing a thing becauſe moſt ſuitable to nature, ſpeaking morality; but doing becauſe God commands it, ſpeaks true religion and the obedience of Faith. For as the formal reaſon of the act of faith is a divine Teſtimony diſcovered to our underſtandings, ſo the formal principle of an act of ſpiritual obedience is a divine command inclining the will, and awing it to performance. So far then as divine Law determines things, we are bound to obſerve them from the dictates of the natural Law.

§. 5. The fourth Hypotheſis: In things which are determined both by the Law of nature, and divine poſitive Laws, as to the ſubſtance and morality of them, but not determined as to all circumſtances belonging to them, it is in the power of Lawful authority in the Church of God to determine them, ſo far as they judge them tend to the promoting the performance of them in due manner. So that not only matters wholly left at liberty as to the ſubſtance of them are ſubject to humane Laws and Conſtitutions, but even things commanded in the Divine Law, in reference to the manner of performance, if undetermined by the ſame Law, which enforce the duty. Thus the ſetting apart ſome time for God's worſhip, is a dictate of the natural Law: that the firſt day of the week be that time, is determin'd under the Goſpel; but in what places, at what hours, in what order, decency and ſolemnity this worſhip ſhall be then performed, are circumſtances not determined in Scripture, but only by general rules: as to theſe then, ſo they be done in conformity to thoſe rules, they are ſubject to humane poſitive determinations. But this is not an Hypotheſis in the age we live in to be taken for granted without proving it: ſome denying the Magiſtrate any power at all in matters of religion, others granting a defenſive, protective power of that religion which is profeſſed according to the Laws of Chriſt, but deny any determining power in the Magiſtrate concerning things left undetermin'd by the Scripture. This Hypotheſis then hath landed me into a Field of controverſie, wherein I ſhall not ſo much ſtrive to make my way through any oppoſite party, as endeavour to beget a right underſtanding between the adverſe parties, in order to a mutual compliance; which I ſhall the rather do, becauſe if any controverſie hath been an increaſer and fomenter of heart-burnings and diviſions among us, it hath been about the determination of indifferent things. And, which ſeems ſtrange, the things men can leaſt bear with one another in, are matters of liberty: and thoſe things men have divided moſt upon, have been matters of uniformity, and wherein they have differed moſt, have been pretended things of Indifferency. In order then to laying a foundation for peace and union, I ſhall calmly debate what power the Magiſtrate hath in matters of religion, and how far that power doth extend in determining things left undetermin'd by the word. For the clear underſtanding the firſt of theſe, we ſhall make our paſſage open to it by the laying down ſeveral neceſſary diſtinctions about it, the want of conſidering which hath been the ground of the great confuſion in the handling this controverſie. Firſt then, we muſt diſtinguiſh between a power reſpecting religion in it ſelf, and a power concerning religion as it is the publick owned and profeſſed religion of a Nation. For although the Magiſtrate hath no proper power over religion in it ſelf, either taking it abſtractly for the rule of worſhip, or concretely, for the internal acts of worſhip; for he can neither add to that rule, nor diſſolve the obligation of it; nor yet can he force the conſciences of men, (the chief ſeat of religion) it being both contrary to the nature of religion it ſelf, which is a matter of the greateſt freedom and internal liberty, and it being quite out of the reach of the Magiſtrates Laws, which reſpect only external Actions as their proper object; for the obligation of any Law can extend no farther than the juriſdiction and authority of the Legiſlator, which among men is only to the outward actions. But then if we conſider religion as it is publickly owned and profeſſed by a Nation, the ſupreme Magiſtrate is bound by vertue of his office and authority, not only to defend and protect it, but to reſtrain men from acting any thing publickly tending to the ſubverſion of it. So that the plea for liberty of conſcience, as it tends to reſtrain the Magiſtrate's power, is both irrational and impertinent; becauſe liberty of conſcience is the liberty of mens judgments, which the Magiſtrate cannot deprive them of. For men may hold what opinions they will in their minds, the Law takes no cognizance of them: but it is the liberty of practice, and venting and broaching thoſe opinions which the Magiſtrate's power extends to the reſtraint of. And he that hath the care of the publick good, may give liberty to, and reſtrain liberty from men, as they act in order to the promoting of that good; And as a liberty of all opinions tends manifeſtly to the ſubverting a Nation's peace, and to the embroyling it in continual confuſions, a Magiſtrate cannot diſcharge his office, unleſs he hath a power to reſtrain ſuch a liberty. Therefore we find plainly in Scripture that God imputes the increaſe and impunity of Idolatry as well as other vices to the want of a lawful Magiſtracy, Judges 17. 5, 6. where the account given of Micah's Idolatry was, becauſe there was no King in Iſrael; which implies it to be the care and duty of Magiſtrates to puniſh and reſtrain whatever tends to the oppoſing and ſubverting the true religion. Beſides, I cannot find any reaſon pleaded againſt the Magiſtrate's power now, which would not have held under David, Solomon, Aſa, Jehoſaphat, Hezekias, Joſias, or other Kings of the Jews, who aſſerted the publick profeſſion, to the extirpation of what oppoſed it. For the plea of conſcience, (taken for mens judgments going contrary to what is publickly owned as religion) is indifferently calculated for all Meridians, and will ſerve for a Religion of any elevation. Nay ſtiff and contumacious Infidels or Idolaters may plead as highly, (though not ſo truly) as any, that it goes againſt their judgments or their conſcience to own that religion which is eſtabliſhed by authority. If it be lawful then to reſtrain ſuch, notwithſtanding this pretence, why not others, whoſe doctrine and principles the Magiſtrate judgeth to tend in their degree, (though not ſo highly) to the diſhonouring God, and ſubverting the profeſſion entertained in a Nation? For a mans own certainty and confidence that he is in the right, can have no influence upon the Magiſtrate judging otherwiſe; only if it be true, it will afford him the greater comfort and patience under his reſtraint: which was the caſe of the primitive Chriſtians under perſecutions: The Magiſtrate then is bound to defend, protect and maintain the religion he owns as true, and that by vertue of his office, as he is Cuſtos utriuſque tabulæ, The maintainer of the honour of God's Laws, which cannot be, if he ſuffer thoſe of the firſt table to be broken without any notice taken of them. Were it not for this power of Magiſtrates under the Goſpel, how could that Iſa. 49.23. promiſe be ever made good, that Kings ſhall be nurſing Fathers to the Church of God? unleſs they mean ſuch Nurſing Fathers as Aſtyages was to Cyrus, or Amulius to Romulus and Remus, who expoſed their nurſtlings to the Fury of wild Beaſts to be devoured by them. For ſo muſt a Magiſtrate do the Church, unleſs he ſecure it from the incurſion of Hereticks, and the inundation of Seducers. But ſo much for that which is more largely aſſerted and proved by others. The Magiſtrate then hath power concerning Religion, as owned in a Nation.

Secondly, we muſt diſtinguiſh between an external and objective power, about matters of Religion, and an internal formal power; which ſome call an imperative and elicitive power, others a power of order and a power of juriſdiction, others poteſtas Eccleſiaſtica, and poteſtas circa Euſeb. vit. Conſtant. l. 4. c. 24. Eccleſiaſtica, or in the old diſtinction of Conſtantine, τῶν ἐκτὸς & τῶν ἔσω τῆς ἐκκλησίας, a power of things within and without the Church; the ſenſe of all is the ſame, though the terms differ. The internal, formal, elicitive power of order, concerning things in the Church, lies in authoritative exerciſe of the Miniſterial function, in preaching the word, and adminiſtration of Sacraments; but the external, objective, imperative power of juriſdiction, concerning the matters of the Church, lies in a due care and proviſion for the defence, protection, and propagation of Religion. The former is only proper to the Miniſtry, the latter to the Supream Magiſtracy: For though the Magiſtrate hath ſo much power about Religion, yet he is not to uſurp the Miniſterial function, nor to do any proper acts belonging to it. To which the inſtance of Uzzia's is pertinently applied. But then this takes nothing off from the Magiſtrate's power; for it belongs not to the Magiſtrate imperata facere, but De Imp. ſum. Poteſt. cap. 2. l. 1. imperare facienda, as Grotius truly obſerves, not to do the things commanded, but to command the things to be done. From this diſtinction we may eaſily underſtand, and reſolve that ſo much vexed and intricate Queſtion, concerning the mutual ſubordination of the Civil and Eccle- In Jud. c. 19. ſiaſtical power: For as Peter Martyr well obſerves, theſe two powers are ſome ways ἀντιστρεφαὶ, are converſant ſeveral ways about the ſame thing; but the Functions of both of them muſt be diſtinguiſhed: For the Paſtors of the Church are not to adminiſter juſtice, but it is their duty to declare how juſtice ſhould be rightly adminiſtred, without partiality, or oppreſſion. So on the other ſide, the Magiſtrate muſt not preach the Goſpel, nor adminiſter Sacraments; but however, muſt take care that theſe be duly done by thoſe to whoſe function it belongs: but for a clearer making it appear, theſe things are to be conſidered, both in a Magiſtrate and Miniſter of the Goſpel. In a Magiſtrate the Power it ſelf, and the perſon bearing that power: The power it ſelf of the Magiſtrate is no ways ſubordinate to the power of the Miniſtry; indeed if we conſider both powers, in reference to their objects, and ends, there may be an inferiority of Dignity, as Chamier calls it, in the civil power to the other, conſidered abſtractly; but conſidering it concretely, as lodged in the perſons, there is an Inferiority of ſubjection in the Eccleſiaſtical to the Civil. But ſtill the perſon of the Magiſtrate, though he is not ſubject to the power of the Miniſters, yet both as a Chriſtian, and as a Magiſtrate, he is ſubject to the word of God, and is to be guided by that in the adminiſtration of his Function. So on the other ſide, in a Miniſter of the Goſpel, there are theſe things conſiderable; the object of his function, the function it ſelf, the liberty of exerciſing it, and the perſon who doth exerciſe it. As for the object of this function, the Word and Sacraments, theſe are not ſubject to the civil power, being ſettled by a Law of Chriſt; for then for the function it ſelf, that may be conſidered, either in the derivation of it, or in the adminiſtration of it. As for the derivation of the power and authority of the function, that is from Chriſt, who hath ſettled and provided by Law, that there ſhall be ſuch a ſtanding function to the end of the world, with ſuch authority belonging to it: But for the adminiſtration of the function, two things belong to the Magiſtrate: Firſt, to provide and take care for due adminiſtration of it; and to ſee that the Miniſters preach the true doctrine, though he cannot lawfully forbid the true doctrine to be taught; and that they duly adminiſter the Sacraments, though he cannot command them to adminiſter them otherwiſe than Chriſt hath delivered them down to us: This for due adminiſtration. Secondly, in caſe of male-adminiſtration of his function, or ſcandal rendring him unfit for it, it is in the Magiſtrate's power, if not formally to depoſe, yet to deprive them of the liberty of ever exerciſing their function within his Dominions; as Solomon did Abiathar, and Juſtinian Sylverius, as Conſtantius did Vigilius: For the liberty of the exerciſe of the function is in the Magiſtrate's power, though a right to exerciſe it be derived from the ſame power from which the authority belonging to the function was conveyed. And then laſtly, as to the perſons exerciſing this function, it is evident, as they are members of a civil ſociety as well as others, ſo they are ſubject to the ſame civil Laws as others are. Which as it is expreſly affirmed by Chryſoſtom, on Rom. 13. 1. Let every ſoul be ſubject to the higher powers, that is, ſaith he, κἂν ἀπόστολος ᾖς, κἂν εὐαγγελιστὴς, κἂν προφήτης, κἂν ὁτιοῦν. Be he an Apoſtle, Evangeliſt, Prophet, Prieſt, Monk, be he who he will. So it is fully, largely, irrefragably proved by our Writers againſt the Papiſts: eſpecially by the learned Iſ. Caſaubon in his piece de libertate Eccleſiaſticâ. So then we ſee what a fair, amicable, and mutual aſpect theſe two powers have one upon another, when rightly underſtood, being far from claſhing one with the other; either by a ſubjection of the civil power to the Eccleſiaſtical, or the civil powers ſwallowing up and devouring the peculiarity of the Miniſterial function. And upon theſe grounds, I ſuppoſe Beza and Eraſtus may, as to this, ſhake hands; So that the Magiſtrate do not uſurp the Miniſterial function, which Vedelius calls Papatus politicus; nor the Miniſters ſubject the civil power to them, which is Papatus Eccleſiaſticus.

§. 7. Thirdly, we diſtinguiſh between an abſolute Architectonical and Nomothetical power, independent upon any other Law, and a Legiſlative power, abſolute as to perſons, but regulated by a higher Law. The former

we attribute to none but God; the latter belongs to a Supreme Magiſtrate, in reference to things belonging to his power, either in Church or Common-wealth. By an Architectonical, Nomothetical power, we mean that power which is diſtinguiſhed from that which is properly call'd Political. The former lies in the making Laws for the good of the Common-wealth; the latter in a due execution and adminiſtration of thoſe Laws for the common good. This we have aſſerted to the Magiſtrate already; we now come to aſſert the other; where we ſhall firſt ſet down the bounds of this power, and then ſee to whom it belongs. Firſt then, we ſay not that the Magiſtrate hath a power to revoke, repeal, or alter any Divine poſitive Law; which we have already ſhewn. Secondly, we ſay not, that the Magiſtrate by his own will may conſtitute what new Laws he pleaſe for the worſhip of God. This was the fault of Jeroboam who made Iſrael to ſin, and therefore by the rule of reaſon muſt be ſuppoſed to ſin more himſelf: So likewiſe Ahab, Ahaz, and others. Religion is a thing ſettled by a Divine Law; and as it is taken for the doctrine and worſhip of God; ſo it is contained in the word of God, and muſt be fetched wholly from thence. But then thirdly, The Magiſtrate, by his power, may make that which is a Divine Law already, become the Law of the Land. Thus Religion may be incorporated among our Laws, and the Bible become our Magna Charta. So the firſt Law in the Codex Theod. is about the believing the Trinity, and many others about Religion are inſerted into it. Now as to theſe things clearly revealed in the word of God, and withal commanded by the Civil Magiſtrate, although the primary obligation to the doing them, is from the former determination by a Divine Law; yet the ſanction of them by the Civil Magiſtrate, may cauſe a farther obligation upon Conſcience than was before, and may add puniſhments and rewards not expreſſed before. For although when two Laws are contrary the one to the other, the obligation to the higher Law takes away the obligation to the other; yet when they are of the ſame nature, or ſubordinate one to the other, there may a New obligation ariſe from the ſame Law, enacted by a New authority. As the commands of the Decalogue brought a New obligation upon the Conſciences of the Jews, though the things contained in them, were commanded before in the Law of Nature: And as a Vow made by a man, adds a new tie to his Conſcience, when the matter of his Vow is the ſame with what the word of God commands; and renewing our Covenant with God after Baptiſm, renews our obligation: So when the faith of the Goſpel becomes the Law of a Nation, men are bound by a double cord of Duty to entertain and profeſs that faith. Fourthly, In matters undetermined by the word, concerning the external Polity of the Church of God, the Magiſtrate hath the power of determining things, ſo they be agreeable to the word of God. This laſt clauſe is that which binds the Magiſtrates power, that it is not abſolutely Architectonical, becauſe all his Laws muſt be regulated by the general rules of the Divine Law. But though it be not as to Laws, yet I ſay it is as to perſons; that is, that no other perſons have any power to make Laws, binding men to obedience, but only the Civil Magiſtrate. This is another part of the controverſie between the Civil and Eccleſiaſtical power, about the power of determining matters belonging to the Churches Government: But there is here no ſuch breach between thoſe two, but what may be made up with a diſtinction or two. We diſtinguiſh then between a power decla- rative, of the obligation of former Laws, and a power authoritative, determining a new obligation; between the office of counſelling and adviſing what is fit to be done, and a power determining what ſhall be done; between the Magiſtrates duty of conſulting, in order to the doing it, and his deriving his authority for the doing it. Theſe things premiſed, I ſay: Firſt, that the power of declaring the obligation of former Laws, and of conſulting and adviſing the Magiſtrate for ſetling of new Laws, for the polity of the Church, belongs to the Paſtors and Governours of the Church of God. This belongs to them, as they are commanded to teach what Chriſt hath commanded them, but no authority thereby given to make new Laws to bind the Church; but rather a tying them up to the commands of Chriſt already laid down in his word. For a power to bind mens Conſciences to their determinations, lodged in the officers of the Church, muſt be derived either from a Law of God giving them this right, or elſe only from the conſent of parties. For any Law of God, there is none produced with any probability of reaſon, but that, Obey thoſe that are over you in the Lord. But that implies no more than ſubmitting to the Doctrine and Diſcipline of the Goſpel, and to thoſe whom Chriſt hath conſtituted as Paſtors of his Church, wherein the Law of Chriſt doth require obedience to them, that is, in looking upon them, and owning them in their relation to them as Paſtors. But that gives them no authority to make any new Laws, or Conſtitutions, binding mens Conſciences any more than a command from the ſupream authority that inferiour Magiſtrates ſhould be obeyed, doth imply any power in them to make new Laws to bind them. But thus far I acknowledge a binding power in Eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions, though they neither bind by vertue of the matter, nor of the authority commanding (there being no legiſlative power lodged in the Church) yet in reſpect of the circumſtances and the end, they ſhould be obey'd, unleſs I judge the thing unlawful that is commanded, rather than manifeſt open contempt of the Paſtors of the Church, or bring a ſcandal to others by it. But as to the other power, ariſing from mutual compact and conſent of parties, I acknowledge a power to bind all included under that compact, not by vertue of any ſupream binding power in them, but from the free conſent of the parties ſubmitting; which is moſt agreeable to the nature of Church-power, being not coactive but directive; and ſuch was the confederate diſcipline of the Primitive Church, before they had any Chriſtian Magiſtrate: And thence the decrees of Councils were call'd Canons, and not Laws. Secondly, Though it be the Magiſtrates duty to conſult with the Paſtors of the Church, to know what is moſt agreeable to the word of God, for the ſettlement of the Church; yet the Magiſtrate doth not derive his authority in commanding things from their ſentence, decree, and judgment, but doth by vertue of his own power cauſe the obligation of men to what is ſo determin'd, by his own enacting what ſhall be done in the Church. The great uſe of Synods and Aſſemblies of Paſtors of Churches, is to be as the Council of the Church unto the King, in matters belonging to the Church, as the Parliament is for matters of civil concernment. And as the King, for the ſettling Civil Laws, doth take advice of ſuch Perſons who are moſt verſed in matters of Law; ſo by proportion of reaſon, in matters concerning the Church, they are the fitteſt Council, who have been the moſt verſed in matters immediately belonging to the Church: In the management of which affairs, as much, if not more, prudence, experience, rience, judgment, moderation, is requiſite, as in the greateſt affairs of State. For we have found by doleful experience, that if a fire once catch the Church, and Aaron's bells ring backward, what a Combuſtion the whole State is ſuddenly put into, and how hardly the Churches inſtruments for quenching ſuch fires, lacryhmæ & preces Eccleſiæ, do attain their end. The leaſt peg ſcrued up too high in the Church ſoon cauſeth a great deal of diſcord in the ſtate, and quickly puts mens ſpirits out of Tune. Whereas many irregularities may happen in the ſtate, and men live in quietneſs and peace. But if Phaetons drive the chariot of the Sun, the world will be ſoon on fire. I mean ſuch in the Church whoſe brains like the Unicorns run out into the length of the Horn; Such who have more fury than zeal, and yet more zeal than Knowledge or Moderation. Perſons therefore whoſe calling, temper, office, and experience hath beſt acquainted them with the State-actions, Polity of the Primitive Church, and the incomparable Prudence and Moderation then uſed, are fitteſt to debate, conſult, deliberate, determine about the ſafeſt expedients for repairing breaches in a divided, broken, diſtracted Church. But yet I ſay when ſuch men thus aſſembled have gravely and maturely adviſed and deliberated what is beſt and fitteſt to be done, the force, ſtrength and obligation of things ſo determin'd doth depend upon the power and authority of the Civil Magiſtrate for taking the Church as incorporated into the Civil-State, as Eccleſia eſt in republicâ, non reſpublica in Eccleſiâ, according to that known ſpeech of Optatus Milivetanus; ſo though the object of theſe conſtitutions, and the perſons determining them, and the matter of them be eccleſiaſtical, yet the force and ground of the obligation of them is wholly civil. So Peter Martyr expreſly; Nam quod ad poteſtatem Eccleſiaſticam attinet, ſatis eſt civilis Magiſtratus: is enim curare debet ut omnes officium facient (But for the judgment of the reformed Divines about this, ſee Vedelius de epiſcopatu Conſtant. M—— & Officium Magiſtratus Chriſtiani, annexed to Grotius de Imper. &c.) I therefore proceed to lay down the reaſon of it. Firſt, That whereby we are bound either to obedience or penalty upon diſobedience, is the ground of the obligation; but it is upon the account of the Magiſtrates power that we are either bound to obedience, or to ſubmit to penalties upon diſobedience. For it is upon the account of our general obligation to the Magiſtrate, that we are bound to obey any particular Laws or Conſtitutions. Becauſe it is not the particular determinations made by the Civil Magiſtrate, which do immediately bind Conſcience, but the general Law of Scripture requires it from us as a Duty to obey the Magiſtrate in all things lawful. Obedience to the Magiſtrate is due immediately from Conſcience; but obedience to the Laws of the Magiſtrate comes not directly from Conſcience, but by vertue of the general obligation. And therefore diſobedience to the Magiſtrates Laws is an immediate Sin againſt Conſcience, becauſe it is againſt the general obligation; but obedience to particular Laws ariſeth not immediately from the obligation of Conſcience to them in particular, but to the Magiſtrate in general. So that in things left lawful and undetermined by the word, where there ariſeth no obligation from the matter, it muſt ariſe from our ſubjection and relation to the Magiſtrate; and what is the ground of Obedience, is the cauſe of the Obligation. Secondly, He hath only the power of obligations who hath the power of making ſanctions to thoſe Laws. By ſanctions I mean here in the ſenſe of the Civil Law, eas legum partes quibus pœnas conſtituimus adverſus eos qui contra contra leges fecerint, thoſe parts of the Law which determine the puniſhments of the violaters of it. Now it is evident that he only hath power to oblige who hath power to puniſh upon diſobedience. And it is as evident that none hath power to puniſh but the Civil Magiſtrate; I ſpeak of legal Penalties which are annexed to ſuch Laws as concern the Church. Now there being no coercive or coactive power belonging to the Church as ſuch, all the force of ſuch Laws as reſpect the outward Polity of the Church, muſt be derived from the Civil Magiſtrate. Thirdly, He who can null and declare all other obligations void, done without his power, hath the only power to oblige. For whatſoever deſtroys a former obligation, muſt of neceſſity imply a power to oblige, becauſe I am bound to obey him in the abſtaining from that I was formerly obliged to: But this power belongs to the Magiſtrate. For ſuppoſe in ſome indifferent Rites and Ceremonies, the Church repreſentative, that is, the Governours of it pro tempore do preſcribe them to be obſerved by all, the ſupreme Power forbids the doing of thoſe things, if this doth not null the former ſuppoſed obligation, I muſt inevitably run upon theſe abſurdities. Firſt, That there are two ſupreme powers in a Nation at the ſame time. Secondly, That a man may lie under two different obligations as to the ſame thing; he is bound to do it by one power, and not to do it by the other. Thirdly, The ſame action may be a Duty and a Sin; a Duty in obeying the one power, a Sin in diſobeying the other. Therefore there can be but one power to oblige, which is that of the ſupreme Magiſtrate.

§. 8. Having thus far aſſerted the Magiſtrates due power and authority as to matters of Religion, we proceed to examine the extent of this power in determining things left at liberty by the word of God, in order to the Peace and Government of the Church. For our clear and diſtinct proceeding, I ſhall aſcend by theſe three ſteps. Firſt, To ſhew that there are ſome things left undetermin'd by the word. Secondly, That theſe things are capable of poſitive determinations and reſtraint. Thirdly, That there are ſome bounds and limits to be obſerved in the ſtating and determining theſe things. Firſt, That there are ſome things left undetermined by the word: by determining here, I do not mean determining whether things be lawful or no; for ſo there is no Rite or Ceremony whatſoever, but is determined by the Scripture in that ſenſe, or may be gathered from the application of particular actions to the general rules of Scripture; but by determining, I mean whether all things concerning the Churches Polity and Order be determined as Duties or no: viz. that this we are bound to obſerve, and the other not. As for inſtance, what time, manner, method, geſture, habit be uſed in preaching the word; whether Baptiſm muſt be by dipping or ſprinkling; at what day, time, place, the Child ſhall be baptized; and other things of a like nature with theſe. Thoſe who aſſert any of theſe as Duties, muſt produce neceſſarily the command making them to be ſo: for duty and command have a neceſſary reſpect and relation to one another. If no command be brought, it neceſſarily follows that they are left at liberty. So as to the Lord's Supper Calvin ſaith, whether the Communicants take the Bread themſelves, or receive it being given them: whether they ſhould give the Cup into the hands of the Deacon or to their next Neighbour: whether the Bread be leaven'd or not, the Wine red or white, nihil refert, it matters not; Hæc indifferentia ſunt & in eccleſiæ libertate poſita; they are matters of indifferency, and are left to the Churches liberty. But this matter of indifferency is not yet ſo clear as it is generally thought to be; we ſhall therefore bare the ground a little by ſome neceſſary diſtinctions, to ſee where the root of indifferency lies: Which we ſhall the rather do, becauſe it is ſtrongly aſſerted by an Honourable perſon, that there is no indifferency in the things themſelves which are ſtill either unlawful or neceſſary, (if Lawful at this time, in theſe circumſtances) but all indifferency lies in the darkneſs and ſhortneſs of our underſtandings, which may make ſome things ſeem ſo to us. But that Honourable perſon clearly runs upon a double miſtake. Firſt, That Indifferency is a medium participationis of both extreams, and not only negationis, viz. that as intermediate colours partake both of black and white, and yet are neither; ſo in morality, between good and bad, there is an intermediate entity, which is neither, but indifferent to either: Whereas the nature of Indifferency lies not in any thing intermediate between good and bad, but in ſome thing undetermined by divine Laws as to the neceſſity of it; ſo that if we ſpeak as to the extreams of it, it is ſomething lying between a neceſſary duty, and an intrinſecal evil. The other miſtake, is, that throughout that diſcourſe he takes indifferency as circumſtantiated in individual actions, and as the morality of the action is determined by its circumſtances; whereas the proper notion of Indifferency lies in the nature of the action conſidered in it ſelf abſtractly; and ſo theſe things are implied in an indifferent action. Firſt, Abſolute undetermination as to the general nature of the act by a divine Law, that God hath left it free for men to do it or no. Secondly, That one part hath not more propenſion to the rule than the other; for if the doing of it comes nearer to the rule than the omiſſion, or on the contrary, this action is not wholly indifferent. Thirdly, That neither part hath any repugnancy to the rule; for that which hath ſo, is ſo far from being indifferent, that it becomes unlawful: So that an indifferent action is therein like the Iron accoſted by two Loadſtones on either ſide of equal vertue, and ſo hovers in medio, inclining to neither, but ſuppoſing any degree of vertue added to the one above the other, it then inclines towards it; or as the Magnetical needle about the Azores, keeps it ſelf directly parallel to the Axis of the world without variation, becauſe it is ſuppoſed then to be at an equal diſtance from the two great Magnets, the Continents of Europe and America; but no ſooner is it removed from thence, but it hath its variations. So indifferency taken in ſpecie, as to the nature of the act, inclines neither way; but ſuppoſing it lie under poſitive determinations, either by Laws or circumſtances, it then neceſſarily inclines either to the nature of good or evil.

Nature of Epiſc. cap. 5.

Neither yet are we come to a full underſtanding of the nature of indifferent actions; we muſt therefore diſtinguiſh between indifferency as to goodneſs neceſſitating an action to be done, and as to goodneſs neceſſary to an action to make it good; For there is one kind of goodneſs propter quam fit actio, in order to which the action muſt neceſſarily be done; and there is another kind of goodneſs ſine quâ non benè fit actio, neceſſary to make an action good when it is done. As following after peace hath ſuch a goodneſs in it, as neceſſitates the action, and makes it a neceſſary duty: but handling a particular controverſie is ſuch an action, as a man may let alone without ſin in his courſe of ſtudies; yet when he doth it, there is a goodneſs neceſſary to make his doing it a good action, viz. his referring his ſtudy of it to a right end, for the obtaining of truth and peace. This latter goodneſs is twofold, either bonitas directionis, as ſome call it, which is referring the action to its true end; in reference to which, the great controverſie among the Schoolmen, is about the indifferency of particular actions, viz. Whether a particular direction of a mans intention to the ultimate end, be not ſo neceſſary to particular actions, as that without the action is of neceſſity evil, and with it good; or whether without that an action may be indifferent to good or evil, which is the ſtate of the Queſtion between Thomas Scotus, Bonaventure and Durandus; but we aſſert the neceſſity of at leaſt an habitual direction, to make the action in individuo good, and yet the act in it ſelf may notwithſtanding be indifferent, even in individuo, as there is no antecedent neceſſity lying upon mens Conſciences for the doing of it; becauſe men may omit it, and break no Law of God. Beſides this, to make an action good, there is neceſſary a bonitas originis, or rather Principii, a good principle out of which the action muſt flow; Which muſt be that faith, which whatſoever is not of, is ſin, as the Apoſtle tells us. Which we muſt not ſo underſtand, as though in every action a Man goes about, he muſt have a full perſuaſion that it is a neceſſary duty he goes about; but in many actions that faith is ſufficient whereby he is perſwaded upon good grounds, that the thing he goes about is lawful; although he may as lawfully omit that action, and do either another, or the contrary to it. There may be then the neceſſity of ſome things in an action when it is done to make it good, and yet the action it ſelf be no ways neceſſary, but indifferent and a matter of liberty. This may be eaſily underſtood by what is uſually ſaid of God's particular actions, that God is free in himſelf either to do or not to do that action (as ſuppoſe the Creation of the World) but when he doth it, he muſt neceſſarily do it with that goodneſs, holineſs, and wiſdom, which is ſuitable to his nature: So may many actions of men be in themſelves indifferent, and yet there muſt be a concomitant neceſſity of good intention and principle to make the action good. But this concomitant neceſſity doth not deſtroy the radical indifferency of the action it ſelf; it is only an antecedent neceſſity from the obligation of the Law, is that which deſtroys indifferency. So likewiſe it is as to evil; there is ſuch an evil in an action, which not only ſpoils the action, but hinders the perſon from the liberty of doing it, that is, in all ſuch actions as are intrinſecally evil; and there is ſuch a kind of evil in actions, which though it ſpoils the goodneſs of the action, yet keeps not from performance; which is ſuch as ariſeth from the manner of performance, as praying in hypocriſie, &c. doing a thing lawful with a ſcrupulous or erring Conſcience. We ſee then what good and evil is conſiſtent with indifferency in actions, and what is not. And that the nature of actions, even in individuo, may be indifferent, when as to their circumſtances they may be neceſſarily determin'd to be either good or evil. As marrying, or not marrying, as to the Law of God, is left at liberty, not making it in it ſelf a neceſſary duty, one way or other; but ſuppoſing particular circumſtances make it neceſſary, pro hic & nunc, yet the nature of it remains indifferent ſtill; and ſuppoſing marriage, it is neceſſary it ſhould be in the Lord, and yet it is not neceſſary to make choice of this perſon rather than of that; ſo that not only the abſolute indifferency of the action is conſiſtent with this concomitant neceſſity, but the full liberty both of contradiction and contrariety. Again, we muſt diſtinguiſh between an indifferency as to its nature, and indifferency

V. Forbeſ. Iren. lib. 1. cap. 13.

as to its uſe and end; or between an indifferency as to a Law, and indifferency as to order and peace: here I ſay, that in things wholly indifferent in both reſpects, that is, in a thing neither commanded nor forbidden by God, nor that hath any apparent reſpect to the peace and order of the Church of God, there can be no rational account given, why the nature of ſuch indifferencies ſhould be alter'd by any humane Laws and Conſtitutions. But matters that are only indifferent as to a command, but are much conducing to the peace and order of a Church, ſuch things as theſe, are the proper matter of humane conſtitutions concerning the Churches polity: Or rather to keep to the words of the Hypotheſis it ſelf, where any things are determin'd in general by the word of God, but left at liberty as to manner and circumſtances, it is in the power of lawful authority in the Church of God to determine ſuch things, as far as they tend to the promoting the good of the Church.

§. 9. And ſo I riſe to the ſecond ſtep, which is, that matters of this nature may be determin'd and reſtrained. Or that there is no neceſſity, that all matters of liberty ſhould remain in their primary indifferency. This I know is aſſerted by ſome of great note and learning; that in things which God hath left to our Chriſtian liberty, man may not reſtrain us of it, by ſubjecting thoſe things to poſitive Laws; but I come to examine, with what ſtrength of reaſon this is ſaid, that ſo we may ſee, whether men may not yield in ſome lawful things to a reſtraint of their Chriſtan liberty, in order to the Peace of the Church of God: Which I now prove by theſe Arguments. Firſt, What may be lawfully done when it is commanded, may be ſo far lawfully commanded, as it is a thing in it ſelf lawful: but matters of Chriſtian liberty may be lawfully done when they are commanded to be done, though it were lawful not to do them before that command. The truth of the propoſition appears, becauſe lawful authority may command any thing that may be lawfully done. Becauſe nothing can exempt from obedience to a lawful Magiſtrate, but the unlawfulneſs of the thing commanded; and therefore nothing can debar the Magiſtrate from commanding theſe things; for nothing can hinder him from commanding, but what may hinder the ſubject from obedience. I grant in many caſes it may be lawful to obey, when it is very inconvenient for the Magiſtrate to command; but inconveniency and unlawfulneſs are two things; nay, and in ſome caſes a man may lawfully obey when he is unlawfully commanded; but then the matter of the command it ſelf is unlawful. As in executing an unjuſt ſentence, granting that a Princes ſervants may lawfully do it, eſpecially when they know it not; yet in that caſe, the ground of their lawful obedience, is the ground of the Magiſtrates lawful command, which is the ſuppoſed juſtice of the execution. But that which makes the Magiſtrates command unlawful, is the intrinſecal evil of the thing it ſelf. So for unlawful wars, though the Subjects may lawfully obey, yet the Prince ſins in commanding, not but that he hath a right to command ſo far as they are bound to obey, which is only in things lawful; but that which in this caſe alters the matter, is the Princes knowing his cauſe to be unjuſt. So that however the propoſition holds in things not manifeſtly unjuſt. But however this be, it is hereby granted, that the things may be lawfully done, when they are reſtrained by the Magiſtrates command; and by that it appears that liberty may be reſtrained; elſe it could not be lawful to act under that reſtraint; not as it reſpects the things themſelves, but under that formality, as they are the reſtraint of that which ought to be left free. The reſtraint however then is lawful, as to the perſons acting under authority, who are the ſubjects of this liberty, though it were granted unlawful as to the authority doing it. Which former is ſufficient for my purpoſe, viz. that Chriſtian liberty, as to the ſubjects of it, may be lawfully reſtrained. Secondly, A leſſer duty ceaſeth to be a duty, when it hinders from the performance of greater: but the preſerving Chriſtian liberty is a leſſer duty, which may hinder the peace of the Church, which is a greater; therefore in that caſe it may be reſtrained. The Major is granted by Divines and Caſuiſts; when duties ſtand in competition, the leſſer ceaſeth to bind, as is evident, in that God will have mercy rather than ſacrifice. Poſitives yield to morals and naturals. Thence the obligation of an oath ceaſeth, when it hinders from a natural duty; as the Corban among the Jews from relief of Parents. And therefore Grotius ſaith, that oath taken concerning a thing lawful, if it doth hinder majus bonum morale, the obligation of that oath ceaſeth. Now that preſerving liberty is a leſſer duty than the looking after the peace of the Church, is evident, becauſe the one is only a matter of liberty, and left undetermin'd by the Word; and the other a matter of neceſſity, and abſolutely, and expreſly required of all, as a duty as much as poſſibly lies in them to endeavour after. Thirdly, If an occaſional offence of weaker brethren may be a ground for reſtraining Chriſtian liberty, then much more may commands from lawful authority do it; but the offence of weaker Brethren may reſtrain Chriſtian liberty, as to the exerciſe of it, as appears by the Apoſtles diſcourſe, Rom. 14. 21. The reaſon of the conſequence lies here, that a caſe of mere offence, which is here pleaded towards weak Brethren, cannot have that obligation upon conſcience, which a known duty of obeying lawful authority, in things in themſelves lawful, hath. Nay farther, inſiſting only on the Law of ſcandal, I would fain know, whether it be a greater offence and ſcandal to Chriſtians conſciences, to infringe the lawful authority of the Magiſtrate, and to deny obedience to his commands, in things undetermined by the Law of God; or elſe to offend the Conſciences, that is, go againſt the judgments of ſome well meaning, but leſs knowing Chriſtians. Or thus, whether in the matter of ſcandal, it be a greater offence to go againſt the judgments of the weaker and more ignorant, or the more knowing and able, when the one have only their own weak apprehenſions to biaſs them, the other are backed by and grounded upon an eſtabliſhed Law. And whether it be not a greater ſcandal to Religion to diſobey a Chriſtian Magiſtrate, than it is to offend ſome private Chriſtians. Let theſe things be examined and then let us ſee whether the argument will not hold à majori; if the Law of Scandal as to private Chriſtians may reſtrain liberty, then may a command from the Magiſtrate do it. Fourthly, I argue thus: If the nature of Chriſtian liberty may be preſerved under the reſtraint of the exerciſe of it, then it is not againſt the nature of Chriſtian liberty to have the exerciſe reſtrained; but the former is true, and therefore the latter. Now that the nature of Chriſtian liberty may be preſerved under the reſtraint of its exerciſe, I prove by theſe Arguments.

Grot. de jure belli & pacis, lib. 2. cap. 13. ſect. 7.

§. 10. Firſt. Becauſe the nature of Chriſtian liberty is founded upon the freedom of judgment, and not the freedom of practice. The caſe is the ſame in moral and natural liberty as in Chriſtian. Now we ſay truly, that the radical liberty of the ſoul is preſerved, though it be determined to a particular action: For the liberty of the Will lying in the power of determining it ſelf either way, (as it is generally thought) the actual determination of the will doth not take away the internal power in the ſoul; and in that reſpect there may be potentia faciendi, where there is not poſſibilitas effectûs, a power of doing, when there is no poſſibility the thing ſhould be done, when the event is otherwiſe determined by a divine decree, as in breaking the bones of Chriſt upon the Croſs. So it is in reference to Chriſtian liberty; though the exerciſe of it be reſtrained, yet the liberty remains; becauſe Chriſtian liberty lies in the freedom of judgment, that is, in judging thoſe things to be free which are ſo; ſo that if any thing that is in its ſelf free, be done by a man with an opinion of the neceſſity of doing it antecedent to the Law commanding it, or without any Law preſcribing it, thereby his Chriſtian liberty is deſtroyed; but if it be done with an opinion of the freedom and indifferency of the thing it ſelf, but only with a conſequential neceſſity of doing it, ſuppoſing the Magiſtrate's command, he retains the power of his Chriſtian liberty ſtill, though under the reſtraint of the exerciſe of it. And therefore it would be well obſerved, that the opinion of the neceſſity of any one thing undetermined by Scripture, deſtroys Chriſtian liberty more than a Magiſtrate's command doth. And by this reaſon they that hold any one poſture at receiving the Lord's Supper neceſſary, (as ſitting, leaning, kneeling) do all equally deſtroy their own Chriſtian liberty as to theſe things which are undetermined by the word. So a Magiſtrate, when commanding matters of Chriſtian liberty, if in the preface to the Law, he declares the thing neceſſary to be done in its ſelf, and therefore he commands it, he takes away, as much as in him lies our Chriſtian liberty. And in that caſe we ought to hold to that excellent rule of the Apoſtle, ſtand faſt therefore in the liberty wherewith Chriſt hath ſet you free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage. But if the Magiſtrate declare the things to be in themſelves indifferent, but only upon ſome prudent conſiderations for peace and order he requires perſons to obſerve them, though this brings a neceſſity of obedience to us, yet it takes not away our Chriſtian liberty. For an antecedent neceſſity expreſſed in the Law, (as a learned and excellent Caſuiſt of our own obſerves) doth neceſſarily require the aſſent of the practical judgment to it; which takes away our liberty of judgment, or our judgment of the liberty of the things; but a conſequential neceſſity upon a command ſuppoſed, doth only imply an act of the will, whereby the freedom of judgment and conſcience remaining, it is inclined to obedience to the commands of a ſuperior Law. Now that liberty doth lie in the freedom of judgment, and not in the freedom of practice, and ſo is conſiſtent with the reſtraint of the exerciſe of it; appears both in the former caſe of ſcandal, and in the actions of the Apoſtles and primitive Chriſtians complying with the Jews in matters of liberty; yea which is a great deal more, in ſuch ceremonies of which the Apoſtle expreſly ſaith, that if they obſerved them, Chriſt would profit them nothing; and yet we find Paul himſelf circumciſing Timothy becauſe of the Jews, Certainly then however theſe ceremonies are ſuppoſed to be not only mortuæ but mortiferæ now the Goſpel was preached, and the Law of Chriſtian liberty promulged, yet Paul did not look upon it as the taking away his liberty, at any time when it would prevent ſcandal among the Jews, and tend to the furtherance of the Goſpel, to uſe any of them. It was therefore the opinion of the neceſſity of them was it which deſtroyed Chriſtian liberty; and therefore it is obſervable, that where the opinion of the neceſſity of obſerving the Judaical Rites and Ceremonies was entertained, the Apoſtle ſets himſelf with his whole ſtrength to oppoſe them, as he doth in his Epiſtles to the Galatians and Coloſſians. Whom yet we find in other places, and to other Churches, not leaven'd with this doctrine of the neceſſity of judaical Rites, very ready to comply with weak Brethren, as in his Epiſtles to the Romans and Corinthians. From which we plainly ſee, that it was not the bare doing of the things, but the doing them with an opinion of the neceſſity of them is that which infringeth Chriſtian liberty, and not the determination of one part above the other by the Supreme Magiſtrate, when it is declared not to be for any opinion of the things themſelves as neceſſary, but to be only in order to the Church's peace and unity. Secondly. It appears that liberty is conſiſtent with the reſtraint of the exerciſe of it; becauſe the very power of reſtraining the exerciſe of it, doth ſuppoſe it to be a matter of liberty, and that both antecedently and conſequentially to that reſtraint. Antecedently, ſo it is apparent to be a matter of liberty, elſe it was not capable of being reſtrained: Conſequentially, in that the ground of obſervance of thoſe things when reſtrained, is not any neceſſity of the matter, or the things themſelves; but only the neceſſity of obeying the Magiſtrate in things lawful and undetermin'd by the word: which leads to another argument. Thirdly, Mens obligation to theſe things, as to the ground of it, being only in point of contempt and ſcandal, argues that the things are matter of liberty ſtill. I grant the Magiſtrate's authority is the ground of obedience, but the ground of the Magiſtrate's command is only in point of contempt and ſcandal, and for preſerving order in the Church: For I have already ſhewed it to be unlawful, either to command or obey, in reference to theſe things, from any opinion of the neceſſity of them, and therefore the only ground of obſerving them, is to ſhew that we are not guilty of contempt of the power commanding them, nor of ſcandal to others that are offended at our not obſerving them. Tota igitur religio eſt in fugiendo ſcandalo & vetando contemptu, ſaith our learned Whitaker: All our ground of obedience is the avoiding ſcandal and contempt of authority. To the ſame purpoſe Pet. Martyr, ſpeaking of the obligation of Eccleſiaſtical Laws: Non obſtringunt ſi removeatur contemptus & ſcandalum: So that non-obſervance of indifferent things commanded, when there is an apparent contempt or ſcandal, do not involve a man in the guilt of ſin: as ſuppoſe a Law made that all publick prayer be performed kneeling, if any thing lies in a man's way to hinder him from that poſture, in this caſe the man offends not; becauſe there is no contempt or ſcandal: So if a Law were made that all ſhould receive the Lord's-ſupper faſting, if a man's health calls for ſomewhat to refreſh him before, he ſins not in the breach of that Law. And therefore it is obſervable which Whitaker takes notice of in the Canons of the Councils of the primitive Church, that though they did determine many things belonging to the external Polity of the Church, yet they obſerved this difference in their Cenſures of Anathema's; That in matters of mere order and decency they never pronounced an Anathema, but with the ſuppoſition of apparent contempt; and inſerted, Si quis contra præſumpſerit, ſi quis contumaciter contra fecerit: but in matters of doctrine or life, fully determin'd by the Law of God, they pronounced a ſimple Anathema, without any ſuch clauſe inſerted. Now from this we may take take notice of a difference between Laws concerning indifferences in Civil and Eccleſiaſtical matters: That in civils the Laws bind to indifferencies without the caſe of contempt or ſcandal, becauſe in theſe the publick good is aimed at, of which every private perſon is not fit to judge, and therefore it is our duty either to obey or ſuffer; but in Eccleſiaſtical conſtitutions, only peace and order is that which is looked at, and therefore, Si nihil contra ἐυταξίαν feceris, non teneris illis, is the rule here, if nothing tending to apparent diſorder be done, men break not thoſe Laws: For the end and reaſon of a Law is the meaſure of its obligation. Fourthly, Mens being left free to do the things forbidden, either upon a repeal of the former Laws, or when a man is from under obligation to that authority which commands them, argues them ſtill to be matters of liberty, and not matters of neceſſity. That Laws reſpecting indifferent things may be repealed, I cannot imagine that any have ſo little reaſon as to deny, upon a different ſtate of affairs from what it was when they were firſt enacted; or when they cannot attain the ends they are deſigned for, the peace and order of the Church, but rather tend to embroil it in trouble and confuſion: And that when men are from under the authority impoſing them, men are at their own liberty again, muſt neceſſarily be granted, becauſe the ground of reſtraint of that liberty was the authority they were under; and therefore the cauſe being taken away, the effect follows. Therefore for men to do them when authority doth not impoſe them, muſt imply an opinion of the neceſſity of the things themſelves, which deſtroys Chriſtian liberty. Whence it was reſolved by Auguſtine in the caſe of Rites, that every one ſhould obſerve thoſe of that Church which he was in: which he ſaith he took from Ambroſe. His words are theſe, Nec diſciplina ulla in his melior gravi prudentique Chriſtiano quàm ut eo modo agat, quo agere viderit Eccleſiam, ad quamcunque forte devenerit. Quod enim neque contra fidem, neque contra bonos mores injungitur, indifferenter eſt habendum, & pro eorum inter quos vivitur ſocietate ſervandum eſt. He tells us, He knew no better courſe for a ſerious prudent Chriſtian to take in matters of Rites and Cuſtoms, than to follow the Church's example where he is: for whatſoever is obſerved neither againſt faith or manners, is a matter in its ſelf indifferent, and to be obſerved according to the cuſtom of thoſe he lives among. And after acquaints us that his Mother coming to Milan after him, and finding the Church there not obſerve the Saturday faſt as the Church of Rome did, was much perplexed and troubled in mind at it, (as tender but weak conſciences are apt to be troubled at any thing contrary to their own practice) ſhe for her own ſatisfaction ſends her ſon to Ambroſe, then Biſhop of the Church there, who told him he would give him no other anſwer but what he did himſelf, and if he knew any thing better, he would do it. Auguſtin preſently expects a command from him to leave off Saturday faſts; inſtead of that, Ambroſe tells him, Cum Romam venio, jejuno ſabbato; cum hîc ſum, non jejuno. Sic etiam tu ad quam forte Eccleſiam veneris, ejus morem ſerva, ſi cuiquam non vis eſſe ſcandalo, nec quenquam tibi. When I am at Rome I faſt on the Sabbath, but at Milan I do not. So thou likewiſe, when thou comeſt to any Church, obſerve its cuſtom, if thou wouldſt neither be an offence to them, nor have them be ſo to thee. A rare and excellent example of the piety, prudence, and moderation of the Primitive Church: far from rigid impoſing indifferent cuſtoms on the one ſide; from contumacy in oppoſing mere indifferences on the other. Which judgment of Ambroſe, Auguſtine ſaith, he

he always looked on as often as he thought of it, tanquam cœleſte oraculum, as an oracle come from Heaven; and concludes with this excellent ſpeech, which if ever God intend peace to our Church, he will make men underſtand: Senſi enim ſæpe dolens & gemens multas infirmorum perturbationes fieri per quorundam fratrum contentioſam obſtinationem, & ſuperſtitioſam timiditatem qui in rebus hujuſmodi, quæ neque Scripturæ ſanctæ autoritate, neque univerſalis Eccleſiæ traditione, neque vitæ corrigendæ utilitate ad certum poſſunt terminum pervenire (perducere) tantum quia ſubeſt qualiſcunque ratiocinatio cogitantis, aut quia in ſuâ patriâ ſic ipſe conſuevit, aut quia ibi vidit ubi peregrinationem ſuam quo remotiorem à ſuis eo doctiorem factam putat, tam litigioſas excitant quæſtiones ut niſi quod ipſi faciunt, nihil rectum exiſtiment. I have often, ſaith he, found it to my grief and ſorrow, that the troubles of weaker Chriſtians, have been cauſed by the contentious obſtinacy of ſome on the one hand, and the ſuperſtitious fearfulneſs of others on the other, in things which are neither determin'd by the authority of the holy Scriptures, nor by the cuſtom of the univerſal Church, nor yet by any uſefulneſs of the things themſelves, in order to the making mens lives better; only for ſome petty reaſon in a man's own mind, or becauſe it hath been the cuſtom of their Country, or becauſe they have found it in thoſe Churches, which they have thought to be the nearer to truth, the farther they have been from home, they are continually raiſing ſuch quarrels and contentions, that they think nothing is right and lawful, but what they do themſelves. Had that bleſſed Saint lived in our age, he could not have uttered any thing more true, nor more pertinent to our preſent ſtate: which methinks admirers of antiquity ſhould embrace for its authority, and others for the great truth and reaſon of it. Did we but ſet up thoſe three things as Judges between us in our matters of Ceremonies, The authority of the Scriptures, the practice of the Primitive Univerſal Church, and the tendency of them to the reforming mens lives; how ſoon might we ſhake hands, and our controverſies be at an end! But as long as contentious obſtinacy remains on one ſide, and a ſuperſtitious fearfulneſs on the other, (for ſuperſtition may as well lie in the imagined neceſſity of avoiding things indifferent, as in the neceſſary obſerving of things which are not) we may find our ſtorms increaſe, but we are not like to ſee any Land of Peace. How happy might we be, did men but once underſtand that it was their duty to mind the things of peace! How little of that Duſt might ſtill and quiet our moſt contentious Frays!

Hi motus animorum, atque hæc certamina tanta
Pulveris exigui jactu compreſſa quieſcunt.

But in order to ſo happy and deſirable an union and accommodation, I ſhall not need to plead much from the nature of the things we differ about; the lowneſs of them in compariſon of the great things we are agreed in, the fewneſs of them in compariſon of the multitude of thoſe weighty things we ought moſt to look after, the benefits of union, the miſeries of diviſion, which if our lamentable experience doth not tell us of, yet our conſciences may; I ſhall crave leave humbly to preſent to ſerious conſideration ſome propoſals for accommodation: which is an attempt which nothing but an earneſt deſire of peace can juſtifie, and I hope that will: which here falls in as the third ſtep of my deſigned diſcourſe, about the bounds to be ſet in the reſtraint of Chriſtian liberty.

The

§. 11. The firſt is, that nothing be impoſed as neceſſary, but what is clearly revealed in the word of God. This there is the higheſt reaſon and equity for, ſince none can have command immediately over conſcience, but God himſelf, and whatever is impoſed as neceſſary, doth immediately bind conſcience. And whatever binds mens conſciences with an opinion of the neceſſity of it, doth immediately deſtroy that Chriſtian liberty which men are neceſſarily bound to ſtand faſt in, and not be intangled with any yoke Gal. 5. 1. of bondage. Not only the yoke of Jewiſh Ceremonies, but whatever yoke pincheth, and galls as that did, with an opinion of the neceſſity of doing the thing commanded by any but the word of God. Which the Apoſtle calls Dogmatizing, Coloſſ. 2. 20. and v. 16. let no man judge you in meat and drink; nè Præpoſiti quidem veſtri, ſaith Whitaker; theſe impoſitions he calls, v. 22. the commandments and doctrines of men. And ſuch he calls a ſnare, 1 Corinth. 7. 23. which was the making an indifferent thing, as Cœlibate, neceſſary. Laqueus eſt quicquid præcipitur ut neceſſarium quod liberum eſſe debet. So that though obedience be neceſſary to indifferent things when commanded; yet it muſt always be libera à conſcientiâ quoad res ipſas legum, no obligation to be laid upon conſcience to look upon the things as neceſſary.

Secondly, That nothing be required, nor determin'd, but what is ſufficiently known to be indifferent in its own nature. The former propoſal was in reference to the manner of impoſing, this reſpects the nature of the things themſelves. The only difficulty here is, how a thing may be ſufficiently known to be indifferent; becauſe one man looks upon that as indifferent, which another doth not. The moſt equal way to decide this controverſie, is to make choice of ſuch judges as are not intereſted in the quarrel: And thoſe are the ſenſe of the Primitive Church in the firſt four Centuries, who were beſt able to judge whether they looked upon themſelves as bound by any command of Scripture or no; and withal the judgment of the Reformed Churches: So that what ſhall be made appear to be left indifferent, by both the ſenſe of the Primitive Church, and the Churches of the Reformation, may be a matter determinable by Law, and which all may be required to conform in obedience to.

Thirdly, That whatever is thus determined be in order only to a due performance of what is in general required in the word of God, and not to be looked on as any part of divine worſhip or ſervice. This is that which gives the greateſt occaſion of offence to mens conſciences, when any thing is either required, or if not, yet generally uſed and looked on as a neceſſary part or concomitant of God's worſhip, ſo that without it the worſhip is deemed imperfect. And there is great difference to be made between things indifferent in their own nature, and indifferent as to their uſe and practice. And when the generality of thoſe who uſe them do not uſe them as indifferent, but as neceſſary things, it ought to be conſidered whether in this caſe ſuch a uſe be allowable till men be better informed of the nature of the things they do. As in the caſe of the Papiſts about image-worſhip, their divines ſay, that the images are only as high tenors of Devotion, but the worſhip is fixed on God; but we find it is quite otherwiſe in the general practice of people who look at nothing beyond the image. So it may be, bating the decrees of the offence, when matters of indifferency in themſelves are by the generality of people not looked on as ſuch, but uſed as a neceſſary part of divine ſervice. And it would be conſidered whether ſuch an abuſe of matters ſuppoſed indifferent being known, it be not ſcandalum datum to continne their uſe without an effectual remedy for the abuſe of them.

Fourthly, That no ſanctions be made, nor mulcts or penalties be inflicted on ſuch who only diſſent from the uſe of ſome things whoſe lawfulneſs they at preſent ſcruple, till ſufficient time and means be uſed for their information of the nature and indifferency of the things, that it may be ſeen whether it be out of wilful contempt and obſtinacy of ſpirit, or only weakneſs of conſcience and diſſatisfaction concerning the things themſelves that they diſobey. And if it be made evident to be out of contempt, that only ſuch penalties be inflicted as anſwers to the nature of the offence. I am ſure it is contrary to the Primitive practice, and the Moderation then uſed, to ſuſpend or deprive men of their miniſterial function for not conforming in habits, geſtures, or the like. Concerning habits, Walafridus Strabo, expreſly tells us, there was no diſtinction of habits uſed in the Church in the Primitive times. Veſtes ſacerdotales per incrementa ad eum, qui nunc habetur, aucta ſunt ornatum. Nam primis temporibus communi veſtimento induti, Miſſas agebant, ſicut & hactenus quidam Orientalium facere perhibentur. And therefore the Concilium Gangrenſe condemned Euſtathius Sebaſtenus for making a neceſſity of diverſity of habits among Chriſtians for their profeſſion, διὰ τὴν ἄσκησιν, it being acknowledged both by Salmaſius and his great adverſary Petavius, that in the Primitive times the Preſbyters did not neceſſarily wear any diſtinct habit from the people, although the former endeavours to prove that commonly they did in Tertullian's time; but yet that not all the Preſbyters, nor they only did uſe a diſtinct habit, viz. the Pallium Philoſophicum, but all the Chriſtians who did ἀκριβῶς χριστιανίζειν, as Socrates ſaid of Sylvanus Rhetor, all that were ἀσκηταὶ among them, ſtricter profeſſors of Chriſtianity; among which moſt of the Preſbyters were. And Origen in Euſebius expreſly ſpeaks of Heraclas a Preſbyter of Alexandria, that for a long time κοινῇ ἐσθῆτι χρώμενος, he uſed only the common garment belonging to Chriſtians, and put on the Pallium Philoſophicum for the ſtudy of the Grecian Learning, after that Chriſtianity began to loſe in height what it got in breadth: inſtead of the former ſimplicity of their garments as well as manners, and their τριβώνια came in the uſe of the byrri, Penulæ Dalmaticæ, and ſo daily increaſing, as Strabo ſaith. I ſay not this in the leaſt to condemn any diſtinction of habit for mere decency and order, but to ſhew it was not the cuſtom of the Primitive times to impoſe any neceſſity of theſe things upon men, nor to cenſure them for bare diſuſe of them. He muſt be a great ſtranger in the Primitive Church that takes not notice of the great diverſity of rites and cuſtoms uſed in particular Churches, without any cenſuring thoſe who differed from them; or if any by inconſiderate zeal did proceed ſo far, how ill it was reſented by other Chriſtians. As Victors excommunicating the Quarto-decimani for which he is ſo ſharply reproved by Irenæus, who tells him, that the primitive Chriſtians who differed in ſuch things, did not uſe to abſtain from one anothers communion for them, καὶ γὰρ οἱ τῆς αὐτῆς πίστεως ὄντες, διαφωνοῦσι περὶ τὰ ἔθη πρὸς ἑαυτούς, as Socrates tells us, Thoſe that agree in the ſame faith, may differ among themſelves in their rites and cuſtoms, as he largely ſhews in a whole Chaptet to that purpoſe, as in the obſervation of Eaſter ſome the fourteenth day of April, others only upon the Lord's day, but ſome of the more Eaſtern Churches differed from both. In their faſts, ſome ob-

ſerved Lent but for one day, ſome two, ſome three weeks, ſome ſix weeks, others ſeven: and in their Faſts ſome abſtained from all kind of living creatures, others only from fleſh, eating fiſh: and others fowl: others abſtained from fruit and eggs: others eat only dry bread, others not that neither. And ſo for their publick Aſſemblies, Some communicating every Lord's day, others not. The Church of Alexandria had its publick Meetings and Sermons every fourth day of the week as he tells us. The ſame Church made the publick readers and interpreters, either of the Catechumeni, or of the baptized, differing therein from all other Churches: Several cuſtoms were uſed about Digamy and the marriage of Miniſters in ſeveral Churches. So about the time of Baptiſm, ſome having only one ſet time in the year for it, as at Eaſter in Theſſaly, others two, Eaſter and Dominica in Albis, ſo called from the white garments of the baptized. Some Churches in baptiſm uſed three dippings, others only one. Great differences about the time of their being Catechumeni, in ſome places longer, in others a ſhorter time. So about the excommunicate and degrees of penance (as they are called) their Flentes, audientes, ſuccumbentes, conſiſtentes, the Communio peregrinæ, the ſeveral Chriſms in vertice, in pectore, in ſome places at Baptiſm, in ſome after. So for placing the Altar (as they metaphorically called the Communion Table) it was not conſtantly towards Cap.23.l.5. the Eaſt; for Socrates affirms, that in the great Church at Antiochia it ſtood to the Weſt end of the Church; and therefore it had ἀντίστροφον Eccleſ. hiſt. l.10. cap.4. θέσιν, a different poſiture from other Churches. And Euſebius ſaith out of the Panegyriſt, that in the New Church built by Paulinus at Tyre, the Altar ſtood ἐν μέσῳ in the middle. Theſe things may ſuffice for a taſte at preſent of which more largely elſewhere (God willing) in due time. We ſee the primitive Chriſtians did not make ſo much of any uniformity in rites and ceremonies; nay I ſcarce think any Churches in the primitive times can be produced that did exactly in all things obſerve the ſame cuſtoms: Which might eſpecially be an argument of moderation in all as to theſe things, but eſpecially in pretended admirers of the Primitive Church. I conclude with a known ſaying of Auſtin, Indignum eſt ut propter ea quæ nos Deo neque digniores, neque indigniores poſſunt facere, alii alios vel condemnemus, vel judicemus. It is an unworthy thing for Chriſtians to condemn and judge one another for thoſe things which do not further us at all in our way to heaven.

Laſtly, That Religion be not clog'd with Ceremonies. They when multiplied too much, if lawful, yet ſtrangely eat out the heart, heat, life, vigour of Chriſtianity. Chriſtian Religion is a plain, ſimple, eaſie thing. Chriſt commends his yoke to us by the eaſineſs of it, and his burden by the lightneſs of it. It was an excellent teſtimony which Amm. Marcellinus a heathen gave to Chriſtianity, when ſpeaking of Conſtantius, Religionem Chriſtianam rem abſolutam & ſimplicem anili ſuperſtitione confudit, That he ſpoiled the beauty of Chriſtianity, by muffling it up Eraſ. in declar. ad Cenſ. Pariſ. art. 14. in ſuperſtitious obſervations. And it is as true which Eraſmus ſaid in anſwer to the Sorboniſts, Quò magis in corporalibus ceremoniis hæremus, hoc magis vergimus ad Judaiſmum. External Ceremonies teach us backward, and bring us back from Chriſt to Moſes; which is fully proved as to the Conf. with Hart. cap. 8. Div. 8. De Croy 3. Conformity, part 2. Papiſts, by our learned Rainolds and Mr. De Croy; but we need no farther evidence than a bare peruſal of Durandus Mimatenſis his Rationale Divinorum officiorum. By Ceremonies, I mean not here matters of mere decency and order, for order ſake; which doubtleſs are lawful (if the meaſure of that order be not the pomp and glory of the world, but the gravity, compoſure, ſobriety, which becomes Chriſtianity) for when the Jews were the moſt ſtrictly tyed up by a Ceremonial Law, they did introduce many things upon the account of order and decency: as the building Synagogues, their hours of prayer, their Paraſhoth and Haphtaroth, the Sections of the Law and Prophets; the continuation of the Paſſover 14 days by Hezekiah, when the Law required but ſeven: the feaſt of Purim by Eſter and Mordecai: the faſts of the 4th, 5th, and 10th month under the captivity, the feaſt of dedication by the Maccabees. The uſe of Baptiſm in Proſelyting, waſhing the feet before the Paſſover, imitated and practiſed by our Saviour: So that matters of order and decency are allowable and fitting; but Ceremonies properly taken for actions ſignificative, and therefore appointed becauſe ſignificative, their lawfulneſs may with better ground be ſcrupled. Or taking Ceremony in Bellarmine's deſcription of it, to be actio externa quæ non aliunde eſt bona & laudabilis niſi quia fit ad Deum colendum: And in this ſenſe it will be hard to manifeſt any thing to be lawful, but what is founded upon a Divine precept; if it be not a matter of order, and ſo no Ceremony. And as for ſignificative Ceremonies, concerning matter of doctrine or fact, a learned Doctor puts us in mind of the old rule, that they be paucæ & ſalubres; and the fewer, the more wholſom: For as he obſerves from Ariſtotle in Inſectile Animals, the want of blood was the cauſe they run out into ſo many legs. I ſhall conclude this whole Diſcourſe with another ſpeech of S. Auſtin, very pertinent to our preſent purpoſe. Omnia itaque talia quæ neque ſanctarum Scriptuarum autoritatibus continentur, nec in Conciliis Epiſcoporum ſtatuta inveniuntur, nec conſuetudine univerſæ Eccleſiæ roborata ſunt, ſed diverſorum locorum diverſis moribus innumerabiliter variantur, ita ut vix aut omnino nunquam inveniri poſſunt cauſæ, quas in eis inſtituendis ſecuti ſunt homines, ubi facultas tribuitur, ſine ulla dubitatione reſecanda exiſtimo. All ſuch things which are neither founded on the authority of the Scriptures, nor determined by general Councils (for ſo it muſt be underſtood) nor practiſed by the Catholick Church, but vary according to the cuſtoms of places, of which no rational account can be given; aſſoon as men have power to do it, I judge them to be cut off without any ſcruple: For which definitive ſentence of his, he gives this moſt ſufficient reaſon; Quamvis enim neque hot inveniri poſſit, quomodo contra fidem ſint, ipſam tamen religionem (quam pauciſſimis & manifeſtiſſimis celebrationem ſacramentis miſericordia Dei liberam eſſe voluit) ſervilibus oneribus premunt, ut tolerabilior ſit conditio Judæorum, qui etiamſi tempus libertatis non agnoverint, legalibus tamen ſarcinis, non humanis præſumptionibus ſubjiciuntur; For although we cannot poſitively ſay, how ſuch things as theſe do manifeſtly impugn our faith, yet in that they load our Religion with ſuch ſervile burdens, (which the mercy of God hath left free for all other obſervations, but the celebration of ſome few and moſt clear Sacraments) that they make our condition worſe than that of the Jews; for they, although ſtrangers to Goſpel liberty, had no burdens charged upon them by the conſtitutions of men, but only by the Law and commands of God: Which ſentence and reaſon of his, I leave to the moſt impartial judgment of every true ſober-minded Chriſtian. And thus I am at laſt come through this field of thorns and thiſtles; I hope now to find my way more plain and eaſie. So much for the fourth Hypotheſis. The two next will be diſcharged with leſſer trouble.

Ep. 119. ad Jan. cap. 19.

§. 12. Hypoth. 5. What is left undetermin'd both by Divine poſitive Laws, and by principles deduced from the natural Law, if it be determined by lawful authority in the Church of God, doth bind the conſciences of thoſe who are ſubject to that authority, to obedience to thoſe determinations. I here ſuppoſe, that the matter of the Law be ſomething not predetermined, either by the Law of Nature, or Divine poſitive Laws, for againſt either of theſe no humane Law can bind the conſcience: For if there be any moral evil in the thing commanded, we are bound to obey God rather than men; in which caſe we do not formally and directly diſobey the Magiſtrate, but we chuſe to obey God before him. And as we have obſerved, a former obligation from God or Nature, deſtroys a latter; becauſe God hath a greater power and authority over mens conſciences, than any humane authority can have: And my obedience to the Magiſtrate being founded upon a Divine Law, it muſt be ſuppoſed my duty to obey him firſt, by vertue of whoſe authority I obey another; then the other whom I obey, becauſe the former hath commanded me. If I am bound to obey an inferiour Magiſtrate, becauſe the ſupreme requires it; if the inferiour command me any thing contrary to the Will and Law of the ſupreme, I am not bound to obey him in it, becauſe both he derives his power of commanding, and I my obligation to obedience from the authority of the ſupreme, which muſt be ſuppoſed to do nothing againſt it ſelf. So it is between God and the ſupreme Magiſtrate; by him Kings reign; God, when he gives them a Legiſlative power, doth it cumulativè non privativè, not ſo as to deprive himſelf of it, nor his own Laws of a binding force againſt his: So that no Law of a Magiſtrate can in reaſon bind againſt a poſitive Law of God. But what is enacted by a lawful Magiſtrate, in things left undetermined by God's Laws, doth even by vertue of them bind men to obedience, which require ſubjection to the higher powers for conſcience ſake. So that whatſoever is left indifferent, obedience to the Magiſtrate in things indifferent is not: And if we are not bound to obey in things undetermin'd by the word, I would fain know wherein we are bound to obey them? or what diſtinct power of obligation belongs to the authority the Magiſtrate hath over men? For all other things we are bound to already by former Laws; therefore either there muſt be a diſtinct authority without power to oblige, or elſe we are effectually bound to whatſoever the Magiſtrate doth determine in lawful things. And if it be ſo in general, it muſt be ſo as to all particulars contained in that general, and ſo in reference to matters of the Church, unleſs we ſuppoſe all things concerning it to be already determined in Scripture; which is the thing in queſtion, and ſhall be largely diſcuſſed in its due place.

Rom. 13. 5.

§. 13. Sixthly, Hypoth. 6. Things undetermined by the Divine Law, natural and poſitive, and actually determined by lawful authority, are not thereby made unalterable, but may be revoked, limited, and changed, according to the different ages, tempers, inclinations of men, by the ſame power which did determine them. All humane conſtitutions are reverſible by the ſame power which made them: For the obligation of them not ariſing from the matter of them, but from the authority of the perſon binding, are conſequently alterable, as ſhall be judged by that power moſt ſuitable to the ends of its firſt promulgation. Things may ſo much alter, and times change, that what was a likely way to keep men in unity and obedience at one time, may only enrage them at another: The ſame Phyſick which may at one time cure, may at another only enrage the diſtemper more. As therefore the ſkill of a Phyſician lies moſt in the application of Phyſick to the ſeveral tempers of his Patients: So a wiſe Magiſtrate, who is as Nicias ſaid in Thucydides, πόλεως κακῶς βουλευσαμένης ἰατρός. The Phyſician to cure the diſtempers of the body Politick; and conſiders, (as Spartian tells us Adrian uſed to ſay in the Senate, ita ſe Rempub. geſturum, ut ſciret populi rem eſſe, non propriam) that the peoples intereſt is the main care of the Prince, will ſee a neceſſity of altering, reforming, varying many humane conſtitutions, according as they ſhall tend moſt to the ends of Government, either in Church or State. Thence it is ſaid of the ſeveral Laws of nature, divine and humane: that Lex naturæ poteſt poni, ſed non deponi, Lex divina nec poni nec deponi, Lex humana & poni & deponi. The Law of Nature may be laid down, (as in caſe of marriage with Siſters in the beginning of the world) but not laid aſide; the Law of God can neither be laid down nor laid aſide: but humane Laws both may be laid down and laid aſide. Indeed the Laws of the Medes and Perſians are ſaid to be unalterable, (but if it be meant in the ſenſe it is commonly underſtood in) yet that very Law which made them unalterable, (for they were not ſo of their own nature) was an alterable Law, and ſo was whatever did depend upon it. I conclude then, whatever is the ſubject of humane determination may lawfully be altered and changed, according to the wiſdom and prudence of thoſe in whoſe hands the care of the publick is. Thus then, as thoſe things which are either of natural or Chriſtian liberty, are ſubjected to humane Laws and Reſtraints, ſo thoſe Laws are not irreverſible; but if the Fences be thrown down by the ſame authority which ſet them up, whatever was thereby incloſed, returns to the community of natural right again. So much for theſe Hypotheſes, which I have been the longer in explaining and eſtabliſhing, becauſe of the great influence they may have upon our preſent peace, and the near concernment they have to this whole diſcourſe, the whole Fabrick of which is erected upon theſe foundations.

Chap. III.

How far Church Government is founded upon the Law of nature. Two things in it founded thereon. 1. That there muſt be a ſociety of men for the worſhip of God. 2. That this ſociety be governed in the moſt convenient manner. A ſociety for worſhip manifeſted. Gen. 4. 26. conſidered. The ſons of God and the ſons of men, who? Societies for worſhip among heathens evidenced by three things. 1. Solemnity of ſacrifices; ſacrificing how far natural; the antiquity of the Feaſt of Firſt-fruits largely diſcovered. 2. The original of Feſtivals for the honour of their Deities. 3. The ſecrecy and ſolemnity of their myſteries. This farther proved from man's ſociable nature; the improvement of it by religion, the honour redounding to God by ſuch a ſociety for his worſhip.

§. 1. Having now laid our foundation, we proceed to raiſe a ſuperſtructure upon it. And we now come cloſely to enquire how far Government in the Church is founded upon an unalterable divine right? That we have found to be built upon a double foundation, the dictates of the Law of nature, and Divine poſitive Laws. We ſhall impartially enquire into both of them; and ſee how far Church Government is ſettled upon either of theſe two. I begin then with the Law of Nature. Two general things I conceive are of an unalterable divine right in reference to this. Firſt, That there be a ſociety and joining together of men for the worſhip of God. Secondly, That this Society be governed, preſerved, and maintained in a moſt convenient manner. Firſt, That there muſt be a ſociety of men joining together for the worſhip of God. For the dictate of nature being common to all, that God muſt be ſerved, nature requires ſome kind of mutual ſociety for the joint performance of their common duties. An evidence of which dictate of nature appears in the firſt mention we find of any publick ſociety; ſo that a ſociety for religious worſhip was as ancient as the firſt civil ſocieties we have any records of. Nay the very firſt publick ſociety we read of was gathered upon this account. For we read in the early days of the world, that the Charter for this ſociety was ſoon made uſe of, Gen. 4. 26. In the days of Enoſh men began to call upon the name of the Lord. Now Enoſh was Seth's ſon, whom Adam had given to him in the place of Abel; and as ſoon as the number of men did increaſe, that men grew into Societies, they then had their publick Societies for God's worſhip. For we cannot underſtand that place abſolutely, as though God had not been called on before, but now he was called on more ſignally and ſolemnly; when men were increaſed, that they began to imbody themſelves into Societies, Cœpit congregare populum ad tractandum ſimul dei cultum, ſaith Pererius; Tunc cœptum eſt populariter coli Deus, Mariana. Invocare, i. e. palam colere, Emanuel Sa, relating all to the publick Societies being then gathered for the worſhip of the true God. From which time, in all probability did commence that title of thoſe who joined in thoſe Societies that they were called בני----האלהים The ſons of God which we read of ſoon after, Gen. 6. 2. as they are diſtinguiſhed from the —— האדם בני the ſons of men, which titles, as I am far from underſtanding in the ſenſe of the Fathers taking them for the Angels, (which in likelihood they took from the ſuppoſititious piece going under the name of Enoch's Prophecy) ſo I cannot underſtand them as commonly they are taken, for mere diſcretive titles of the poſterity of Seth and Cain; as though all that came of Seth were the Sons of God, and all of Cain were the ſons of men. For as there certainly were many bad of Seth's Poſterity, becauſe the flood deſtroyed all of them, Noah only and his Family excepted; ſo there might be ſome good of the other, vice being no more entail'd than vertue is; and Jewels may ſometimes lie in a heap of dung: and ſo this name of the ſons of God might be appropriated to thoſe who joined themſelves to thoſe ſocieties for God's worſhip. In which ſenſe ſome underſtand the very words of the Text, הוחל לקרא בשם יהוה then began men to be called by the name of the Lord: Which I ſuppoſe is the ſenſe of Aquila, who thus renders the place, τότε ἤρχθη τοῦ καλεῖσθαι ἐν ὀνόματι Κυρίου, although it be brought by Dionyſ. Voſſius to juſtifie the former interpretation of the words. This ſenſe, if the conſtruction of the words will bear it, (which Druſius queſtions, but others are much for it, and Theodoret, the French and Piſcator ſo render it) ſeems moſt genuine and natural; and not at all impugning what I have formerly gathered from the words, but implying it; For this diſtinction of names and titles did argue a diſtinction of Societies among them. I am not ignorant that the generality of Jewiſh Expoſitors, and many of their followers, do cary the ſenſe of the words quite another way, from the ambiguity of the ſignification of הוחל which may be interpreted as well to

to prophane as begin, and ſo they read it, tunc prophanatum eſt ad invocandum nomen Domini, Then men prophaned the name of the Lord: And accordingly Maimonides begins Idolatry בימי אנוש from the days of Enoſh. But the words will ſcarce bear this conſtruction, as Voſſius upon him obſerves; and beſides there is no mention at all of the name of any falſe Gods, but only of the true one. So much then for the firſt original of this Society for religion, which we ſee began as ſoon as there was matter for a Society to be gathered up of. Some indeed derive this Society a great deal higher; and becauſe we read that Abel and Cain brought their ſacrifices, they thence infer, that it was to Adam who was the publick Prieſt then, and performed all publick duties of worſhip in his own perſon, and ſo was indeed Œcumenical Biſhop of the whole world, and yet had but four perſons, or but few more for his charge. Such a Dioceſe we might be content to allow him that pleads for the ſame office, and derives his Title ſomewhat higher than Adam; for Pope Boniface the eight proved there muſt be but one chief Prieſt, and ſo one Pope, becauſe it is ſaid, Gen. 1. 1. that God created the world in Principio not in Principiis; mark the number, therefore there muſt be but one beginning, and ſo one Biſhop, and not many. What excellent diſputants an infallible chair makes men! Much good may his argument do him.

§. 2. As a farther evidence, how much nature dictates that ſuch a Society there ſhould be for Divine worſhip, we ſhall enquire into the practice of men in their diſperſion after the Flood. And what we find unanimouſly continued among them, under ſuch groſs Idolatry as they were given to, and which did ariſe not from their Idolatry as ſuch, but from the general nature of it as a kind of worſhip, we have reaſon to look upon as one of thoſe planks which hath eſcaped the common ſhipwrack of humane nature by the fall of man. And ſo though that argument from the general conſent of Nations owning a way of worſhip, though a falſe one, in order to the proving the exiſtence of God, be ſlighted by ſome, yet there is this double evidence in it to prove it, more than is generally taken notice of, and beyond the bare Teſtimony it ſelf given by that conſent. Firſt, From mens being ſo eaſily impoſed upon by falſe religions, in that they are ſo ſoon gull'd into Idolatry; it argues there are ſome Jewels in the world, or elſe men would never be deceived with counterfeits; it argues that a Child hath a Father, who is ready to call every one that comes to him Father; ſo it argues there is ſome natural inſtinct in men towards the worſhip of God, when men are ſo eaſily brought to worſhip other things inſtead of God. We ſee no other creatures can be ſo impoſed upon; we read of no Idolatry among the Brutes, nor that the Bees, though they have a King, and honour him, did ever bow their Knees to Baal, or worſhip the Hive inſtead of him. If men had no journeys to go, others need not be ſworn as the Athenians were, not to put them out of their way. If there were no inclinableneſs to religion, all cautions againſt Idolatry were ſuperfluous; there is then from mens proneneſs to error, as to the perſon and object of worſhip, an evidence of a natural ὅρμην, an inſtinct within towards the act of worſhip: And as when I ſee ſheep flock together, even in their wandrings, I may eaſily gather, that though they are out of their proper paſtures, yet they are of a tame and ſociable nature; ſo when we ſee Societies for worſhip were preſerved among men after they were degenerated into Idolatry, is an evident argument that ſuch aſſociating together together for the general nature of the act, doth flow from the nature of man. Secondly, All mens agreeing in ſome kind of worſhip, though differing as to the object and manner of it, is an evidence it comes from nature, becauſe it plainly evinces it could be nothing taken up out of deſign, received by cuſtom, nor conveyed by tradition, becauſe even among thoſe whoſe intereſts and deſigns have been contrary to one another, and could have no mutual compacts to deceive their people, have all agreed in this thing, though almoſt in all other things they have ſtrangely differed. All other Cuſtoms and Traditions, are either changed, or loſt, among ſeveral Nations; as the rude barbarous Northern Nations, that in their inroads and incurſions upon other places, have left in proceſs of time, almoſt all other cuſtoms but only their religion behind them. This ſticks cloſer than Saladine's black ſhirt, or the old Monk's cloaths, which they put not off till they died. Nay even thoſe Nations, who openly, and as by a Law, violate the other received dictates of nature, do yet maintain and hold up this. Thoſe that have had the leaſt of commerce and converſe with civilized people, have yet had their Societies for worſhip: And when they could find no Gods to worſhip, they would rather make than want them. The Egyptians would rather ſpoil their Sallets than be without Gods; and they that whipt their Gods, yet had them ſtill. They who had no ſenſe of another Life, yet would pray to their Gods for the good things of this; and they that would not pray that the Gods would do them good, yet would that they might do them no hurt: So that in the moſt prodigious Idolatry, we have an argument for Religion, and in the ſtrange diverſities of the ways of worſhip, we have an evidence how natural a Society for worſhip is. This to ſhew the validity and force of the argument drawn from conſent of Nations, even in their Idolatry.

§. 3. Three things I ſhall evidence theſe Societies for worſhip among the Heathens by; the ſolemnity of their ſacrifices, their publick Feſtivals, and their ſecret Myſteries, all which were inſtituted peculiarly in honour of their Gods: It being neceſſary in ſuch Societies for worſhip, to have ſome particular Rites, whereby to teſtifie the end of ſuch Societies to be for the honour of their Deity, and to diſtinguiſh thoſe ſolemnities from all other. Firſt then for ſacrifices; Paulus Burgenſis obſerving how this cuſtom ſpread all the world over, concludes from thence that it was natural to men. In qualibet ætate, & apud quaſlibet hominum nationes ſemper fuit aliqua ſacrificiorum oblatio. Quod autem eſt apud omnes, naturale eſt. Thus far I confeſs ſacrificing natural, as it was a ſolemn and ſenſible Rite of worſhip; but if he meant by that, the deſtroying of ſome living creatures to be offered up to God, I both deny the univerſal practice of it, and its being from the dictate of nature; and I rather believe with Fortunius Licetus, that it was continued down by tradition, from the ſacrifices of Cain and Abel before the flood, or rather from Noah's after; which might the eaſier be, becauſe Nature dictating there muſt be ſome way of worſhip, and it being very agreeable to Nature it ſhould be by ſenſible ſigns, all Nations having no other rule to direct them, were willing to obſerve that Rite and Cuſtom in it, which was conveyed down to them from their Progenitors: But let us ſee what reaſon Burgenſis gives; Ratio naturalis dictat, ut ſecundum naturalem inclinationem, homines ei quod eſt ſupra omnes, ſubjectionem exhibeant, ſecundum modum homini convenientem. Qui quidem modus eſt, ut ſenſibilibus ſignis utatur, ad exprimendum interiorem conceptum, ſicut ex ſenſibilibus cognitionem accipit inviſibilium. Unde ex naturali ratione procedit, quod homo ſenſibilibus ſignis utatur, offerens eas Deo in ſignum ſubjectionis & honoris ad ſimilitudinem eorum qui Dominis ſuis aliquid offerunt in recognitionem Dominii. But all this will extend no farther, than that it is very agreeable to natural reaſon, that as man attains the knowledge of inviſible things by viſible, ſo he ſhould expreſs his ſenſe of inviſible things by ſome viſible ſigns, thereby declaring ſubjection to God as his Lord and Maſter, as Tenants expreſs their Homage to their Lords by offering ſomething to them. And I withal acknowledge, that as to oblations without blood, they ſeem indeed very natural: Whence we ſhall ſomewhat largely diſcover the antiquity of the Feaſts of Firſt-fruits, which were the cleareſt acknowledgment of their dependence upon God, and receiving theſe things from him. Ariſtotle tells us, αἱ ἀρχαῖαι θυσίαι καὶ σύνοδοι φαίνονται γίνεσθαι μετὰ τὰς τῶν καρπῶν συγκομιδὰς· οἷον ἀπαρχαί. That the moſt ancient Sacrifices and Aſſemblies appear to have been upon the ingathering of fruits, ſuch as the ſacrifices of firſt-fruits to the Gods were. Nicomach. l. 8. To the ſame purpoſe Porphyrius, ἀπ᾽ ἀρχῆς μὲν γὰρ αἱ τῶν καρπῶν ἐγίνοντο τοῖς θεοῖς θυσίαι. The firſt ſacrifices were of firſt fruits. And Horace, De Abſtin. lib. 2. ſ. 27.

Although he be not ſo expreſs for offering the very fruits of the earth; yet it is evident from him, that their great Feſtivals in honour of their Gods, were immediately after harveſt, and that they had great Aſſemblies for that purpoſe, and did then ſolemnly ſacrifice. And from theſe ſolemnities came the original of Tragedies and Comedies, as Horace intimates, and is largely ſhewed by Iſaac Caſaubon in his Treatiſe de Satyricâ Poeſi. Lib. 1. c. 1. But to fetch this yet a little higher, and ſo bring it downwards: The firſt ſacrifice we read of in Scripture, was this of the fruits of the earth, (unleſs the ſkins which Adam cloathed himſelf with, were of the beaſts ſacrificed, as ſome conjecture) Cain's ſacrifice was מנחה an Gen. 4. 2. oblation of the fruits of the earth; in all probability, the firſt-fruits as Abel offered the firſt-born of the Cattle to the Lord: This ſeems to have been at ſome ſolemn time of ſacrificing, which is implied in מקץ ימים At the end of days. In proceſs of time we render it; but the Jews underſtand it at the end of the year; days in Scripture being often put for years, which Interpretation if we follow, we find a very early obſervation of the Anniverſary feſtival of firſt-fruits: But however this be, we have by unqueſtionable Tradition, that no Feſtival was more anciently, nor more univerſally obſerved, than this of offering the firſt fruits to God of their increaſe. V. Ainſworth in loc. The Jews were bound up ſo ſtrictly to it by their Law, Leviticus 23. 14. that they were to eat nothing of their crop, till the offering of the firſt fruits was made. And Porphyrius tells us out of Hermippus, that one of the Laws made for the Athenians by Triptolemus, was, Θεοὺς καρποῖς ἀγάλλειν, To feaſt the Gods with their fruits. De abſtin. l. 4. ſ. 22. Of which Xenocrates there gives a twofold reaſon; ſenſe of gratitude to the Gods, and the eaſineſs at all times to offer up theſe; by which he ſuppoſed the cuſtom would continue longer. Draco afterwards put this among his Θεσμοὶ αἰώνιοι, his unalterable Laws, Θεοὺς τιμᾷν ἀπαρχαῖς καρπῶν, To V. Petit. ad Leg. Att. p. 3.

worſhip their Gods with their firſt fruits. Beſides which, for other Quæſt.Græc. q. 6. Greeks we have the teſtimony of Plutarch, οἱ πλεῖστοι τῶν Ἑλλήνων πρὸς τὰς πάνυ παλαιὰς θυσίας ἐχρῶντο ταῖς κριθαῖς, ἀπαρχομένων τῶν πολιτῶν. The moſt of the Grecians, ſaith he, in their moſt ancient ſacrifices did uſe barley, the firſt-fruits being offered by the Citizens; and therefore the Opuntii called their chief Prieſt κριθολόγος, becauſe he gathered in the firſt fruits. The manner of offering the firſt fruits among them, was much of the ſame nature with the Mincha among the Jews, which was Levit. 23. 13. of fine flower mingled with oyl for a burnt offering to the Lord: The word there uſed implies the bruiſing the ears of corn in a mortar, becauſe they were as yet moiſt, and could not be ground as hard corn was. Whence, becauſe it was not all brought to flower, the Cake was called σῶα, and κρίμνα. It is called by the Septuagint κριθὴ πεφρυγμένη. So I ſuppoſe it ſhould be read, which in our great Bibles is πεφρυγμένα χίδρα· and it is called by the Greeks οὐλοχύται, which word is frequently uſed by Homer and Apollonius Rhodius, whom I forbear to tranſcribe, it being ſo obvious; which is expounded both by the excellent Scholiaſt on Apollonius, Iliad. α. v. 449. Arg. 1. v. 409, &c. and by Euſtathius and the ſhort Scholiaſt on Homer, to be κριθαὶ μεθ' ἁλῶν μεμιγμέναι, Barley and Salt mixed together. To which among the Romans the Mola ſalſa anſwered, of which Feſtus: Eſt far toſtum & ſale conſperſum, as the Mincha under the Law, was always ſalted with ſalt, Levit. 2. 13. This Mola ſalſa among the Romans, had originally relation to the firſt fruits: For the cuſtom of offering up firſt fruits among them, was as ancient as their inſtitution of Religious Rites; as Hiſt.Natur. lib. 18. c. 2. Pliny fully informs us. Numa inſtituit Deos fruge colere, & mola ſalſa ſupplicare, atque ut autor eſt Hemina, far terrere: which likewiſe anſwers Lev. 2. 14. to the Jewiſh Mincha, which was to be קלוי באש toſta in igne, parched in the fire: For which purpoſe Numa inſtituted the Fornicalia, which were farris torrendi feriæ, the feaſt of firſt fruits among them, the parching the corn being in order thereto: For as Pliny adds, ac ne deguſtabant novas fruges, aut vina antequam ſacerdotes primitias libâſſent; which may be V. Sanbertum de ſacrif. c. 19. exactly rendred in the very words of the Law, Leviticus 23. 14. But though the Mola ſalſa came originally from hence, it afterwards came to be uſed in moſt ſacrifices; thence the word immolare to ſacrifice, again parallel to the Mincha acceſſorium, as ſome call it among the Jews, which was uſed in other ſacrifices, and was diſtinct from the Mincha per ſe, which of its ſelf was an oblation to the Lord. From this offering up Voſſius de Idol. l. 2. cap. 59. bruiſed corn, ſome derive the name of Ceres from גרש which ſignifies as much, and was required Leviticus 2. 14. thence Ovid l. 8. Met. Primitias frugum Cereri, ſua vina Lyæo; but beſides Ceres they offered their firſt fruits among the Greeks to Horæ, Diana, Apollo, Veſta, as may be Græc. Fer. ſeen in Meurſius in Ὡραῖα, Θαργήλια, Ἑστιαῖα. Thus we ſee how theſe three Nations did agree not only in the obſervation of the Feaſt of firſt fruits, but very much in the ceremonies of their offerings too. Only this difference may be obſerved between them, the Romans did mix their Mola ſalſa with water, the Jews their Mincha with oyl only; the Greeks did not bruiſe the corn in their οὐλοχύται, but only mixed ſalt with the grains of corn. But the Jews and Romans both bruiſed and parched it, before they offered it up for the firſt fruits. Thus much to ſhew the antiquity and obſervation of the offering up of the firſt fruits among the moſt ancient and civilized nations. Which though it may ſeem a Digreſſion, yet I hope not wholly unacceptable, it being likewiſe the offering of my firſt fruits, and therefore the more ſeaſonable.

Proceed we now to other Feſtival Solemnities, to ſee what evidences of a ſociety for worſhip we find in them. And for this, it is apparent that the firſt original of Feſtivals among the heathen was for the honour of the Gods. Upon which account a grave and prudent author accounts the obſervation of ſome Feſtivals natural; becauſe nature doth dictate the neceſſity of ſome ſociety for the worſhip of God. For thus Strabo, Κοινὸν τοῦτο καὶ τῶν Ἑλλήνων καὶ τῶν βαρβάρων ἐστὶ τὸ τὰς ἱεροποιίας μετ᾽ ἀνέσεως ἑορταστικῆς ποιεῖσθαι, καὶ τοῦθ᾽ ἡ φύσις οὕτως ὑπαγορεύει. It was the cuſtom of all nations (who are comprehended under his words) to have Feſtival days for the honour of their Gods, which nature it ſelf dictates. Hence the Greeks as Athenæus obſerves, πάσης εὐωχίας τὴν αἰτίαν εἰς τὸν θεὸν ἀνέφερον, uſed to ſay that their Gods beg'd them all their play-days. After telling us of the mirth and jollity uſed after their ſacrifices, which was always the ſecond courſe at theſe Feſtivals, thence the Jews called their high Feſtival days ימים טובים good days or days of Mirth. We read of few Nations but had theſe Feſtival ſolemnities for the honour of their Gods. The Perſians had theirs for their God Mithras: The Babylonians ſaith Athenæus out of Beroſus, had their Feaſt Sacæa which Caſaubon would have called Seſacæa, becauſe Babylon in Scripture is called ששך Seſac, as the Ludi Romani were from Rome. It is to no purpoſe to mention the Feſtivals obſerved by the Greeks and Romans in honour of their Gods being ſo many that whole Books have been compoſed of them. That which I obſerve from hence, is, that Societies for the worſhip of God are natural; becauſe of their ſolemn reſting from their ordinary labour upon days appointed for the honour of their Gods: Thereby ſhewing they looked upon thoſe as peculiar days, and themſelves as peculiar Societies upon thoſe days from what they were at other times. One thing more evidenceth this among them; their ſolemn and ſecret myſteries which were ſocieties on purpoſe, as pretended for this very end in honour of their Gods. Their σεμνὰ, μεγάλα, φρικτὰ μυστήρια, as they were wont to call them, preſerved with the greateſt ſecrecy by the ἐπόπται. Their great and leſſer Eleuſinian, Samothracian, Cotyttian, Mithriacal Myſteries, to which none were admitted without paſſing through many degrees, κάθαρσις, μύησις, σύστασις, before they came to be ἐπόπται perfectly initiated. Wherein they were much imitated by the Chriſtians in the celebration of the Lord's ſupper about the fourth or fifth Century, as is largely ſhewed by Caſaubon in a moſt learned Diatriba on this ſubject in his Exercitations: to which I refer the reader. We ſee what ſtrict rules they had for admiſſion of any into theſe pretendedly ſacred but truly moſt impious ſocieties. In thoſe of Mithras as Suidas and Nonnus tell us, they paſſed through eighty degrees before they were throughly initiated, and ſeldom eſcaped with life. However we may gain from them this general notion, that they looked on a peculiar diſtinct ſociety as neceſſary for the worſhip and honour of the Deity they ſerved. Thus we ſee à poſteriori how a diſtinct ſociety for God's worſhip appears to be a dictate of Nature.

We ſhall now ſee if we can evidence à priori that it is a dictate of nature that there muſt be ſome ſociety for the worſhip of God. Three things will make that appear. Firſt, The ſociableneſs of man's nature. Man is ἀγελαῖόν τι, a creature that loves to herd it ſelf with thoſe of his own kind. Ἄνευ γὰρ φίλων, οὐδεὶς ἂν ἕλοιτο ζῆν ἔχων τὰ λοιπὰ ἀγαθὰ πάντα. If a man had all other comforts of life and wanted ſociety, he would not think his life worth leading, as Ariſtotle obſerves who farther takes notice of the ſociableneſs of man's nature Ὅθεν τοὺς φιλανθρώπους ἐπαινοῦμεν, from the general commendation that is given to courteous and affable men. I deny not but in the entring into a civil ſtate of ſociety, either fear or profit might be a main inducement to it; but though it be an inducement, yet there muſt be ſuppoſed an inclinableneſs to a ſociety; or a Commonwealth might be as ſoon ſet up among Tigers as men. So that they have very little ground of reaſon, who from the external inducements of fear or profit, in entring into civil ſocieties, do conclude againſt the ſociableneſs of man's nature. If then mans nature be ſociable in all other things, then nature will tell men, they ought to be ſo in things of common concernment to them all, and which is every ones work or duty, as religion is; if in other things men are ſociable, much more in this; For Secondly, Religion gives a great improvement to mans ſociable nature; and therefore Plutarch well calls Religion συνεκτικὸν ἁπάσης κοινωνίας καὶ νομοθεσίας ἔρεισμα. A foundation that knits and joins ſocieties together. And thence wiſely obſerves that in the conſtitution of Laws, πρῶτόν ἐστιν ἡ περὶ θεῶν δόξα καὶ μέγιστον· the firſt and greateſt thing to be looked at, is, the religion eſtabliſhed, or the opinions men entertain of the Gods. ~~To~~ which he ſubjoyns this excellent reaſon, πόλις ἂν μοι δοκεῖ μᾶλλον ἐδάφους χωρὶς, ἢ πολιτεία τῆς περὶ θεῶν δόξης ἀναιρεθείσης, παντάπασι σύστασιν λαβεῖν ἢ λαβοῦσα τηρῆσαι. That it is more impoſſible for a Common-wealth either to be formed or ſubſiſt without religion, than a City to ſtand without foundations. Thence a prudent Stateſ-man called Religion the beſt Reaſon of State. It appears then evidently both from reaſon and experience, that Religion hath a great influence upon the modelling and ordering civil ſocieties, whence as the ſame Moraliſt obſerves, Lycurgus did as it were conſecrate the Lacedemonians with religious rites, as Numa the Romans, Jon the Athenians, and Deucalion the Hellens. Whence ſome half-witted men (but I know not whether more defective in wit or grace) have (obſerving the great influence religion hath to keep men in order) been ready to look upon it as only a Politick device, to awe men with greater eaſe. It is not here a place largely to examine and refute this unworthy pretence. Only I adjure them by their only Goddeſs, Reaſon, to tell me whence come men to be ἐμπαθεῖς πρὸς τὰ θεῖα δι' ἐλπίδων ἅμα καὶ φόβων, as Plutarch expreſſeth it, to be ſo eaſily awed by the hopes and fears of another life more than other creatures are? Why are they at all affected with the diſcourſe of them? why cannot they ſhake off the thoughts of theſe things when they pleaſe? Are not men hereby made the moſt miſerable of creatures? for no other creature can be perſuaded that it ſhall ever quench its thirſt in thoſe rivers of pleaſures, nor make its bed in everlaſting flames. The beaſts of Sardinia that have their only refreſhment by the dew of Heaven, yet have never any hopes to come there. The Lyon never keeps from his prey by the thoughts and fears of a great Tribunal. But ſuppoſe only mankind of all creatures ſhould be liable to be thus impoſed on, as is pretended; How comes it to paſs that in no age of the world this impoſture hath not been diſcovered, confuted, ſhaken off by ſome people as wiſe as themſelves? Or have there never been any ſuch in the world? But whence come ſome men then to be wiſer than others? Whence come ſome to know things which all the reaſon in the world could never find out, without revelation? Whence comes a power to do any thing above the courſe of nature, if there be nothing but nature? Or are all men deceived that believe ſuch things?

things? If ſo, then there muſt be ſomewhat that muſt deceive men; men would not deceive themſelves, and they could not be ſo long impoſed upon by other men; there muſt be then ſome evil ſpirit muſt do it; and whence ſhould that come? from nature too? but then whence comes nature its ſelf? from its ſelf too, or ſomething elſe? Did it make it ſelf, or was it made by a greater power than it? if it made its ſelf, it muſt be and not be at the ſame time; it muſt be as producing and not be as produced by that act. And what is become of our Reaſon now? there muſt be then a ſupreme, eternal, infinite Being which made the world and all in it; which hath given nature ſuch a Touch of its own immortality and dependence upon God, that reaſon capable of Religion is the moſt proper diſtinctive Character of man from all inferior beings. And this Touch and ſenſe being common to the whole nature, they therefore incline more to one anothers ſociety in the joint performance of the common duties, due from them to their Maker. And ſo Religion not only makes all other bonds firm (which without it are nothing, as Oaths, Covenants, Promiſes, and the like, without which no civil ſociety can be upheld) but muſt of its ſelf be ſuppoſed eſpecially to tye men in a nearer ſociety to one another in reference to the proper acts belonging to its ſelf. Thirdly, It appears from the greater honour which redounds to God by a ſociable way of worſhip. Nature that dictates that God ſhould be worſhipped, doth likewiſe dictate that worſhip ſhould be performed in a way moſt for the honour and glory of God. Now this tends more to promote God's honour, when his ſervice is owned as a publick thing, and men do openly declare and profeſs themſelves his ſubjects. If the honour of a King lies in the publickly profeſſed and avowed obedience of a multitude of ſubjects; it muſt proportionably promote and advance God's honour more to have a fixed, ſtated Worſhip, whereby men may in a Community and publick ſociety declare and manifeſt their homage and fealty to the ſupreme Governour of the World. Thus then we ſee the light of Nature dictates there ſhould be a ſociety and joyning together of men for and in the Worſhip of God.

CHAP. IV.

The ſecond thing the Law of Nature dictates, that this ſociety be maintained and governed in the moſt convenient manner. A farther inquiry, what particular orders for Government in the Church came from the Law of Nature. Six laid down, and evidenced to be from thence. Firſt, A diſtinction of ſome perſons, and their ſuperiority over others, both in power and order, cleared to be from the Law of Nature. The power and application of the power diſtinguiſhed; this latter not from any Law of Nature binding, but permiſſive: therefore may be reſtrained. Peoples right of chooſing Paſtors conſidered. Order diſtinguiſhed from the form and manner of Government: the former natural, the other not. The ſecond is, that the perſons imployed in the ſervice of God, ſhould have reſpect anſwerable to their imployment, which appears from their relation to God as his ſervants; from the perſons imployed in this work before poſitive Laws. Maſters of families the firſt Prieſts.

The Prieſthood of the firſt born before the Law diſcuſſed: the arguments for it anſwered. The conjunction of civil and ſacred authority largely ſhewed, among Egyptians, Grecians, Romans, and others. The ground of ſeparation of them afterwards, from Plutarch and others.

§. 1. THE ſecond thing which the light of Nature dictates, in reference to Church Government, is, That the ſociety in which men joyn for the worſhip of God, be preſerved, maintained, and governed in the moſt convenient manner. Nature, which requires ſociety, doth require Government in that ſociety, or elſe it is no ſociety. Now we ſhall inquire what particular orders for Government in this ſociety eſtabliſhed for the worſhip of God, do flow from the light of Nature, which I conceive are theſe following.

Firſt, To the maintaining of a ſociety, there is requiſite a diſtinction of perſons, and a ſuperiority of power and order, in ſome over the other. If all be rulers every man is ſui juris, and ſo there can be no ſociety, or each man muſt have power over the other, and that brings confuſion. There muſt be ſome then inveſted with power and authority over others, to rule them in ſuch things wherein they are ſubordinate to them, that is, in all things concerning that ſociety they are entred into. Two things are implied in this: Firſt, Power; ſecondly, Order. By Power, I mean right to govern; by Order, the ſuperiority of ſome as rulers, the ſubordination of others as ruled. Theſe two are ſo neceſſary, that no civil ſociety in the world can be without them: For if there be no power, how can men rule? if no order, how can men be ruled, or be ſubject to others as their Governours? Here ſeveral things muſt be needfully diſtinguiſhed. The power from the application of that power, which we call the Title to government. The Order it ſelf from the form or manner of government. Some of theſe I aſſert as abſolutely neceſſary to all Government of a ſociety, and conſequently of the Church, conſidered without poſitive Laws; but others to be accidental, and therefore variable. I ſay then, that there be a Governing power in the Church of God, is immutable, not only by vertue of God's own conſtitution, but as a neceſſary reſult from the dictate of nature, ſuppoſing a Society: but whether this power muſt be derived by ſucceſſion, or by a free choice, is not at all determined by the light of Nature; becauſe it may be a lawful power and derived either way: and the Law of Nature as binding, only determines of neceſſaries. Now in civil Government, we ſee that a lawful Title is by ſucceſſion in ſome places, as by election in other. So in the Church under the Law, the power went by lineal deſcent, and yet a lawful power; and on the other ſide, none deny (ſetting aſide poſitive Laws,) but it might be as lawful by choice and free election. The main reaſon of this is, that the Title or manner of conveying authority to particular perſons, is no part of the preceptive obligatory Law of Nature, but only of the permiſſive; and conſequently is not immutable, but is ſubject to Divine or humane poſitive determinations, and thereby made alterable: And ſuppoſing a determination, either by Scripture or lawful authority, the exerciſe of that natural right is ſo far reſtrained as to become ſinful, according to the 3^d^ Propoſition under the 2^d^ Hypoth. and the 5^th^ Hypoth. So that granting at preſent, that people have the right of chooſing their Paſtors; this right being only a part of the permiſſive Law of Nature, may be lawfully reſtrained and otherwiſe determined, by thoſe that have lawful authority over the people, as a civil ſociety, according to the 5th Hypoth. If it be pleaded that they have a right by Divine poſitive Law, that Law muſt be produced; it being already proved, that no bare example, without a declaration by God that ſuch an example binds, doth conſtitute a Divine Right which is unalterable. We ſay then, that the manner of inveſting Church-Governours in their Authority, is not determin'd by the Law of Nature; but that there ſhould be a power Governing is (ſuppoſing a ſociety) of the immutable Law of Nature, becauſe it is that without which no ſociety can be maintained. And this is one of thoſe things which are of the Law of Nature, not in an abſolute ſtate of liberty, but ſuppoſing ſome acts of men (which once ſuppoſed) become immutable, and indiſpenſible. As ſuppoſing propriety, every man is bound to abſtain from what is in anothers poſſeſſion, without his conſent, by an immutable Law of Nature; which yet ſuppoſeth ſome act of man, viz. the voluntary introducing of propriety by conſent: So ſuppoſing a ſociety in being, it is an immutable dictate of the Law of Nature, that a power of Government ſhould be maintained and preſerved in it.

§. 2. So I ſay for the ſecond thing, Order, This, as it implies the ſubordination of ſome in a ſociety, to others as their rulers, is immutable and indiſpenſable; but as to the form whereby that order ſhould be preſerved, that is, whether the Government ſhould be in the hands of one or more, is no wiſe determined by the obligatory Law of Nature; becauſe either of them may be lawful and uſeful for the ends of Government, and ſo neither neceſſary by that Law: for as to the Law of Nature, the caſe is the ſame in civil and religious ſocieties; now who will ſay, that according to the Law of Nature, any form of Government, Monarchy, Ariſtocracy, Democracy, is unlawful. Theſe things are then matters of natural liberty, and not of natural neceſſity, and therefore muſt be examin'd according to poſitive determinations of divine and humane Laws, where we ſhall ſpeak of it. This then is clear as to our purpoſe, That a power in the Church muſt be conſtantly upheld and preſerved, fitly qualified for the ends of Government, is an immutable Law, ſo that this power be lodged in ſome particular Perſons to act as Governours, and ſo diſtinct from others, as ſubordinate to them; but whether the power of Government come from people by election, or from Paſtors by ordination, or from Magiſtrates by commiſſion and delegation; whether one, two, or all theſe wayes, is not determined by natural Law, but muſt be looked for in God's poſitive Laws; if not there neither to be found, we muſt acquieſce in what is determined by lawful authority. The ſame I ſay again, as to forms of Government, whether the power of ſole juriſdiction, and ordination, be inveſted in one perſon above the rank of Preſbyters, or be lodged in a College acting in a parity of power, is a plea muſt be removed from the Court of Common Law of Nature, to the King's Bench; I mean to the poſitive Laws of God, or the Supreme power in a Commonwealth: There being no Statutes in the Law of Nature to determine it; it muſt be therefore Placitum Regis, ſome poſitive Law muſt end the controverſie. We therefore traverſe the ſuit here, and ſhall enter it at the other Court.

§. 3. The ſecond thing dictated by the Law of Nature, is, That the Perſons imployed in the immediate ſervice of God, and entruſted with the power of governing the ſociety appointed for that end, ſhould have reſpect paid them anſwerable to the nature of their imployment. This appears to have foundation in the Law of Nature, being eaſily deducible from one of the firſt principles of that Law, that God is to be worſhipped; if ſo, then thoſe whoſe employment is chiefly to attend upon himſelf, ought to have greater reverence than others. By the ſame reaſon in nature, that if we do honour the King himſelf, the nearer any are to the King's perſon in attendance or employment, the greater honour is to be ſhewed them. The ground of which is, that the honour given to ſervants as ſuch, is not given to their perſons, but to their relation, or to the one only upon the account of the other; and ſo it doth not fix and terminate upon themſelves, but rebounds back, and reflects upon the original and fountain of that honour, the Prince himſelf: So if any be honoured upon the account of their immediate employment in the ſervice of God, it is God who is chiefly honour'd, and not they; it being the way men have to expreſs their honour to God, by ſhewing it proportionably and reſpectively to thoſe who either repreſent him, or are employed by him. Εἰς τὸν τῶν ὅλων δεσπότην ἡ τιμὴ διαβαίνει, as Chryſoſtome ſpeaks in this very caſe. The honour paſſeth through them to God himſelf. Where he largely proves this very thing from the Egyptians ſparing the Land of their Prieſts; and argues at leaſt for an equality of honour, from reaſon, to be given to thoſe who ſerve the true God. Nay, he is ſo far from looking upon it as a part of their ſuperſtition, that he mounts his argnment à pari to one, à minori ad majus, ἀλλ' ὅση ἡ διαφορὰ τῆς πλάνης πρὸς τὴν ἀλήθειαν, καὶ τῶν ἐκείνων ἱερέων πρὸς τοὺς τοῦ θεοῦ ἱερεῖς, τοσαύτην διαφορὰν καὶ περὶ τὴν τιμὴν ἐπιδεξώμεθα, that is, as much as truth exceeds error, and the ſervants of God do the Idol prieſts, ſo much let the honour we give to them, exceed that which was given by the Heathen to theirs: But we have a farther evidence of the honourableneſs of this employment, by the light of Nature, from the perſons employed in this work, before any poſitive Laws did reſtrain it: for I ſay not, that the Law of Nature doth dictate, that the function of thoſe employed in this work ſhould be differenced from all other; that is done by divine poſitive Laws; but the honour of thoſe in that function is from the Law of Nature: which appears hence, in that in the eldeſt times, thoſe who had the greateſt authority civil, had likewiſe the ſacred conjoined with it. For as Ariſtotle rightly obſerves, that the original of civil government was from private families: ſo in thoſe families, before they came to aſſociate for more publick worſhip, the Maſter of the Family was the Prieſt of it. Thence we read of Noah's ſacrificing, Abraham's duty to inſtruct his family, and his own command for offering up his ſon: we read of Jacob's ſacrificing, and Job's, and ſo of others, Every maſter of the family then was the High-prieſt too, and governed his family, not only as ſuch, but as a religious ſociety.

§. 4. Afterwards (from what inſtitution we know not; but certainly the reaſon of it, if it were ſo, was to put the greater honour upon the eldeſt Son) it is generally conceived, that the firſt-born had the Prieſthood of the family in their poſſeſſion, till the time of the Levitical Law. The Jewiſh Doctors think that was the Birthright which Jacob procured from his Father, and which Abraham gave to Iſaac, when it is ſaid that he gave him כל all that he had: For ſaith Poſtellus, if it be meant in a literal ſenſe, how could he give thoſe gifts to his other Sons which are mentioned before? Wherefore he conjectures, by that All is meant the ſpiritual knowledge of Chriſt, which he calls Intellectus generalis; which might be proper to him as a Prieſt of the family. But the plain meaning ing is no more, than when Abraham had beſtowed Legacies on his other Children, he left Iſaac hæredem ex aſſe, his lawful heir: I am unwilling to deny a tradition ſo generally received, among both Jewiſh and Chriſtian Writers, as the Prieſthood of the firſt-born before the Law; but this I ſay, I cannot yet find any other ground for it but tradition: no place of Scripture giving us ſufficient evidence for it, and many againſt it. That which ſerves ſufficiently for the confutation of it, is that obſervation of Theodoret ἐπισημαντέον ὅτι πανταχοῦ τῶν πρωτοτόκων οἱ μετ' αὐτοὺς προτιμῶνται. It is to be obſerved, that the younger are always preferred before the firſt-born. Which he takes notice of from the caſe he there ſpeaks to of Ephraim and Manaſſes; and ſo runs it up to Abel preferr'd before Cain, Seth before Japheth, Abraham before his elder brethren, Iſaac before Iſmael, Jacob before Eſau, Judas and Joſeph before Reuben, Moſes before Aaron, and David before the reſt of his Brethren; (although that was after the Law.) That place which gives the greateſt countenance to the opinion is, Numb. 3. 41. And thou ſhalt take the Levites for me inſtead of the firſt-born: Where it ſeems, that the firſt-born were formerly the Prieſts, in whoſe room the Levites were taken. But with ſubmiſſion to better judgments, I can ſee nothing implied in this place, but only that God having delivered their firſt-born in Egypt, Exod. 12. 23. and calling for them to be ſanctified to him, Exod. 13. 2. upon the account of the propriety he had in them, in a peculiar manner, by that deliverance (and not on the account of any ſpecial ſervice, for many were very unfit for that by reaſon of age, and which is obſervable, God requires as well the firſt-born of beaſts both to be ſanctified and redeemed, Numb. 3. 41.) therefore God now ſetling a way of worſhip, he gave the Iſraelites liberty to redeem them, and inſtead of them pitched on the tribe of Levi for his own ſervice. Another place is Exodus 24. 5. where the young men are mentioned that offered burnt offering. It is confeſſed that the Chaldee Paraphraſt and Arabick Verſion underſtand here the firſt-born; but however the place implies no more than that they were employed to bring the ſacrifices, for ſo the Septuagint renders it, καὶ ἐξαπέστειλε τοὺς νεανίσκους τῶν υἱῶν Ἰσραὴλ καὶ ἀνήνεγκεν ὁλοκαυτώματα, or elſe that they were employed as the Popæ only to kill the ſacrifices; for we ſee the ſprinkling of the blood which was the main thing intended here as a fœderal rite, was done by Moſes himſelf, who was the High Prieſt of the people as well as Prince, till Aaron and his ſons were ſet apart, which was not till Exodus 28. 1, 2. and yet Aaron was three years elder than Moſes, Exod. 7. 7. which is an evidence that Aaron as firſt-born was not the Prieſt; for till his conſecration, Moſes and not Aaron performed the offices of Prieſthood. Thence we read Pſalm 99. 6. Moſes and Aaron among his Prieſts. For although the word כהן be ſometimes attributed to thoſe in civil authority, as, 2 Sam. 8. 18. compared with 1 Chron. 18. 17. and 2 Sam. 20. 26. Gen. 41. 50. Exod. 2. 16. Job. 12. 19. Yet there is no reaſon ſo to underſtand it of Moſes: And farther the ground why כהן was attributed to both Prince and Prieſt before the Law, was, becauſe the ſame Perſon might be both; as the Prieſts of Egypt were Princes too, Gen. 41. 50. But for Moſes, we read not only of the title, but the proper offices of Prieſts attributed to him, as ſacrificing, Exod. 24. 5. conſecrating Aaron and his ſons, Exod. 29. 35. and therefore Aben Ezra upon that Pſalm forecited, calls him כהן הכהנים the High-Prieſt.

§. 5. The Prieſthood of Moſes leads us to another evidence of the honour of thoſe who were employed in the ſervice of God, which is that when Families increaſed and many aſſociated into a Commonwealth, though the private ſervice might belong to the maſter of the Family, yet the publick before poſitive Laws reſtraining it, was moſt commonly joined with the civil power. Thus Melchizedeck was both King and Prieſt in Salem; if with the Jews we conclude he was Sem (which we have little reaſon for) it will be a greater evidence, Sem being then the greateſt Potentate living. But we paſs from him to other Nations after the diſperſion, to ſee where the power over religious ſocieties was generally held. In Egypt we find that their Prieſts were often made Kings, as Plutarch obſerves out of Heccateus, and is confeſſed by Strabo, Diodorus and others. Of the Greeks the ſame Plutarch gives us a large teſtimony, that among them ἀντίῤῥοπον ἦν τὸ τῆς ἱερωσύνης ἀξίωμα πρὸς τὸ τῆς Βασιλείας, the Prieſthood was accounted of equal dignity with the Kingdom. The ſame doth Ariſtotle in ſeveral places in his Politicks: and particularly of the Spartans, of whom Herodotus adds that the Prieſthood of Jupiter Cæleſtis and Lacedæmonius did always belong to the King's own perſon. For the old Latins Virgil's Anius is ſufficient: and among the Romans after the power was ſeparated, the Pontifex Max. had royal ſtate, his cella curulis and Lictors as the Conſuls had; only their Prieſts medled not in civil affairs, of which Plutarch gives a double reaſon; the impoſſibility of minding both employments as they ſhould do, and ſo muſt either ἀσεβεῖν τοὺς θεοὺς, neglect the worſhip of the Gods, or elſe βλάπτειν τοὺς πολίτας, wrong the people with the neglect of the adminiſtration of juſtice. The other reaſon is, becauſe thoſe that were employed in civil affairs, were put upon execution of juſtice; and it was no ways fit a man ſhould come reeking from the blood of Citizens, to go and ſacrifice to the Gods. This conjunction of civil and ſacred power is atteſted by Clemens Alexandrinus of the moſt civilized heathens, ſo likewiſe by Syneſius of the moſt ancient Nations, by Strabo of the Epheſians, by the Roman Hiſtorians of the Roman Emperors, who from Auguſtus to Gratian, and ſome ſay after, continued the title of Pontifex Maximus among the reſt of the Imperial Honours. Thus much then may ſerve to manifeſt how the Honour of thoſe perſons who are employed in the ſervice of God, and the Government of religious ſocieties, is a dictate of the Law of Nature.

Chap. V.

The third thing dictated by the Law of Nature, is the ſolemnity of all things to be performed in this ſociety; which lies in the gravity of all Rites and Ceremonies, in the compoſed temper of mind. God's worſhip rational. His ſpirit deſtroys not the uſe of reaſon. The Enthuſiaſtick Spirit diſcovered. The circumſtantiating of fit time and place for worſhip, The ſeventh day, on what account ſo much ſpoken of by the Heathens. The Roman Holy-days. Ceſſation of labour upon them. The ſolemnity of Ceremonies uſed. Χέρνιψ, περιῤῥαντήρια, ſilence in devotions. Excluſion of unfit perſons. Solemnity of diſcipline: excommunication among the Jews by the ſound of a Trumpet, among Chriſtians by a Bell.

§. 1. THE next thing in reference to religious ſocieties which nature dictates, is, that all things, either pertaining to the immediate worſhip

worſhip of God, or belonging to the Government of that ſociety, be performed with the greateſt ſolemnity and decency that may be. Which dictate ariſeth from the nature of the things themſelves; which being moſt grave and ſerious, do require the greateſt gravity and ſeriouſneſs in the doing of them. And therefore any Ceremonies, actions, or geſtures, which tend to the diſcompoſing mens ſpirits, are upon that account to be exploded out of any religious ſocieties, as being ſo directly repugnant to the nature, deſign, and performance of religious duties. Wherefore that is the ſtanding rule of all inſtituted Ceremonies, by the Law of Nature in the worſhip of God, that they be ſuch as tend immediately to the advancing the ſerenity, tranquillity, and compoſure of their minds who obſerve them; and not ſuch which in their own nature, or by continual cuſtom of the uſers of them, do either rarifie mens ſpirits too much into a ſuperficial lightneſs and vanity of ſpirit; or elſe ſink them too much below the command of reaſon, into the power of unruly paſſions. A clear and compoſed ſpirit, is only fit for converſe with things of ſo high a nature. That region which is neareſt heaven, is the freeſt from clouds and vapours, as well as thoſe dancing Meteors, which hover about in a light uncertain Motion. It ſtrangely unbecomes the Majeſty of religious worſhip to have any thing vulgar, trivial, much more ridiculous in it. The worſhip of God is λατρεία λογικὴ, a rational worſhip, Rom. 12. 1. as well in regard of that worſhip which ſhould moderate and govern the manner of ſervice, as in regard of thoſe faculties which ſhould be moſt employed in it; or the foundation which the ſervice hath upon the dictates of mens natural reaſon.

§. 2. And as nature tells us, there ſhould be nothing too light or ſuperficial, ſo neither any thing whereby men are carried beyond the bounds of their own reaſon: For what men do at ſuch a time, is not their own proper act, but is more properly to be aſcribed to the power, ſtrength, and exceſs of a melancholy fancy, or elſe to a higher Enthuſiaſtical ſpirit, which then actuates and informs their fancies: and therefore it hath been well obſerved, as a Characteriſtical difference between the true Prophetical ſpirit, and the falſe and counterfeit; that the one leaves men in the free uſe of their reaſon and faculties; the other alienates them by panick fears, tremblings, and conſternations both of body and mind. To which purpoſe many evidences are brought by a late learned Writer, in his Diſcourſe of Prophecy out of the Heathen and Chriſtian Authors. Theſe latter diſcovering the vanity of the Montaniſtical ſpirit by this one obſervation: which beſides the Authors there cited, viz. (Clemens Alexandrinus, Miltiades in Euſebius, Jerom and Chryſoſtom) may appear from Epiphanius, who largely and excellently diſcourſeth on this ſubject, when he diſcovers the folly of Montanus and his followers: and gives this reaſon why they could be no true Prophets; for thoſe that were ſo, had ἐῤῥωμένην τὴν διάνοιαν, καὶ τὴν διδασκαλίαν καὶ τὴν διαλογήν· A great conſiſtency of ſenſe, reaſon, and diſcourſe; and inſtanceth in Iſaiah and Ezekiel: for, ſaith he, ὁ προφήτης μετὰ καταστάσεως λογισμῶν, καὶ παρακολουθήσεως ἐλάλει καὶ ἐφθέγγετο ἐκ πνεύματος ἁγίου τὰ πάντα ἐῤῥωμένως λέγων. A true Prophet had always the free uſe of his reaſon and faculties, and ſpake from the ſpirit of God with conſiſtency and coherence of Diſcourſe. But it was quite otherwiſe with the Montaniſts; οὐδὲ εὐσταθοῦντες φανοῦνται, οὔτε παρακολουθίαν λόγου ἔχοντες· λοξὰ γὰρ τὰ παρ' αὐτῶν ῥήματα καὶ σκαληνὰ καὶ οὐδεμιᾶς ὀρθότητος ἐχόμενα. They were always trembling both in body and mind; uſed no conſequence of reaſon in diſcourſe, their words had no proper ſenſe, but were all dark, intricate, and obſcure. An exact deſcription of a late prevailing Sect among us, who have their names from thoſe conſternations they were wont to fall into, and whoſe language carries as much obſcurity with it, as any of the followers of Montanus could wrap up theirs into. Only inſtead of Montanus his Paraclete, they tell us of a Light within, whoſe office is much of the ſame nature with the other; and one of the great errors of Montanus was, the adhering to Enthuſiaſms and Revelations beyond and beſide the written Word; which is the Helena of our late Opinioniſts, becauſe it gives a liberty for venting any conceptions of their own brains, under the pretence and diſguiſe of a Light within. But we ſee hence, how far ſuch tremblings and conſternations of body or mind are from a true, ſober, prophetick ſpirit; and how thoſe Chriſtians who lived in the time when the ſpirit of Prophecy had not yet left the Church of Chriſt (as appears by Origen, Tertullian, and others:) yet they always looked upon any violent extaſie, or fury, as an evidence of a falſe Prophet. And therefore Tertullian, when grown a Proſelyte of Montanus, endeavours ſtrongly to remove that apprehenſion of the ecſtatical fury of Montanus, and Priſca, and Maximilla, granting, if it were true, that it was a mark of a falſe and counterfeit prophetical ſpirit. The true Prophets I grant of old, were by the ſtrength of the impreſſion of their viſions upon their Animal ſpirits, ſometimes thrown into a fit of trembling; but when it was not continually ſo, and when it was, it might be rather a preſent aſtoniſhment from ſo ſtrange and unwonted ſight (as is common in ſuch caſes) or elſe from the ſtrong apprehenſion they had of the diſmal judgments God threatned to the people; but however, it never took from them the free uſe of their reaſon and faculties, which were always converſant about the matters revealed unto them. But as Procopius Gazæus obſerves of the falſe Prophets, τοῖς μαινομένοις ἐῴκασιν. they were acted like mad men. Which he takes notice of upon occaſion of Saul's propheſying when the evil ſpirit came upon him: and interprets with the Jewiſh Writers, of a madneſs rather than true Prophecy. Such as that of Caſſandra when ſhe is brought in by Lycophron.

Ἀσπετὸν, ſaith Tzetzes, that is πολλὴν, ἀπεριηγολέθετον· which is fully deſcribed by Lucan, of one pretending Enthuſiaſm:

———ſub pectore ficta quieto

And ſoon after,

———non rupta trementi

Whereby he diſcovers her not to be a true Enthuſiaſt, becauſe ſhe uſed not a ſtrange confuſed voice and tremblings as they did who were their proper Enthuſiaſts, as the Sibyls and the Pythian propheteſs. By this we ſee, that theſe earthquakes of violent paſſions are cauſed by the Prince of the air, and not by the gentle breathings of the divine Spirit: That theſe convulſions of mens ſpirits, are not the conſequents of the inhabitation of the good Spirit, but of the violent intruſion of the evil one: That that temper of mind is moſt ſuitable to religion, which is as well free from the bleakneſs and turbulency of paſſion, as the faint gleams of Lightneſs and Vanity.

§. 3. But a farther ſolemnity than this is required by the dictates of nature too, which lies in the circumſtantiating of time and place, and a dedication of both to the end of worſhip. That theſe are very conſonant to natural reaſon, appears by the univerſal conſent of all Nations agreeing in any form of the Worſhip of a Deity: who have all had their ſet times and fixed places to perform this worſhip in. I ſhall not inſiſt as ſome have done, that the ſeventh day hath been particularly and ſolemnly obſerved for the worſhip of God by the conſent of Nations: Although there be many probable arguments and plauſible teſtimonies brought for a peculiarity of honour to, if not ſervice on, the ſeventh day, out of Joſephus, Ariſtobulus Judæus (and by him from Linus, Heſiod, Homer) Clemens Alexandrinus, Tertullian, Lampridius, Seneca, Tibullus, and many others. From which Teſtimonies it appears that ſome kind of reverence and honour was given to the ſeventh day; but whether that day was the ſeventh of the week, or the ſeventh of the month; (which was conſecrated among the Greeks to Apollo, upon which the Θαργήλια and Πυανέψια, and the ſeventh of every month were obſerved in honour of him;) whether the Title of ἱερὸν ἦμαρ did belong to the ſeventh as one of the ἑορτάσιμοι or ἀποφράδες, Feſtival or inauſpicious days (for it was common to both)? Whether obſerved by any publick religious cuſtom, or by ſome private ſuperſtition, are things too large to inquire into, too difficult now to determine, and not neceſſary for my preſent purpoſe; It being ſufficient in order to that, if they had any ſet times at all for worſhip, which ſhews how ſolemn the worſhip of God ought to be. And this is not denyed by any; it being ſo neceſſary a conſectary from the duty of worſhip that there muſt be a time for performance of it. And not only in general that there muſt be ſome time, but a ſufficient proportion of time to be conſecrated to the publick exerciſe of piety, both from the conſideration of mans obligation to divine ſervice from his nature, from the weight and concernment of the things that time is employed in, and in the inward ſenſe of immortality upon the ſoul of man. But then what this proportion of time muſt exactly be, I ſee not how meer natural light could determine it, but it would rather ſuggeſt it to be highly reaſonable to wait for and expect ſuch a determination from the ſupreme Rector and Governor of the world. It being far more fit for the Maſter to preſcribe unto the ſervant what proportion of ſervice he expects from him; than that the ſervant ſhould both divide and chooſe his own time, and the proportion of ſervice which he owes to his Maſter. Nay it being ſo much more reaſonable for us to wait for God's order, than for a ſervant for his Maſters, as God's Power and Dominion over the creature is greater than that of a Maſter over his ſervant; as it is the voice and ſenſe of nature that God's commands cannot otherwiſe be but juſt, holy, reaſonable and good: which may be otherwiſe from men; as the acceptance of our perſons with God, lies not barely in the work done, but in the doing it out of obedience to the commands of God, which is otherwiſe with men; as God can give ſtrength to perform what he commands, which man cannot; which things conſidered make it evident to be highly reaſonable that God himſelf ſhould preſcribe the proportion of time, and not mans nature. But when God hath thus determined it, nature cannot but aſſent to that particular determination, that in conſideration of the works of God, it is moſt reaſonable that rather one day in a week, than one in a month, ſhould be dedicated to God's ſervice; that the ſeventh day of the week upon God's reſting on that day and ſanctifying it ſhould be the preciſe day, unleſs ſome reaſon equivalent to that of the firſt inſtitution, and approved by God for that end, be the ground of its alteration to another of the ſeven, which is the reaſon of the change under the Goſpel.

§. 4. As an evidence of the ſolemnity of times for worſhip, the Romans as well as other Nations had their ſeveral feriæ, their days ſet apart for the honour of their Gods. In which Macrobius tells us the Prieſts held them polluted, ſi indictis conceptiſque opus aliquod fieret; præterea regem ſacrorum flamineſque non licebat videre feriis opus fieri, & ideò per præconem denuntiabatur nè quid tale ageretur, & præcepti negligens mulctabatur. If any work were done upon thoſe days of reſt, the day was polluted, and the perſon puniſhed, unleſs it were as Umbro there affirms, in order to the honour of their Gods, or for neceſſaries of life. To which purpoſe Scævola anſwered him that aſked what work muſt be done upon the Feriæ: Quod prætermiſſum noceret, which would be ſpoiled by letting it alone; as taking an Oxe out of a ditch, ſtrengthening a beam like to fall and ruine men; and thence Maro allowed it lawful to waſh ſheep if it were to cure and not only to cleanſe them.

Balantumque gregem fluvio merſare ſalubri.

By which laſt word Macrobius ſaith it was only lawful to do it for healing them, and not in order to gain. Servius informs us likewiſe, that the Prieſts when they went to ſacrifice, ſent their ſervants before to bid all tradeſmen leave working, ne pro negotio ſuo & ipſorum oculos & Deorum ceremonias attaminent; Feriæ enim operæ Deorum creditæ ſunt; Leſt by following their work they both offend them and the Gods too: For theſe Holy days are devoted to the ſervice of the Gods. Feſtus ſaith, that upon their dies religioſi, niſi quod neceſſe eſt, nefas habetur facere; nothing but works of pure neceſſity were to be done. But by dies religioſi, probably he means the dies atri & nefaſti; their ominous unlucky days, as they accounted them. But however Macrobius diſtinguiſheth the days among the Romans into Dies feſti, profeſti, & interciſi. The Feſti were dedicated to the Gods, the Profeſti to their own work, the Interciſi were divided between both, at ſome hours of which it was lawful to follow their civil employments, at others not. Nam cum hoſtia cæditur, fari nefas eſt; inter cæſa & porrecta fari licet: rurſus cum adoletur non licet. While the ſacrifice was killing, no Courts of Judicature were opened (in which the Prætor might fari tria verba ſolemnia, do, dico, addico, thence called dies faſti) but between the killing the ſacrifice and offering up the entrails (called Porrecta from porricere, which was verbum ſacrificiale pervetuſtum, ſaith Turnebus, an old word belonging to ſacrificing, exta Diis cum dabant porricere dicebant, Varro.) then it was lawful to open the Courts; but again, when the ſacrifice was offered, Servius Honor. in Virgil. Georgic. 1.

ed, it was not. By which we ſee as from the light of nature, that what days and times whether weekly, monthly, or Anniverſary, were deſigned and appointed as dies Feſti, for the ſervice of God, were to be ſpent wholly in order to that end, and not to give ſome part to God, and to take others to themſelves: as they were wont to do in their ſacrifices to offer up ſome part to the Gods, and feaſt upon the reſt themſelves; as Athenæus tells us, that Conon and Alcibiades offered ſuch Hecatombs to the Gods, that they entertained the people upon the remainders of them. And from hence we may ſee how far ſhort of natural light their Religion falls, who make no ſcruple of ſpending a great part of the days devoted to God's worſhip in following either their imployments or recreations: Which latter ſeem more directly to impugn the end of ſuch time appointed than the other, in as much as recreations tend more to the rarifying mens ſpirits, and evaporating them into lightneſs and vanity, and ſo diſcompoſing them for the duties of ſpiritual worſhip, than mens ſerious and lawful callings do. But farther, we obſerve, among the Romans the ſeveral ſorts of days appointed for publick worſhip. Macrobius reckons up four ſorts of them, Stativæ, Conceptivæ, Imperativæ, & Nundinæ. Stativæ, were the ſet Feſtival days obſerved every year by the whole people, and marked for that end in their Faſti. Such were the Agonalia, Carmentalia, Lupercalia, which are marked with red Letters in the Faſti conſulares, or the Calendarium Romanum, by Joſ. Scaliger called Calendarium Colotianum, which may be ſeen at large in Mr. Selden: beſides which, their other anniverſary feſtivals are there ſet down: which Tertullian ſaith, being all put together, Pentecoſtem implere non poterunt, make not up the number of fifty; and ſo not ſo many as our Lord's days in a year are. Conceptivæ, were ſuch Feſtivals as were annually obſerved, but the days of the keeping them were every year determined by the Magiſtrates or the Prieſts, as Latinæ, Sementivæ, Paganalia, Compitalia, Imperativæ, were ſuch as the Conſuls or Prætors did command at their own pleaſure. Such were their ſolemn ſupplications in times of trouble, and their days of Triumph and Thankſgiving for victories. The Nundinæ were thoſe which returned every ninth day, and therefore the Letter by which they obſerved the return of the ninth day, was H. as among us Chriſtians G. which becauſe it notes the return of the Lord's days, we call the Dominical Letter. Theſe Nundinæ were the days when the country people brought in their wares into the City to be ſold, which were anciently obſerved as feſtival days, ſacred to Jupiter; but by the Lex Hortenſis were made Dies faſti, for determining the controverſies that might ariſe among the people in their dealings; as the Court of Pye powder was inſtituted among us upon the ſame account. So much for the ſolemnity of time uſed in the ſervice of God.

Another evidence of the ſolemnity of Worſhip, was the extraordinary care of the Heathens in preparing themſelves for it, by cleanſing and purifying themſelves with water, for which purpoſe they had their χέρνιψ for cleanſing their hands, and their λοῦτρα and περιῤῥαντήρια ſtanding at the porch of their Temples for their whole bodies, which cuſtom was generally obſerved by the Heathens, as is very obvious in the ſeveral Writers of their cuſtoms in ſacrificing; beſides which they obſerved likewiſe this waſhing with water, by way of luſtration and expiation of their faults, as Triclinius the Scholiaſt on Sophocles tells us, it was an ancient cuſtom when men had murdered others, ὕδατι ἀπονίπτειν

τὰς χεῖρας εἰς κάθαρσιν τοῦ μιάσματος, to waſh their hands in expiation of their guilt; as Oreſtes did in Pauſanias after the killing his mother, and ſome think Pilate in the Goſpel did ſo for the ſame end; but his was only to declare his innocency, and not to expiate his ſin, as is obſerved by many upon that place. But however, from hence we may take notice of the Spring and Fountain of the Pope's Holy-water: which was conſecrated by Numa long before Alexander I. to whom Polydore Virgil, and others attribute the firſt uſe of it in the Chriſtian Church: And as the uſe of it, and the manner of ſprinkling it is the ſame among the Papiſts, as it was among the Heathen; ſo likewiſe the end of it, witneſs the old Rime,

Which may be ſufficiently anſwered with the cenſure of a heathen:

Ovid. Faſt. lib. 2.

But from this I paſs to the ſolemnity in their worſhip it ſelf, evidenced by the general ſilence commanded in it; which appears by Horace's Favete linguis, Ovid's Ore favent populi nunc cum venit aurea pompa; Virgil's fida ſilentia ſacris; Feſtus's linguam paſcito, i. e. coerceto; The Egyptians ſetting Harpocrates his image in the entrance to their Temples, and the Romans placing the Statue of Angerona on the Altar of Volupia. The Greeks had their κήρυκες which did ἡσυχίαν κατακηρύττειν ἐν ἱερουργίαις, as Julius Pollux tells us, which Plautus calls facere audientiam, to command ſilence: much as the Deacons afterwards did in the Primitive Church, who were wont to command ſilence by their Orarium, and were thence called κήρυκες among the Chriſtians (for though κηρύττειν, as applied to the Biſhop and Preſbyters, did ſignifie ὁμιλεῖν and εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, to preach; yet as it was applied to the Deacons, it implyed only their commanding ſilence in order to the prayers of the Catechumeni called παραθέσεις, as Ariſtenus obſerves on Concil. Carthag. can. 106. But this by the way.) The formula uſed by the Greeks in commanding ſilence was, ἀκούετε λαοί, to which Ariſtonicus the Fidler alluded when in the market place of Mylaſſa, a Town in Caria, he ſaw many Temples, and but few Citizens, he cried out ἀκούετε ναοὶ inſtead of ἀκούετε λαοί. But I paſs theſe things over, as being commonly known, only obſerving from them the ſolemnity of their publick devotions, which is farther ſeen in their ſolemn excluding unfit perſons from partaking with them in their ſacrifices. Of which Virgil, Ovid, Statius, Silius Italicus, and others among the Romans ſpeak; and the Lictor in ſome ſacrifices ſtood up, ſaith Feſtus, and cryed aloud, Hoſtis, mulier, vinctus exeſto, i. e. extra eſto: and to keep unfit perſons the better off, the Flamines had a Commentaculum, a kind of rod in their hands. Among the Greeks the old form continued from Orpheus or Onomacritus his Orphaica, ἑκὰς ἑκὰς ἐστε βέβηλοι· and thoſe that ſacrifice, aſked τίς τῇδε; the other anſwered πολλοὶ κἀγαθοί. From all theſe things laid together, we ſee the great ſolemnity uſed by them in their worſhip, which conſidered in its ſelf, was not the product of ſuperſtition, but a dictate of the Law of Nature. And it ſeems moſt natural to the acts of diſcipline, that they ſhould be performed in the moſt publick ſolemn manner, and not in any private clandeſtine way: which being ſo done, oft times loſe the deſigned effect of them, in making men ſenſible and aſhamed of thoſe miſcarriages which made them deſerve ſo ſharp and ſevere a cenſure. Thence among the Jews, their ſolemn ſentence of the greater excommunication was pronounced by the ſound of a Trumpet; and ſo they ſay Meroz was excommunicated with 400 Trumpets: and the ſame number they report was uſed in excommunicating Jeſus of Nazareth, which was uſually done by the Magiſtrate, or the Rector of the Univerſity: As they tell us a ſtory of a man coming to buy fleſh at Pombeditha (which was one of the three Univerſities of the remaining Jews in Chaldea, after the return from captivity, the other were Sora and Neharda) but offering ſome opprobrious language to R. Jehuda then Governor of the Univerſity, he makes no more to do, but prolatis tubis hominem excommunicavit, brings out his Trumpets and excommunicates him. And as the uſe of bells, ſince their invention, did ſupply the former uſe of Trumpets in calling the Congregation together, (which I ſuppoſe was the account of uſing Trumpets in excommunicating from the Congregation) ſo it ſeems the bells were ſometimes uſed to ring men out of, as well as into the Church; thence the ſolemn Monkiſh curſe, curſing men with Bell, Book, and Candle, which can have no other ſenſe but from this practice. So much ſhall ſuffice to ſhew the foundation which the ſolemnity of worſhip, and the acts belonging to it, have in the dictates of nature manifeſted by the voice and conſent of Nations; for herein vox populi is vox naturæ, as at other times it is Vox Dei.

CHAP. VI.

The fourth thing dictated by the Law of Nature, that there muſt be a way to end controverſies ariſing, which tend to break the peace of the ſociety. The nature of Schiſm conſidered; Liberty of judgment and authority diſtinguiſhed; the latter muſt be parted with in religious ſocieties as to private perſons, What way the light of nature directs to, for ending controverſies, in an equality of power, that the leſs number yield to the greater: on what Law of Nature that is founded. In a ſubordination of power that there muſt be a liberty of Appeals defined. Independency of particular Congregations conſidered. Elective Synods. The Original of Church-Government as to congregations. The caſe parallel'd between civil and Church-Government. Where appeals finally lodge. The power of calling Synods, and confirming their acts in the Magiſtrate.

§. 1. THE fourth thing which Nature dictates in reference to a Church ſociety, is, That there muſt be a way agreed upon to determine and decide all thoſe controverſies ariſing in this ſociety, which immediately tend to the breaking the peace and unity of it. We have ſeen already that natural reaſon requires a diſparity between perſons in a ſociety, to form and conſtitute a ſociety; there muſt be order and power in ſome, there muſt be inferiority and ſubjection in others anſwering to the former; and by theſe we ſuppoſe a ſociety to be now model'd. But nature muſt either be ſuppoſed defective in its deſigns and contrivements as to the neceſſaries required for the management of them; or elſe there muſt likewiſe be implyed a ſufficient proviſion for the maintenance and preſervation of a ſociety thus entred into. It is no wiſe agreeable to the wiſdom of nature to erect a fabrick with ſuch materials, which though they may lie one upon the other, yet if not fitly compacted together, will fall in pieces again as ſoon as it is ſet up: nor yet to frame a body with mere fleſh and bones, and the ſuperiority of ſome members above the other; for unleſs there be joints and ſinews and ligatures to hold the parts together, the diſſolution will immediately follow the formation of it. The end and deſign of nature is, preſervation and continuance, and therefore things neceſſary in order to that muſt be implyed in the firſt deſign of the being of the thing; ſo that at leaſt, as to its ſelf, there be no defect in order to that. This muſt in reaſon be ſuppoſed in all ſocieties, that when they are firſt entred, it muſt be upon ſuch terms as may be ſufficient to maintain and keep up thoſe ſocieties in that peace and order which is requiſite in order to the continuance of them. For what diſeaſes are to bodies, age and fire are to buildings, that diviſions and animoſities are to ſocieties, all equally tending to the ruine and deſtruction of the things they ſeize upon. And as bodies are furniſhed by nature not only with a receptive and concoctive faculty, of what tends to their nouriſhment, but with an expulſive faculty of what would tend to the ruine of it; ſo all civil bodies muſt not only have ways to ſtrengthen them, but muſt have likewiſe a power to expel and diſperſe thoſe noxious humours and qualities, which tend to diſſolve the frame, compages and conſtitution of them. A power then to prevent miſchiefs is as neceſſary in a ſociety, as a power to ſettle things in order to the advancement of the common good of ſociety. This therefore the Church as a religious ſociety muſt likewiſe be endowed with, viz. a power to maintain its ſelf, and keep up peace and unity within its ſelf: which cannot otherwiſe be ſuppoſed (conſidering the bilious humour in mens natures, not wholly purged out by Chriſtianity) without ſome way to decide controverſies which will ariſe, diſturbing the peace of it. For the clearing of this, which much concerns the power and government of the Church, we ſhall conſider what the controverſies are which tend to break the Churches peace: and what way the Law of Nature finds out for the ending of them. Which we are the more neceſſitated to ſpeak to, becauſe nothing hath begotten controverſies more than the power of determining them hath done.

§. 2. The controverſies then which tend to break the peace of a religious ſociety, are either matter of different practice, or matter of different opinion. The former, if it comes from no juſt and neceſſary cauſe, and ends in a total ſeparation from that ſociety, the perſon guilty of it was joined with, is juſtly call'd Schiſm; which (as one defines it) is an Eccleſiaſtical ſedition, as ſedition is a Lay-Schiſm; both being directly contrary to that communion and friendlineſs, which ſhould be preſerved in all ſocieties. The latter, if impugning ſomewhat fundamental, in order to the end of conſtituting religious ſocieties, or being a leſſer matter, if wilfully taken up, and obſtinately maintained, is called Hereſie: which two are ſeldom ſeen out of each others company; and when they are together, are like the blind and lame man in the Fable, the one lent the other eyes, and the other lent him feet: one to find out what they deſired, the other to run away with it when they had it. The Heretick he uſeth his eyes to ſpie out ſome cauſe or pretence of deſerting communion; the Schiſmatick he helps him with his legs to run away from it; but between them both, they rob the Church of its peace and unity. But in order to the making clear what the Churches power is in reference to theſe, we are to take notice of theſe things. Firſt, That the Church hath no direct immediate power over mens opinions. So that a matter of mere different opinion lies not properly within the cognizance of any Church power: the reaſon of it is this, becauſe the end of power lodged in the Church, is to preſerve the peace and unity of its ſelf: now a mere different opinion doth not violate the bonds of ſociety; for opinionum diverſitas & opinantium unitas non ſunt ἀσύστατα. Men may preſerve communion under different apprehenſions. So long then as diverſity of opinion tends not to the breaking the quiet and tranquillity of the Church of God, a man may ſafely enjoy his own private apprehenſions, as to any danger of moleſtation from Church Governours; That is, ſo long as a man keeps his opinion to himſelf; and hath the power of being his own counſellor. It is not the difference of opinion formally conſidered when it is divulged abroad that is puniſhable, but the tendency to Schiſm, which lies in the divulging of it, and drawing others away from the received Truths: For the opinion its ſelf is an internal act of the mind, and therefore puniſhable by no external power, as that of the Magiſtrate or Church is; as no internal action is under the juriſdiction or authority of a Magiſtrate, any farther than as neceſſarily conjoyned with the outward action, or as it hath a direct influence upon it. The caſe of blaſphemy, which is a thing of the higheſt nature in this kind, is not puniſhable by men, as blaſphemy implies low and undervaluing thoughts of God; but as being a thing divulged (elſe no formal blaſphemy) it tends apparently to the diſhonour of God, and conſequently to the breaking in pieces all ſuch ſocieties, whoſe great foundation is the belief of the Majeſty and Glory of God. So idolatry under the Law was puniſhed, as it was immediately deſtructive of that obedience which men did owe to the true God. And under the Goſpel, it is not mere difference of opinion, judgment, and apprehenſion, which lays men open to the Cenſures of that power which moderates and rules a religious ſociety; but the indeavour by difference of opinion to alienate mens ſpirits one from another, and thereby to break the ſociety into fractions and diviſions, is that which makes men liable to reſtraint and puniſhment. From whence it follows, that where the peace and unity of the Church may be preſerved, and yet men keep up indifferent apprehenſions of things, there is nothing deſerving any ſevere animadverſion from the rulers of that ſociety: for a power corrective and vindictive muſt ſuppoſe ſomething acted contrary to the Laws and rules of the ſociety, and the end of committing that power into the hands of Governours: now here is nothing of that nature; for the Laws of mutual ſociety are obſerved; and the end of Church Government is to ſee ne quid Eccleſia detrimenti capiat, leſt the Church as a ſociety be any ways prejudiced: which cannot be while men maintain that love, affection, and communion which becomes the members of ſuch a ſociety. The unity then required in the Church is not an unity of judgment and apprehenſion among the members of it; which though it be their duty to indeavour after, yet it is no farther attainable by mens indeavours than perfection is; and Unio Chriſtianorum in this ſenſe, is one of the Jewels belonging to the Crown of Heaven. There is no neceſſity then of inquiring quiring after an infallible judge of controverſies, unleſs we had ſome promiſe and aſſurance from Chriſt, that the members of his Church ſhould never differ in their judgments from one another, and then what need of an infallible Judge? and if Chriſt had appointed an infallible Judge, he would infallibly have diſcovered it to the minds of all ſober men; or elſe his infallibility could never attain its end: For while I queſtion whether my Judge be infallible or no, I cannot infallibly aſſent to any of his determinations. And where there is no ground for an infallible Judge, for any to pretend to it, is the worſt of ſuppoſable errors; becauſe it renders all others incurable by that apprehenſion, and takes away all poſſibility of repentance while men are under that perſuaſion. The unity then of the Church, is that of communion, and not that of apprehenſion; and different opinions are no farther liable to cenſures, than as men by the broaching of them, do endeavour to diſturb the peace of the Church of God.

§. 3. That then which ſeems moſt liable to cenſures in a Church, is Schiſm, as being immediately deſtructive of that communion which ſhould be maintained in a religious ſociety. But as to this too, we muſt obſerve ſomething farther, and not to think and judge every thing to deſerve the name, which is by many call'd Schiſm; it being well obſerved by a very learned and judicious Divine, that Hereſie and Schiſm, as they are commonly uſed, are two Theological Scarecrows, with which, they who uſe to uphold a party in religion, uſe to fright away ſuch, as making enquiry into it, are ready to relinquiſh and oppoſe it, if it appear either erroneous or ſuſpicious. For as Plutarch reports of a Painter, who having unskilfully painted a Cock, chaſed away all Cocks and Hens, that ſo the imperfection of his Art might not appear by compariſon with nature; ſo men willing for ends, to admit of no fancy but their own, endeavour to hinder an enquiry into it, by way of compariſon of ſomewhat with it, peradventure truer, that ſo the deformity of their own might not appear. Thus he. Schiſm then, as it imports a ſeparation from communion with a Church ſociety, is not a thing intrinſecally and formally evil in it ſelf, but is capable of the differences of good and evil according to the grounds, reaſons, ends, and circumſtances inducing to ſuch a ſeparation. The withdrawing from ſociety, is but the materiality of Schiſm; the formality of it muſt be fetched from the grounds on which that is built. It is therefore a ſubject which deſerves a ſtrict enquiry, what things thoſe are which may make a withdrawing from a religious ſociety, to which a man is joined, to be lawful: For as it is a great ſin on the one hand, unneceſſarily to divide and ſeparate from Church ſociety; ſo it is an offence on the other ſide, to continue communion when it is a duty to withdraw it. For the reſolving this knotty and intricate Queſtion, I ſhall lay down ſome things by way of premiſal, and come cloſely to the reſolution of it.

Firſt, Every Chriſtian is under an obligation to join in Church ſociety with others; becauſe it his duty to profeſs himſelf a Chriſtian, and to own his religion publickly, and to partake of the Ordinances and Sacraments of the Goſpel, which cannot be without ſociety with ſome Church or other. Every Chriſtian, as ſuch, is bound to look upon himſelf as the member of a body, viz. the viſible Church of Chriſt; and how can he be known to be a member, who is not united with other parts of the body? There is then an obligation upon all Chriſtians, to engage in a religious ſociety with others, for partaking of the Ordinances of the Goſpel. It hath been a caſe diſputed by ſome (particularly by Grotius the ſuppoſed Author of a little Tract, An ſemper ſit communicandum per ſymbola? when he deſigned the Syncretiſm with the Church of Rome) whether in a time when Churches are divided, it be a Chriſtian's duty to communicate with any of thoſe parties which divide the Church, and not rather to ſuſpend the communion from all of them. A caſe not hard to be decided; for either the perſon queſtioning it, doth ſuppoſe the Churches divided to remain true Churches, but ſome to be more pure than other; in which caſe, by virtue of his general obligation to communion, he is bound to adhere to that Church which appears moſt to retain its Evangelical purity: Or elſe he muſt ſuppoſe one to be a true Church, and the other not; in which the caſe is clearer, that he is bound to communicate with the true Church; or he muſt judge them alike impure, which is a caſe hard to be found; but ſuppoſing it ſo, either he hath joined formerly with one of them, or he is now to chooſe which to join with; if he be joined already with that Church, and ſees no other but are as impure as that, he is bound to declare againſt the impurity of the Church, and to continue his communion with it; if he be to chooſe communion, he may ſo long ſuſpend till he be ſatisfied, which Church comes neareſt to the primitive conſtitution, and no longer. And therefore I know not whether Chryſoſtome's act were to be commended, who after being made a Deacon in the Church of Antioch by Meletius, upon his death, becauſe Flavianus came in irregularly as Biſhop of the Church, would neither communicate with him, nor with Paulinus another Biſhop at that time in the City, nor with the Meletians, but for three years time withdrew himſelf from communion with any of them. Much leſs were the Διακρινόμενοι or the Hæſitantes as the Latins called them, to be commended, who after the determination of the Council of Chalcedon, againſt Eutyches, becauſe of great differences remaining in Egypt and the Eaſtern Churches, followed Zenoes Henoticum, and would communicate neither with the Orthodox Churches, nor Eutychians. But I ſee not what cenſure Jerome could incur, who going into the Dioceſe of Antioch, and finding the Churches there under great Diviſions, there being beſides the Arian Biſhop, three others in the Church of Antioch, Meletius, Paulinus, and Vitalis, did ſo long ſuſpend communion with any of them, till he had ſatisfied himſelf about the occaſion of the Schiſm, and the innocency of the Perſons and Churches engaged in it. But if he had withdrawn longer, he had offended againſt his obligation to join in Church ſociety with others, for participation of Goſpel ordinances; which is the neceſſary Duty of every Chriſtian.

Secondly, Every Chriſtian actually joined in Church ſociety with others, is ſo long bound to maintain ſociety with them, till his communion with them becomes ſin. For nothing elſe can juſtifie withdrawing from ſuch a ſociety, but the unlawfulneſs of continuing any longer in it. Suppoſing a Church then to remain true, as to its conſtitution and eſſentials, but there be many corruptions crept into that Church; whether is it the duty of a Chriſtian to withdraw from that Church becauſe of thoſe corruptions, and to gather new Churches only for purer adminiſtration, or to join with them only for that end? This as far as I underſtand it, is the ſtate of the Controverſie between our Parochial Churches, and the Congregational. The reſolution of this great Queſtion muſt depend on this, Whether it is a ſin to communicate with Churches true as to eſſentials, but ſuppoſed corrupt in the exerciſe of diſcipline? For Parochial Churches are not denied to have the eſſentials of true Churches by any ſober Congregational men. For there is in them the true word of God preached, the true Sacraments adminiſtred, and an implicite Covenant between Paſtor and People, in their joining together. All that is pleaded then, is corruption, and defect in the exerciſe and adminiſtration of Church order and diſcipline. Now that it is lawful for Chriſtians to join with Churches ſo defective, is not only acknowledged by reverend Mr. Norton in his anſwer to Apollonius, but largely and fully proved. For which he lays down five propoſitions which deſerve to be ſeriouſly conſidered by all, which make that a plea for withdrawing from ſociety with other Churches. Firſt, A believer may lawfully join himſelf in communion with ſuch a Church, where he cannot enjoy all the ordinances of God; as in the Jewiſh Church, in our Saviour's time, which refuſed the Goſpel of Chriſt, and the Baptiſm of John; and yet our Saviour bids us hear the Scribes and Phariſees ſitting in Moſes chair, which hearing, ſaith he, doth imply conjunctionem Eccleſiæ Judaicæ, a joining with the Jewiſh Church; and ſo with Churches rejecting an article of faith, as in the Church of Corinth the doctrine of the reſurrection, the Churches of Galatia the doctrine of juſtification by faith; but the Apoſtle no where requires ſeparation on that account from them. Secondly, A believer may lawfully join in communion with ſuch a Church in which ſome corruption in the worſhip of God is tolerated without reformation. As the offering on high places from Solomon to Hezekiah in the Church of Juda, obſervation of circumciſion, and the neceſſity of keeping the ceremonial Law in the Churches of Galatia. Thirdly, A believer may lawfully join himſelf in communion with ſuch a Church in which ſuch are admitted to ſacraments, who give no evident ſigns of grace, but ſeem to be Lovers of this world; which he proves, becauſe it is every one's main duty to examine himſelf, and becauſe another's ſin is no hurt to him, and therefore cannot keep him from his duty; and then by mens coming unworthily, non polluitur communio, licet minuitur conſolatio, the communion is not defiled, though the comfort of it be diminiſhed. He brings inſtance from the Church of Corinth, among whom were many ſcandalous, and had not repented, 2 Cor. 12. 20, 21. So in the Jewiſh Church which lay under great corruptions, when our Saviour and his Apoſtles communicated with it. Fourthly, Although a Believer join with ſuch a Church, he is not therefore bound with the guilt nor defiled with the pollutions of others; which he proves, becauſe it is lawful to do it, and ſo he contracts no guilt by it. Fifthly, A believer that hath joined himſelf to ſuch a Church, is not bound to withdraw, and ſeparate from ſuch a Church under pain of guilt if he doth it not, becauſe it implies a contradiction to be lawful to join to ſuch a Church, and yet unlawful to continue in its communion; for that ſpeaks it to be a Church, and this latter to be no Church: and by that he doth imply it to be unlawful to ſeparate from any ſociety which is acknowledged to be a true Church. Thus for that learned and reverend Man, by whom we ſee that the received Principles of the ſober and moderate part of thoſe of that perſuaſion, are not at ſuch a diſtance from others, as many imagine. We ſee then that communicating with a Church not ſo pure as we deſire, is no ſin by the arguments by him produced. And how it ſhould be then lawful to withdraw from ſuch a Church, merely for Reſponſ. ad Syllog. Queſt. cap. 16.

1 Cor. 14. 34. 1 Cor. 6. 4.--15.

purer communion, I underſtand not. This I am ſure was not the caſe of our Churches in their ſeparation from the Church of Rome: the main ground of which was the ſin of communicating with that Church in her Idolatry and Superſtition, and the impoſſibility of communicating with her, and not partaking of her ſins, becauſe ſhe required a profeſſion of her errors, and the practice of her Idolatry as the neceſſary conditions of her communion; in which caſe it is a ſin to communicate with her.

§. 5. And this leads me now to a cloſer reſolution of the caſe of withdrawing from Churches in which men have formerly been aſſociated, and the grounds which may make ſuch a withdrawing lawful. In order to that we muſt diſtinguiſh between theſe things. Firſt, Between corruptions in the Doctrine of a Church, and corruptions in the practice of a Church. Secondly, Between corruptions whether in doctrine, or practice profeſſed and avowed by a Church, and required as conditions of communion in all members of it, and corruptions crept in, and only tolerated in a Church. Thirdly, Between Non-communion as to the abuſes of a Church, and a poſitive and total ſeparation from a Church, as it is ſuch. From theſe things I lay down theſe following Propoſitions.

First, Where any Church is guilty of corruptions, both in doctrine and practice, which it avoweth and profeſſeth, and requireth the owning them as neceſſary conditions of communion with her, there a Non-communion with that Church is neceſſary, and a total and poſitive ſeparation is lawful and convenient. I have ſaid already that the neceſſity and lawfulneſs of this departing from communion with any Church is wholly to be reſolved by an enquiry into the grounds and reaſons of the action it ſelf. So that the matter of fact muſt of neceſſity be diſcuſſed, before the matter of Law as to ſeparation from the Church, be brought into debate. If there be a juſt and neceſſary cauſe for ſeparation, it muſt needs be juſt and neceſſary; therefore the cauſe muſt be the ground of reſolving the nature of the Action. Schiſm then is a ſeparation from any Church upon any ſlight, trivial, unneceſſary cauſe; but if the cauſe be great and important, a departure it may be, Schiſm it cannot be. They who define Schiſm to be a voluntary ſeparation from the Church of God; if by voluntary they mean that where the will is the cauſe of it, the definition ſtands good and true; for that muſt needs be groundleſs and unneceſſary as to the Church it ſelf: but if by voluntary be meant a ſpontaneous departing from communion with a Church, which was cauſed by the corruptions of that Church, then a ſeparation may be ſo voluntary, and yet no Schiſm: for though it be voluntary, as to the act of departing, yet that is only conſequentially, ſuppoſing a cauſe ſufficient to take ſuch a reſolution; but what is voluntary antecedently, that it hath no other Motive but faction and humour, that is properly Schiſm, and ought ſo to be looked upon. But in our preſent caſe, three things are ſuppoſed as the cauſes and motives to ſuch a forſaking communion. Firſt, Corruption in Doctrine; the main ligature of a religious ſociety is the conſent of it in doctrine with the rule of religion, the word of God. Therefore any thing which tends to ſubvert and overthrow the foundation of the gathering ſuch a ſociety (which is the profeſſion and practice of the true religion) yield ſufficient ground to withdraw from communion with thoſe who profeſs and maintain it. Not that every ſmall error is a juſt ground of ſeparation, for then there would be no end of ſeparation, and men muſt ſeparate from one another, till knowledge comes to its perfection, fection, which will only be in glory; but any thing which either directly or conſequentially doth deſtroy any fundamental article of Chriſtian faith. Which may be as well done by adding to fundamental articles, as by plain denying them. And my reaſon is this: becauſe the very ratio of a fundamental article doth imply, not only its neceſſity to be believed and practiſed (and the former in reference to the latter; for things are therefore neceſſary to be known, becauſe neceſſary to be done, and not è contrà) but likewiſe its ſufficiency as to the end for which it is called fundamental. So that the articles of faith called fundamental, are not only ſuch as are neceſſary to be believed, but if they be, are ſufficient for ſalvation to all that do believe them. Now he that adds any thing to be believed or done as fundamental, that is, neceſſary to ſalvation, doth thereby deſtroy the ſufficiency of thoſe former articles in order to ſalvation; for if they were ſufficient, how can new ones be neceſſary. The caſe will be clear by an inſtance. We aſſert the ſatisfaction of Chriſt for ſinners to be a fundamental article, and thereby do imply the ſufficiency of the belief of that in order to ſalvation; now if a Pope or any other command me to believe the meritoriouſneſs of good works with the ſatisfaction of Chriſt as neceſſary to ſalvation, by adding this, he deſtroys the former as a fundamental article: for if Chriſt's ſatisfaction be ſufficient, how can good works be meritorious? and if this latter be neceſſary, the other was not; for if it were, what need this be added: Which is a thing the Papiſts with their new Creed of Pius the fourth would do well to conſider: and others too, who ſo confidently aſſert that none of their errors touch the foundation of faith. Where there is now ſuch corruption in doctrine ſuppoſed in a Church, withdrawing and ſeparation from ſuch a Church is as neceſſary as the avoiding of her errors, and not partaking of her ſins is. Thence we read in Scripture, of rejecting ſuch as are hereticks, and withdrawing from their ſociety, which will as well hold, as to Churches as Perſons, and ſo much the more, as the corruption is more dangerous, and the relation nearer of a member to a Church, than of one man to another: And from the reaſon of that command, we read in Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, that when Eulalius, Euphronius, and Placentius were conſtituted Biſhops of Antioch, being Arians, many both of the Clergy and people, who reſolved to adhere to the true faith, withdrew from the publick meetings, and had private Aſſemblies of their own. And after, when Leontius was made Biſhop of Antioch, who favour'd the Arians, Flavianus and Diodorus, not only publickly reproved him for deſerting the Orthodox faith, but withdrew the people from communion with him, and undertook the charge of them themſelves: So when Fœlix was made Biſhop of Rome, none of the Church of Rome would enter into the Church while he was there. And Vincentius Lirinenſis tells us a remarkable ſtory of Photinus Biſhop of Sirmium in Pannonia, a man of great abilities and fame, who ſuddenly turned from the true faith, and though his people both loved and admired him, yet when they diſcerned his errors, Quem antea quaſi arietem gregis ſequebantur, eundem deinceps veluti lupum fugere cœperunt. Whom they followed before as the leader of the flock, they now run away from as a devouring Wolf. This is the firſt thing which makes ſeparation, and withdrawment of communion, lawful and neceſſary, viz. corruption of doctrine. The ſecond is Corruption of practice: I ſpeak not of practice, as relating to the civil converſation of men, but as it takes in the Agenda of Religion. When idolatrous cuſtoms, and ſuperſtitious practice are not only crept

into a Church, but are the preſcribed devotion of it: Such as the adoration of the Euchariſt (chiefly inſiſted on by Mr. Daillé in his Apology, as a cauſe of ſeparation from the Church of Rome) invocation of Saints and Angels, worſhipping images, and others of a like nature, uſed among the Papiſts, which are of themſelves ſufficient to make our ſeparation from them neceſſary. But then Thirdly, as an acceſſion to theſe two, is the publick owning and profeſſing them, and requiring them, as neceſſary conditions of communion, from all the members of their Church, which makes our withdrawing from them unavoidably neceſſary, as long as we judge them to be ſuch corruptions as indeed they are. For men not to forſake the belief of errors, ſuppoſing them to be ſuch, is impoſſible; and not to forſake the practice and profeſſion of them upon ſuch belief, were the higheſt hypocriſie: and to do ſo, and not to forſake the communion of that Church where theſe are owned, is apparently contradictious (as Mr. Chillingworth well obſerves) ſeeing the condition of communion with it is, that we muſt profeſs to believe all the doctrines of that Church, not only to be errors, but to be certain and neceſſary truths: So that on this account, to believe there are any errors in the Church of Rome, is actually, and ipſo facto, to forſake the communion of that Church; becauſe the condition of its communion is the belief that there are none: And ſo that learned and rational Author there fully proves, that thoſe who require unlawful and unneceſſary conditions of communion, muſt take the imputation of Schiſm upon themſelves, by making ſeparation from them juſt and neceſſary. In this caſe, when corruptions in opinion or practice are thus required, as conditions of communion, it is impoſſible for one to communicate with ſuch a Church without ſin; both materially, as the things are unlawful which he joyns with them in; and formally, as he judgeth them ſo. This is the firſt Propoſition.

The ſecond is, Where a Church retains the purity of doctrine in its publick profeſſion, but hath a mixture of ſome corruptions, as to practice, which are only tolerated and not impoſed, it is not lawful to withdraw communion from ſuch a Church, much leſs to run into total ſeparation from it: For here is no juſt and lawful cauſe given of withdrawing; here is no owned corruption of doctrine or practice, nor any thing required as a condition of communion, but what is in its ſelf neceſſary; and therefore there can be no plea, but only pollution, from ſuch a communion, which cannot be to any who do not own any ſuch ſuppoſed corruptions in the Church. Men may communicate with a Church, and not communicate with the abuſes of a Church; for the ground of his communicating is, its being a Church, and not a corrupt or defective Church. And that men are not themſelves guilty, by partaking with thoſe who are guilty of corruptions in a Church, might be eaſily and largely proved, both from the Church of the Jews in the caſe of Eli's ſons, and the Chriſtian Churches of Aſia, and Corinth, where we read of many corruptions reproved, yet nothing ſpoken of the duty of the members of thoſe Churches to ſeparate from them, which would have been, had it been a ſin to communicate with thoſe Churches when ſuch corruptions were in it. Beſides, what reaſon is there that one mans ſins ſhould defile another, more than anothers graces ſanctifie another? and why corruption in another ſhould defile him more than in himſelf, and ſo keep him from communicating with himſelf? and what ſecurity any one can have in the moſt refined Churches, but that there is ſome ſcandalous, or at leaſt unworthy perſon among them? and whether then it is not his duty to try and examine all himſelf particularly, with whom he communicates? and why his preſence at one Ordinance ſhould defile it more than at another? and why at any more than in worldly converſe, and ſo turn at laſt to make men Anchorets, as it hath done ſome? Many other reaſons might be produced againſt this, which I forbear, it being fully ſpoke to by others. And ſo I come to the Third Propoſition, which is,

See Mr. Durham's Tract of ſcandal, part. 2. ch. 12.

Where any Church, retaining purity of doctrine, doth require the owning of, and conforming to any unlawful or ſuſpected practice, men may lawfully deny conformity to, and communion with that Church in ſuch things, without incurring the guilt of Schiſm. I ſay not: Men may proceed to poſitive Schiſm as it is call'd, that is, erecting of new Churches, which from Cyprian is call'd erigere Altare contra Altare; but only that withdrawing communion from a Chruch in unlawful or ſuſpected things, doth not lay men under the guilt of Schiſm: which becauſe I know it may meet with ſome oppoſition from thoſe men, who will ſooner call men Schiſmaticks than prove them ſo, I ſhall offer this reaſon for it to conſideration. If our ſeparation from the Church of Rome was therefore lawful, becauſe ſhe required unlawful things, as conditions of her communion; then where-ever ſuch things are required by any Church, non-communion with that Church in thoſe things will be lawful too; and where non-communion is lawful, there can be no Schiſm in it. Whatever difference will be thought of, as to the things impoſed by the Church of Rome and others, will be ſoon anſwered by the proportionable difference between bare non-conformity, and total and poſitive ſeparation. What was in its ſelf lawful and neceſſary then, how comes it to be unlawful and unneceſſary now? Did that juſtifie our withdrawing from them, becauſe they required things unlawful, as conditions of communion; and will not the ſame juſtifie other mens non-conformity, in things ſuppoſed by them unlawful? If it be ſaid here, that the Pope's power was an uſurpation, which is not in lawful Governours of Churches; it is ſoon replyed, That the Pope's uſurpation mainly lies in impoſing things upon mens conſciences as neceſſary, which are doubtful, or unlawful; and where-ever the ſame thing is done, there is an uſurpation of the ſame nature, though not in ſo high a degree; and it may be as lawful to withdraw communion from one as well as the other. If it be ſaid that men are bound to be ruled by their Goverours, in determining what things are lawful, and what not? To this it is anſwered: firſt, no true Proteſtant can ſwear blind obedience to Church Governours in all things. It is the higheſt uſurpation to rob men of the liberty of their judgments: That which we plead for againſt the Papiſts, is, that all men have eyes in their heads as well as the Pope; that every one hath a judicium privatæ diſcretionis, which is the rule of practice, as to himſelf; and though we freely allow a miniſterial power, under Chriſt, in the Governours of the Church, yet that extends not to an obligation upon men, to go againſt the dictates of their own reaſon and conſcience. Their power is only directive and declarative, and in matters of duty can bind no more than reaſon and evidence brought from Scripture by them doth. A man hath not the power over his own underſtanding, much leſs can others have it. Nullus credit aliquid eſſe verum, quia vult credere id eſſe verum; non eſt enim in poteſtate hominis facere aliquid

quid apparere intellectui ſuo verum quando voluerit. Either therefore men are bound to obey Church Governours in all things abſolutely, without any reſtriction or limitation; (which if it be not uſurpation and dominion over others faith in them, and the worſt of implicite faith in others, it is hard to define what either of them is,) or elſe if they be bound to obey only in lawful things; I then enquire who muſt be judge what things are lawful in this caſe, what not? if the Governours ſtill, then the power will be abſolute again; for to be ſure, whatever they command, they will ſay is lawful, either in it ſelf, or as they command it: if every private perſon muſt judge what is lawful, and what not, which is commanded (as when all is ſaid, every man will be his own judge in this caſe, in things concerning his own welfare) then he is no farther bound to obey than he judgeth the thing to be lawful which is commanded. The plea of an erroneous conſcience, takes not off the obligation to follow the dictates of it; for as he is bound to lay it down, ſuppoſing it erroneous, ſo he is bound not to go againſt it, while it is not laid down. But then again, if men are bound to ſubmit to Governours in the determination of lawful things, what plea could our Reformers have to withdraw themſelves from the Pope's yoke? it might have ſtill held true, Boves arabant & Aſinæ paſcebantur ſimul, which is Job 1. 14. Aquinas his argument for the ſubmiſſion of inferiours in the Church to Summ. 2.2. q. 2. art. 6. their ſuperiours: for did not the Pope plead to be a lawful Governour, and if men are bound to ſubmit to the determination of Church Governours, as to the lawfulneſs of things, they were bound to believe him in that as well as other things; and ſo ſeparation from that Church was unlawful then: So that let men turn and wind themſelves which way they will, by the very ſame arguments that any will prove ſeparation from the Church of Rome lawful, becauſe ſhe required unlawful things, as conditions of her communion, it will be proved lawful, not to conform to any ſuſpected or unlawful practice, required by any Church Governours upon the ſame terms; if the thing ſo required, be after ſerious and ſober enquiry, judged unwarrantable by a man's own conſcience. And withal it would be farther conſidered, whether when our beſt Writers againſt the Papiſts, do lay the imputation of Schiſm, not on thoſe who withdraw communion, but on them for requiring ſuch conditions of communion (whereby they did rather eject men out of their communion, than the others ſeparate from them) they do not by the ſame arguments, lay the imputation of Schiſm on all who require ſuch conditions of communion, and take it wholly off from thoſe who refuſe to conform for conſcience ſake. To this I ſhall ſubjoin the judgment of as a learned and judicious a Divine, as moſt our Nation hath bred, in his excellent (though little) Tract concerning Schiſm. "In thoſe Schiſms, ſaith he, which concern fact, nothing can be a juſt Mr. Hales of Schiſm, p. 8. "cauſe of refuſing communion, but only to require the execution of "ſome unlawful or ſuſpected act; for not only in reaſon, but in religion "too, that Maxim admits of no releaſe, cautiſſimi cujuſque præceptum "quod dubitas nè feceris. And after inſtanceth in the Schiſm about "image-worſhip, determin'd by the ſecond Council of Nice, in which "he pronounceth the Schiſmatical party to be the Synod it ſelf, and "that on theſe grounds: Firſt, becauſe it is acknowledged by all, that "it is a thing unneceſſary. Secondly, it is by moſt ſuſpected. Thirdly, it is by many held utterly unlawful: Can then (ſaith he) the "enjoining of ſuch a thing be ought elſe but abuſe? or can the refu-

" ſal of communion here, be thought any other thing than duty? Here, " or upon the like occaſion, to ſeparate, may peradventure bring per- " ſonal trouble or danger (againſt which it concerns any honeſt man to " have pectus præparatum) farther harm it cannot do, ſo that in theſe " caſes you cannot be to ſeek what to think, or what you have to do. " and afterwards propounds it as a remedy to prevent Schiſm, to have " all Liturgies and publick forms of ſervice ſo framed, as that they ad- " mit not of particular and private fancies, but contain only ſuch things " in which all Chriſtians do agree. For, ſaith he, conſider of all the " Liturgies that are, and ever have been, and remove from them what- " ever is ſcandalous to any party, and leave nothing but what all agree " on; and the evil ſhall be, that the publick ſervice and honour of " God ſhall no ways ſuffer: Whereas, to load our publick forms, with " the private fancies upon which we differ, is the moſt ſovereign way " to perpetuate Schiſm unto the World's end. Prayer, Confeſſion, " Thankſgiving, reading of Scriptures in the plaineſt and ſimpleſt man- " ner, were matter enough to furniſh out a ſufficient Liturgy, though " nothing either of private opinion, or of Church Pomp, of Garments " or preſcribed geſtures, of Imagery, of Muſick, of matter concerning " the dead, of many ſuperfluities, which creep into the Church, under " the name of Order and Decency, did interpoſe it ſelf. To charge " Churches and Liturgies with things unneceſſary, was the firſt begin- " ning of all ſuperſtition; and when ſcruple of conſcience began to be " made, or pretended; there Schiſm began to break in; if the ſpecial " guides and Fathers of the Church, would be a little ſparing of in- " cumbring Churches with ſuperfluities, or not over rigid, either in re- " viving obſolete cuſtoms, or impoſing new, there would be far leſs " cauſe of Schiſm or Superſtition; and all the inconvenience were like- " ly to enſue, would be but this, they ſhould in ſo doing yield a little " to the imbecillity of their inferiors, a thing which St. Paul would " never have refuſed to do: mean while, whereſoever falſe or ſuſpected " opinions are made a piece of Church Liturgy, he that ſeparates is " not the Schiſmatick; for it is alike unlawful, to make profeſſion of " known or ſuſpected falſhood, as to put in practice unlawful or ſuſpe- " cted actions. Thus far that excellent perſon, whoſe words I have taken the pains to tranſcribe, becauſe of that great wiſdom, judgment, and moderation, contained in them; and the ſeaſonableneſs of his counſel and advice, to the preſent poſture of affairs among us. Were we ſo happy but to take off things granted unneceſſary by all, and ſuſpected by many, and judged unlawful by ſome; and to make nothing the bonds of our communion, but what Chriſt hath done, viz. one faith, one baptiſm, &c. allowiug a liberty for matters of indifferency, and bearing with the weakneſs of thoſe who cannot bear things which others account lawful, we might indeed be reſtored to a true Primitive luſtre far ſooner, than by furbiſhing up ſome antiquated ceremonies, which can derive their pedigree no higher, than from ſome ancient cuſtom and tradition. God will one day convince men, that the Union of the Church lies more in the Unity of faith and affection, than in uniformity of doubtful rites and ceremonies. The bond of Church-communion ſhould be ſomething common to ſtrong and weak Chriſtians, as St. Auſtin ſaith of the rule of faith, that it is puſillis magniſque communis; and certainly the Primitive Church, that did not charge mens faith with ſuch a load of articles, as now in theſe latter ages men are charged charged with, would much leſs burden men with impoſing doubtful practices upon them, as the ground of Church-communion. And for publick forms of Divine ſervice, ſuch of all things certainly ſhould be ſo compoſed, as to be the leaſt ſubject to any ſcruple from any perſons whatſoever; being on purpoſe compoſed for the declaring mens unity and conſent in their publick worſhip: And thoſe who are the moſt addicted to any one form, can never plead it unlawful to amend it, whereas others may, that it is not lawful or convenient, at leaſt to uſe it without ſuch alterations. And therefore, were there that ſpirit of mutual condeſcenſion, which was moſt certainly in Eccleſiâ primo primitivâ, as Gratian ſomewhere ſpeaks, in the firſt and truly primitive Church in the Apoſtles time; our breaches as to this thing too, might ſoon be cloſed up, and the voice of Schiſm be heard among us no more. It argued very much the prudence and temper of the French Churches, in compoſing their publick forms of prayer, that they were ſo far from inſerting any thing controverſial into them, that Amyraldus tells us, the Papiſts themſelves would uſe them. Et quod vix credibile eſſet niſi publicè viſeretur, eas inſeruerunt in eos libros in quos congeſſerunt varias precationum formulas. And that which men would ſcarce believe unleſs they ſaw it, they inſerted them into their own prayer-books. The ſame temper was uſed by our Reformers in the compoſing our Liturgy, in reference to the Papiſts, to whom they had then an eſpecial eye, as being the only party then appearing, whom they deſired to draw into their communion, by coming as near them as they well and ſafely could: And certainly thoſe holy men, who did ſeek by any means to draw in others, at ſuch a diſtance from their principles as the Papiſts were, did never intend by what they did for that end, to exclude any truly tender conſciences from their communion. That which they laid as a bait for them, was never intended by them as a hook for thoſe of their own profeſſion. But the ſame or greater reaſon which made them ſeek ſo much at that time (before the rent between the Papiſt and us was grown to that height it is now at; they being then in hopes by a fair complyance to have brought the whole Kingdom to join with them) I ſay the ſame reaſon which at that time made them yield ſo far to them then, would now have perſuaded them to alter and lay aſide thoſe things which yield matter of offence, to any of the ſame profeſſion with themſelves now. For ſurely none will be ſo uncharitable towards thoſe of his own profeſſion, as not to think there is as much reaſon to yield in compliance with them, as with the Papiſts. And it cannot but be looked upon as a token of God's ſevere diſpleaſure againſt us, if any, though unreaſonable propoſals of peace between us and the Papiſts ſhould meet with ſuch entertainment among many; and yet any fair offers of union and accommodation among our ſelves, be ſo coldly embraced and entertained.

Having thus far ſhewed how far the obligation to keep in a Church ſociety doth reach to the ſeveral members of it: I now proceed to ſhew what way the light of nature directs men to for the quieting and compoſing any differences which may ariſe in ſuch a ſociety tending to break the peace of it. But before I come to the particular ways directed to, by the Law of nature, for ending Controverſies in the Church, I ſhall lay down ſome things by way of caution, for the right underſtanding of what is already ſpoken, leſt I ſhould be thought inſtead of pleading for peace, to leave a door open for an univerſal liberty, and ſo pave a new cauſeway towards Babel. Firſt, that though it be law-

ſul not to conform to unlawful or ſuſpected practices in a Church, yet it is not therefore lawful to erect new Churches. For all other eſſentials ſuppoſed in a Church, a mere requiring conformity in ſome ſuſpected rites, doth not make it to be no true or ſound Church, as to other things, from which it is lawful to make a total divorce and ſeparation. A total ſeparation is when a new and diſtinct ſociety for worſhip is entred into, under diſtinct and peculiar officers governing by Laws and Church-rules different from that form which they ſeperate from. This I do not aſſert to be therefore lawful, becauſe ſome things are required, which mens conſciences aae unſatisfied in: unleſs others proceed to eject and caſt them wholly out of communion on that account, in which caſe their ſeparation is neceſſary, and their ſchiſm unavoidable. Secondly, therefore I aſſert, that as to things in the judgment of the Primitive and Reformed Churches left undetermined by the Law of God, and in matters of mere order and decency, and wholly as to the form of Government, every one notwithſtanding what his private judgment may be of them, is bound for the peace of the Church of God to ſubmit to the determination of the lawful Governours of the Church. And this is that power of ending controverſies which I ſuppoſe to be lodged in a Church ſociety; not ſuch a one as whereto every man is bound to conform his private judgment, but whereto every private perſon is bound to ſubmit in order to the Churches peace. That is, that in any controverſies ariſing in a Church, there is ſuch a power ſuppoſed, that may give ſuch an authoritative deciſion of the controverſie in which both parties are bound to acquieſce, ſo as to act nothing contrary to that deciſion. For as it is ſuppoſed that in all contracts and agreements for mutual ſociety, men are content to part with their own liberties for the good of the whole; ſo likewiſe to part with the authority of their own judgments, and to ſubmit to the determination of things by the rulers of the ſociety conſtituted by them. For there muſt be a difference made between the liberty and freedom of a man's own judgment, and the authority of it: for ſuppoſing men out of all ſociety, every man hath both; but ſocieties being entred, and contracts made, though men can never part with the freedom of their judgments, (men not having a Deſpotical power over their own underſtandings) yet they muſt part with the authority of their judgments, i.e. in matters concerning the Government of the ſociety, they muſt be ruled by perſons in authority over them. Elſe there can be nothing imagined but confuſion, and diſorder, inſtead of peace and unity in every civil ſtate and ſociety. The caſe is the ſame in a religious ſociety too, in which men muſt be ſuppoſed to part with the authority of their own judgments in matters concerning the Government of the Church, and to ſubmit to what is conſtituted and appointed by thoſe who are intruſted with the care and welfare of it. Elſe it is impoſſible there ſhould be unity and peace in a Church conſidered as a ſociety; which is as much as to ſay, there neither is, nor can be ſuch a ſociety. And that God hath commanded that which is naturally impoſſible; I mean, freedom from diviſions, and the unity and peace of his Church: Which will appear from hence, becauſe it can never be expected that all men ſhould be exactly of one mind, Either then men retaining their private apprehenſions, are bound to acquieſce in what is publickly determined, or there is a neceſſity of perpetual confuſions in the Church of God. For the main inlet of all diſturbances and diviſions in the Church, is from hence, that men conſider themſelves abſolutely, and not as members of a governed ſociety, and ſo that they may follow their own private judgments, and are bound ſo to do in matters belonging to the Government of the Church, and not to acquieſce for the Churches peace in what is eſtabliſhed in order to the ruling of this ſo conſtituted ſociety, by lawful authority.

§. 8. Theſe things premiſed, the way is now fully cleared for the diſcovering what ways are preſcribed by the Light of Nature for ending controverſies in the Church; which will appear to be theſe two.

1. In ſocieties wherein perſons act with an equality of power, for the ending differences ariſing, the leſs number muſt always acquieſce in the determination of the greater. And therefore it is a generally received Axiome, that in all ſocieties pars major jus habet univerſitatis, the greater part hath the power of the whole: And it is a ſtanding rule in the Civil Law, refertur ad univerſos quod publicè fit per majorem partem, which is determined by the Lawyers to hold not of the perſons in power, but of the perſons preſent at the determination; as when Alexander Severus made fourteen of the Viri Conſulares to be Curatores Urbis joyned with the Præfectus Urbis, to determine caſes brought before them, what was determined by the greater part of thoſe preſent, was looked upon as binding, as if the whole number had been there. And this Ariſtotle lays down as one of the fundamental laws of a Democratical Government. ὅ, τι ἂν δόξη τοῖς πλείοσι, τοῦτ' εἶναι τὸ τέλος καὶ τοῦτ' εἶναι τὸ δίκαιον. That muſt be looked on as a juſt and final deciſion of a caſe debated, which the major part determines. And therefore rationally infers, that in a Democracy the poorer ſort (and ſo likewiſe the worſe) muſt always bear the greateſt ſway, becauſe they are the moſt. Which is an unavoidable inconvenience in that form of Government whether in Church or State. The ſame he elſewhere applies to other forms of Government which have a multitude of rulers, as Ariſtocracy and Oligarchy: That which ſeems good to the moſt obtains as a Law amongſt all, Which Appian thus briefly expreſſeth, τὸ πλεῖον δικαιότερον· and Dinoyſ. Halicarnaſſeus ὅ, τι ἂν δόξη τοῖς πλείοσι, τοῦτο νικᾶν, the one ſpeaking of matter of fact, that it doth obtain, the other of matter of Law that it ſhould do ſo. It appears then from the Law and light of Nature, that wherever any multitude acts in an equality of power, the greater part have the power of the whole; not from any right which the major part hath as ſuperior over the leſs; but from the Law of Nature, which will have every part ordered for the good of the whole; which good cannot oft times be obtained without a ſpecial determination on one ſide or other; nor that determination have its effect, if the Act of the major part may be reſcinded by the leſs. So that in every thing requiring ſpecial determination, this is to be eſteemed the moſt juſt and final deciſion which is done by the major part: For it would be manifeſtly unjuſt for the leſſer part to determine the greater, and therefore by the Law of Nature, the greater part hath the right of the whole.

2. In a ſociety conſiſting of many particular companies or congregations, there muſt be a ſubordination of powers by the Law of Nature, which grants a right of appeal to an injured perſon from the lower and ſubordinate power to the higher and ſuperior. Appealing is defined by the Lawyers to be Provocatio iniquæ ſententiæ querelam continens. An addreſs to a higher power with complaint of wrong: and ſo in general it is defined by Ulpian to be ab inferioris Judicis ſententiâ ad ſuperiorem provocatio: but as Hottoman obſerves, appeals may ſometimes be made to a co-ordinate

co-ordinate power upon complaint of injuſtice done. As one Prætor, Conſul, Tribune might be appealed to, from the ſentence of another. The original of appeals then is, that injuries may be redreſſed, and in order to that, nature dictates that there ought to be a ſubordination of powers one to another, leſt any injury done through corruption or ignorance of the immediate Judges, prove irremediable. To which purpoſe our learned Whitaker ſaith, that Appeals are juris divini & naturalis, & in omni ſocietate admodum neceſſariæ; propter multorum judicum vel iniquitatem, vel ignorantiam; alioqui actum eſſet de innocente, ſi non liceret ab iniqua ſententia appellare: So that appeals are founded upon natural right, leſt men ſhould be injured in any determination of a caſe, by thoſe who have the cognizance of it. And in order to a redreſs of wrongs, and ending controverſies, nature tells us that Appeals muſt not be infinite, but there muſt be ſome power, from whence Appeals muſt not be made: What that ſhould be, muſt be determined in the ſame manner that it is in Civils; not that every controverſie in the Church muſt be determined by an Œcumenical Council, but that it is in the power of the ſupreme Magiſtrate, as Supreme head in cauſes Eccleſiaſtical, to limit and fix this ſubordination, and determine how far it ſhall go, and no farther. The determination being in order to the peace of the Church, which Chriſtian Magiſtrates are bound to look after, and ſee that cauſes hang not perpetually without deciſion: And ſo we find the Chriſtian Emperours conſtituting to whom Appeals ſhould be made, and where they ſhould be fixed, as Juſtinian and Theodoſius did. For when the Church is incorporated into the Commonwealth, the chief authority in a Commonwealth as Chriſtian, belongs to the ſame to which it doth as a Commonwealth: But of that already. It is then againſt the Law and Light of Nature, and the natural right of every man, for any particular company of men, calling themſelves a Church, to engroſs all Eccleſiaſtical power ſo into their hands, that no liberty of Appeals for redreſs can be made from it. Which (to ſpeak within compaſs) is a very high uſurpation made upon the Civil and Religious Rights of Chriſtians; becauſe it leaves men under a cauſeleſs cenſure, without any authoritative vindication of them from it. As for that way of elective Synods, ſubſtitued in the place of authoritative power to determine controverſies, it is a σοφὸν φάρμακον, which will never be ſoveraign enough to cure the diſtemper it is brought for: For elective Synods are but like that which the Lawyers call arbitrium boni viri, which they diſtinguiſh from arbitrium ex compromiſſo, and binds no farther than the party concerned doth judge the ſentence equal and juſt. So that this helps us with no way to end controverſies in the Church, any farther than the perſons engaged are willing to account that juſt which ſhall be judged in their caſe. Taking then a coercive power, only for ſuch a one as may authoritatively decide a controverſie, we ſee what great reaſon there is for what the Hiſtorian obſerves: Arbitriis ii ſe debent interponere, qui non parentem coercere poſſunt; That all power of arbitration ſhould have ſome juridical power going along with it, to make a final end of quarrels. But that which ſeems yet more ſtrange to me, is this, that by thoſe who aſſert the Independency of particular Congregations, it is ſo hotly pleaded, that Chriſt hath given every particular Congregation a power over its own members, to determine controverſies ariſing between them: but, that if one, or many of theſe particular Congregations ſhould err, or break break the rule, he hath left no power authoritatively to decide what ſhould be done in ſuch caſes. Can we conceive that Chriſt ſhould provide more for the caſes of particular perſons, than of particular Churches? And that he ſhould give authority for determining one, and not the other? Is there any more coactive power given by any to Synods, or greater officers, than there is by them to particular Churches? which power is only declarative as to the rule, though authoritative as to perſons wherever it is lodged. Is there not more danger to God's people, by the ſcandals of Churches, than perſons? Or did Chriſt's power of governing his people reach to them only as particular congregations? Doth not this too ſtrongly ſavour of the Pars Donati? only the Meridies muſt be rendred a particular Congregational Church, where Chriſt cauſeth his Flock to reſt? But ſuppoſing the Scripture not expreſly to lay down a rule for governing many Churches, are men out-lawed of their natural rights? that ſuppoſing a wrong ſentence paſſed in the Congregation, there is no hopes, way, or means to redreſs his injury, and make his innocency known? Doth this look like an inſtitution of Chriſt? But that which I conceive is the πρῶτον ψεῦδος, and the original of this miſtake, is, that the Churches we read of firſt planted in Scripture, were only particular Congregations; and therefore there is no proper Church-power beyond them, or above them. I meddle not with the antecedent now, which is largely diſcuſſed by others; but the extream weakneſs of the conſequence, is that I am here obliged to diſcover. For what a ſtrange ſhortneſs of diſcourſe is it to argue thus, if when there was but one Congregation, that Congregation had all power within its ſelf; then when there are more particular Congregations, it muſt be ſo; and yet this is the very foundation of all thoſe Kingdoms of Yvetot, as one calls them, thoſe ſole ſelf-governing Congregations. When there was but one Congregation in a Church, it was neceſſary if it had any Church power, that it muſt be lodged in that one Congregation: But when this Congregation was multiplyed into many more is it not as neceſſary for their mutual government, there ſhould be a common power governing them together, as a joynt-ſociety? Beſides, the firſt Congregational Church in the New Teſtament, viz. that of Jeruſalem, could be no particular organical Church; for it had many, if not all, univerſal officers in it; and if they were the fixed Paſtors of that Church, they could not, according to the principles of thoſe who thus ſpeak, preach to any other Congregation but their own, by vertue of their office: And ſo, either their Apoſtolical office and commiſſion muſt be deſtroyed, if they were Paſtors of particular organical Churches; or if their Apoſtolical office be aſſerted, their Paſtorſhip of particular organical Churches is deſtroyed by their own principles, who aſſert that the Paſtor of a Church can do no Paſtoral office out of his own Congregation. The caſe is the ſame, as to other Churches planted by the Apoſtles and governed by themſelves; which two, as far as I can find in the New Teſtament, were of an equal extent; viz. that all the Churches planted by the Apoſtles, were chiefly governed by themſelves, though they had ſubordinate officers under them. Theſe firſt Churches then were not ſuch particular organized Churches, but they were as the firſt matter of many Congregations to be propagated out of them; which after made one ſociety, conſiſting of thoſe ſeveral Congregations imbodied together, and ruled by one common government. As in a College, every Tutor hath his own pupils, which he rules; and if we ſuppoſe but one Tutor at firſt in the College, with his pupils, all the power, both common to the ſociety, and peculiar to his flock, is joined together; but when there are many more Tutors, having Pupils under their charge, all theſe, for their better ordering as a ſociety, muſt be governed by the common government of the College, to which the particular government of every Tutor is and muſt be ſubordinate: But this will be more fully made appear in the original of Civil government. It is far more evident, that all Civil power lay at firſt in Adam and his family, and afterwards in particular families, than that all Church power lay in particular Congregations at firſt. We may then with as good reaſon ſay, that there is no lawful Civil Government now, but that of particular families; and that no National Government hath any right or power over particular families, becauſe families had once all Civil power within themſelves; as becauſe it is ſuppoſed, that all Church-power lay firſt in particular Congregations, therefore there muſt be no Church power above them; nor that particular Congregations are ſubject to ſuch Government as is requiſite for the regulating of the ſociety in common, as comprehending in it many particular Congregations. Let them ſhew then, how any Government in the State is lawful, when families had the firſt power, and by what right now thoſe families are ſubordinate to the Civil Magiſtrate, and what neceſſity there is for it; and by the very ſame reaſons will we ſhew the lawfulneſs of Government in the Church over many Congregations, and that thoſe are by the ſame right, and upon the ſame neceſſity, to ſubordinate themſelves to the Governours of the Church conſidered as a ſociety taking in many particular Congregations. The Parallel runs on farther and clearer ſtill: For as the heads of the ſeveral families after the Flood, had the command over all dwelling under their roofs, while they remained in one family; and when that increaſed into more, their power was extended over them too; which was the firſt original of Monarchy in the world: So the planters of the firſt Churches, that while the Church was but one Congregation, had power over it, then this Congregation was multiplied into more, their power equally extended over them all. And as afterwards, ſeveral heads of families upon their encreaſe, did conſtitute diſtinct Civil Governments, wherein were ſubordinate officers, but thoſe Governments themſelves were co-ordinate one with another: So in the Church, ſo many Congregations as make up one Provincial, or National ſociety (as ſucceſſion and prudence doth order the bounds of them) do make up ſeveral particular Churches, enjoying their officers ruling them, but ſubordinate to the Governours of the Church in common: Which ſociety, National or Provincial, is ſubordinate to none beyond its ſelf, but enjoys a free power within its ſelf of ordering things for its own Government, as it judgeth moſt convenient, and agreeable to the rules of Scripture. The ſumm then of what I ſay, concerning ſubordination of officers and powers in the ſociety of the Church, is this, that by the light and Law of Nature it appears, that no individual company or Congregation, hath an abſolute, independent power within its ſelf; but that for the redreſſing grievances happening in them, appeals are neceſſary to the parties aggrieved, and a ſubordination of that particular Congregation, to the government of the ſociety in common. So that, the right of appealing, and original of ſubordination, is from Nature; the particular manner and form of ſubordinate and ſuperiour Courts, is to be fetched from poſitive Laws; the limitation of Appeals, extent of juriſdiction, the binding power of ſentence, ſo far as concerns external Unity in the Church, is to be fetched from the power of the Magiſtrate, and civil ſanctions and conſtitutions. The Churches power, as to Divine Law, being only directive and declarative; but being confirmed by a civil ſanction, is juridical and obligatory. Concerning the Magiſtrates power to call, confirm, alter, repeal the decrees of Synods, ſee Grotius, Chamier, Whitaker, Caſaubon, Mornay, and others, who fully and largely handle it; To whom having nothing to add, I will take nothing at all from them: As for that time when the Church was without Magiſtrates ruling in it, in thoſe things left undetermined by the rule of the Word, they acted out of principles of Chriſtian prudence agreeable to the rules of Scripture, and from the principles of the Law of Nature: One of which we come in the next place to ſpeak to. So much for the Churches power, conſidered as a ſociety for ending controverſies ariſing within its ſelf, tending to break the peace and unity of it.

Chap. VII.

The fifth thing dictated by the Law of Nature, That all that are admitted into this ſociety, muſt conſent to be governed by the Laws and Rules of it. Civil ſocieties founded upon mutual conſent; expreſs in the firſt entrance, implicite in others born under ſocieties actually formed. Conſent as to a Church neceſſary, the manner of conſent determined by Chriſt by baptiſm and profeſſion. Implicite conſent ſuppoſed in all baptized, explicite, declared by challenging the privileges, and obſerving the duties of the Covenant. Explicite by expreſs owning the Goſpel when adult, very uſeful for recovering the credit of Chriſtianity. The Diſcipline of the Primitive Church cleared from Origen, Juſtin Martyr, Pliny, Tertullian. The neceſſary requiſites of Church memberſhip, whether poſitive ſigns of grace: Explicite Covenant, how far neceſſary; not the formal conſtitution of a Church, proved by ſeveral arguments.

§. 1. THE Law of Nature dictates, that all who are admitted into this ſociety, muſt conſent to be governed by the Laws and Rules of that ſociety, according to its conſtitution. For none can be looked upon as a member of a ſociety, but ſuch a one as ſubmits to the Rules and Laws of the ſociety, as conſtituted at the time of his entrance into it. That all civil ſocieties are founded upon voluntary conſent and agreement of parties, and do depend upon contracts and Covenants made between them, is evident to any that conſider that men are not bound by the Law of Nature to aſſociate themſelves with any but whom they ſhall judge fit; that dominion and propriety was introduced by free conſent of men: and ſo there muſt be Laws and Bonds fit, agreement made, and ſubmiſſion acknowledged to thoſe Laws; elſe men might plead their natural right and freedom ſtill, which would be deſtructive to the very nature of thoſe ſocieties. When men then did firſt part with their natural liberties, two things were neceſſary in the moſt expreſs terms to be declared; firſt a free and voluntary conſent to part with ſo much of their natural rights as was not conſiſtent with the well being of the ſociety: Secondly, a free ſubmiſſion to all Laws, which ſhould be agreed upon at their entrance into ſociety, or afterwards as they ſee cauſe. But when ſocieties were already entred, and children born under them, no ſuch expreſs conſent was required in them, being bound by vertue of the protection, they find from authority to ſubmit to it, and an implicite conſent is ſuppoſed in all ſuch as are born under that authority. But for their more full underſtanding of this obligation of theirs, and to lay the greater tye of obedience upon them, when they come to underſtanding, it hath been conceived very requiſite by moſt States to have an explicite declaration of their conſent, either by ſome formal oath of allegiance, or ſome other way ſufficiently expreſſing their fidelity, in ſtanding to the Covenants long ſince ſuppoſed to be made. To apply this now to the Church.

We have all along hitherto conſidered the Church in general, as a ſociety or corporation which was neceſſary in order to our diſcovering what is in it from the Light of Nature without poſitive Laws.

§. 2. Hiſt. Council of Trent. l.7. p.612. But here we muſt take notice of what was obſerved by Father Laynez the Jeſuit at the Council of Trent, That it is not with the Church as with other ſocieties, which are firſt themſelves, and then conſtitute the Governours. But the Governour of this ſociety was firſt himſelf, and he appointed what Orders, Rules, and Laws ſhould govern this ſociety; and wherein he hath determined any thing, we are bound to look upon that, as neceſſary to the maintaining of that ſociety which is built upon his conſtitution of it. And in many of thoſe orders which Chriſt hath ſetled in his Church; the foundation of them is in the Law of Nature, but the particular determination of the manner of them is from himſelf. Thus it is in the caſe we now are upon; nature requires that every one entring into a ſociety, ſhould conſent to the rules of it. Our Saviour hath determined how this conſent ſhould be expreſſed, viz. by receiving Baptiſm from thoſe who have the power to diſpenſe it; which is the fœderal rite whereby our conſent is expreſſed to own all the Laws and ſubmit to them, whereby this ſociety is governed: which at the firſt entring of men into this ſociety of the Church was requiſite to be done by the expreſs and explicite conſent of the parties themſelves, being of ſufficient capacity to declare it; but the Covenant being once entred into by themſelves, not only in their own name, but in the name of their poſterity (a thing implied in all Covenants wherein benefits do redound to poſterity, that the obligation ſhould reach unto them too, but more particular in this, it having been always the tenour of God's Covenants with men, to enter the ſeed as well as the perſons themſelves, as to outward privileges) an implicite conſent as to the children in Covenant, is ſufficient to enter them upon the privileges of it by baptiſm, although withal it be highly rational for their better underſtanding the ingagement they entred into, that when they came to age they ſhould explicitely declare their own voluntary conſent to ſubmit to the Laws of Chriſt, and to conform their lives to the profeſſion of Chriſtianity; which might be a more than probable way, and certainly moſt agreeable both to reaſon and Scripture to advance the credit of Chriſtianity once more in the world, which at this day ſo much ſuffers by ſo many profeſſing it without underſtanding the terms of it; who ſwallow down a profeſſion of Chriſtianity, as boys do pills, without knowing what it is compounded of, which is the great reaſon it works ſo little alteration upon their ſpirits.

The one great cauſe of the great flouriſhing of religion in the Primitive times, was certainly the ſtrictneſs uſed by them in their admiſſion of members into Church ſocieties, which is fully deſcribed by Origen againſt Celſus, who tells us they did φιλοπευστεῖν τοὺς βίους καὶ τὰς ἀγωγὰς τῶν προσιόντων, inquire into their lives and carriages, to diſcern their ſeriouſneſs in their profeſſion of Chriſtianity during their being Catechumeni: Who after tells us they did require τὸ κεκαθάρθαι ὑπὸ τοῦ λόγου, καὶ ὅση δύναμις βέλτιον βεβιωκέναι, true repentance and reformation of life, τὸ τηνικάδε καλοῦμεν αὐτοὺς ἐπὶ τὰς παρ' ἡμῖν τελετάς, then we admit them to the participation of our myſteries. I confeſs the Diſcipline of the Primitive Church hath been very much miſrepreſented to us, by mens looking upon it through the glaſs of the modern practices and cuſtoms obtaining among us: as though all this only concerned the admiſſion to the Lord's Supper; though that was always in chiefeſt veneration in the Church of God, as being the chief of Goſpel myſteries (as they loved to ſpeak) yet I cannot find that any were admitted to all other Ordinances freely with them who were debarred from this: but their admiſſion to one, did include an admiſſion to all: ſo on the contrary, I find none admitted to baptiſm, who were not to the Lord's Supper; and if Catechumeni, preſently after, only confirmation intervening (which will hardly be ever found ſeparate from baptiſm, till the diſtinction of the double Chriſme in vertice & pectore came up, which was about Jerom's time.)

The thing then which the Primitive Church required in admitting perſons adult to baptiſm, and ſo to the Lord's Supper, was a ſerious viſible profeſſion of Chriſtianity, which was looked upon by them as the greateſt evidence of their real conſent to the rules of the Goſpel. For that purpoſe it will be worth our taking notice what is ſet down by Juſtin Martyr, Apolog. 2. ſpeaking of the celebration of the Lord's Supper; καὶ ἡ τροφὴ αὕτη καλεῖται παρ' ἡμῖν εὐχαριστία, ἧς οὐδενὶ ἄλλῳ μεταχεῖν ἐξὸν ἐστὶν ἢ τῷ πιστεύοντι ἀληθῆ εἶναι τὰ δεδιδαγμένα ἐφ' ἡμῶν, καὶ λουσαμένῳ τὸ ὑπὲρ ἀφέσεως ἁμαρτιῶν καὶ εἰς ἀναγέννησιν λουτρὸν, καὶ οὕτως βιοῦντι ὡς ὁ Χριστὸς παρέδωκεν, where we ſee what was required before admiſſion to the Lord's Supper, a profeſſion of faith in the truths of the Goſpel, and anſwerable life to the Goſpel, without which it was not lawful to participate of the Lord's Supper. And farther we ſee by Pliny, that the Chriſtians of thoſe times did make uſe of ſome ſolemn ingagements among themſelves which he calls Sacramenta; they did ſe ſacramento obſtringere, ne furta, ne latrocinia ne adulteria committerent, ne fidem fallerent, &c. and Tertullian reports it out of Pliny, that he found nothing de Sacramentis eorum (as Junius firſt reads it out of M. S. for de ſacris, after him Heraldus, and as it is now read in Rigaltius's Edition) beſides cautelam & ad confederandum diſciplinam, &c. ſcelera prohibentes, which Euſebius calls συνθήκας pacta, Covenants between them; and ſo Mr. Selden interprets the place of Origen in the beginning of his book againſt Celſus, where Celſus begins his charge againſt the Chriſtians, ὡς συνθήκας κρύβδην πρὸς ἀλλήλους ποιουμένων χριστιανῶν παρὰ τὰ νενομισμένα· where he takes συνθήκας not as Gelenius renders it, conventus, but in its proper ſenſe for contracts or covenants that were made by the Chriſtians as by other ſocieties, only permitted, and tolerated by the Commonwealth. And we find by Pliny, that when the hæteriæ were forbidden, he brought the Chriſtian in under the Law; the ground of thoſe ſocieties was only a mutual compact and agreement among the perſons of it: Such as among the Eſſens of the Jews,

And ſo in all other ſocieties which ſubſiſt only from mutual confederation in a Commonwealth. Thus I acknowledge it to be in Chriſtianity, that there muſt be ſuch a ſuppoſed contract or voluntary conſent in the perſons ingaged in ſuch ſocieties. But with this obſervable difference, that although there muſt be a conſent in both, yet the one is wholly free, as to any pre-ingagement or obligation to it, as well as to the act its ſelf; but in religious ſocieties, though the act of conſent be free, yet there is an antecedent obligation upon men, binding them to this voluntary conſent. The want of the underſtanding this difference, is, the very foundation of that opinion men call Eraſtianiſm; for the followers of Eraſtus, when they find that Chriſtians did act ex confederatâ diſciplinâ, they preſently conclude all Church power to lay only in mutual conſent. It is granted Church power doth ſuppoſe conſent, but then all Chriſtians are under an obligation from the nature of Chriſtianity to expreſs this conſent, and to ſubmit to all cenſures legally inflicted. About the betæriæ and ſocieties among the Romans, we may take notice of the Law of twelve Tables. So in the collection of *Lud. §. 5. I confeſs when perſons are entred into a viſible Church-Society by Baptiſm, if they will own that profeſſion they were baptized into, and are not guilty either of plain ignorance of it, or manifeſt ſcandal, and demand as their right the other ordinances of the Goſpel, I ſee not by what power they may be excluded. If we fix not in a ſerious viſible profeſſion as the ground of giving right, but require poſitive evidences of grace in every one to be admitted to ordinances as the only thing giving right, for my part, ſetting aſide the many inconveniencies beſides which attend that in reference to the perſons to be admitted, I ſee not how with a ſafe and good conſcience ordinances can be adminiſtred by any. My reaſon is this. Every one, eſpecially a Miniſter in that caſe ought to proceed upon certain grounds that the perſon admitted hath right to the ordinance to be adminiſtred; but if poſitive ſigns of grace be required, a mans conſcience cannot proceed upon any certainty, without infallible knowledge of anothers ſpiritual ſtate, which I ſuppoſe none will pretend to. My meaning is, that which gives right, muſt be ſomething evident to the perſon admitting into it, if it be his duty to inquire after it; but if only poſitive ſigns of grace be looked on, as giving right, the ground of right can never be ſo evident to another perſon, as to proceed with a good conſcience, i. e. with a full perſuaſion of anothers right to the adminiſtration of any ordinance to him. If it be ſaid, that theſe are required only as tokens of a true viſible profeſſion, and it is that which gives the right; I reply, our knowledge of, and aſſent to the concluſion, can be no ſtronger, nor more certain than to the premiſſes from whence it is inferred; if therefore true profeſſion gives right, and our knowledge of that proceeds upon our knowledge of the work of grace, we are left at the ſame uncertainty we were at before. But if we ſay that an outward profeſſion of the Goſpel (where there is nothing rendring men uncapable of owning it, which is ignorance, nor declaring they do not own it, which is ſcandal) is that which gives a viſible right to the ordinances of the Church as viſible, we have ſomething to fix our ſelves upon, and to bottom a perſuaſion of the right of perſons to ordinances.

Chriſt when he inſtituted Churches, did inſtitute them as viſible ſocieties, that is, to have marks whereby to be known and diſtinguiſhed, as other ſocieties in the world are; now that which puts a difference between this and other ſocieties, is an open profeſſion of Chriſtianity, which profeſſion is looked upon as the outward expreſſion of the internal conſent of the ſoul to the doctrine and laws of the Goſpel. Which outward evidence of conſent, where there is nothing evidently and directly oppugning it, is that which the Church of God in admiſſion of viſible members is to proceed upon. I no where find that ever Chriſt or his Apoſtles in making diſciples, or admitting to Church memberſhip, did exact any more than a profeſſed willingneſs to adhere to the doctrine which they preached; nor that they refuſed any who did declare their deſire to joyn with them. An owning Chriſtianity is all we read of antecedent to admiſſion of Church-members. And if any thing elſe be farther required as neceſſary, we muſt either ſay the word of God is defective in inſtitutions of neceſſity to the Church, which I ſuppoſe the aſſertors of it will not be ſo inconſiſtent to their own principles, as to do; or elſe muſt produce where any thing farther is required by the word of God.

By this we may ſee what to anſwer thoſe who require an explicite Covenant from all members of the Church, as that which gives the form and being to a Church. If they mean only in the firſt conſtitution of a viſible Church, an expreſs owning of the Goſpel Covenant, there is none will deny that to be neceſſary to make one a member of the viſible Church of Chriſt. If they farther mean that there muſt be a real confederation between thoſe who joyn together in Goſpel ordinances in order to their being a Church, I know none will queſtion it that know what it is that makes a ſociety to be ſo; which is ſuch a real confederation with one another: If they mean farther, that though Chriſtians be bound by vertue of their Goſpel Covenant to joyn with ſome Church ſociety, yet not being determined by Scripture to what particular Church they ſhould joyn; therefore for Chriſtians better underſtanding what their mutual duty is to one another; and who that Paſtor is to whom they owe the relation of member, that there ſhould be ſome ſignificant declaration either by words or actions of their willingneſs to joyn with ſuch a particular ſociety in Goſpel ordinances; I ſhall grant this to be neceſſary too. But if beyond this their meaning be, that a formal explicite covenant be abſolutely neceſſary to make any one a member of a Church, I ſee no reaſon for it. For, §. 7.

1. If there may be a real confederation without this; then this is not neceſſary, but there may be a real confederation without this explicite Covenant; as appears in thoſe Churches of Chriſt, both in the Primitive times, and ſince the Reformation, who have never uſed it, which none I ſuppoſe who maintain this opinion will deny to have been true viſible Churches of Chriſt.

2. If the Goſpel Covenant entred into by any, gives a right to Goſpel ordinances by its ſelf, then an explicite Covenant is not that which makes one a member of a Church; but the Goſpel Covenant gives that right to all Goſpel ordinances. If by baptiſm, the perſon baptized have a legal title to all Goſpel ordinances, then, &c. the Minor appears in that they are admitted Church members by baptiſm; and how can any be a member of a Church, and not have right to all ordinances in it, ſuppoſing capacity to receive them? A right once received, continues till it be forfeited, eſpecially when it is ſuch a right as is not limited to any particular privileges, but to all the privileges of that ſociety into which they are entred.

3. The reality of conſent may be ſufficiently manifeſted without an explicite Covenant, as in the joyning with thoſe who are under the ſame profeſſion in the common acts of the ſociety and acceptance of, and ſubmiſſion to the rulers of that ſociety, which implicitely is that Covenant which they would have expreſſed; and actions in this caſe are as declarative and ſignificative as words.

4. If a Church may ceaſe to be a true Church, without explicite diſowning ſuch a Covenant, then it is not explicite Covenanting which makes a Church; but a Church may ceaſe to be a true Church without explicite diſowning it; as in caſe of univerſal corruption, as to word and Sacraments; as in the Church of Rome, that ſtill owns her ſelf for a Church. The ground of the conſequence, is from the parity of reaſon as to contraries.

§. 8. But though I ſee no reaſon at all, why an explicite Covenant ſhould be ſo neceſſary to a Church, that we cannot ſuppoſe a true Church without it; yet I no ways deny the lawfulneſs or expediency, in many caſes, of having a perſonal profeſſion from all baptized in infancy, when they come to age (which we may if we pleaſe, call Confirmation) and the neceſſity of deſiring admiſſion, in order to participation of all Ordinances: which deſire of admiſſion doth neceſſarily imply mens conſenting to the Laws of that ſociety, and walking according to the duties of it; and ſo they are conſequentially and virtually, though not expreſly and formally, bound to all the duties required from them in that relation. When Churches are over-run with looſneſs, ignorance, and prophaneneſs, or when Chriſtians are under perſecution, an external profeſſion of the Goſpel Covenant, and declaring their owning the ſociety they are entred into, and ſubmitting to the Laws of it, may be, if not wholly neceſſary, yet very uſeful and expedient: And indeed, at all times we ſee people underſtand ſo little of their duty or engagements, and are ſo hardly brought under the exerciſe of Goſpel diſcipline, that an open profeſſion of their ſubmiſſion to the rules of the Goſpel, ſeems the moſt likely way to advance the practice, power, and purity of Religion: But of this much is ſpoken by others lately, and therefore I ſuperſede. From all this we ſee, that every ſociety implying a joyning together in ſome common duties, Nature tells us there muſt be a real conſenting together, explicite, or implicite in all perſons, who enter into ſuch a ſociety.

CHAP.

Chap. VIII.

The laſt thing dictated by the Law of Nature, is, that every offender againſt the Laws of the ſociety, muſt give an account of his actions to the Governours of it, and ſubmit to the cenſures inflicted upon him by them. The original of penalties in ſocieties. The nature of them, according to the nature and ends of ſocieties. The penalty of the Church no civil mulct: becauſe its Laws and ends are different from civil ſocieties. The practice of the Druids in excommunication. Among the Jews whether a mere civil or ſacred penalty. The latter proved by ſix arguments. Cherem Col Bo objections anſwered. The original of the miſtake ſhewed. The firſt part concluded.

§. 1. Nature dictates farther, that in a well ordered ſociety, every offender againſt the rules of that ſociety, muſt give an account of his actions to the Governours of that ſociety, and ſubmit to the cenſures of it, according to the judgment of the rulers of it. In all ſocieties ſubſiſting by Laws, men being more ruled by hopes and fears, than by a ſenſe of duty, or love of goodneſs, it is neceſſary for maintaining a ſociety, that there muſt be not only a declaration of what men ought to do, but a ſetting forth the penalties which they muſt undergo upon violation of the Laws whereon the ſociety doth ſubſiſt: And as there muſt be penalties annexed, as the ſanction of the Law, ſo it muſt of neceſſity be implyed in a well ordered ſociety, that every perſon, as he doth promiſe obedience to the Laws, ſo by the ſame obligation he is bound to ſubmit to the penalties upon diſobedience: For whatever Law binds to duty where there is a penalty threatned, doth bind likewiſe to puniſhment upon neglect of duty: for no ſooner is the Law broken, but the offender lies under the penal ſanction of that Law, and is thereby bound to give an account of himſelf and actions, to thoſe Governours who are bound to ſee the Laws obeyed, or offenders puniſhed. Guilt follows immediately upon the breach of the Law, which is nothing elſe but the offenders obligation to puniſhment. From this obligation on the offenders part, ariſeth a new relation between the Governour of the ſociety and the offender. On the Governours part a right to puniſh, vindictive juſtice ſuppoſing offences committed; and on the offenders part, an obligation to undergo what ſhall be inflicted upon him for his offence: Puniſhment being nothing elſe, but malum paſſionis ob malum actionis. There muſt be then theſe things ſuppoſed in any well ordered ſociety; Laws to be governed by, Rulers to ſee the Laws kept, or offenders puniſhed, penalties made known for offenders, ſubmiſſion of the perſons in the ſocieties to the penalties, if they deſerve them. But now of what kind, nature, and degree the penalties muſt be, muſt be reſolved according to the nature, end, and deſign of the conſtitution of the ſociety. If it be a ſociety for preſervation of the rights of bodies, or eſtates, the penalties muſt be either pecuniary or corporal: And the ground is, becauſe the end of legal puniſhment is not properly revenge, but the preſervation of the ſociety, which without puniſhments could not be: A threefold end is therefore aſſigned to puniſhments; the reformation of the offending perſon, the prevention of farther offences in the ſociety of the ſame kind, and the being a terror and example to others; the firſt is called νουθεσία, κόλασις, or παραίνεσις, the ſecond τιμωρία, being for the preſervation of the honour of the Magiſtrate: the third παράδειγμα, when the puniſhment is inflicted upon one, that others ſhould take notice of it; which muſt be always done in a publick manner: So παραδειγματίσαι in Matthew, is oppoſed to λάθρα ἀπολῦσαι.

§. 2. Theſe things being thus in general conſidered, come we now to apply it to the Church conſidered as a ſociety. That it hath peculiar Laws to be governed by, appears by the diſtinct nature, end, and deſign of the conſtitution of it; which is not to preſerve any outward rights, but to maintain and keep up a religious ſociety for the ſervice of God; and therefore the penal ſanctions of theſe Laws cannot properly be any corporal or pecuniary mulct, but ſomewhat anſwerable to the nature of the ſociety. It muſt be then ſomewhat which implies the deprivation of that which is the chiefeſt benefit of that ſociety. The benefits of it are the privileges and honour which men enjoy by thus aſſociating themſelves for ſo high an employment: That puniſhment then muſt be the loſs of thoſe privileges which the Corporation enjoys, which muſt be by excluſion of the offending perſon from communion with the ſociety. Hence we ſee it is evident, that which we call excommunication is the greateſt penalty which the Church, as a ſociety, can inflict upon the members of it, conſidered as ſuch. And hence it is likewiſe clear, that as the ſociety of the Church is diſtinct from others, the Laws, Ends, Governours of a different nature, ſo the puniſhment muſt be a puniſhment diſtinct from civil, and ordained wholly in order to the peculiar ends of this ſociety; which they do not well conſider, who deny any ſuch power as that of excommunication peculiar to the Church, which is as much as to deny that the Laws whereby the Church is ruled, are different from the civil Laws, or the ends of this ſociety from the ends of civil ſocieties: for the puniſhment muſt be proportioned to the Laws, and referred immediately to its proper ends. It were no ways difficult to anſwer the pretences brought againſt this: For although I acknowledge a ſubordination of this religious ſociety to the ſupreme authority in the Commonwealth, and that the rules concerning the Government of the ſociety in common muſt have their ſanction from thence; yet this no ways implies but it may have its peculiar penalties and power to inflict them, any more than any Company of Tradeſmen have not power to exclude any from their Company for breaking the rules of the Company, becauſe they are ſubordinate to the Supreme Authority: or any College to expel any from thence, for breaking the local Statutes of it, which are diſtinct from the common Laws. Nor is it any argument, that becauſe Chriſtians had mutual confederations in times of perſecution for the exerciſe of cenſures, therefore theſe cenſures were only arbitrary and humane; unleſs it be proved, that it was not a duty in them ſo to confederate and join together, nor was there any antecedent obligation to inflict thoſe cenſures upon offenders. Much leſs, thirdly, becauſe their juriſdiction is not civil and coactive, therefore they have none at all; which is as much as to ſay, the Laws of Scripture are not our common Laws, therefore they are none at all.

§. 3. I ſhall not here inſiſt upon the divine right of a power to excommunicate offenders, founded upon the poſitive Laws of Chriſt, it being my only buſineſs now to ſhew what foundation ſuch a power hath in the Law of nature; which we have ſeen doth follow upon the Churches being a diſtinct ſociety ruled by other Laws, acting on other ends, ſubſiſting upon differing grounds from any other ſociety. A farther evidence we have of this, how conſonant it is to the light of nature, from the practice of all ſocieties pretending to be for the worſhip of God, who have looked upon this as the proper penalty of offenders among them, to be excluded out of thoſe ſocieties. Thus we find among the Druids, whoſe great office was to take care of the worſhip of their Gods, and to inſtruct the people in religion, as Cæſar relates, illi rebus divinis interſunt, ſacrificia publica ac privata procurant, religiones interpretantur; and accordingly the puniſhment of diſobedience among them was excommunication from their ſacrifices, which they looked upon as the greateſt puniſhment could be inflicted upon them, as Cæſar at large deſcribes it; Si quis aut privatus aut publicus eorum decreto non ſtetit, ſacrificiis interdicunt: hæc pœna apud eos eſt graviſſima; quibus ita eſt interdictum ii numero impiorum & ſceleratorum habentur, iis omnes decedunt, additum eorum ſermonemque defugiunt, ne quid ex contagione incommodi accipiant, neque iis petentibus jus redditur, neque honos ullus communicatur.

§. 4. The practice of excommunication among the Jews is not queſtioned by any, but the right ground and original of that practice, with the effect and extent of it. Some conceive it to have been only taken up among the Jews after the power of capital puniſhments was taken from them; and that it was uſed by them, wholly upon a civil account, not extending to the excluſion of men from their worſhip in the Temple or Synagogues, but only to be a note of infamy upon offending perſons. This opinion though entertained by perſons of much skill and learning in the Jewiſh Antiquities, yet carries not that evidence with it to gain my aſſent to it. For firſt, the cauſe of excommunication were not ſuch as were expreſſed by their Law to deſerve ſuch civil puniſhments as might have been inflicted by them upon offenders, nor were they generally matters of a civil nature, but matters of offence and ſcandal, as will appear to any that ſhall peruſe the twenty four cauſes of excommunication related out of the Jewiſh Writers by Selden and Joh. Coch. Such were the neglecting the precepts of the Scribes, the vain pronouncing the name of God, bearing witneſs againſt a Jew before Heathen tribunals, doing any common work in the afternoon of the day before the paſſover, with others of a like nature. If Excommunication had been then taken up among them only ex confederatâ diſciplinâ, to ſupply the defect of civil judicatories, at leaſt all capital offenders muſt have lain under the ſenſe of excommunication. But here we read not of any being excommunicated for thoſe, but for other leſſer matters, which were looked upon as matters of ſcandal among them; and though ſome of them were matters of civil injuries, yet it follows not that men were excommunicated for them as ſuch, but for the ſcandal which attended them. As in the Chriſtian Church, men are excommunicated for matters which are puniſhable by the civil Magiſtrate, but not under that notion, but as they are offences to that Chriſtian ſociety which they live among. Secondly, It appears that excommunication was not a meer civil penalty, becauſe the increaſing or abatement of that penalty did depend upon the perſon's repentance and deſire of abſolution. Now civil penalties do not regard the intention and mind of the perſon, but the quality and deſert of the action; the reaſon is, becauſe humane Laws do reſpect immediately actionem ipſam, and not animum agentis, unleſs it be only ſo far far as the mind hath influence upon the action. But now it is otherwiſe in ſuch Laws which take immediate notice of the intention of the mind, and only of outward actions as they are ſignificative and expreſſive of the inward intentions: for in theſe, though the ground of proceeding to penalties be from the notice taken of the outward action, yet that outward action being ſubject to penalty, as expreſſive of the minds intention; where there may be ſufficient evidence given of the integrity and uprightneſs of the intention afterwards, there may be proportionably a relaxation of the penalty; becauſe the end of the penalty inflicted was not to be an act of juſtice excluded from mercy in the end of adminiſtration as in civil judicatories, but an act of juſtice whoſe end was mercy, that is, the regaining and recovering the offenders ſoul from ſin, by inflicting ſuch a penalty upon him, as might humble him under the ſenſe of it. Hence appears the great reaſonableneſs of their proceedings in the managery of diſcipline in the primitive times, who did not fix a certain time as a ſtanding Law for all offenders, but did increaſe, or leſſen both the time and weight of their penance, according to the evidences given of their ſubmiſſion and true repentance for their miſcarriages. That it was thus now in reference to excommunication among the Jews, appears from what is aſſerted by the Learned Buxtorf concerning the time of the leſſer excommunication, called נדוי Niddui, which remained thirty days uſually, but were ſhortned by confeſſion and deſire of abſolution; durat 30. dies, qui tamen pœnitentiâ & deprecatione decurtantur. But if after thirty days paſt, he continue impenitent, the Judge as he ſees fit, increaſeth the puniſhment, ſo as to double or treble the time, or extend it to his whole life: if he died without repentance, a ſtone is laid upon his bier, to ſhew he deſerved lapidation; they wept not for him, nor buried him in the common place of burial. Farther, Buxtorf there alledgeth this conſtitution of their Law: that if he that was under Niddui, and deſired not abſolution, was the ſecond time under it, if that did no good on him, then he was excommunicated with the higher ſort of excommunication, called חרם which is likewiſe obſerved by Joh. Coch. Mr. Selden, and others. From whence it is evident that this was an Eccleſiaſtical cenſure, and not merely civil, becauſe the main end of it was not ſatisfaction to the Law, but the repentance of the perſon who lay under the fault; and according to the evidence given of it, the penalty was relaxed or increaſed; which argument not yet taken notice of nor improved by writers on this ſubject, ſeems to make the caſe clear, that excommunication among the Jews was not a mere out-lawry, as ſome conceive it to have been.

§. 5. Thirdly, I argue, it was not the breach of the Law, but the publickneſs of the offence, or the ſcandal of it which was the ground of excommunication; then it was not a mere civil penalty, but an eccleſiaſtical cenſure: for civil penalties do proceed upon the breach of the Law, and alter not as to the publickneſs or privateneſs of the offence; but here it is evident, that the ſame offence deſerving excommunication if done in publick, did not if done in private, or was left at the perſons liberty to have the offender excommunicated or not. That which is reckoned as the firſt cauſe of excommunication, is affront or contempt put upon a wiſe man, or Rabbi, or one that was תלמיד חכם a ſtudent in the Law; now it is determined by them in this caſe, that if it were done in private, the Rabbi might pardon him: but if in publick, he could not. For as Joh. Coch. gives the reaſon, publicum Doctoris ludibrium in legis contemptum redundat: the contempt of publick teachers of the Law, redounds to the diſhonour of the Law its ſelf. Thus it was the ſcandal of the fault, and not the bare offence which made excommunication neceſſary among them; and not as that ſcandal was a mere defamation of the perſon, but as it redounded to the contempt of the Law. Fourthly, I argue from the form uſed in excommunication by them. There are two forms produced of their excommunications, the one by Buxtorf out of an old Hebrew Manuſcript, the beginning of which is Ex ſententiâ Domini Dominorum, ſit in Anathemate Ploni filius Ploni, in utraqùe domo judicii, ſuperiorum, ſc. & inferiorum, &c. where two things evidence, it was accounted a ſacred and no civil action doing it immediately in the name and authority of the Lord of Lords; and pronouncing him excommunicate both in heaven and earth. So R. Elieſer ſpeaking of the excommunication of the Cuthites or Samaritans: atque anathemate devovebant Cuthæos myſterio nominis Amphoraſch, & Scriptura exarata in tabulis, & anathemate domus judicii ſuperioris, atque anathemate curiæ inferioris, as it is tranſlated by Guli. Vorſtius, who in his notes upon that book produceth a moſt dreadful ſentence of excommunication uſed to this day in many Synagogues, which they call Cherem Col. Bo. from the book whence it is taken, which runs moſt ſolemnly in the ſeveral names of God, whereby they do Schamatize, curſe and devote the perſons againſt whom it is pronounced. Fifthly, It appears not to be a merely civil thing inſtead of civil power, becauſe they uſe it againſt thoſe over whom they have no civil juriſdiction, as appears by their Schamatizing the Chriſtians in their Liturgies, as Buxtorf obſerves. Sixthly, I argue from the effects of it, becauſe they who lay under it were excluded from publick worſhip, which is averred by Buxtorf, Coch. and others in the places forecited. It is acknowledged that he that was only under Niddui, might be preſent at publick worſhip, but even there he was under his ſeparation too, of four Cubits from any other Iſraelite.

§. 6. And hence in probability might the miſtake ariſe, becauſe thoſe under Niddui might appear at the Temple or Synagogue; therefore excommunication was no prohibition à ſacris. But he that was under Cherem, non docet, non docetur, neither teacheth others, nor is taught himſelf, ſaith, Joh. Cocceius; and Buxtorf of one under Cherem, omninò à cœtu ſacro excluditur, and in this ſenſe Buxtorf expreſly takes the turning out of the Synagogue, Joh. 9. 22.——12. 42. which, ſaith he, is done by Cherem. But againſt this it is ſtrongly pleaded by our Learned Mr. Selden, that putting out of the Synagogue is nothing elſe but excommunicating רברול סן הקהל to ſeparate from the Congregations, taking קדר and ſo συναγωγὴ in the civil and not ſacred ſenſe, as it denotes an excluding them from common ſociety; but though it be freely granted that that is ſometimes the ſignification of קהל and συναγωγὴ as Mat. 10. 17. yet thoſe particulars being conſidered, which are already laid down, I ſhall leave it to conſideration whether it be more probable to take the word Synagogue here in a civil or ſacred ſenſe; when the occaſion expreſſed is merely a matter of doctrine and opinion, and not any thing condemned by their Law. Another thing which hath been I believe a great ground of miſtaking, in this matter, is, that excluding from the civil ſociety among them was always conſequent upon upon excommunication; the reaſon whereof was, becauſe the Church and Commonwealth were not diſtinct among the Jews; and the ſame perſons who took care of ſacred, did likewiſe of civil things (there being no diſtinct Sanhedrins among them as ſome imagine) but from hence it no ways follows, but their excommunication might be an excluſion from ſacred worſhip as well as civil ſociety. However, were it as they pretend, that it was from civil commerce, yet the whole people of the Jews being סגולה God's peculiar people, and his only Church in being before the times of the Goſpel, an excluſion in that reſpect from the common ſociety of them might deſervedly be looked upon as a ſacred action, and not merely Civil, it being a ſeparation from a people whoſe main ligature was their being a Church of God, or a Community gathered together for God's worſhip and ſervice. Thus we ſee the Church of the Jews had this power among them; and for the Chriſtian Church, the practice of diſcipline upon offenders was never queſtioned, though the right hath been; ſo that from hence we gather, in that it hath been the practice of ſocieties conſtituted for the worſhip of God, to call offenders to an account for their offences, and if upon examination they be found guilty, to exclude them their ſociety; that it is a dictate of the Law of Nature, that every offender againſt the Laws of a ſociety muſt give an account of his actions to the rulers of it, and ſubmit to the cenſures inflicted on him by them. Thus I am now come to the end of my firſt ſtage, to ſhew how far Church Government is founded upon the Law and Light of Nature.

CHAP. I.

The other ground of Divine Right conſidered, viz. God's poſitive Laws; which imply a certain knowledge of God's intention to bind men perpetually. As to which, the arguments drawn from Tradition, and the practice of the Church in after ages, proved invalid by ſeveral arguments. In order to a right ſtating the Queſtion, ſome conceſſions laid down. Firſt, That there muſt be ſome form of Government in the Church. The notion of a Church explained: whether it belongs only to particular Congregations, which are manifeſted not to be of God's primary intention, but for our neceſſity. Evidence for National Churches under the Goſpel. A National Church-Government neceſſary.

I Now come to the ſecond way, whereby any thing comes to be of unalterable Divine Right, which is by the poſitive Laws of God, which do bind univerſally to obedience. In the entrance into this diſcourſe, it is neceſſary to lay down the ways, whereby we find out a Divine poſitive Law determining an unalterable obligation: which muſt be either by expreſs words of Scripture, or by ſome other certain way, whereby to gather from thence, that it was God's intention to bind men. For the main thing requiſite to make a ſtanding univerſal poſitive Law, is God's declaring his mind, that the thing inquired into, ſhould unalterably bind men to the practice of it. Now whatever doth ſufficiently manifeſt God's intention, is a medium to find out ſuch a Law by, and nothing elſe: But it muſt be ſuch a manifeſtation as gives a mans mind ſufficient evidence and teſtimony whereon to build a true, certain, and divine aſſent to the thing, as revealed: So that whatſoever binds the Conſcience as a Law, muſt firſt be entertained by the underſtanding as a matter of faith; not as it imports ſomething merely doctrinal and dogmatical, but as it implies the matter of a Divine Revelation, and the object of an aſſent upon the credibility of a Teſtimony. For God having the only immediate authority over the conſciences of men, nothing can bind immediately the conſcience but a Divine Law, neither can any thing bind as ſuch, but what the underſtanding aſſents unto, as revealed by God himſelf. Now the word of God being the only Codex and Digeſts of Divine Laws, what ever Law we look for, muſt either be found there in expreſs terms, or at leaſt ſo couched therein, that every one by the exerciſe of his underſtanding, may by a certain and eaſy collection, gather the univerſal obligation of the thing inquired after. In this caſe then, whatſoever is not immediately founded upon a Divine Teſtimony cannot be made uſe of as a Medium to infer an univerſally binding Law by: So that all Traditions and hiſtorical evidence will be unſerviceable to us, when we inquire into §. 1.

into God's intentions in binding mens conſciences. Matters of fact, and mere Apoſtolical practice, may I freely grant, receive much light from the Records of ſucceeding ages; but they can never give a man's underſtanding ſufficient ground to infer any Divine Law, ariſing from thoſe facts atteſted to by the practice or Records of ſucceeding ages.

§. 2. For firſt, the foundation and ground of our aſſent in this caſe, is not the bare teſtimony of antiquity; but the aſſurance which we have, either that their practice did not vary from what was Apoſtolical, or in their writings, that they could not miſtake concerning what they deliver unto us: And therefore thoſe who would infer the neceſſary obligation of men to any form of Government, becauſe that was practiſed by the Apoſtles, and then prove the Apoſtolical practice from that of the ages ſucceeding, or from their writings, muſt firſt of all prove, that what was done then, was certainly the Apoſtles practice, and ſo prove the ſame thing by its ſelf, or that it was impoſſible they ſhould vary from it, or that they ſhould miſtake in judging of it: For here ſomething more is required than a mere matter of fact, in which I confeſs their nearneſs to the Apoſtles times doth give them an advantage above the ages following, to diſcern what it was; but ſuch a practice is required, as infers an univerſal obligation upon all places, times, and perſons. Therefore theſe things muſt be manifeſted, that ſuch things were unqueſtionably the practice of thoſe ages and perſons; that their practice was the ſame with the Apoſtles; that what they did was not from any prudential motives, but by vertue of a Law which did bind them to that practice. Which things are eaſily paſſed over by the moſt eager Diſputers of the controverſie about Church Government, but how neceſſary they are to be proved before any form of Government be aſſerted, ſo neceſſary, that without it there can be no true Church, any weak underſtanding may diſcern.

Secondly, Suppoſing that Apoſtolical practice be ſufficiently atteſted by the following ages, yet unleſs it be cleared from Scripture that it was God's intention that the Apoſtles actions ſhould continually bind the Church, there can be nothing inferred that doth concern us in point of conſcience. I ſay, that though the matter of fact be evidenced by poſterity, yet the obligatory nature of that fact muſt depend on Scripture: and the Apoſtles intentions muſt not be built upon mens bare ſurmiſes, nor upon after-practices, eſpecially if different from the conſtitution of things during the Apoſtles times. And here thoſe have ſomewhat whereon to exerciſe their underſtandings, who aſſert an obligation upon men to any form of Government, by vertue of an Apoſtolical practice, which muſt of neceſſity ſuppoſe a different ſtate of things from what they were when the Apoſtles firſt eſtabliſhed Governours over Churches. As how thoſe who were appointed Governours over particular Congregations by the Apoſtles, come to be by vertue of that ordination, Governours over many Congregations of like nature and extent with that over which they were ſet: And whether, if it were the Apoſtles intention that ſuch Governours ſhould be always in the Church, is it not neceſſary that that intention of theirs be declared by a ſtanding Law, that ſuch there muſt be; for here matter of fact and practice can be no evidence, when it is ſuppoſed to be different from the Conſtitution of Churches afterward: But of this more hereafter.

Thirdly, Suppoſing any form of Government in its ſelf neceſſary, and that neceſſity not determined by a Law in the word of God, the Scripture is thereby apparently argued to be inſufficient for its end; for then deficit in neceſſariis; ſome things are neceſſary for the Church of God which the Scripture is wholly ſilent in. I ſay not, that every thing about Church Government muſt be written in Scripture; but ſuppoſing any one form neceſſary, it muſt be there commanded, or the Scripture is an imperfect rule, which contains not all things neceſſary by way of precept: For there can be no other neceſſity univerſal, but either by way of means to an end, or by way of Divine command: I know none will ſay that any particular form of Government is neceſſary abſolutely, by way of means to an end; for certainly, ſuppoſing no obligation from Scripture, Government by an equality of power in the officers of the Church, or by ſuperiority of one order above another, are indifferent in order to the general ends of Government, and one not more neceſſary than the other. If any one form then be neceſſary, it muſt be by that of command; and if there be a command univerſally binding, whoſe footſteps cannot be traced in the word of God, how can the Scriptures be a perfect rule, if it fails in determining binding Laws? So that we muſt, if we own the Scriptures ſufficiency as a binding rule, appeal to that about any thing pleaded as neceſſary, by virtue of any Divine command, and if ſuch a Law cannot be met with in Scripture, which determines the caſe in hand one way or other by way of neceſſary obligation, I have ground to look upon that which is thus left undetermined by God's poſitive Laws, to be a matter of Chriſtian liberty; and that neither part is to be looked upon as neceſſary for the Church of God, as excluſive of the other.

This I ſuppoſe is the caſe, as to particular forms of Government in the Church of God; but that I may not only ſuppoſe but prove it: I now come to the ſtating of the Queſtion, which if ever neceſſary to be done any where, it is in the Controverſie of Church Government, the moſt of mens heats in this matter ariſing from want of right underſtanding the thing in queſtion between them. In the ſtating the Queſtion I ſhall proceed by degrees, and ſhew how far we acknowledge any thing belonging to Government in the Church to be of an unalterable Divine Right. Firſt, That there muſt be a form of Government in the Church of God, is neceſſary by vertue, not only of that Law of Nature which provides for the preſervation of ſocieties, but likewiſe by vertue of that Divine Law, which takes care for the Churches preſervation in peace and unity. I engage not here in the controverſie, whether a particular Congregation be the firſt Political Church or no; it ſufficeth for my purpoſe that there are other Churches beſides particular Congregations: I mean, not only the Catholick viſible Church, which is the firſt, not only in order of conſideration, but nature too, as a totum Integrale before the ſimilar parts of it; but in reſpect of all other accidental modifications of Churches, from the ſeveral ways of their combination together. They who define a Church by ſtated worſhipping Congregations, do handſomely beg the thing they deſire, by placing that in their definition of a Church, which is the thing in queſtion: which is, whether there be no other Church but ſuch particular Congregations? Which is as if one ſhould go about to prove, that there were no civil ſocieties but in particular Corporations, and to prove it, ſhould give ſuch a definition of civil ſociety, that it is a company of men joyned together in a Corporation, for the preſervation of their Rights and §. 3.

Privileges,

Privileges, under the Governours of ſuch a place. It muſt be firſt proved, that no other company of men can be call'd a civil ſociety beſides a Corporation: and ſo that no other ſociety of men joyning together in the profeſſion of the true Religion, can be call'd a Church, but ſuch as join in particular Congregations.

§. 4. To which purpoſe it is very obſervable, that particular Congregations are not de primariâ intentione divinâ; for if the whole world could join together in the publick worſhip of God, no doubt that would be moſt properly a Church, but particular Congregations are only accidental, in reference to God's intention of having a Church, becauſe of the impoſſibility of all mens joyning together for the convenient diſtribution of Church-privileges, and adminiſtration of Goſpel-ordinances. For it is evident, that the Privileges and Ordinances, do immediately and primarily belong to the Catholick viſible Church, in which Chriſt to that end hath ſet officers, as the Apoſtle clearly expreſſeth, 1 Corinth. 12. 28. (for how Apoſtles ſhould be ſet as officers over particular Congregations, whoſe Commiſſion extended to the whole World, is, I think, ſomewhat hard to underſtand) but for the more convenient participation of Privileges and Ordinances, particular Congregations are neceſſary: This will be beſt illuſtrated by examples. We read that Eſther 1. 3. King Ahaſhuerus made a feaſt for all his Princes and Servants: Doubtleſs the King did equally reſpect them all as a body in the feaſting of them, and did beſtow his entertainment upon them all as conſidered together; but by reaſon of the great multitude of them, it was impoſſible that they ſhould all be feaſted together in the ſame room; and therefore for more convenient participation of the King's bounty, it was neceſſary to divide themſelves into particular companies, and to aſſociate as many as conveniently could in order to that end. So it is in the Church, Chriſt in donation of privileges equally reſpects the whole Church; but becauſe men cannot all meet together to participate of theſe privileges, a more particular diſtribution was neceſſary for that end. But a clearer example of this kind we have yet in Scripture, which is Mark 6. 39. in our Saviour's feeding the multitude with five loaves and two fiſhes; where we ſee our Saviour's primary intention, was to feed the whole multitude; but for their more convenient partaking of this food, our Saviour commands them to ſit down συμπόσια συμπόσια, according to the Hebraiſm of ingeminating the words, to note the diſtribution of them, and therefore the Vul. Lat. renders it ſecundum contubernia, that is διαμεμερισμένως, as Camerarius expounds it, according to ſo many companies and diviſions as might conveniently ſit together, as at a table: Where we plainly ſee this diſtribution was only accidental, as to Chriſt's primary intention of feeding the multitude, but was only neceſſary for their own conveniency. Thus the caſe is evident, as to the Church of God, it is our neceſſity and conveniency which makes ſeveral congregations of the Catholick viſible Church, and not God's primary intention, when he beſtowed ſuch privileges upon the Church, that it ſhould be underſtood of particular Congregations.

§. 5. If then particular congregations be only accidental for our conveniency, it evidently follows that the primary notion of a Church, doth not belong to theſe; nor that theſe are the firſt ſubject of Government which belongs to a Church as ſuch, and not as crumbled into particular congregations; although the actual exerciſe of Government be moſt viſible ſible and diſcernable there; Becauſe the joyning together for participation of Goſpel ordinances muſt be in ſome particular company or other aſſociated together for that end. Where ever then we find the notion of a Church particular, there muſt be government in that Church; and why a National ſociety incorporated into one civil Government, joyning in the profeſſion of Chriſtianity, and having a right thereby to participate of Goſpel ordinances in the convenient diſtributions of them in particular congregations, ſhould not be called a Church, I confeſs I can ſee no reaſon. The main thing objected againſt it, is, that a Church implies an actual joyning together for participation of all Goſpel ordinances; but as this, as I ſaid before, is only a begging the Queſtion, ſo I ſay now, that actual communion with any particular Congregation is not abſolutely neceſſary to a member of a Church; for ſuppoſing one baptized at ſea, where no ſetled Congregation is (nor any more ſociety than that which Ariſtotle calls συμπλοία) yet ſuch a one is thereby a member of the Church of God, though not of any Congregation; ſo likewiſe a Church then may conſiſt of ſuch as have a right to ordinances, without the inſerting their actual participation of them in fixed Congregations. A particular Church then I would deſcribe thus, that it is a ſociety of men joyning together in the viſible profeſſion of the true Faith, having a right to, and enjoying among them the Ordinances of the Goſpel. That a whole Nation profeſſing Chriſtianity, in which the ordinances of the Goſpel are duly adminiſtred in particular Congregations, is ſuch a ſociety, is plain and evident. A clear inſtance of ſuch a National conſtitution of a Church under the Goſpel, we have in the Prophecy of the converſion of Egypt and Aſſyria in Goſpel times. Iſaiah 19. 19, 21, 24, 25. We have Egypts profeſſing the true Faith, and enjoying Goſpel ordinances, verſ. 19, 21. which according to the prophetical ſtyle are ſet down under the repreſentation of ſuch things as were then in uſe among the Jews: by an Altar in the midſt of the Land, v. 19. The Altar noting the true worſhip of God; and being in the midſt of the Land, the univerſal owning of this worſhip by all the people of the Land. God owns them for a Church. v. 25. Whom the Lord of Hoſts ſhall bleſs, ſaying, Bleſſed be Egypt my people. The very name whereby Iſrael was called while it was a Church, עמי Hoſea 2. 1. and when God unchurched them, it was under this name עמי —— לא ye are not my people. As much then as Iſrael was a Church when God owned it for his people, ſo ſhould Egypt be upon their converſion to the Faith of Chriſt, which was done upon Mark's preaching at Alexandria not long after the death of Chriſt.

This then we have now briefly cleared, that a Nation joyning in the profeſſion of Chriſtianity, is a true Church of God; whence it evidently follows, that there muſt be a form of Eccleſiaſtical Government over a Nation as a Church, as well as of civil Government over it, as a ſociety governed by the ſame Laws. Therefore ſome make this neceſſary to a National Church, National union in one Eccleſiaſtical body in the ſame community of Eccleſiaſtical Government. For every ſociety muſt have its Government belonging to it as ſuch a ſociety; and the ſame reaſon that makes Government neceſſary in any particular congregation, will make it neceſſary for all the particular congregations joyning together in one viſible ſociety as a particular National Church. For the unity and peace of that Church, ought much more to be looked after than of any one particular Congregation, in as much as the peace of all the parti-particular combinations of men for participation of ordinances doth depend upon, and is comprehended in the peace of the whole. But though I ſay from hence, that ſome form of publick Government by the ſub-ordination of particular aſſemblies to the Government of the whole body of them is neceſſary, yet I am far from aſſerting the neceſſity of any one form of that Government, much more, from ſaying that no National Church can ſubſiſt without one National officer, as the High-Prieſt under the Law; or one National place of worſhip, as the Temple was. The want of conſidering which, viz. that National Churches may ſubſiſt without that form of them under the Jews, is doubtleſs the great ground of mens quarrelling againſt them; but with what reaſon, let men impartially judge. This then we agree, that ſome form of Government is neceſſary in every particular Church, and ſo that Government in the Church of Divine and unalterable right; and that not only of particular Congregations, but of all ſocieties which may be call'd Churches, whether Provincial, or National.

CHAP. II.

The ſecond conceſſion is, That Church government formally conſidered, muſt be adminiſtred by officers of Divine appointment. To that end, the continuance of a Goſpel Miniſtry fully cleared from all thoſe arguments, by which poſitive Laws are proved immutable. The reaſon of the appointment of it continues; the dream of a ſeculum Spiritus Sancti diſcuſſed, firſt broached by the Mendicant Fryers. Its occaſion and unreaſonableneſs ſhewed. God's declaring the perpetuity of a Goſpel Miniſtry, Matth. 28. 19. explained. A novel interpretation largely refuted. The World to come, what. A Miniſtry neceſſary for the Churches continuance, Epheſ. 4. 12. explained, and vindicated.

§. 1. SEcondly, That the Government of the Church ought to be adminiſtred by officers of Divine appointment, is another thing I will yield to be of Divine Right: but the Church here, I take not in that latitude which I did in the former Conceſſion, but I take it chiefly here for the members of the Church, as diſtinct from officers, as it is taken in Acts 15. 22. So that my meaning is, that there muſt be a ſtanding perpetual Miniſtry in the Church of God, whoſe care and employment muſt be, to overſee and Govern the people of God, and to adminiſter Goſpel ordinances among them, and this is of Divine and perpetual Right. That Officers were appointed by Chriſt in the Church for theſe ends at firſt, is evident from the direct affirmation of Scripture. God hath ſet in the Church, firſt Apoſtles, ſecondly Prophets, thirdly Teachers, &c. 1 Corinth. 12. 28. Eph. 4. 8, 11. and other places to the ſame purpoſe. This being then a thing acknowledged, that they were at firſt of Divine inſtitution, and ſo were appointed by a Divine poſitive Law, which herein determines and reſtrains the Law of Nature (which doth not preſcribe the certain qualifications of the perſons to govern this ſociety, nor the inſtalment, or admiſſion of them into this imployment, viz. by ordination.) The only inquiry then left is, whether a ſtanding Goſpel-miniſtry be ſuch a poſitive Law, as is to remain perpetually in the Church, or no? which I ſhall make appear by thoſe things which I laid down in the entrance of this Treatiſe, as to the notes whereby to know when poſitive Laws are unalterable.

§. 2. The firſt was when the ſame reaſon of the command continues ſtill; and what reaſon is there why Chriſt ſhould appoint officers to rule his Church then, which will not hold now? Did the people of God need Miniſters then to be as Stars (as they are call'd in Scripture) to lead them unto Chriſt, and do they not as well need them now? Rev. 1. 16. Had people need of guides then, when the doctrine of the Goſpel was confirmed to them by miracles, and have they not much more now? Heb. 13. 7. Heb. 2. 3. Muſt there be ſome then to oppoſe gainſayers, and muſt they have an abſolute liberty of propheſying now, when it is foretold what times of ſeduction the laſt ſhall be? Titus 1. 9. 2 Tim. 3. 1. Muſt there be ſome then to rule over their charge, as they that muſt give an account, and is not the ſame required ſtill? Heb. 13. 17. Were there ſome then to reprove, rebuke, exhort, to preach in ſeaſon, out of ſeaſon, and is there not the ſame neceſſity of theſe things ſtill? 2 Tim. 4. 2. Was it not enough then, that there were ſo many in all Churches that had extraordinary gifts of tongues, propheſying, praying, interpretation of tongues, 1 Cor. 14. but beſides thoſe there were ſome Paſtors by office, whoſe duty it was to give attendance to reading, to be wholly in theſe things, 1 Tim. 4. 13. and now when theſe extraordinary gifts are ceaſed, is not there a much greater neceſſity than there was then, for ſome to be ſet apart and wholly deſigned for this work? Were Ordinances only then adminiſtred by thoſe whom Chriſt commiſſioned, and ſuch as derived their authority from them; Mat 28. 18. and what reaſon is there that men ſhould arrogate and take this employment upon themſelves now? If Chriſt had ſo pleaſed, could he not have left it wholly at liberty for all believers to have gone about Preaching the Goſpel? or why did he make choice of twelve Apoſtles chiefly for that work, were it not his will to have ſome particularly to diſpenſe the Goſpel? And if Chriſt did then ſeparate ſome for that work, what reaſon is there why that office ſhould be thrown common now, which Chriſt himſelf incloſed by his own appointment?

§. 3. There can be no poſſible reaſon imagined, why a Goſpel Miniſtry ſhould not continue ſtill, unleſs it be that Fanatick pretence of a ſeculum Spiritus Sancti, a diſpenſation of the Spirit, which ſhall evacuate the uſe of means of inſtruction, and the uſe of all Goſpel ordinances; which pretence is not ſo novel as moſt imagine it to be; for ſetting aſide the Montaniſtical ſpirit in the Primitive times, which acted upon principles much of the ſame nature with theſe we now ſpeak of; the firſt riſe of this Ignis fatuus was from the bogs of Popery, viz. from the orders of the Dominicans and Franciſcans, about the middle of the twelfth Century. For no ſooner did the Pauperes de Lugduno, or the Waldenſes appear, making uſe of the word of God to confute the whole Army of Popiſh traditions, but they, finding themſelves worſted at every turn while they diſputed that ground, found out a Stratagem whereby to recover their own credit, and to beat their adverſaries quite out of the field. Which was, that the Goſpel which they adhered to ſo much, was now out of date, and inſtead of that they broached another Goſpel out of the writings of the Abbot Joachim, and Cyril's viſions, which they blaſphemouſly named Evangelium Spiritus Sancti, Evangelium Novum, and Evangelium Æternum, as Gulielmus de Sancto Amore, their great Antagoniſt relates, in his Book de periculis noviſſ. temporum, purpoſely deſigned againſt the Impoſtures of the Mendicant Friers, who then like Locuſts, roſe in multitudes with their ſhaven crowns crowns out of the bottomleſs pit. This Goſpel of the ſpirit they ſo much magnified above the Goſpel of Chriſt, that the ſame Author relates theſe words of theirs concerning it; Quod comparatum ad Evangelium Chriſti, tanto plus perfectionis ac dignitatis habet, quantum Sol ad Lunam comparatus, aut ad nucleum teſta; that it exceeded it as much as the kernel doth the ſhell, or the Light of the Sun doth that of the Moon. We ſee then from what quarter of the world this new light began to riſe: but ſo much for this digreſſion. To the thing it ſelf.

§. 4. If there be ſuch a diſpenſation of the ſpirit which takes away the uſe of Miniſtry and Ordinances, it did either commence from the time of the effuſion of the Spirit upon the Apoſtles, or ſome time ſince. Not then; for even of thoſe who had the moſt large portion of the Spirit poured upon them, we read that they continued in all Goſpel-ordinances, Acts 2. 42. and among the chief, τῇ διδαχῇ τῶν Ἀποστόλων, under the Apoſtles Miniſtry, it may be better rendred than in the Apoſtles Doctrine: And which is moſt obſervable, the prophecy of Joel about the Spirit, is then ſaid to be fulfilled, Acts 2. 17. Beſides, if either that place of Joel, or that of Jeremy, cited Heb. 8. 11. or the Unction of the Spirit, 1 Joh. 2. 20, 27. did take away the uſe of preaching, how did the Apoſtles themſelves underſtand their meaning, when they were ſo diligent 1 Joh.4.1. in preaching and inſtructing others: John writes to thoſe to try the Spi- 1 Joh.2.20. rits, of whom he ſaith, they have an unction to know all things; and thoſe to whom the Apoſtle writes, that they need not teach every one his neighbour: of them he ſaith, that they had need be taught the firſt prin- Heb. 5. 12. ciples of the oracles of God. And even in that very Chapter where he ſeems to ſay, they that are under the New Covenant, need not be taught, he brings that very ſpeech in as an argument, that the old diſpenſation of the Law was done away; And ſo goes about to teach, when he ſeems to take away the uſe of it. Theſe ſpeeches then muſt not be underſtood in their abſolute and literal ſenſe, but with a reflection upon, and compariſon with, the ſtate of things in the times wherein thoſe prophecies were utter'd: For God to heighten the Jews apprehenſions of the great bleſſings of the Goſpel, doth ſet them forth Calvin in under a kind of Hyperbolical expreſſions, that the dull capacity of the Joel 2. 28. Jews might at leaſt apprehend the juſt weight and magnitude of them, Jer.31. 31. which they would not otherwiſe have done. So in that place of Jeremy, God to make them underſtand how much the knowledge of the Goſpel exceeded that under the Law, doth as it were ſet it down in this Hyperbolical way, that it will exceed it as much, as one that needs no teaching at all, doth one that is yet but in his rudiments of learning. So that the place doth not deny the uſe of teaching under the Goſpel, but becauſe teaching doth commonly ſuppoſe ignorance, to ſhew the great meaſure of knowledge, he doth it in that way, as though the knowledge ſhould be ſo great, that men ſhould not need be taught in ſuch a way of rudiments as the Jews were, viz. by Types and Ceremonies, and ſuch things. We ſee then no ſuch diſpenſation was in the Apoſtles times; for the ſame Apoſtle after this in Chap. 10. 25. bids them not Heb.10.25. to forſake Aſſembling themſelves together as ſome did: Wherefore were theſe Heb. 13. 7. Aſſemblies, but for inſtruction? and in the laſt Chapter, bids them obey their rulers. What need of rulers, if no need of teaching? But ſo ſenſleſs a dream will be too much honour'd with any longer confutation. In the Apoſtles times then, there was no ſuch diſpenſation of the Spirit, which did take away the uſe of Miniſtry and Ordinances. If it be expected ſince their times, I would know whence it appears, that any have a greater meaſure of the Spirit than was poured out in the Apoſtles times; for then the Miniſtry was joyned with the Spirit: and what prophecies are fulfilled now, which were not then? or if they pretend to a doctrine diſtinct from, and above what the Apoſtles taught, let them produce their evidences, and work thoſe miracles which may induce men to believe them: Or let them ſhew what obligation any have to believe pretended new revelations, without a power of miracles, atteſting that thoſe revelations come from God? Or whereon men muſt build their faith, if it be left to the dictates of a pretended ſpirit of revelation? or what way is left to diſcern the good ſpirit from the bad, in its acting upon mens minds, if the word of God be not our rule ſtill? Or how God is ſaid to have ſpoken in the laſt days by his Son, if a far- Heb. 1. 1.

ther ſpeaking be yet expected? For the Goſpel diſpenſation is therefore call'd the Laſt days, becauſe no other is to be expected: Times being differenced in Scripture according to God's ways of revealing himſelf to men. But ſo much for this.

§. 5. The ſecond way whereby to know when poſitive Laws are unalterable, is, when God hath declared that ſuch Laws ſhall bind ſtill. Two ways whereby God doth expreſs his own will concerning the perpetuity of an office founded on his own inſtitution. Firſt, If ſuch things be the work belonging to it, which are of neceſſary and perpetual uſe. Secondly, If God hath promiſed to aſſiſt them in it perpetually, in the doing of their work. Firſt, The objects of the Miniſterial office are ſuch things which are of neceſſary and perpetual uſe; I mean the adminiſtration of Goſpel-ordinances, viz. the Word and Sacraments, which were appointed by Chriſt for a perpetual Uſe. The Word as a means of converſion and edification; the Sacraments, not only as notes of diſtinction of Profeſſors of the true faith from others, but as Seals to confirm the truth of the Covenant on God's part towards us, and as inſtruments to convey the bleſſings ſealed in the Covenant to the hearts of belivers. Now the very nature of theſe things doth imply their perpetuity and continuance in the world, as long as there ſhall be any Church of God in it. For theſe things are not typi rerum futurarum, only Ceremonies to repreſent ſomething to come, but they are ſymbola rerum inviſibilium, ſigns to repreſent to our ſenſes things inviſible in their own nature; and between theſe two there is a great difference, as to the perpetuity of them: For Types of things as to come, muſt of neceſſity expire when the thing typified appears; but repreſentation of inviſible things cannot expire on that account, becauſe the thing repreſented as inviſible, cannot be ſuppoſed to be made viſible, and ſo to evacuate the uſe of the ſigns which repreſent them to us. Types repreſent a thing which is at preſent inviſible, but under the notion of it as future; Symbols repreſent a thing at preſent inviſible, but as preſent, and therefore Symbols are deſigned by God's inſtitution for a perpetual help to the weakneſs of our faith. And therefore the Lord's Supper is appointed to ſet forth the Lord's death, till 1 Cor. 11. 26.
he come: whereby the continuance of it in the Church of God is neceſſarily implied. Now then, if theſe things which are the proper object of the Miniſterial function be of a perpetual nature, when theſe things are declared to be of an abiding nature, it neceſſarily follows, that that function to which it belongs to adminiſter theſe things, muſt be of a perpetual nature.

For that notwithſtanding the duſt lately thrown upon it, we have a clear place, Matth. 28. 19. Go teach and baptize, &c. Lo I am with you always to the end of the World. If πάσας τὰς ἡμέρας, did not ſignifie perpetuity, yet certainly the latter words do; for how could Chriſt be with the Apoſtles themſelves perſonally to the end of the World? it muſt be therefore with them, and all that ſucceed them in the office of teaching and baptizing, to the world's end: For that I aſſert to be the meaning of ἕως τῆς συντελείας τοῦ αἰῶνος. I inſiſt not barely on the ſignification of the word αἰὼν, either as to its ſuppoſed Etymology, or as it anſwers the Heb. עיל ם knowing how fallible the arguments drawn from thence are, when in the diſpute of the eternity of the Law of Moſes with the Jews, it is confeſſed that עולם relates only to a long continuance of time. But however, I ſuppoſe that it will hardly be found in Scripture, that either αἰὼν or עולם doth barely relate to the time of life of any individual perſons, eſpecially if abſolutely put as it is here. One great ſignification of αἰὼν in the New Teſtament (which we are to inquire into, and not how it is uſed among Greek Authors) is that wherein αἰὼν is taken for the world its ſelf, which Vorſtius reckons among the Hebraiſms of the N. Teſt. in which ſenſe the Jews call God Philolog. Sacr. de Hebr. N. T. cap. 2. רב העולם and great perſons גדולי העלם Magnates mundi; in which ſenſe, in the N. Teſtament, the Devil is call'd ὁ ἄρχων τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, John 12. 31.—— 14. 31. and ὁ θεὸς τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, 2 Cor. 4. 4. And ſo God is ſaid to create τοὺς αἰῶνας, the world, Heb. 1. 2.—11. 3. If we take it in this ſenſe, Chriſt's promiſe muſt of neceſſity relate to the diſſolution of the fabrick of the world, and that he would be with his ſervants in the Goſpel, till all things be diſſolved. Againſt this it is pleaded, that the συντέλεια here relates to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and that αἰὼν implies the ſtate of things under the Law, which would continue till Jeruſalem was deſtroyed, from which time a new αἰὼν would commence. But to this I anſwer firſt, I abſolutely deny that συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος, doth ever in Scripture relate to the deſtruction of the Jewiſh State. This will be beſt made out by a particular view of the places wherein this phraſe occurs. The firſt time we meet with this phraſe is in Matthew 13. where we have it thrice. v. 39. ὁ δὲ θερισμὸς συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνός ἐστι. Now can any be ſo ſenſleſs, as to imagine that the harveſt wherein the Tares ſhall be gathered, and caſt into unquenchable fire, when the Angels are ſaid to be the Reapers, and to gather out of Chriſt's Kingdom every thing that offends, ſhould be attributed to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem? And ſo v. 40. and v. 49. where the ſame phraſe expreſſeth the ſame time, οὕτως ἔσται ἐν τῇ συντελείᾳ τοῦ αἰῶνος, where the antecedents and conſequents fully declare, what the time is there meant, which is the general judgment of the world. The only place pleaded for this ſenſe is Matth. 24. 3. where the Diſciples inquire of Chriſt what ſhould be the ſign, τῆς σῆς παρουσίας καὶ τῆς συντελείας τοῦ αἰῶνος, where granting, that the former Chriſt's coming may reſpect his coming to alter the preſent ſtate of things according to the Jews apprehenſion of the Meſſias; yet I deny that the latter doth, but it reſpects the general deſtruction of the world, conſequent upon that alteration: for the Jews not only expect an alteration of the preſent ſtate of things among them, but a conſequent deſtruction of the world, after the coming of the Meſſias, according to that ſpeech of theirs cited by Dr. Lightfoot, אלף שבים

ſciples, ſpeaking in the ſenſe of the Jews, do not only inquire of the ſigns of his altering the preſent ſtate of things among them, but likewiſe of the deſtruction of the whole world too. Accordingly it is obſervable, that throughout that Chapter, our Saviour intermixeth his anſwers to theſe two Queſtions. Sometimes ſpeaking in reference to the Jewiſh State, as it is plain he doth, verſe 15, 16. and ſo on; and when he ſaith, that this Generation ſhall not paſs, till all theſe things be fulfilled, ver. 34. But then it is as evident, that ſome places muſt relate to the deſtruction of the world, as when he ſaith, of that day and hour knoweth no man, no not the Angels of heaven, but the Father only, v. 36: which will appear more plainly, by comparing it with Mark 13. 32. Where the ſon is excluded from knowing that hour too; But how can any ſay, that the Son did not know the time of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, which he himſelf foretold when it ſhould be. And thoſe words heaven and earth ſhall paſs away, v. 35. ſeem to be our Saviour's tranſition to the Anſwer of the other Queſtion, about the final deſtruction of all things; however that be, we ſee no reaſon at all why συντέλεια τ͂ αἰῶνος, ſhould only reſpect the ſubverſion of the Jewiſh ſtate: but ſuppoſing it ſhould, yet there is far leſs reaſon why it ſhould be ſo meant, in the place whoſe ſenſe we are inquiring into; for if by Chriſt's coming to deſtroy Jeruſalem, the old ſtate and diſpenſation ſhould be taken away, we muſt ſuppoſe a new ſtate under the Meſſias to begin from thence. And how rational doth this ſound, that Chriſt ſhould promiſe his peculiar preſence with his own Apoſtles, whom he imployed in erecting the Goſpel State, only till the old Jewiſh State be ſubverted; but his promiſe not at all to extend to that time, wherein the State of the Kingdom of the Meſſias ſhould be ſet up inſtead of it: And how could any of the Apoſtles, for example S. John, who ſurvived the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, expect Chriſt's preſence with him, by vertue of this promiſe, if it extended no farther than to the deſtruction of the Jewiſh State? Beſides, it is a mere groundleſs fancy, and ſavours of the Jewiſh apprehenſions of the State of the Meſſias Kingdom, to imagine that the temporal State of Jeruſalem muſt be firſt ſubverted before that αἰὼν or diſpenſation of things was at an end. For the Jewiſh State and diſpenſation did not lie in the Jewiſh Polity, but an obligation to the Law of Moſes, which expired together with Chriſt. And ſo the Goſpel State, which is call'd the Kingdom of Heaven, and the Regeneration, began upon Mat. 19. 28. Chriſt's Reſurrection and Aſcenſion, when he was ſolemnly (as it were) inaugurated in his Mediatory Kingdom. And preſently after ſends down his Vice-Roy upon the day of Pentecoſt, in the effuſion of Acts 2. 1. the Spirit upon the Apoſtles, making good his Promiſe of the Paraclet to ſupply his abſence: Whereby the Apoſtles were more ſignally impowered for the advancing of the Goſpel State.

§. 7. The αἰὼν then of the Goſpel commenceth from Chriſt's reſurrection, and to this αἰὼν I am very inclinable to think that our Saviour hath reference in theſe words, when he ſaith he will be with his diſciples to the end of that αἰὼν, if we take it for a ſtate of things, or the Goſpel diſpenſation; that is, as long as the Evangelical Church ſhall continue: For that in Scripture is ſometime called the world to come, and that Phraſe among the Jews of עילם הבא the world to come is ſet to expreſs Heb. 2. 5. the time of the Meſſias; and it may be the Apoſtle may refer to this, when Lightfoot Horæ. Hebr. in Mat. 12. 32. p. 173. he ſpeaks of Apoſtates taſting δυνάμεις τε μέλλοντος αἰῶνος, that is, the force and energy of the Goſpel preached; whence the Kingdom of God Heb. 6. 5.

ſhall remain, which will be to the world's end.

§. 8. The third thing whereby to know when poſitive inſtitutions are unalterable, is, when they are neceſſary to the being, ſucceſſion, and continuance of the Church of God. Now this yields a farther evidence of the perpetuity of officers in the Church of God, ſeeing the Church its ſelf cannot be preſerved without the Government; and there can be no Government without ſome to rule the members of the Church of God, and to take care for a due adminiſtration of Church-privileges, and to inflict cenſures upon offenders, which is the power they are inveſted in by the ſame authority which was the ground of their inſtitution at firſt. It is not conceivable how any ſociety, as the Church is, can be preſerved without the continuance of Church officers among them. As long as the body of Chriſt muſt be edified, there muſt be ſome κατηρτισμένοι εἰς ἔργον διακονίας, fitted for the work of the Miniſtry, which is appointed in order to that end; For that I ſuppoſe is the Apoſtles meaning in Epheſ. 4. 12. πρὸς τὸν καταρτισμὸν τῶν ἁγίων εἰς ἔργον διακονίας, εἰς οἰκοδομὴν τοῦ σώματος τοῦ Χριστοῦ, following the Complutenſian copy, leaving out the comma between ἁγίων and εἰς ἔργον, which makes as though it were a diſtinct thing from the former; whereas the Original carries the ſenſe on; for otherwiſe it ſhould have been εἰς καταρτισμὸν τῶν ἁγίων εἰς ἔργον διακονίας, &c. and thoſe who follow the ordinary reading, are much at a loſs how to explain that εἰς ἔργον διακονίας coming in ſo in the midſt without dependance upon the former. Therefore the vulgar Latin beſt renders it ad conſummationem ſanctorum ad opus miniſterii, for the compleating of the Saints for the work of the miniſtry in order to the building up of the body of Chriſt; and to this purpoſe Muſculus informs us the German verſion renders it. And ſo we underſtand the enumeration
Eph. 4. 11. in the verſe before of Apoſtles, Prophets, Evangeliſts, Paſtors and Teachers, not for the perſons themſelves, but for the gifts of thoſe

perſons, the office of Apoſtles, Evangeliſts, Paſtors, &c. which is moſt ſuitable to the ἔδωκε δώματα in the eighth verſe. He gave gifts to men; now theſe gifts, ſaith he, Chriſt gave to men πρὸς καταρτισμὸν τῶν ἁγίων εἰς ἔργον διακονίας, for the fitting the Saints for the work of the Miniſtry. Not as a late Democratical writer would perſuade us, as though all the Saints were thereby fitted for this work of the Miniſtry; for that the Apoſtle excludes by the former enumeration; for are all the Saints fitted for Apoſtles? are all Prophets, are all Evangeliſts, are all Paſtors and Teachers? as the Apoſtle himſelf elſewhere argues. And in the eighth verſe of that Chapter he particularly mentions the ſeveral gifts 1 Cor. 12. 29,8,9,10, 11.
qualifying men for ſeveral uſeful imployments in the Church of God, the Spirit dividing to every man ſeverally as he will. Therefore it cannot be that all the Saints are hereby fitted for this work, but God hath ſcattered theſe gifts among the Saints, that thoſe who have them might be fitted εἰς ἔργον διακονίας, becauſe God would not leave his Church without perſons qualified for the ſervice of himſelf in the work of the Miniſtry, in order to the building up of the body of Chriſt. And by the τῶν ἁγίων here may be meant no other than thoſe he ſpeaks of in the Chapter before, when he ſpeaks of the revelation made τοῖς ἁγίοις ἀποστόλοις αὐτοῦ καὶ προφήταις, to his holy Apoſtles and Prophets, Eph. 3. 5.
and ſo God gave theſe gifts for the fitting the Holy Apoſtles, &c. for the work of the Miniſtry. It cannot be meant of all, ſo as to deſtroy a peculiar function of the Miniſtry; for God's very giving theſe gifts to ſome and not to others, is an evidence that the function is peculiar. For elſe had the gifts been common to all, every Saint had been an Apoſtle, every believer a Paſtor, and Teacher, and then where had the People been that muſt have been ruled and governed? So that this very place doth ſtrongly aſſert both the peculiarity of the function, from the peculiarity of gifts in order to fitting men for it, and the perpetuity of the function from the end of it, the building up of the body of Chriſt. Thus I have now aſſerted the perpetual divine right of a Goſpel Miniſtry, not only for teaching the word, but adminiſtration of ordinances, and governing the Church as a ſociety: which work belongs to none but ſuch as are appointed for it, who are the ſame with the diſpenſers of the word, as appears from the titles of ἡγούμενοι, προεστῶτες ποιμένες, Go- Heb. 13. 7, 17.

power, which having been largely proved by others, and yielded by me, Eph. 4. 11.
I paſs over.

CHAP. III.

The Queſtion fully ſtated. Not what form of Government comes the neareſt to the Primitive practice, but whether any be abſolutely determined. Several things propounded for reſolving the Queſtion. What the form of Church-Government was under the Law. How far Chriſtians are bound to obſerve that. Neither the neceſſity of ſuperiority, nor the unlawfulneſs can be proved thence.

which is acknowledging a form of Government neceſſary, and the Governours of the Church perpetual; whether the particular form whereby the Church muſt be governed, be determined by any poſitive Law of God, which unalterably binds all Chriſtians to the obſervation of it. By Church here I mean not a particular Congregation, but ſuch a ſociety which comprehends in it many of theſe leſſer Congregations united together in one body under a form of Government. The forms of Government in controverſie, the Queſtion being thus ſtated, are only theſe two; the particular officers of ſeveral Churches acting in an equality of power, which are commonly called a College of Preſbyters; or a ſuperior order above the ſtanding Miniſtry, having the power of juriſdiction and ordination belonging to it by vertue of a divine inſtitution. Which order is by an Antonomaſia called Epiſcopacy. The Queſtion now is not which of theſe two doth come the neareſt to Apoſtolical practice, and the firſt inſtitution, which hath hitherto been the controverſie ſo hotly debated among us; but whether either of theſe two forms be ſo ſettled by a jus divinum, that is, be ſo determined by a poſitive Law of God, that all the Churches of Chriſt are bound to obſerve that one form ſo determined, without variation from it: or whether Chriſt hath not in the ſetling of his Church (provided there be ſome form of Government, and a ſetled Miniſtry for the exerciſe of it,) left it to the prudence of every particular Church, conſiſting of many Congregations, to agree upon its own form which it judgeth moſt conducing to the end of Government in that particular Church. Αὐτοῦ ῥόδος, αὐτοῦ πήδημα. Here now we fix our ſelves, and the firſt thing we do is to agree upon our ways of reſolution of this Queſtion, whereby to come to an end of this debate. And the moſt probable way to come to an iſſue in it, is to go through all the ways whereon men do fix an unalterable divine right, and to ſee whether any of theſe do evince a divine right ſetled upon a poſitive Law or no, for one of theſe forms. The pleas then for ſuch a divine right are theſe. Either ſome former Law ſtanding in force under the Goſpel, or ſome plain inſtitution of a new Law by Chriſt in forming his Church; or the obligatory nature of Apoſtolical practice, or the General ſenſe of the Primitive Church, to which we ſhall add by way of Appendix, the Judgment of the chief Divines and Churches ſince the Reformation; if we go happily through theſe, we may content our ſelves with having obtained the thing we aim at.

§. 2. The firſt inquiry then is, whether any former Law of God concerning a form of Government for his Church, either by perſons acting in an equality of power, or ſubordination of one order to another, under the Goſpel, doth remain in force or no, binding Chriſtians to the obſerving of it. The Reaſon why I begin with this, is, becauſe I obſerve the diſputants on both ſides make uſe of the Pattern under the Law to eſtabliſh their form by. * Thoſe who are for ſuperiority of one order above another in the Government of the Church, derive commonly their firſt argument from the Pattern under the Law. † Thoſe who are for an equality of power in the perſons acting in Government, yet being for a ſubordination of Courts, they bring their firſt argument for that, from the Jewiſh Pattern. So that theſe latter are bound by their own argument, though uſed in another caſe, to be ruled in this Controverſie by the Jewiſh Pattern. For why ſhould it be more obligatory as to ſubordination of Courts, than as to the ſuperiority of orders? If it holds in one caſe, it muſt in the other. And if there be ſuch a Law for ſuperiority ſtanding unrepealed, there needs no new Law to inforce it under the Goſpel. We ſhall therefore firſt inquire what foundation

dation there is for either Form in that pattern, and how far the argument drawn from thence is obligatory to us now. For the practice then in the Jewiſh Church, That there was no univerſal equality in the Tribe of Levi, which God ſingled out from the reſt for his own ſervice, is obvious in Scripture. For there we find Prieſts above the Levites; the family of Aaron being choſen out from the other families of Cohath (one of the three Sons of Levi) to be employed in a nearer attendance upon God's ſervice, than any of the other Families. And it muſt be acknowledged, that among both Prieſts and Levites there was a ſuperiority; for God placed Eleazar over the Prieſts, Elizaphan over the Cohathites, Numb. 2. v. 30, 34, 35. Eliaſaph over the Gerſhonites; Zuriel over the Merarites, and theſe are called נשיאים the rulers over the ſeveral Families; for it is ſaid of every one of them ונשיא בית אב he was the ruler over the houſe of his Father. Numb. 4. 28, 32. Neither were theſe equal, for over Eliaſaph and Zuriel God placed Ithamar, Numb. 4. 16. over Elizaphan and his own Family, God ſet Eleazar, who by reaſon of his authority over all the reſt, is called נשיא נשיאי the Ruler of the rulers of Levi; and beſides theſe, there were under theſe rulers ראשי אבות the chief fathers of the ſeveral diſtinct Families, as they are called, Exodus 6. 25. Thus we briefly ſee the ſubordination that there was in the Tribe of Levi; the Levites firſt, over them the heads of the Families, over them the Rulers of the chief of the heads, over them Ithamar, over both Prieſts and Levites, Eleazar; over all, Aaron the High-Prieſt.

§. 3. There being then ſo manifeſt an inequality among them, proceed we to ſhew how obligatory this is under the Goſpel. For that end it will be neceſſary to conſider whether this imparity and ſuperiority were peculiarly appointed by God for the Eccleſiaſtical Government of the Tribe of Levi, as it conſiſted of perſons to be employed in the ſervice of God, or it was only ſuch an inequality and ſuperiority as was in any other Tribe. If only common with other Tribes, nothing can be inferred from thence peculiar to Eccleſiaſtical Government under the Goſpel, any more than from the Government of other Tribes to the ſame kind of Government in all civil States. We muſt then take notice that Levi was a particular diſtinct Tribe of its ſelf, and ſo not in ſubordination to any other Tribe; for they had the heads of their Fathers as well as others, Exodus 6. 25. and although when they were ſetled in Canaan, their habitations were intermixt with other Tribes in their forty eight Cities, yet they were not under the Government of thoſe Tribes among whom they lived, but preſerved their Authority and Government entire among themſelves. And therefore it was neceſſary there ſhould be the ſame Form of Government among them, which there was among the reſt. The whole body of the Nation then was divided into thirteen Tribes; theſe Tribes into their ſeveral Families; ſome ſay ſeventy, which they called משפחות. theſe Families were divided into ſo many houſholds, כתים their houſholds into perſons נכרים over the ſeveral perſons were the ſeveral Maſters of Families; over the ſeveral houſholds were the Captains of 1000 and 100, 50———10; over the Families, I ſuppoſe were the heads of the Fathers. And over the thirteen Tribes were the ראשי אבות המטות the chief Fathers of the Tribes of the Children of Iſrael, Numb. 32. 28. and we have the names of them ſet down, Numb. 34. 17, &c. So that hitherto we find nothing peculiar to this Tribe, nor proper to it as employed in the ſervice of God. For their ſeveral Families had their ſeveral heads, and Eleazar over them as chief of the Tribe. And ſo we find throughout Numbers 2. all the heads of the ſeveral Tribes are named and appointed by God, as Eleazar was.

§. 4. The only things then which ſeem proper to this Tribe were, the ſuperiority of the Prieſts over the Levites in the ſervice of God, and the ſupereminent power of the High-Prieſt, as the Type of Chriſt. So that nothing can be inferred from the order under the Law, to that under the Goſpel, but from one of theſe two. And from the firſt there can be nothing deduced but this, that as there was a ſuperiority of Offices under the Law, ſo likewiſe ſhould there be under the Goſpel, which is granted by all in the ſuperiority of Prieſts over Deacons, to whom theſe two anſwer in the Church of God, in the judgment of thoſe who contend for a higher order by divine inſtitution above Preſbyters. And withal we muſt conſider that there was under that order no power of juriſdiction inveſted in the Prieſts over the Levites, but that was in the heads of the Families; and ordination there could not be, becauſe their office deſcended by ſucceſſion in their ſeveral Families. Thoſe who would argue from Aaron's power, muſt either bring too little, or too much from thence: Too little, if we conſider his office was typical and ceremonial, and as High-Prieſt, had more immediate reſpect to God than men, Heb. 5. 1. and therefore Eleazar was appointed over the ſeveral Families during Aaron's life-time, and under Eleazar's his ſon Phinehas. Too much, if a neceſſity be urged for the continuance of the ſame authority in the Church of God, which is the argument of the Papiſts, deriving the Pope's Supremacy from thence. Which was acutely done by Pope Innocentius the third, the Father of the Lateran Council, who proved that the Pope may exerciſe temporal juriſdiction from that place in Deuteronomy 17. 8. and that by this reaſon, becauſe Deuteronomy did imply the ſecond Law, and therefore what was there written, in Novo Teſtamento debet obſervari, muſt be obſerved under the Goſpel, which according to them, is a new Law.

§. 5. All that can be inferred then from the Jewiſh pattern, cannot amount to any obligation upon Chriſtians, it being, at the beſt, but a judicial Law, and therefore binds us not up as a poſitive Law, but only declares the equity of the thing in uſe then. I conclude then, that the Jewiſh pattern is no ſtanding Law for Church-Government now, either in its common or peculiar Form of Government; but becauſe there was ſome ſuperiority of order then, and ſubordination of ſome perſons to others, under that Government, that ſuch a ſuperiority and ſubordination is no ways unlawful under the Goſpel, for that would deſtroy the equity of the Law. And though the Form of Government was the ſame with that of other Tribes, yet we ſee God did not bind them to an equality, becauſe they were for his immediate ſervice, but continued the ſame way as in other Tribes; thence I infer, that there is no neceſſary obligation upon Chriſtians to continue that Form under the Jews, becauſe their Laws do not bind us now; ſo neither is there any repugnancy to Law, in ſuch a ſubordination, but it is very agreeable with the equity of it, being inſtituted for peace and order, and therefore ought not to be condemned for Antichriſtian. The Jewiſh pattern then of Government neither makes equality unlawful, becauſe their Laws do not oblige now; nor doth it make ſuperiority unlawful, becauſe it was practiſed then. So that notwithſtanding the Jewiſh Pattern, the Church of Chriſt is left to its own liberty for the choice of its Form of Government, whether by an equality of power in ſome perſons, or ſuperiority and ſubordination of one order to another.

Chap. IV.

Whether Chriſt hath determined the Form of Government by any poſitive Laws. Arguments of the neceſſity why Chriſt muſt determine it, largely anſwered; as, Firſt, Chriſt's faithfulneſs compared with Moſes, anſwered, and retorted; and proved, that Chriſt did not inſtitute any Form of Church-Government, becauſe no ſuch Law for it as Moſes gave; and we have nothing but general rules, which are applyable to ſeveral Forms of Government.—The Office of Timothy and Titus, what it proves, in order to this queſtion: The Lawfulneſs of Epiſcopacy ſhewn thence, but not the Neceſſity. A particular Form; how far neceſſary, as Chriſt was the Governour of his Church; the ſimilitudes the Church is ſet out by, prove not the thing in queſtion. Nor the difference of Civil and Church-Government; nor Chriſt's ſetting Officers in his Church; nor the inconvenience of the Church's power in appointing new Officers. Every Miniſter hath a power reſpecting the Church in common, which the Church may reſtrain. Epiſcopacy thence proved lawful; the argument from the Scripture's perfection anſwered.

§. 1. WE come then from the Type to the Antitype, from the rod of Aaron to the root of Jeſſe, from the Pattern of the Jewiſh Church, to the Founder of the Chriſtian: To ſee whether our Lord and Saviour hath determined this Controverſie, or any one Form of Government for his Church, by any univerſally binding Act or Law of his. And here it is pleaded more hotly by many, that Chriſt muſt do it, than that he hath done it. And therefore I ſhall firſt examine the pretences of the neceſſity of Chriſt's determining the particular Form; and then the arguments that are brought that he hath done it. The main Pleas that there muſt be a perfect Form of Church-Government laid down by Chriſt, for the Church of God, are from the compariſon of Chriſt with Moſes, from the equal neceſſity of Forms of Government now, which there is for other ſocieties, from the perfection and ſufficiency of the Scriptures; all other arguments are reducible to theſe three heads. Of theſe in their order. Heb. 1. 2, 5, 6.

Arg. 1. Firſt, From the compariſon of Chriſt with Moſes, they argue thus; If Moſes was faithful in his houſe as a ſervant, much more Chriſt as a ſon; now Moſes appointed a particular Form of Government for the Church under the Old Teſtament, therefore Chriſt did certainly lay down a Form of Church-Government for the New Teſtament.

Anſ. 1. To this I anſwer, Firſt: Faithfulneſs implies the diſcharge of a Truſt repoſed in one by another: ſo that it is ſaid, Ver. 2. he was faithful to him that appointed him: Chriſt's faithfulneſs then lay in diſcharging the work which his Father laid upon him, which was the work of mediation between God and us; and therefore the compariſon is here inſtituted between Moſes as typical Mediator, and Chriſt as the true Mediator; that as Moſes was faithful in his work, ſo was Chriſt in his. Now Moſes his faithfulneſs lay in keeping cloſe to the Pattern received in the Mount, that is, obſerving the commands of God: Now therefore if Chriſt's being faithful in his office, doth imply the ſetling any one form of Government in the Church, it muſt be made appear that the ſetling of this form was part of Chriſt's mediatory work, and that which the Father commanded him to do as Mediator; and that Chriſt received ſuch a form a form from the Father for the Chriſtian Church, as Moſes did for the Iſa. 9. 6. Jewiſh. To this it is ſaid, that the Government is laid upon Chriſt's ſhoulders, Mat. 28.18. and all power is in his hands; and therefore it belongs to him as Mediator. Chriſt, I grant, is the King of the Church, and doth govern it outwardly by his Laws, and inwardly by the conduct of his ſpirit; but ſhall we ſay that therefore any one form of Government is neceſſary, which is neither contained in his Laws, nor dictated by his ſpirit?

the main original of miſtakes here, is, the confounding the external and internal Government of the Church of Chriſt, and thence whenſoever men read of Chriſt's power, authority and government, they fanſie it refers to the outward Government of the Church of God, which is intended of his internal mediatory power over the hearts and conſciences of men. But, withal, I acknowledge, that Chriſt, for the better government of his Church and people, hath appointed officers in his Church, inveſted them by vertue of his own power, with an authority to preach and baptize, and adminiſter all Goſpel ordinances in his own name, that Mat. 28. 18, 19. is, by his authority; for it is clearly made known to us in the word of God, that Chriſt hath appointed theſe things. But then, whether any ſhall ſucceed the Apoſtles in ſuperiority of power over Preſbyters, or all remain governing the Church in an equality of power, is no where determined by the will of Chriſt in Scripture, which contains his Royal-Law; and therefore we have no reaſon to look upon it as any thing flowing from the power and authority of Chriſt as mediator, and ſo not neceſſarily binding Chriſtians.

§. 2. Secondly, I anſwer, If the correſpondency between Chriſt and Moſes in their work, doth imply an equal exactneſs in Chriſt's diſpoſing of every thing in his Church, as Moſes did among the Jews; then the Church of Chriſt muſt be equally bound to all circumſtances of worſhip as the Jews were. For there was nothing appertaining in the leaſt to the worſhip of God, but was fully ſet down even to the pins of the Tabernacle in the Law of Moſes; but we find no ſuch thing in the Goſpel. The main duties and ordinances are preſcribed indeed, but their circumſtances and manner of performance are left as matters of Chriſtian liberty, and only couched under ſome general rules; which is a great difference between the Legal and Goſpel ſtate. Under the Law all ceremonies and circumſtances are exactly preſcribed; but in the Goſpel we read of ſome general rules of direction for Chriſtians carriage in all circumſtantial things. Theſe four eſpecially contain all the directions
1 Cor. 14. 40. of Scripture concerning circumſtantials. All things to be done decently
1 Cor. 14. 26. and in order; all to be done for edification. Give no offence. Do all to the glory of God. So that the particular circumſtances are left to Chriſtian 1 Cor. 10. 32. liberty with the obſervation of general rules. It is evident as to 1 Cor. 10. 31. Baptiſm and the Lord's-Supper, which are unqueſtionably of divine inſtitution, yet as to the circumſtances of the adminiſtration of them, Rom. 14. 6, 7. how much leſs circumſtantial is Chriſt than Moſes was! as to Circumciſion and the Paſſover under the Law, the age, time, perſons, manner, place, form, all fully ſet down, but nothing ſo under the Goſpel; whether Baptiſm ſhall be adminiſtred to infants or no, is not ſet down in expreſs words, but left to be gathered by analogy and conſequences; what manner it ſhall be adminiſtred in, whether by dipping or ſprinkling, is not abſolutely determined; what form of words to be uſed, whether Acts 2. 38. 8. 12. 19. 5. in the name of all three perſons, or ſometimes in the name of Chriſt only, as in the Acts we read (if that be the ſenſe, and not rather in Chriſt's

Chriſt's name, i.e. by Chriſt's authority) whether ſprinkling or dipping ſhall be thrice, as ſome Churches uſe it, or only once, as others. Theſe things we ſee relating to an ordinance of divine inſtitution, are yet paſt over without any expreſs command determining either way in Scripture. So as to the Lord's-Supper; what perſons to be admitted to it, whether all viſible profeſſors, or only ſincere Chriſtians: upon what terms, whether by previous examination of Church-Officers, by an open profeſſion of their faith, or elſe only by their own tryal of themſelves, required of them as their duty by their Miniſters; whether it ſhould be always after ſupper, as Chriſt himſelf did it; whether taken faſting, or after meat; whether kneeling, or ſitting, or leaning; whether to be conſecrated in one form of words, or ſeveral: Theſe things are not thought fit to be determined by any poſitive command of Chriſt, but left to the exerciſe of Chriſtian liberty; the like is as to preaching the word, publick Prayer, ſinging of Pſalms; the duties are required, but the particular modes are left undetermined. The caſe is the ſame as to Church-Government. That the Church be governed, and that it be governed by its proper Officers, are things of divine appointment; but whether the Church ſhould be governed by many joining together in an equality, or by ſubordination of ſome perſons to others, is left to the ſame liberty which all other circumſtances are, this being not the ſubſtance of the thing its ſelf, but only the manner of performance of it.

3. I anſwer, That there is a manifeſt diſparity between the Goſpel §. 3.
and Jewiſh Sate; and therefore reaſons may be given why all punctilioes were determined then, which are not now; as,

1. The perfection and liberty of the Goſpel-ſtate above the Jewiſh. The Law was only as a Pedagogy, the Church then in her infancy and nonage, and therefore wanted the Feſcues of Ceremonies to direct her, and every part of her leſſon ſet her, to bring her by degrees to ſkill and exactneſs in her underſtanding the myſtery of the things repreſented to her. But muſt the Church now grown up under Chriſt, be ſtill ſub ferulâ, and not dare to vary in any circumſtance, which doth not concern the thing it ſelf. A boy at ſchool hath his leſſon ſet him, and the manner of learning it preſcribed him in every mode and circumſtance. But at the Univerſity hath his Lectures read him, and his work ſet, and general directions given, but he is left to his own liberty how to perform his work, and what manner to uſe in the doing of it. So it was with the Church under age, every mode and circumſtance was determined; but when the fulneſs of time was come, the Church being then grown up, the main offices themſelves were appointed, and general directions given; but a liberty left how to apply and make uſe of them, as to every particular caſe and occaſion. Things moral remain ſtill in their full force, but circumſtantials are left more at liberty by the Goſpel liberty; as a Son that is taught by his Father, while he is under his inſtruction, muſt obſerve every particular direction for him in his learning; but when he comes to age, though he obſerves not thoſe things as formerly, yet his Son-ſhip continues, and he muſt obey his Father as a Child ſtill, though not in the ſame manner. The ſimilitude is the Apoſtles, Galat. 4. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 10. which he there largely amplifies to this very purpoſe of freeing Chriſtians from Judaical ceremonies.

2. The form of Government among the Jews in the Tribe of Levi, was agreeable to the form of Government among the other Tribes; and ſo Moſes was not more exact in reference to that, than to any other; and thoſe perſons in that Tribe who were the chief before the inſtitution of the Aaronical Prieſthood, were ſo after; but now under the Goſpel, people are not under the ſame reſtrictions for civil government by a Judicial Law, as they were then. For the form of Eccleſiaſtical Government then took place among them as one of their Judicial Laws; And therefore if the argument hold, Chriſt muſt as well preſcribe a form for civil government as Eccleſiaſtical, if Chriſt in the Goſpel muſt by his faithfulneſs follow the pattern of Moſes. But if Chriſt be not bound to follow Moſes's Pattern as to Judicial Law for his Church and people, neither is he as to a form of Eccleſiaſtical Government, becauſe that was a part of their civil and Judicial Law.

3. The people of the Jews was a whole and entire people, ſubſiſting by themſelves when one ſet form of Government was preſcribed them; but it is otherwiſe now under the Goſpel. The Church of Chriſt was but forming in Chriſt's own time, nor the Apoſtles, in whoſe time we read of but ſome Cities and no whole Nations converted to the Faith; and therefore the ſame form of Government would not ſerve a Church in its firſt conſtitution, which is neceſſary for it when it is actually formed. A Paſtor and Deacons might ſerve the Church of a City while believers were few, but cannot when they are increaſed into many Congregations, and ſo proportionably when the Church is inlarged to a whole Nation, there muſt be another form of Government then. Therefore they who call for a National Church under the Goſpel, let them firſt ſhew a Nation converted to the faith, and we will undertake to ſhew the other. And this is the chief reaſon why the Churches Polity is ſo little deſcribed in the New Teſtament, becauſe it was only growing then: and it doth not ſtand to reaſon, that the coat which was cut out for one in his infancy, muſt of neceſſity ſerve him when grown a man; which is the argument of thoſe who will have nothing obſerved in the Church, but what is expreſſed in Scripture. The Apoſtles looked at the preſent ſtate of a Church in appointing officers, and ordered things according to the circumſtances of them, which was neceſſary to be done in the founding of a Church; and the reaſon of Apoſtolical practice binds ſtill, though not the individual action, that as they regulated Churches for the beſt conveniency of Governing them, ſo ſhould the Paſtors of Churches now. But of this largely afterwards.

4. Another difference is, that the people of the Jews lived all under one Civil Government; but it is otherwiſe with Chriſtians who live under different forms of Civil Government. And then by the ſame reaſon, that in the firſt inſtitution of their Eccleſiaſtical Government it was formed according to the Civil; by the ſame reaſon muſt Chriſtians do under the Goſpel, if the argument holds that Chriſt muſt be faithful as Moſes was. And then becauſe Chriſtians do live under ſeveral and diſtinct forms of Civil Government, they muſt be bound by the Law of Chriſt, to contemperate the Government of the Church to that of the State. And what they have gained by this for their cauſe, who aſſert the neceſſity of any one form from this argument, I ſee not; but on the contrary this is evident, that they have evidently deſtroyed their own principle by it. For if Moſes did preſcribe a form of Government for Levi agreeable to the form of the Commonwealth, and Chriſt be as faithful as Moſes was, then Chriſt muſt likewiſe order the Government of Chriſtian Churches according to that of the State, and ſo muſt have different forms as the other hath. Thus much will ſerve abundantly to ſhew the weakneſs of the argument drawn from the agreement of Chriſt and Moſes, for the proving any one form of Government neceſſary; but this ſhall not ſuffice. I now ſhall ex abundanti from the anſwers to this argument, lay down ſeveral arguments that Chriſt did never intend to inſtitute any one form of Government in his Church.

§. 4. 1. Whatever binds the Church of God as an inſtitution of Chriſt, muſt bind as an univerſal ſtanding Law; but one form of Government in the Church cannot bind it as a ſtanding Law. For whatever binds as a ſtanding Law, muſt either be expreſſed in direct terms as ſuch a Law; or deduced by a neceſſary conſequence from his Laws, as of an univerſally binding nature; but any one particular form of Government in the Church, is neither expreſſed in any direct terms by Chriſt, nor can be deduced by juſt conſequence; therefore no ſuch form of Government is inſtituted by Chriſt. If there be any ſuch Law, it muſt be produced, whereby it is determined in Scripture, either that there muſt be ſuperiority or equality among Church Officers as ſuch after the Apoſtles deceaſe. And though the Negative of a Fact holds not, yet the Negative of a Law doth, elſe no ſuperſtition. I have not yet met with any ſuch produced, and therefore ſhall ſee what conſequences can be made of a binding nature. To this I ſay, that no conſequences can be deduced to make an inſtitution, but only to apply one to particular caſes: becauſe poſitives are in themſelves indifferent without inſtitution and Divine appointment; and therefore that muſt be directly brought for the making a Poſitive univerſally binding, which it doth not in its own nature do. Now here muſt be an inſtitution of ſomething merely poſitive ſuppoſed, which in its ſelf is of an indifferent nature; and therefore no conſequence drawn can ſuffice to make it unalterably binding, without expreſs declaration that ſuch a thing ſhall ſo bind: for what is not in its own nature moral, binds only by vertue of a command, which command muſt be made known by the will of Chriſt, ſo that we may underſtand its obligatory nature. So that both a conſequence muſt be neceſſarily drawn, and the obligation of what ſhall be ſo drawn muſt be expreſſed in Scripture: which I deſpair of ever finding in reference to any one form of Government in the Church.

2. If the ſtanding Laws for Church Government be equally applyable to ſeveral diſtinct forms, then no one form is preſcribed in Scripture; but all the ſtanding Laws reſpecting Church Government, are equally applyable to ſeveral forms. All the Laws occurring in Scripture reſpecting Church Government, may be referred to theſe three heads. Such as ſet down the Qualifications of the perſons for the office of Government, ſuch as require a right management of their office, and ſuch as lay down rules for the management of their office. Now all theſe are equally appliable to either of theſe two forms we now diſcourſe of. We begin then with thoſe which ſet down the qualifications of the perſons imployed in Government; thoſe we have largely and fully ſet down by St. Paul in his Ordo to Timothy and Titus, preſcribing what manner of perſons thoſe ſhould be who are to be imployed in the Government of the Church. 1 Tim. 3. 1, 8. Titus 1. 5, 10. A Biſhop muſt be blameleſs as the Steward of God not ſelf willed, not ſoon angry, not given to Wine, no ſtriker, &c. All theſe and the reſt of the Qualifications mentioned, are equally required as neceſſary in a Biſhop, whether taken for one of a ſuperior order above Preſbyters, or elſe only for a ſingle Preſbyter; how ever that be, if he hath a hand in Church Government, he muſt be ſuch a one as the Apoſtle preſcribes; And ſo theſe commands to Timothy and Titus given by Paul, do equally reſpect and concern them, whether we conſider them as Evangeliſts acting by an extraordinary commiſſion, or as fixed Paſtors over all the Churches in their ſeveral precincts; ſo that from the commands themſelves nothing can be inferred either way to determine the Queſtion; only one place is pleaded for the perpetuity of the office Timothy was imployed in, which muſt now be examined: the place is 1 Tim. 6. 13, 14. I give thee charge in the ſight of God, &c. that thou keep this commandment without ſpot, unrebukeable, until the appearing of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. From hence it is argued thus: The commandment here was the charge which Timothy had of Governing the Church; this Timothy could not keep perſonally till Chriſt's ſecond coming; therefore there muſt be a ſucceſſion of Officers in the ſame kind till the ſecond coming of Chriſt. But this is eaſily anſwered. For firſt, It is no ways certain what this command was which St. Paul ſpeaks of; ſome underſtand it of fighting the good fight of Faith, others of the precept of love, others moſt probably the ſum of all contained in this Epiſtle, which I confeſs implies in it (as being one great part of the Epiſtle) Paul's direction of Timothy for the right diſcharge of his office; but granting that the command reſpects Timothy's office, yet I anſwer, ſecondly, It manifeſtly appears to be ſomething perſonal, and not ſucceſſive, or at leaſt nothing can be inferr'd for the neceſſity of ſuch a ſucceſſion from this place which it was brought for: Nothing being more evident than that this command related to Timothy's perſonal obſervance of it. And therefore, thirdly, Chriſt's appearing here, is not meant of

Hom. 18. in 1 *Tim.To.*4. his ſecond coming to judgment, but it only imports the time of Timothy's deceaſe; ſo Chryſoſtome μέχρι τῆς σῆς τελευτῆς, μέχρι τῆς ἐξόδου. So Eſtius Epiſtol. 80. ad Heſych. underſtands it, uſque ad exitum vitæ; and for that end brings that ſpeech of Auguſtine, Tunc unicuique veniet dies adventus Domini, cum venerit ei dies, ut talis hinc exeat, qualis judicandus eſt illo die. And the reaſon why the time of his death is ſet out by the coming of Chriſt, is ἵνα μᾶλλον αὐτὸν διεγείρῃ, as Chryſoſtom, and from him Theophylact obſerves; to incite him more, both to diligence in his work and patience under ſufferings, from the conſideration of Chriſt's appearance. The plain meaning of the words then is the ſame with that, Revel. 2. 10. Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a Crown of life. Nothing then can be hence inferred as to the neceſſary ſucceſſion of ſome in Timothy's office, whatever it is ſuppoſed to be.

§. 5. Secondly, The precepts of the Goſpel requiring a right management Acts 20.28. of the work, are equally appliable to either form. Taking heed to the flock over which God hath made them overſeers; is equally a duty, whether by flock we underſtand either the particular Church of Epheſus, or the adjacent Churches of Aſia; whether by Overſeers we underſtand ſome acting over others, or all joyning together in an equality. So ex-
2Tim. 4. 2. horting, reproving, preaching in ſeaſon and out of ſeaſon, doing all things
1 Tim. 5. 1. 21. ἄνευ προκρίματος, without raſh cenſures and partiality; watching over the
Heb. 13. 17. flock as they that muſt give an account: Laying hands ſuddenly on no man:
1 Tim. 5. 22. 1 Tim. 5. 19. rebuking not an elder, but under two or three witneſſes. And whatever precepts of this nature we read in the Epiſtles to Timothy and Titus, may be equally appliable to men acting in either of theſe two forms of Government: There being no precept occuring in all thoſe Epiſtles preſcribing to Timothy, whether he muſt act only as a Conſul in Senatu

with the conſent of the Preſbytery, or whether by his ſole power he ſhould determine what was the common intereſt, and concern of thoſe Churches he was the Superintendent over. Neither doth the Apoſtle determine at all in thoſe Epiſtles chiefly concerning Church Government, whether upon the removal of Timothy or Titus thence as Evangeliſts, as ſome pretend, or upon their death as fixed Paſtors and Biſhops, as others, any ſhould ſucceed them in the power they enjoyed, or no: nor in what manner the Paſtors of the ſeveral Churches ſhould order things of common concernment. Which would ſeem to be a ſtrange omiſſion, were either of theſe two forms ſo neceſſary, taken excluſively of the other, as both parties ſeem to affirm. For we cannot conceive but if the being and right conſtitution of a Church did depend upon the manner of the Governours acting in it, but that care which Paul had over all the Churches, would have prompted him (eſpecially being aſſiſted and guided by an infallible ſpirit in the penning thoſe Epiſtles) to have laid down ſome certain rules for the acting of the Paſtors of the Churches after the departure of Timothy and Titus. Conſidering eſpecially that the Epiſtles then written by him, were to be of ſtanding perpetual uſe in the Church of God; and by which the Churches in after ages were to be guided as well as thoſe that were then in being. The Apoſtle in both Epiſtles takes care for a ſucceſſion of Paſtors in thoſe Churches: Timothy is charged to commit the things that he had heard of Paul to faithful men, 2 Tim. 2. 2. who ſhall be fit to teach others. Had it not been as requiſite to have charged him to have committed his power of Government to men fit for that, had the Apoſtle looked on the form of Government to be as neceſſary as the office of preaching? Paul, ſaith he, left Titus in Crete Titus 1. 5. on purpoſe to ſettle the Churches and ordain Preſbyters in every City: had it not been as neceſſary to have ſhewed in what order the Churches muſt be ſetled, and what power did belong to thoſe Preſbyters, and how they ſhould act in the governing their Churches, had he thought the conſtitution of the Churches did depend upon the form of their acting? We ſee here then that St. Paul doth not expreſs any thing neceſſarily inferring any one conſtant form to be uſed in the Church of God. And whence can we infer any neceſſity of it, but from the ſcriptures laying it down as a duty that ſuch a form and no other there muſt be uſed in the Church of God? For all that we can ſee then by Paul's direction for Church Government, (when if ever, this ſhould have been expreſſed) it was left to the Chriſtian wiſdom and prudence of the Churches of Epheſus and Crete to conſult and determine in what manner the Government of their Churches ſhould be provided for, upon the departure of Timothy and Titus from them.

§. 6. But here it will be ſoon replyed, that though nothing be expreſſed in Pauls Epiſtles to Timothy and Titus, yet Paul*'s appointing* Timothy and Titus over thoſe Churches, did determine the form of Government, and they were intruſted with a power to provide for future Governours after them.

To this I anſwer: Firſt, the ſuperiority which Timothy and Titus had over thoſe Churches, doth not prove that form of Government neceſſary in all Churches; I diſpute not whether they were Evangeliſts or no, or acted as ſuch in that ſuperiority (of that afterwards) it is evident they might be ſo; there being no convincing argument to the contrary. And the bare poſſibility of the truth of the negative deſtroys the neceſſity of the Affirmative of a Propoſition. As, ſi poſſibile eſt hominem non eſſe animal, then that propoſition is falſe Neceſſe eſt hominem eſſe animal. For Neceſſe eſt eſſe, and Non poſſibile eſt non eſſe, being æquipollents on the one ſide; and Poſſibile eſt non eſſe, Et non neceſſe eſt eſſe, being æquipollents on the other; Poſſibile eſt non eſſe muſt be contradictory to neceſſe eſt eſſe, as Non poſſibile eſt non eſſe is to Non neceſſe eſt eſſe. So that if only the poſſibility of their acting as Evangeliſts, that is, by an extraordinary commiſſion, be evicted, which I know none will deny, the neceſſity of their acting as fixed Biſhops is deſtroyed, and conſequently the neceſſity of the continuance of their office too, which depends upon the former. For if they acted not as Biſhops, nothing can be drawn from their example neceſſarily inforcing the continuance of the Superiority which they enjoyed. But though nothing can be inferred from hence as to the neceſſity of that office to continue in the Church, which Timothy and Titus were inveſted in; yet from the ſuperiority of that power which they enjoyed over thoſe Churches, whether as Evangeliſts, or as fixed Biſhops, Theſe two things may be inferred. Firſt, That the ſuperiority of ſome Church officers over others is not contrary to the rule of the Goſpel: for all parties acknowledge the ſuperiority of their power above the Preſbyters of the ſeveral Cities; only the continuance of this power is diſputed by many. But if they had any ſuch power at all, it is enough for my preſent deſign, viz. that ſuch a ſuperiority is not contrary to the Goſpel rule: or that the nature of the Government of the Church doth not imply a neceſſary equality among the Governours of it. Secondly, Hence I infer, that it is not repugnant to the conſtitution of Churches in Apoſtolical times, for men to have power over more than one particular congregation. For ſuch a power Timothy and Titus had; which had it been contrary to the nature of the regiment of Churches, we ſhould never have read of in the firſt planted Churches. So that if thoſe popular arguments of a neceſſary relation between a Paſtor and particular people, of perſonal knowledge, care and inſpection, did deſtroy the lawfulneſs of extending that care and charge to many particular congregations, they would likewiſe overthrow the nature, end and deſign of the office which Timothy and Titus acted in: which had a relation to a multitude of particular and congregational Churches. Whether their power was extraordinary or no, I now diſpute not; but whether ſuch a power be repugnant to the Goſpel or no; which from their practice is evident that it is not. But then others who would make this office neceſſary, urge farther, that Timothy or Titus might ordain and appoint others to ſucceed them in their places and care over all thoſe Churches under their charge. To which I anſwer firſt, What they might do is not the queſtion, but what they did; as they might do it, ſo they might not do it, if no other evidence be brought to prove it; for Quod poſſibile eſt eſſe, poſſibile eſt non eſſe. Secondly, Neither what they did, is the whole queſtion, but what they did with an opinion of the neceſſity of doing it, whether they were bound to do it or no? and if ſo, whether by any Law extant in Scripture and given them by Paul in his Epiſtles, or ſome private command and particular inſtructions when he deputed them to their ſeveral charges: If the former, that Law and command muſt be produced, which will hardly be, if we embrace only the received Canon of the Scripture. If the latter, we muſt then fetch ſome ſtanding rule and Law from unwritten traditions: for no other evidence can be given of the Inſtructions by word of mouth given by Paul to Timothy and Titus, at the taking their charges upon them. But yet, Thirdly, Were it only the matter of fact that was diſputed, that would hold a controverſie ſtill, viz. whether any did ſucceed Timothy and Titus in their offices. But this I ſhall leave to its proper place to be diſcuſſed, when I come to examine the argument from Apoſtolical ſucceſſion. Thus we ſee then that neither the qualification of the perſons, nor the commands for a right exerciſe of the office committed to them, nor the whole Epiſtles to Timothy or Titus, do determine any one form of Government to be neceſſary in the Church of God.

§. 7. Thirdly, Let us ſee whether the general rules do require any one form; which rules, in that they are general, can determine nothing of the authority it ſelf, as to its particular mode, being intended only for the regulation of the exerciſe of the authority in which Men are placed. And it is an evidence that nothing is particularly determined in this caſe, when the Spirit of God lays down ſuch rules for Government which are appliable to diſtinct forms. Otherwiſe certainly ſome rule would have been laid down, which could have been applied to nothing but to that one form. That none take the office of preaching without a call, nor go without ſending, will equally hold, whether the power of ordination lie in a Biſhop with Preſbyters, or in Preſbyters acting with equality of power. That offenders be cenſured, and complaints made to the Church in caſe of ſcandal, determines nothing to whom the power of juriſdiction doth ſolely belong, nor what that Church is which muſt receive theſe complaints. That all things be done with decency and order, doth preſcribe nothing wherein that decency lies, nor how far that order may extend; nor yet who muſt be the Judges of that decency and order. That all be done for edification, and the common benefit of the Church, doth no ways reſtrain the Church's freedom in diſpoſing of its ſelf as to the form of its Government, ſo the aim of the Church be for the better edification of the body of the Church, and to promote the benefit of it. But, methinks, theſe general orders and rules for diſcipline, do imply the particular manner of Government to be left at liberty to the Church of God, ſo that in all the ſeveral forms theſe general rules be obſerved. Whereas had Chriſt appointed a ſuperior order to govern other ſubordinate officers and the Church together; Chriſt's command for governing the Church would have been particularly addreſſed to them; and again, had it been the will of Chriſt there ſhould be no ſuperior order above the Paſtors of particular Churches, there would have been ſome expreſs and direct prohibition of it; which becauſe we no where read, it ſeems evident that Chriſt hath left both the one and the other to the freedom and liberty of his Church. So much ſhall ſerve, in this place, to ſhew how improbable it is that Chriſt did ever preſcribe any one form of Government in his Church, ſince he hath only laid down general rules for the management of Church-Government.

Rom. 10. 14.

§. 8. But this will not yet ſuffice thoſe who plead that Chriſt muſt determine one immutable form of Government in his Church; but although it be a high preſumption to determine firſt what Chriſt muſt do, before we examine what he hath done, yet we ſhall ſtill proceed and examine all the pretences that are brought for this opinion. The next thing then which is generally urged for it, is the equal neceſſity of Chriſt's inſtituting a certain form, as for any other Legiſlator who models a Common-wealth.

mon-wealth. Now, for anſwer to this, I ſay, firſt, That Chriſt hath inſtituted ſuch an immutable Government in his Church as is ſufficient for the ſucceſſion and continuance of it; which is all which Founders of Common-wealths do look after, viz. that there be ſuch an order and diſtinction of Perſons, and ſubordination of one to the other, that a ſociety may ſtill be preſerved among them; now this is ſufficiently provided for by Chriſt appointing officers continually to rule his Church, and eſtabliſhing Laws for the perpetuating of ſuch officers; ſo whatſoever is neceſſary in order to the general ends of Government, is acknowledged to be appointed by Jeſus Chriſt. Until then that it be proved that one form of Government is in it ſelf abſolutely neceſſary for the being of a Church, this argument can prove nothing; for what is drawn from neceſſity, will prove nothing but in a caſe of neceſſity. Secondly, I anſwer, That thoſe things which are not abſolutely neceſſary to the being of a Church, or left to Chriſt's liberty, whether he will determine them or no; and are no farther to be looked on as neceſſary than as he hath determined by his Laws whether they ſhall be or no in his Church. The thing will be thus cleared: When I read that Zaleucus, Lycurgus, or Numa did form a Common-wealth, and make Laws for it; I preſently conclude that there muſt be ſome order or diſtinction of perſons in this Common-wealth, and ſome rules whereby perſons muſt be governed, and whereby others muſt rule: But I cannot hence infer that Zaleucus, or Lycurgus did inſtitute Monarchical, Ariſtocratical, or Democratical Government, becauſe any of theſe forms might be agreeable to their deſign; and therefore what kind of Government they did appoint; can no otherwiſe be known than by taking a view of the Laws which they made in order thereto. So it is in reference to Chriſt; when we read that Chriſt hath inſtituted a Church always to continue in the world, we preſently apprehend that there muſt be ſome power and order in the members of that ſociety, and Laws for the governing it; but we cannot hence gather that he hath bound up his Officers to act in any one form, becauſe ſeveral forms might in themſelves equally tend to the promoting the end of Government in his Church. And therefore what Chriſt hath expreſly determined in his poſitive Laws, muſt be our rule of judging in this caſe, and not any preſumption of our own, that ſuch a form was neceſſary, and therefore Chriſt muſt inſtitute and appoint it. Which is fully expreſſed by judicious Mr. Hooker, whoſe words will ſerve as a ſufficient anſwer to this objection. As for thoſe marvelous diſcourſes, whereby they adventure to argue that God muſt needs have done the thing which they imagine was to be done; I muſt confeſs I have often wonder'd at their exceeding boldneſs herein. When the queſtion is, whether God have delivered in Scripture, (as they affirm he hath) a complete particular immutable form of Church Polity: Why take they that other both preſumptuous and ſuperfluous labour to prove he ſhould have done it; there being no way in this caſe to prove the deed of God, ſaving only by producing that evidence wherein he hath done it? But if there be no ſuch thing apparent upon record, they do as if one ſhould demand a Legacy by force and vertue of ſome written Teſtament, wherein there being no ſuch thing ſpecified, he pleadeth that there it muſt needs be, and bringeth arguments from the love and good will which always the Teſtator bore, imagining that theſe or the like proofs will convict a Teſtament to have that in it, which other men can no where by reading find. In matters which concern the actions of God, the moſt dutiful way on our part, is to ſearch what God hath done, done, and with meekneſs to admire that, rather than to diſpute what he in congruity of reaſon ought to do. Thus he, with more to the ſame purpoſe. The ſum then of the anſwer to this Argument, is this, that nothing can be infer'd of what Chriſt muſt do, from his relation to his Church, but what is abſolutely neceſſary to the being of it; as for all other things, they being arbitrary conſtitutions, we can judge no more of the neceſſity of them, than as we find them clearly revealed in the Word of God. And therefore the Plea muſt be removed from what Chriſt muſt do, to what he hath done, in order to the determining the particular form of Government in his Church.

But ſtill it is argued for the neceſſity of a particular form of Government in the Church, from the ſimilitudes the Church is ſet out by in Scripture; it is call'd a Vine, and therefore muſt have Keepers; an Houſe, and therefore muſt have Government; a City, and therefore muſt have a Polity; a Body, and therefore muſt have Parts. I anſwer, Firſt, All theſe Similitudes prove only that which none deny, that there muſt be order, power, and a Government in the Church of God; we take not away the Keepers from the Vine, nor the Government from the Houſe, nor Polity from the City, nor diſtinction of Parts from the Body; we aſſert all theſe things as neceſſary in the Church of God. The Keepers of the Vine to defend and prune it; the Governours of the Houſe to rule and order it; the Polity of the City to guide and direct it; the Parts of the Body to compleat and adorn it. But, Secondly, None of theſe Similitudes prove what they are brought for; viz. that any one immutable form of Government is determined. For may not the Keepers of the Vine uſe their own diſcretion in looking to it, ſo the flouriſhing of the Vine be that they aim at? and if there be many of them, may there not be different orders among them, and ſome as Superviſors of the others work? The Houſe muſt have Governours, but thoſe that are ſo, are entruſted with the power of ordering things in the Houſe according to their own diſcretion; and where there is a multitude, is there not diverſity of offices among them? and is it neceſſary that every houſe muſt have officers of the ſame kind? In great and large Families there muſt be more particular diſtinct orders and offices, than in a ſmall and little one. The City muſt have its Polity; but all Cities have not the like, ſome have one form, and ſome another, and yet there is a City ſtill, and a Polity too. A Body muſt have all its Parts; but are all the Parts of the Body equal to one another? it ſufficeth that there be a proportion, though not equality in them; the ſeveral Parts of the Body have their ſeveral offices; and yet we ſee the Head is ſuperintendent over them all; and thus if we make every particular Church a Body, yet it follows not that the form of cloathing that Body muſt always be the ſame; for the manner of Government is rather the Cloathing to the Body, than the Parts of it; the Governours indeed are Parts of the Body, but their manner of governing is not; that may alter according to the proportion and growth of the Body, and its faſhion change for better conveniency.

But if theſe Similitudes prove nothing, yet certainly, ſay they, the difference as to Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Government will; for though there may be different forms in civil Government, which are therefore call'd an Ordinance of man, yet there muſt be but one in Church Government, which is an Ordinance of God, and Chriſt hath appointed Officers to rule it. I anſwer, Firſt, We grant and acknowledge a difference between the Church and the Common-wealth; they are conſtituted for other ends; the one Political, the other Spiritual; one Temporal, the other Eternal; they ſubſiſt by different Charters; the one given to men as men, the other to men as Chriſtians: They act upon different Principles, the one to preſerve civil Rights, the other to promote an eternal Intereſt; nay, their formal Conſtitution is different, for a man by being a member of a Common-wealth, doth not become a member of the Church, and by being excommunicated out of the Church, doth not ceaſe to be a member of the Common-wealth: The Officers of the one are clearly diſtinct from the other, the one deriving their power from the Law of Chriſt, the other from God's general Providence. The Magiſtrate hath no power to excommunicate formally out of the Church, any more than to admit into it, nor have Church-officers any power to caſt men out of the Common-wealth. We ſee then there is a difference between Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Government: But then I anſwer, Secondly, The power of the Magiſtrate is not therefore called an Ordinance of man, becauſe of the mutability of its form, and as diſtinguiſhed from the form of Church Government. For, Firſt, The Apoſtle ſpeaks not of the form of Government, but of the power; ſubmit to every Ordinance of man, &c. the ground of ſubmiſſion is not the form, but the power of Civil Government; and therefore there can be no oppoſition expreſſed here between the forms of Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Government: But if any ſuch oppoſition be, it muſt be between the powers; and if this be ſaid as to Civils, that the power is an ordinance of man in that ſenſe, (whereas Rom. 13. 1. Paul ſaith it is of God) yet as to the Church, it is freely acknowledged that the power is derived from God. Secondly, The Civil power is not called ἀνθρωπίνη κτίσις, becauſe it is a creature of man's making, and ſo ſubject to mens power, but the ground of that ſpeech is, becauſe all Civil power reſpects men as men, without any farther connotation. Humana dicitur, non quod ab hominibus ſit excogitata, ſed quod hominum ſit propria, ſaith Beza. And to the ſame purpoſe Calvin, Humana dicitur ordinatio, non quod humanitùs inventa fuerit; ſed quod propria hominum eſt digeſta & ordinata vivendi ratio. Piſcator, Humanam appellat, non quod magiſtratus homines authores habeat, ſed quod homines eam gerant. So then the Civil power is not called an Ordinance of man, as it is of man's ſetting up, but as it is proper to man; and ſo if there be any oppoſition between the Civil and Church power, it is only this, that the one belongs to men as men, the other to men as Chriſtians. Thirdly, Although it be granted that Chriſt hath appointed and ſet up his own officers in his Church, yet it doth not thence follow, that he hath determined in what manner they ſhall rule his Church. It is true, Eph. 4. 12. Chriſt hath ſet up in his Church, ſome Apoſtles, ſome Evangeliſts, and ſome Paſtors and Teachers; but it doth not thence follow, that Chriſt hath determined, whether the power of Apoſtles and Evangeliſts ſhould continue in his Church or no, as it implyed ſuperiority over the ordinary Paſtors of the Churches; nor whether the Paſtors of the Church ſhould act in an equality in their governing Churches. I grant that all Church-Government muſt be performed by officers of Chriſt's appointing, but that which I ſay is not determined in Scripture, is the way and manner whereby they ſhall govern Churches in common.

§. 11. It is yet farther argued, That if the form of Church-Government be not immutably determined in Scripture, then it is in the Church's power, to make new officers which Chriſt never made, which muſt be a plain addition to the Laws of Chriſt, and muſt argue the Scripture of Imperfection. This being one of the main arguments, I have reſerved it to the place of the Triarii, and ſhall now examine what ſtrength there lies in it. To this therefore I anſwer, Firſt, Thoſe officers are only ſaid to be new, which were never appointed by Chriſt, and are contrary to the firſt appointments of Chriſt for the regulating of his Church; ſuch it is granted the Church hath no power to inſtitute; but if by new officers be meant only ſuch as have a charge over more than one particular congregation, by the conſent of the Paſtors themſelves, then it is evident ſuch an office cannot be ſaid to be new; for beſides the general practice of the Church of God, from the firſt Primitive Times, which have all conſented in the uſe of ſuch officers; we find the foundation of this power laid by Chriſt himſelf, in the power which the Apoſtles were inveſted in, which was extended over many, both Churches and Paſtors; but if it be ſaid, The Apoſtolical power being extraordinary, muſt ceaſe with the perſons which enjoyed it; I anſwer, Firſt, What was extraordinary did ceaſe; but all the diſpute is, what was extraordinary, and what not; ſome things were ordinary in them, as Preaching, Baptizing, Ordaining, Ruling Churches, ſome things were again extraordinary, as immediate Miſſion from Chriſt, (the main diſtinguiſhing note of an Apoſtle) a power of working Miracles, to confirm the truth of what they preached: Now the Queſtion is, whether the power which they enjoyed over Preſbyters and Churches, be to be reckoned in the firſt or the ſecond number. It muſt therefore be proved to be extraordinary, before it can be ſaid to ceaſe with them; and that muſt be done by ſome arguments proper to their perſons; for if the arguments brought be of a common and moral nature, it will prove the office to be ſo too. Secondly, By ceaſing may be meant, either ceaſing as to its neceſſity, or ceaſing as to its lawfulneſs: I ſay not, but that the neceſſity of the office, as in their Perſons, for the firſt preaching and propagating the Goſpel, did ceaſe with them; but that after their death it became unlawful for any particular perſons to take the care and charge of Dioceſan Churches, I deny. For to make a thing unlawful which was before lawful, there muſt be ſome expreſs prohibition forbidding any farther uſe of ſuch a power, which I ſuppoſe men will not eaſily produce in the Word of God.

§. 12. I anſwer therefore, Secondly, That the extending of any Miniſterial power, is not the appointing of any new Office; becauſe every Miniſter of the Goſpel hath a relation in actu primo to the whole Church of God; the reſtraint and enlargement of which power is ſubject to poſitive determinations of prudence and conveniency in actu ſecundo; and therefore if the Church ſee it fit for ſome men to have this power enlarged for better government in ſome, and reſtrained in others, that enlargement is the appointing no new office, but the making uſe of a power already enjoyed for the benefit of the Church of God. This being a foundation tending ſo fully to clear the lawfulneſs of that Government in the Church which implies a ſuperiority and ſubordination of the officers of the Church to one another; and the Churches uſing her prudence in ordering the bounds of her officers, I ſhall do theſe two things: Firſt, Shew that the power of every Miniſter of the Goſpel doth primarily and habitually reſpect the Church in common. Secondly, That the Church may in a peculiar manner ſingle out ſome of its officers for the due adminiſtration of Eccleſiaſtical power. Firſt, That every Miniſter of the Goſpel hath a power reſpecting the Church in common: This I find fully and largely proved by thoſe who aſſert the equality of the power of Miniſters; Firſt, From Chriſt's beſtowing the ſeveral offices of the Church for the uſe of the whole Church, Eph. 4. 12, 13. Chriſt hath ſet Apoſtles, &c. Paſtors and Teachers in his Church; now this Church muſt needs be the Catholick viſible Church, because indiſputably the Apoſtles office did relate thereto, and conſequently ſo muſt that of Paſtors and Teachers too: Again, The end of theſe offices is the building up the body of Chriſt, which cannot otherwiſe be underſtood than of his whole Church; elſe Chriſt muſt have as many bodies as the Church hath particular congregations. Which is a new way of Conſubſtantiation. Secondly, The miniſterial office was in being before any particular congregations were gathered; for Chriſt upon his aſcenſion to glory gave theſe gifts to men; and the Apoſtles were impowered by Chriſt before his aſcenſion; either then they were no Church-officers, or if they were ſo, they could have no other Correlate, but the whole body of the Church of God then lying under the power of darkneſs, a few perſons excepted. Thirdly, Becauſe the main deſign of appointing a Goſpel-Miniſtry, was the converſion of Heathens and Infidels; and if theſe be the proper object of the miniſterial Function, then the office muſt have reference to the whole Church of Chriſt; elſe there could be no part of that office performed towards thoſe who are not yet converted. Fourthly, Elſe a Miniſter can perform no office belonging to him as ſuch, beyond the bounds of his particular congregation, and ſo can neither preach nor adminiſter the Sacraments to any other but within the bounds of his own particular place and people. Fifthly, Becauſe Miniſters by baptizing do admit men into the catholick viſible Church, (elſe a man muſt be baptized again every time he removes from one Church to another) and none can admit beyond what their office doth extend to; therefore it is evident that every particular Paſtor of a Church hath a relation to the whole Church: To which purpoſe our former obſervation is of great uſe, viz. That particular Congregations are not of God's primary intention, but for mens conveniency, and ſo conſequently is the fixedneſs of particular Paſtors to their ſeveral places for the greater conveniency of the Church; every Paſtor of a Church then hath a relation to the whole Church; and that which hinders him from the exerciſe of this power, is not any unlawfulneſs in the thing, but the preſerving of order and conveniency in the Church of God. This being premiſed, I ſay, Secondly, That the officers of the Church may in a peculiar manner attribute a larger and more extenſive power to ſome particular perſons for the more convenient exerciſe of their common power. We have ſeen already that their power extends to the care of the Churches in common, that the reſtraint of this power is a matter of order and decency in the Church of God: Now in matters of common concernment, without all queſtion, it is not unlawful when the Church judgeth it moſt for edification, to grant to ſome the executive part of that power, which is originally and fundamentally common to them all. For our better underſtanding of this, we muſt conſider a twofold power belonging to Church-officers, a power of order, and a power of juriſdiction; for in every Preſbyter, there are ſome things inſeparably joined to his Function, and belonging to every one in his perſonal capacity, both in actu primo, and in actu ſecundo, both as to the right and power to do it, and the exerciſe and execution of

1 Cor. 12. 28, 29.

Eph. 4. 8. Mat. 28. 19.

of that power, ſuch are Preaching the Word, viſiting the ſick, adminiſtring Sacraments, &c. but there are other things which every Preſbyter hath an aptitude, and a jus to in actu primo, but the limitation and exerciſe of that power doth belong to the Church in common, and belong not to any one perſonally, but by a farther power of choice or delegation to it, ſuch is the power of viſiting Churches, taking care that particular Paſtors diſcharge their duty; ſuch is the power of ordination and Church cenſures, and making rules for decency in the Church; this is that we call the power of juriſdiction. Now this latter power, though it belongs habitually and in actu primo to every Preſbyter; yet being about matters of publick and common concernment, ſome farther authority in a Church conſtituted is neceſſary beſides the power of order; and when this power, either by conſent of the Paſtors of the Church, or by the appointment of a Chriſtian Magiſtrate, or both, is devolved to ſome particular perſons, though quoad aptitudinem the power remain in every Preſbyter, yet quoad executionem it belongs to thoſe who are ſo appointed. And therefore Camero determines that Ordinatio non fit à paſtore quatenus paſtor eſt, ſed quatenus ad tempus ſingularem authoritatem obtinet, i. e. That Ordination doth not belong to the power of order but to the power of juriſdiction, and therefore is ſubject to poſitive reſtraints, by prudential determinations. By this we may underſtand how lawful the exerciſe of an Epiſcopal power may be in the Church of God, ſuppoſing an equality in all Church officers as to the power of order. And how incongruouſly they ſpeak, who ſuppoſing an equality in the Preſbyters of Churches at firſt, do cry out, that the Church takes upon her the office of Chriſt, if ſhe delegates any to a more peculiar exerciſe of the power of juriſdiction.

De Eccleſia in Mat. 18. 15. Tom. I. op. in 4. p. 27.

§. 13. The laſt thing pleaded why an immutable form of Church Government muſt be laid down in Scripture, is from the perfection and ſufficiency of the Scriptures; becauſe otherwiſe the Scriptures would be condemned of imperfection. But this will receive an eaſie diſpatch: For, Firſt, The controverſie about the perfection of the Scriptures, is not concerning an eſſential or integral perfection, but a perfection ratione finis & effectuum in order to its end: now the end of it is to be an adæquate rule of faith and manners, and ſufficient to bring men to ſalvation; which it is ſufficiently acknowledged to be, if all things neceſſary to be believed or practiſed be contained in the Word of God: now that which we aſſert not to be fully laid down in Scripture, is not pleaded to be any ways neceſſary, nor to be a matter of faith, but ſomething left to the Churches liberty; but here it is ſaid by ſome, that this is adding to the Law of God, which deſtroys the Scriptures perfection: therefore I anſwer, Secondly, Whatever is done with an opinion of the neceſſity of doing it, deſtroys the Scriptures perfection if it be not contained in it: for that were to make it an imperfect rule; and in this ſenſe every additio perficiens is additio corrumpens, becauſe it takes away from the perfection of the rule which it is added to; and thus Popiſh traditions are deſtructiue of the Scriptures ſufficiency. But the doing of any thing not poſitively determined in Scripture, not looking upon it as a thing we are bound to do from the neceſſity of the thing, and obſerving the general rules of Scriptures in the doing of it, is far from deſtroying the perfection or ſufficiency of the Word of God. Thirdly, All eſſentials of Church Government, are contained clearly in Scripture: The eſſentials of Church Government, are ſuch as are neceſſary to the preſervation of ſuch a ſociety as the Church is; now all theſe things have been not only granted, but proved to be contained in Scripture; but whatever is not ſo neceſſary in its ſelf, can only become neceſſary by vertue of God's expreſs command, and what is not ſo commanded, is accidental and circumſtantial, and a matter of Chriſtian liberty, and ſuch we aſſert the form of Church Government to be. It is not our work to enquire, why God hath determined ſome things that might ſeem more circumſtantial than this, and left other things at liberty, but whether God hath determined theſe things or no. Which determination being once cleared, makes the thing ſo commanded neceſſary as to our obſervance of it: but if no ſuch thing be made appear, the thing remains a matter of liberty, and ſo the Scriptures perfection as to the neceſſaries in order to ſalvation, is no ways impeached by it. So much now for the neceſſity of Chriſt's determining the particular form of Government: we now proceed to the conſideration of Chriſt's actions, whether by them the form of Church Government is determined or no?

CHAP. V.

Whether any of Chriſt's actions have determined the form of Government. All power in Chriſt's hands for Governing his Church: what order Chriſt took in order thereto when he was in the world. Calling Apoſtles the firſt action reſpecting outward Government; the name and office of Apoſtles cleared; an equality among them proved during our Saviour's life. Peter not made Monarch of the Church by Chriſt. The Apoſtles power over the ſeventy Diſciples conſidered, with the nature and quality of their office, Matth. 20. 25, 26, 27. largely diſcuſſed and explained. It makes not all inequality in Church officers unlawful; by the difference of Apoſtles and Paſtors of Churches. Matth. 18, 15. How far that determines the form of Church Government. No evidence of any exact order for Church Government from thence, Matth. 16. 15, 16, 17, 18. conſidered how far that concerns the Government of the Church.

§. 1. HAving conſidered and anſwered the Arguments which are brought, why Chriſt muſt determine the particular form of Government: Our next taſk will be to enquire into thoſe actions of our Saviour which are conceived to have any plauſible aſpect towards the ſetling the form of Government in his Church. And were it not that men are generally ſo wedded to an hypotheſis they have once drunk in by the prevalency of intereſt or education, we might have been ſuperſeded from our former labour, but that men are ſo ready to think that opinion to be moſt neceſſary, which they are moſt in love with, and have appeared moſt zealous for. Men are loth to be perſuaded that they have ſpent ſo much breath to ſo little purpoſe, and have been ſo hot and eager for ſomewhat, which at laſt appears to be a matter of Chriſtian liberty. Therefore we find very few that have been ever very earneſt in the maintaining or promoting any matter of opinion, but have laid more weight upon it, than it would really bear; leſt men ſhould think, that with all their ſweat and toil, they only beat the air, and break their teeth in cracking a nut, with a hole in it; which if they had been ſo wiſe as to diſcern before, they might have ſaved their pains for ſomewhat which would have better recompenced them. But thus it generally fares with men; they ſuck in principles according as intereſt and education diſpoſeth them, which being once in, have the advantage of inſinuating themſelves into the underſtanding, and thereby raiſe a prejudice againſt what ever comes to diſturb them; which prejudice being the Yellow Jaundiſe of the ſoul, leaves ſuch a tincture upon the eyes of the underſtanding, that till it be cured of that Icteriſm, it cannot diſcern things in their proper colours. Now this prejudice is raiſed by nothing more ſtrongly, than when the opinion received is entertained upon a preſumption, that there is a Divine ſtamp and Impreſs upon it, though no ſuch Effigies be diſcernable there. Hence come all the ſeveral contending parties about Church Government, equally to plead an intereſt in this Jus Divinum, and whatever opinion they have eſpouſed, they preſently conceive it to be of no leſs than Divine extract and Original. And as it ſometimes was with great perſonages among the Heathens, when their miſcarriages were diſcernable to the eye of the world, the better to palliate them among the vulgar, they gave themſelves out to be impregnated by ſome of their adored Deities; ſo I fear it hath been among ſome whoſe Religion ſhould have taught them better things, when either faction, deſign, or intereſt, hath formed ſome conceptions within them ſuitable thereunto, to make them the more paſſable to the world, they are brought forth under the pretence of Divine truths. Far be it from me to charge any ſincere, humble, ſober Chriſtians with an offence of ſo high a nature, who yet may be poſſeſſed with ſome miſtakes and apprehenſions of this nature; but theſe are only wrought on by the Maſters of parties, who know, unleſs they fly ſo high, they ſhall never hit the game they aim at. This is moſt diſcernable in the Factors for the Roman Omnipotency (as Paulus the fifth was call'd Omnipotentiæ Pontificiæ Conſervator) they who ſee not that Intereſt and Faction upholds that Court rather than Church, may well be preſumed to be hoodwinked with more than an implicite faith; and yet if we believe the great ſupporters of that intereſt, the power they plead for is plainly given them from Chriſt himſelf, and not only offer to prove that it was ſo, but that it was not conſiſtent with the wiſdom of Chriſt that it ſhould be otherwiſe. Leſt I ſhould ſeem to wrong thoſe of any religion, hear what the author of the Gloſs upon the Extravagancies (ſo they may well be called) ſaith to this purpoſe, Extravag. unum ſanctum. applying that place of our Saviour, all power is given to me in heaven and earth, Matth. 28. 18. to the Pope, adds theſe words, Non videretur Dominus diſcretus fuiſſe, ut cum reverentia ejus loquar, niſi unicum poſt ſe talem vicarium reliquiſſet, qui hæc omnia poſſet. We ſee by this what blaſphemies men may run into, when they argue from their private fancies and opinions, to what muſt be done by the Law of Chriſt. It therefore becomes all ſober Chriſtians impartially to inquire what Chriſt hath done, and to ground their opinions only upon that, without any ſuch preſumptuous intruſions into the Counſels of Heaven. We here therefore take our leave of the diſpute, why it was neceſſary a form of Government ſhould be eſtabliſhed, and now enter upon a ſurvey of thoſe grounds which are taken from any paſſages of our Saviour, commonly produced as a foundation for any particular Forms.

§. 2. I ſhall not ſtand to prove that Chriſt as Mediator hath all the power over the Church in his own hands, it being a thing ſo evident from Scripture, and ſo beyond all diſpute with thoſe whom I have to deal with. Mat. 28. 18. Iſa. 9. 6. In which reſpect he is the only head of the Church, and from whom all divine right for authority in the Church muſt be derived. Which right can ariſe only from ſome actions or Laws of Chriſt, which we therefore now ſearch into. The firſt publick action of Chriſt after his ſolemn entrance upon his office, which can be conceived to have any reference to the Government of his Church, was the calling the Apoſtles. In whom for our better methodizing this diſcourſe, we ſhall obſerve theſe three ſeveral ſteps. Firſt, When they were called to be Chriſt's Diſciples. Secondly, When Chriſt ſent them out with a power of Miracles. Thirdly, When he gave them their full Commiſſion of acting with Apoſtolical power all the world over. Theſe three ſeaſons are accurately to be diſtinguiſhed; for the Apoſtles did not enjoy ſo great power when they were diſciples, as when they were ſent abroad by Chriſt; neither had they any proper power of Church-Government after that ſending Mat. 28. 18, 19. forth, till after Chriſt's reſurrection, when Chriſt told them, all power was put into his hands, and therefore gave them full commiſſion to go and preach the Goſpel to all nations. The firſt ſtep then we obſerve in the Apoſtles towards their power of Church-Government, was in their firſt calling to be Diſciples. Two ſeveral calls are obſerved in Scripture, concerning the Apoſtles; the firſt was more general, when they were called only to follow Chriſt; the ſecond more ſpecial when Chriſt told them what he called them to, and ſpecified and deſcribed their office to them, by telling them he would make them Fiſhers of Men. We ſhall endeavour to digeſt the order of their calling as clearly and as briefly as we can. Our bleſſed Saviour, about the thirtieth year of his Luke 3.23. age, ſolemnly entring upon the diſcharge of his prophetical office in making known himſelf to be the true Meſſias to the world, to make his Mat. 3. 13. Mat. 4. 1. appearance more publick, goes to Jordan, and is there baptized of John; preſently after he is led up by the Spirit into the wilderneſs, where he continued forty days. In this ſpace of time John removes from Jordan John 1.29. and comes on the other ſide to Bethabara; thither Chriſt comes to John; John not only owns Chriſt himſelf, but tells his diſciples this was he into whoſe name he had baptized them. Upon this, two of John's John 1.37. diſciples leave their Maſter and follow Chriſt. Theſe two are the firſt diſciples we ever read our Saviour had; whereof the one was Andrew, Peter's brother, and the other probably conceived to be John (it being his cuſtom to conceal his name when he ſpeaks of himſelf); Andrew calls his brother Peter; Chriſt next day calls Philip; Philip he finds Nathaniel. And this as far as we read, was the firſt number of Chriſt's diſciples. John 2. 2. John 2.17, 23. Here we find two or three gathered together in the name of Chriſt, and Chriſt (truly) in the midſt of them. Theſe diſciples it appears ſtaid with Chriſt ſome time, for they went with him to the marriage in Cana: and after went up with him to Jeruſalem, when many profeſſed to be John 3. 22. John 4. 1. his diſciples; from thence he goes into Judea, where he gathers many diſciples, and baptizeth them. After this he returns with his diſciples, by the way of Samaria into Galilee: and theſe diſciples being now again at home, in probability did return for their livelihood to their old imployments for ſome ſmall time, Chriſt having not yet commanded them to forſake all and follow him. Not long after (about a years ſpace from the firſt calling them) Jeſus being in Galilee goes to the lake of Luke 5. 1. Genezareth, there he finds Andrew and Peter fiſhing: after the miracle there Math. 4. 18, 19. wrought, he then in a more ſolemn manner calls them to leave their Mark 1.16, 17. imployment, for he had deſigned them for a greater, which was to be Fiſhers of men. Whereby our Saviour expreſſeth the care, pains, diligence, gence, deſign and end of the Miniſterial function he had appointed them for. Andrew and Peter preſently leave all and follow Chriſt; the like do James and John, whom they met with a little farther upon the ſhore. And now thoſe who were before but as common Diſciples, are admitted into a higher order, and bred up by Chriſt, as perſons deſigned for an employment of ſo high a nature. We ſee here a neceſſity of making a double call of the Apoſtles; elſe it were impoſſible to reconcile the narration of John with the other Evangeliſts. Therefore Auguſtine thinks their firſt being with Chriſt in John, was only for preſent ſatisfaction who he was, which as ſoon as they underſtood and admired, they returned to their own habitations. Thomas he makes three ſeveral callings of them, the firſt ad agnitionem & familiaritatem, which is that in John; the ſecond ad Diſcipulatum that ſpoken of in Luke 5. 1. the third ad adheſionem, Mat. 4. 18. Mark 1. 16. But I ſee no reaſon to make the ſtory in Luke to be different from that of Matthew and Mark; the former ſome ſay was vocatio ad fidem, a general preparatory call to the latter; the latter was vocatio ad munus Apoſtolicum; although they were not choſen to be Apoſtles till afterwards, yet now Chriſt made them Candidates of the Apoſtleſhip, & amicos interioris admiſſionis, in order to that great employment he had deſigned them for. Farther we muſt take notice that from the time of the Baptiſm of John, the Apoſtles did generally continue with Chriſt, which appears from the qualification of an Apoſtle given by Peter at the choice of Matthias: Of thoſe men which have companied with us all the time that the Lord Jeſus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptiſm of John, unto the ſame day he was taken up from us. The ſtrength of which teſtimony is impregnable for proving that the Apoſtles did generally continue with Chriſt after their being called to follow him; but that time from the baptiſm of John muſt not be taken ſtrictly, for many of the Apoſtles, as Matthew, &c. were not called till ſome time after. About four months after Chriſt's more ſolemn calling of the Apoſtles, at the time of Pentecoſt, as Chemnitius conjectures, our Saviour proceeds to a ſolemn choice of them into their offices, which is deſcribed by Luke 6. 13. after he had prayed the whole night before, v. 12. Mark he acquaints us with the ends of Chriſt's chuſing them: Firſt, That they might continually attend upon him the better to be fitted for their employment afterwards; which he expreſſeth, when he adds, that he might ſend them out to preach, and to give them power over Devils and Diſeaſes, to caſt out the one, and to cure the other. Their actual ſending out was not (ſay ſome) till half a year after, which is the ſtory related by Mat. 10. 1. near a twelve month, (ſay others) but preſently, upon their choice, Chriſt makes the Sermon in the Mount, as appears by the comparing Luke 6. 17, 20. with Mat. 5. 1. wherein, among other things, our Saviour takes occaſion to declare their duty to them, telling them, they were the Light of the world, &c. which he doth the more to fit them for the diſcharge of their employment.

§. 3. Having thus laid theſe things together about the Apoſtles, from their firſt calling, to the time of their miſſion, we ſhall take notice of theſe things from them which may relate to the office which the Apoſtles were called to, and to the government of the Church by them. Firſt, We here obſerve that our Saviour no ſooner began to preach the Goſpel himſelf, but he made choice of ſome perſons as a peculiar order of men, for the propagation of the Goſpel in the world. The peculiarity of the

Function of a Goſpel-Miniſtry under Chriſt was, we ſee, deſigned from Chriſt's firſt publick appearance in his office; he might have left the Apoſtles in the common order of Diſciples, had he not intended an office in his Church, diſtinct and peculiar from all other employments; and therefore it is obſervable that Chriſt did not call the Apoſtles off from their other employments, till he deſigned to make them Apoſtles; before, when they were only private Diſciples, they did follow their employments at ſome times ſtill; but when he calls them to be Fiſhers of Men, he bids them leave all and follow him. Secondly, We take notice of the admirable wiſdom of our Saviour in the choice he made of the perſons for firſt founding his Church; and the means he uſed to fit them for it. The perſons were ſuch as were moſt ſuitable to his deſign; the means ſuch as were moſt ſuitable to the perſons. The perſons were ſuch, who by reaſon of the known meanneſs of their condition, and ſuppoſed weakneſs of abilities, were the fitteſt to convince the world, that the doctrine which they preached was not the product of humane wiſdom, but the expreſs Image and character of Divine Truth; whoſe nakedneſs and ſimplicity would gain more upon mens belief by the power which accompanied the preaching of it, than the moſt refined and ſublimated notions of their wiſe men ſhould do, managed with the greateſt ſubtilty and prudence by the maintainers of them. Chriſt would make men ſee that his doctrine ſtood not in need either of the wiſdom or power of men, to defend or propagate it; and therefore made choice of the moſt unlikely inſtruments for that end; that mens 1 Cor. 2. 5. faith ſhould not ſtand in the wiſdom of men, but in the power of God. But withal we are to take notice of Chriſt's admirable wiſdom in the means he uſed to fit and qualifie them for the firſt builders of his Church; for although the power and efficacy of their preaching was wholly from God, and not from themſelves, yet our Saviour doth not preſently, upon his calling them, place them in the higheſt office he intended them for, but proceeds gradually with them, and keeps them a long time under his own eye and inſtruction, before he ſends them abroad; and that for two ends chiefly: Firſt, To be witneſſes of his actions. Secondly, To be auditors of his doctrine. Firſt, To be witneſſes of his actions, which was looked on by the Apoſtles, as the moſt neceſſary qualification for an Apoſtle, in the place fore-cited, Acts 1. 21, 22. Peter calls himſelf a witneſs of the ſufferings of Chriſt, 1 Pet. 5. 1. John ſaith, that which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have ſeen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the word of life; that which we have ſeen and heard, declare we unto you, 1 Joh. 1. 1, 3. whereby the credibility of the Goſpel was ſufficiently evidenced to the world, when the Preachers of it ſpake nothing but what their own ſenſes were witneſſes of, both as to the doctrines and actions of Chriſt; and therefore is no ways credible, they ſhould be deceived themſelves in what they ſpoke; and more improbable they would deceive others, whoſe intereſt lay wholly upon the truth of the doctrine which they preached; for by the very preaching of that doctrine they robb'd themſelves of all the comforts of life, and expoſed themſelves to a thouſand miſeries in this life; ſo that unleſs their doctrine was true in order to another life, they were guilty of the greateſt folly this world ever heard of. We ſee what care our Saviour took to ſatisfie the reaſons of men concerniug the credibility of his doctrine, when the perſons he employed in the founding of a Church upon it, were only ſuch as were intimately converſant with the whole life, doctrine, and works of him from whom they received it; and thereby we cannot ſuppoſe any ignorance in them concerning the things they ſpoke; and leſt men ſhould miſtruſt they might have a deſign to impoſe on others, he made their faithfulneſs appear, by their expoſing themſelves to any hazards to make good the truth of what they preached. Eſpecially having ſuch a Divine power accompanying them in the miracles wrought by them, which were enough to perſuade any rational men, that they came upon a true Embaſſie, who carried ſuch Credentials along with them. Another end of our Saviour's training up his Apoſtles ſo long in his School before he ſent them abroad, was, that they might be auditors of his doctrine, and ſo might learn themſelves before they taught others. Chriſt was no friend to thoſe haſty births which run abroad with the ſhell on their heads; no, although it was in his power to confer the gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, as well at their firſt entrance into Diſcipleſhip as afterwards, yet we ſee he nurtures and trains them up gradually, teaching them as Quintilian would have Maſters do, Guttatim, acquainting them now with one, then with another of the Myſteries of the Goſpel. Chriſt doth not overwhelm them with floods and torrents of diſcourſes, but gently drops now one thing into them, then another, by which way ſuch narrow-mouth'd veſſels would be the ſooneſt filled. Yea our Saviour uſeth ſuch an οἰκονομία, as the Greek Fathers call it, ſuch a prudent Temper in inſtructing them, that it is matter of juſt admiration to conſider under how great and ſtupendous ignorance of the main points of redemption, (Chriſt's death and reſurrection, and the nature of Chriſt's Kingdom) they diſcovered, after they had been ſome years under Chriſt's Tutorage. And we ſee what induſtry and diligence was uſed in the training up of thoſe for the Apoſtleſhip, who were in an immediate way ſent out by Chriſt. And it is very probable that upon the firſt ſending abroad, they taught not by immediate revelation, but only what they had learned from Chriſt during their being with him. Whence we ſee what a ſubordination there is in acquired parts, labour, and induſtry, to the teachings and inſpirations of the Divine Spirit; our Saviour looked not on his labour as loſt, although afterwards the Unction from the Holy One ſhould teach them all things. It was Chriſt's deſign to have them go מחיר אל——חיל from ſtrength to ſtrength, Pſal. 84. 7.

à domo ſanctuarii in domum doctrinæ, as the Chaldee Paraphraſt renders that place, from one School of learning to another. As under the Law, even thoſe that waited for the Ruach-hakkodeſh, the inſpiration of the Divine Spirit, were brought up in the Schools of the Prophets under inſtruction there; which was the place where they lay expecting the gentle gale of the Holy Spirit to carry them forth; which was the ground of Amos his complaint, that he was neither a Prophet, nor the ſon of a Amos 7.14.
Prophet; by which it ſeems evident, that God's ordinary courſe was to take ſome of the Sons of the Prophets out of the Colleges where they lived, and employ them in the Prophetical-office. But of this largely elſewhere. Such a School of the Prophets did our Saviour now erect, wherein he entred his Diſciples as Scholars, and educated them in order to the office he intended them for.

The next thing we take notice of, is the name and nature of that office which Chriſt call'd them to. They who derive the uſe of the name of Apoſtles, as apply'd by Chriſt to his Diſciples, either from the ἀποστολεῖς at Athens, by which name the Maſters of ſome Ships were

Suidas in v. call'd, as the Ships ἀπόστολοι, or from Heſychius his ἀπόστολοι, which he Digeſt.l.50. tit. 16. leg. 106. interprets νυμφαγωγοί, or from the ἀπόστολοι, in the ſenſe of the Civil Law, which ſignifie the dimiſſory Letters granted for appeals; or from Cont. Ebionitas. the Jewiſh שליחין as thereby were underſtood thoſe ἀπόστολοι, as Epiphanius calls them, who were as Aſſeſſors and Counſellors to the Patriarch of the Jews at Tiberias; or thoſe Officers who were ſent up and down by the Patriarch to gather up Tenths, firſt Fruits, and ſuch other Lib.16. tit. 8. things, who are call'd thence Apoſtoli in the Codex Theod. tit. de Judæis; all theſe, I ſay, do equally loſe their labour, and run far to fetch that which might be found much nearer home: Our Saviour taking the word from common uſe, but applying it in a ſpecial manner to a peculiar ſenſe, which is the cuſtom of the Scriptures. The original of the word properly imports ſuch as are employed by commiſſion from an*Exercit.14. Sect. 4.* other, for the diſpatch of ſome buſineſs in his name. So Caſaubon, (who was ſufficiently able to judge of the uſe of a Greek word) In communi Græcorum uſu ἀπόστολοι dicebantur certi homines, qui negotii gerendi gratiâ, magis quam deferendi nuntii, aliquo mittebantur. And ſo it is taken, John 13. 16. οὐδὲ ἀπόστολος μείζων τοῦ πέμψαντος αὐτὸν, He that is ſent is not greater than he that ſent him. Thence Epaphroditus, when employed upon a ſpecial meſſage to Paul, in the name of the Churches, is call'd ἀπόστολος ὑμῶν, Phil. 2. 25. which we tranſlate your meſſenger. And ſo Titus, and the two other, ſent to the Church of Co-2Cor. 8.23. rinth, to gather their charity, are call'd ἀπόστολοι ἐκκλησιῶν, the meſſengers of the Churches. Thence Paul fully renders the import and ſenſe of the word Apoſtle by πρεσβεύομεν, 2 Corinth. 5. 20. We act as Ambaſſadors for Chriſt. To which purpoſe it is obſervable, that the Septuagint, (whoſe Greek is moſt followed by the New Teſtament) do render the word שלח when it ſignifies to employ a meſſenger upon ſpecial ſervice, by ἀποστέλλειν, as 1 Kings 21. 11.——— 1 Kings 12. 18. Exod. 4. 30. and the very word ἀπόστολος is uſed in this ſenſe, 1 Kings 14. 6. where Abijah ſaith, I am ἀπόστολος πρὸς σὲ σκληρός, a ſad meſſenger to thee; for thus ſaith the Lord. Whereby the full ſenſe and importance of the word Apoſtle appears to be, one that is employed by a peculiar commiſſion from him that hath authority over him, for the doing ſome ſpecial ſervice. Thus were Chriſt's Diſciples called Apoſtles, from the immediate commiſſion which they had from Chriſt, for diſcharge of that work which he employed them in. Thence our Saviour makes uſe of the word ſending in the proper and peculiar ſenſe, when he gives the Apoſtles their commiſſions, in thoſe remarkable words of Chriſt to them. As the Father hath ſent me, ſo ſend I you, Joh. 20. 21. Whereby our Saviour delegates his power and authority which he had as Doctor of the Church, to his Apoſtles, upon his leaving the world, not in a privative way, ſo as to deſtroy his own authority over the Church, but in a cumulative way, inveſting them with that authority which they had not before, for both teaching and governing the Church. No argument then can be drawn for the right or form of Church-Government from Chriſt's actions towards his diſciples, before the laſt and full commiſſion was given unto them; becauſe they had no power of Church-Government before that time.

§. 5. Which will be farther cleared, if we conſider their firſt ſending out, ſpoken of, Mat. 10. 1. Mark 6. 7. Luke 9. 1. Several things lie in our way to be obſerved, in reference to this Miſſion of the Apoſtles. Firſt, That though the Apoſtles had been now for ſome competent time, not only called to their office, but ſolemnly choſen to it; yet we no where read that they did ever exerciſe that office till now they were ſent forth by Chriſt. They remained ſtill at Chriſt's feet, learning for their own inſtruction, and fitting themſelves for their future employment, and thought it no inconvenience while they lay for a wind, to lay in ſufficient lading and proviſion for their voyage. Baptize indeed they did before, Joh. 4. 2. but that I ſuppoſe was done by them by an immediate preſent order from Chriſt himſelf, being by as the chief in the action; thence Chriſt in one place is ſaid to baptize, Joh. 3. 22. and yet he is ſaid not to baptize, but his diſciples, Joh. 4. 2. Chriſt did it authoritatively, the diſciples miniſterially. Yet if we ſhould grant the diſciples did then baptize as private men after the received cuſtom of the Jews, (among whom only a Conſeſſus trium was requiſite to baptize a Proſelyte) this doth not at all take off from the peculiarity of a Function both to preach and baptize, becauſe as yet the Goſpel-Miniſtry was not inſtituted; and therefore what might be lawful before reſtraint, doth not follow it ſhould be ſo after; when all thoſe ſcattered Rays and Beams which were diſperſed abroad before, were gathered into the Miniſterial-office upon Chriſt's appointing it, as that great Hemiſphere of Light in the Creation was after ſwallowed up in the body of the Sun. But now were the Apoſtles firſt ſent out to preach, and now God firſt begins to null the Jewiſh-Miniſtry, and ſet up another inſtead of it, and makes good that threatning, that he was againſt the Ezek. 34. 10. Shepherds, and would require the flock at their hand, and cauſe them to ceaſe to feed the flock, &c. Here then we have the firſt exerciſe of the Apoſtles Miniſtry, for which we ſee, beſides their former call and choice, particular Miſſion was after neceſſary. Secondly, We obſerve, That the employment Chriſt ſent them upon now, was only a temporary employment, confined as to work and place, and not the full Apoſtolical work. The want of conſidering and underſtanding this, hath been the ground of very many miſtakes among men, when they argue from the occaſional precepts here given the Apoſtles, as from a ſtanding perpetual rule for a Goſpel-Miniſtry; whereas our Saviour only ſuited theſe inſtructions to the preſent caſe, and the nature and condition of the Apoſtles preſent employment; which was not to preach the Goſpel up and down themſelves, but to be as ſo many John Baptiſts, to call the people to the hearing of Chriſt himſelf; and therefore the doctrine they were to preach, was the ſame with his, the Kingdom Mat. 10. 7. of Heaven is at hand, whereby it appears their doctrine was only preparatory to Chriſt; it being only to raiſe up higher expectations of the Goſpel-ſtate under the Meſſias; and theſe were they whom the King now Mat. 22. 9 ſent into the high-ways, to invite men to the marriage-feaſt, and to bid them to come in to him. This was the only preſent employment of the Apoſtles in their firſt Miſſion, in which they were confined to the Cities of Judæa, that they might have the firſt refuſal of the Goſpel offers. This Miſſion then being occaſional, limited, and temporary, can yield no foundation for any thing perpetual to be built upon it. Thirdly, We obſerve, That thoſe whom Chriſt employed in the firſt diſperſing the Goſpel abroad, were furniſhed with arguments ſufficient to evince not only the credibility, but the certain truth of what they preached. Therefore Chriſt, when he now ſent them out, gave them ἐξουσίαν πνευμάτων, Mat. 10. 2. not only a mere power to work miracles, but a right conferred on them to do it as the Apoſtles of Chriſt. Theſe were the Credentials which the

Apoſtles carried along with them, to ſhew from whom they derived their power, and by whoſe authority they acted. And theſe were the moſt ſuitable to them, as making it appear that a divine preſence went along with them, and therefore they could not falſifie to the world in what they declared unto them; which was the beſt way for them to evidence the truth of their doctrine, becauſe it was not to be diſcovered by the evidence of the things themſelves, but it depended upon the teſtimony of the Author, and therefore the only way to confirm the truth of the doctrine, was to confirm the credibility of the Author, which was beſt done by doing ſomething above what the power of nature could reach unto. And this was the prerogative of the Apoſtles in their firſt Miſſion above John the Baptiſt; for of him it is ſaid, that he did no miracle. Fourthly, We obſerve, That the Apoſtles in this Miſſion were inveſted in no power over the Church, nor in any ſuperiority of order one over another. The firſt is evident, becauſe Chriſt did not now ſend them abroad to gather Churches, but only to call perſons to the doctrine of the Meſſias; and while Chriſt was in the world among them, he retained all Church power and authority in his own hand. When this temporary Miſſion expired, the Apoſtles lived as private perſons ſtill under Chriſt's Tutorage, and we never read them acting in the leaſt as Church-officers all that while. Which may appear from this one argument, becauſe all the time of our Saviour's being in the world, he never made a total ſeparation from the Jewiſh Church, but frequented with his diſciples the Temple-worſhip and ſervice to the laſt; although he ſuper-added many Goſpel-obſervations to thoſe of the Law. And therefore when no Churches were gathered, the Apoſtles could have no Church power over them. All that can be pleaded then in order to Church-Government, from the conſideration of the form of Government, as ſetled by our Saviour, muſt be either from a ſuppoſed inequality among the Apoſtles themſelves, or their ſuperiority over the LXX. Diſciples; or from ſome rules laid down by Chriſt, in order to the Government of his Church, of which two are the moſt inſiſted on, Mat. 20. 25. Mat. 18. 17. Of theſe then in their order.

§. 6. The firſt argument drawn for an eſtabliſhed form of Government in the Church, from the ſtate of the Apoſtles under Chriſt, is, from a ſuppoſed inequality among the Apoſtles, and the ſuperiority of one as Monarch of the Church; which is the Papiſts Plea from St. Peter, as the chief and head of the Apoſtles. Whoſe loud exclamations for St. Peter's authority are much of the ſame nature with thoſe of Demetrius the Silver-ſmith at Epheſus, with his fellow Craftſmen, who cried up, Great is Diana of the Epheſians, not from the honour they bore to her as Diana, but from the gain which came to them from her worſhip at Epheſus. But I diſpute not now the entail of St. Peter's power, what ever it was to the Roman Biſhop; but I only enquire into the Pleas drawn for his authority from the Scriptures, which are written in ſo ſmall a character, that without the Spectacles of an implicite Faith, they will ſcarce appear legible to the eyes of men. For what though Chriſt changed St. Peter's name? muſt it therefore follow that Chriſt baptized him Monarch of his Church? Were not John and James called by Chriſt Boanerges? and yet who thinks that thoſe Sons of Thunder muſt therefore overturn all other power but their own? Chriſt gave them new names, to ſhew his own authority over them, and not their authority over others; to be as Monitors of their duty, and not as Inſtruments to convey power.

power. So Chryſoſtome ſpeaks of the very name Peter given to Simon, it was to ſhew him his duty of being fixed and ſtable in the faith of Chriſt, ἵνα ἔχῃ διδάσκαλον διηνεχῆ τὴν προσηγορίαν τῆς τοιαύτης στερρότητος, this name might be (as a ſtring upon his finger) a continual remembrancer of his duty. And likewiſe, I conceive, as an encouragement to him after his fall, that he ſhould recover his former ſtability again; elſe it ſhould ſeem ſtrange, that he alone of the Apoſtles, ſhould have his name from firmneſs and ſtability, who fell the ſooneſt, and the fouleſt of any of the Apoſtles; unleſs it were κατ' ἀντίφρασιν, which would be worſe Divinity than Rhetorick. The change then of Saint Peter's name imports no ſuch univerſal power, neither from the change, nor from the name. But why then hath St. Peter the honour to be named firſt of all the Apoſtles? Firſt, It ſeems to be implyed as an honour given to Peter above the reſt; but doth all honour carry an univerſal power along with it? There may be order certainly among equals; and there may be firſt, ſecond and third, &c. where there is no imparity and juriſdiction in the firſt over all the reſt. A Primacy of order as among equals, I know none will deny St. Peter: A Primacy of power as over Inferiors, I know none will grant, but ſuch as have ſubdued their reaſon to their paſſion and intereſt. Nay, a farther order of mere place, may without danger be attributed to him; a primacy in order of time, as being of the firſt called, and it may be the firſt who adhered to Chriſt, in order of age; of which Jerom, ætati delatum quia Petrus ſenior erat, ſpeaking of Peter and John, nay, yet higher, ſome order of dignity too; in regard of his θερμότης, which the Greek Fathers ſpeak ſo much of; the fervency and heat of his ſpirit, whence by Euſebius he is called προήγορος τῶν ἀποστόλων the Prolocutor among the Apoſtles, who was therefore moſt forward to enquire, moſt ready to anſwer, which Chryſoſtome elegantly calls προπηδᾷν alluding to the name κορυφαῖος and ἔξαρχος, which are frequently given to Peter by the Fathers, which import no more than præſultor in choreâ, he that led the dance among the Diſciples; but his being κορυφαῖος implies no ſuperiority of power. For Dionyſſ. Halycarnaſſ. calls Appius Claudius τὸν κορυφαιότατον τῆς δεκαρχίας, whereas all know that the Decemviri had an equality of power among themſelves. Neither doth his being as the mouth of the Diſciples imply his power; for Aaron was a mouth to Moſes, but Moſes was Aaron's maſter. Neither yet doth this primacy of order always hold in reference to Peter; for although generally he is named firſt of the Apoſtles, as Mat. 10. 2. Mark 3. 16. Acts 1. 13. Mark 1. 36. Luke 8. 45. Acts 2. 14.——37. yet in other places of Scripture we find other Apoſtles ſet in order before him, as James, Galat. 2. 9. Paul and Apollos, and others, 1 Cor. 3, 22. 1 Cor. 1. 12.——9. 5. No argument then can be drawn hence, if it would hold, but only a primacy of order; and yet even that fails too in the Scriptures changing of the order ſo often. But, ſay they, whatever becomes of this order, we have a ſtrong foundation for Saint Peter*'s power, becauſe Chriſt ſaid, He would build his Church upon him*, Mat. 16. 17. This were ſomething indeed, if it were proved; but I fear this Rock will not hold water, as it is brought by them; nor Saint Peter prove to be that Rock. For, indeed, was the Church built upon Saint Peter? then he muſt be the chief foundation-ſtone, and Peter muſt build upon himſelf, and not upon Chriſt, and all the Apoſtles upon him; and thus in exalting the Servant, we depreſs the Maſter; and ſetting a new foundation, we take away the only foundation Jeſus Chriſt. If by being built upon upon Peter, they mean no more than being built by him as the chief inſtrument; it is both a very incongruous ſpeech, and implies nothing more than what was common to him, and the reſt of the Apoſtles, who were all Maſter-builders in the Church of Chriſt, as Paul calls himſelf; Rev. 21. 19. and in that reſpect are ſet forth as the twelve foundation-ſtones, in the walls of the New-Jeruſalem.

The rock then ſpoken of by Chriſt, in his ſpeech to Peter, if taken doctrinally, was St. Peter's confeſſion, as many of the Fathers interpret it; if taken perſonally, it was none other but Chriſt himſelf, who uſed Joh. 2. 19. a like ſpeech to this, when he ſaid, Deſtroy this Temple, and in three days I will raiſe it up. Which words, though ſpoken by occaſion of the material Temple, (as thoſe were of Peter's name) yet Chriſt underſtood them of the temple of his body, (as here likewiſe he doth of his perſon.) But ſtill they urge, Chriſt put the Keys into Saint Peter's hands, Mat. 16. 19. Now the power of the Keys doth denote regal authority. I anſwer, Firſt, The Keys may be given two ways, either from a Prince to a Subject, or from a City to a Prince. In this latter acception, they denote principality in the receiver, but withal inferiority and ſubjection in the Giver; and in this ſenſe, I am ſo charitable, as to think they will not ſay that Chriſt gave the Keys to Peter; it muſt be then as a Prince to a Subject; and when they are ſo given, it doth not imply any univerſal power in the perſons to whom they are given, but an inveſting them in that particular place he hath appointed them to; the office which the power of the Keys implies, is Miniſterial, and not Authoritative, Declarative, and not Juridical, over perſons committed to their charge, and not over officers joined in equality of power with them. For ſo were the reſt of the Apoſtles with Peter in the ſame power of the Keys, Mat. 18. 18. John 20. 23. This power of the Keys then was given to Peter in a peculiar manner, but nothing peculiar to him given thereby. But ſtill there remains another Ward in Saint Peter's Keys, and the laſt Foot to the Pope's Chair; which is Paſce oves, Feed my ſheep; a charge given particularly to Peter, John 21. 15. Thence they infer his power over the whole Church. But this Foot hath neither Joints nor Sinews in it, and is as infirm as any of the reſt; for neither did this command, rather than commiſſion, belong only to Peter; for Chriſt had before given them all their general commiſſion; As the Father hath ſent me, even ſo ſend I you, John 20. 21. whereby is implied an inveſting all the Apoſtles equally, with the power and authority of governing the Church of God; although this charge be peculiarly renewed to Peter, becauſe as he had particularly fall'n, ſo he ſhould be particularly reſtored; neither yet did we grant this: doth the word ποιμαίνειν, imply ſuch a power and authority as they plead for, viz. a ſupreme power over the Church of God? for this even by Peter himſelf is attributed to the fixed Preſbyters of the Churches, who by this argument have as much authority conveyed them, as Saint Peter had, 1 Pet. 5. 2. and yet, ſhould we grant this, it would not infer what they deſire; for theſe Sheep were not the whole Church of Chriſt, taken abſolutely, but indefinitely. For all the Apoſtles had a command to preach to every creature, Mat. 28. 18. which was, as to the words, larger, as to the ſenſe the ſame with Gal. 2. 7. that to Saint Peter here. And afterwards we find Peter called the Apo- Acts 8. 14. Gal. 2. 9. ſtle of Circumciſion, and the Apoſtles ſending him to Samaria, and Paul in the right-hand of fellowſhip with Peter, which had been certainly diſhonourable to Peter, had he been inveſted with ſuch an univerſal ſupreme power over the Apoſtles and the whole Church. Such pretences then as theſe are, for ſuch an extravagant power in the Church of God, from ſuch miſerably weak foundations, for the upholding a corrupt intereſt, have given the occaſion to that tart Sarcaſm, In Papatu ſub Petri nudo nomine Satan non amplius Larva. But that which would ſeem ſufficient to awaken any out of this dream of Saint Peter's power over the reſt of the Apoſtles, is, the frequent contendings of the twelve Apoſtles, one among another, who ſhould be greateſt, and that even after that Chriſt had ſaid, Upon this rock will I build my Church, as we may ſee, Mat. 20. 24. If Chriſt had conferred ſuch a power on Saint Peter, what little ground had there been for the requeſt of James and John? and would not our Saviour rather have told them, the chiefeſt place was conferred on Peter already, than have curbed their ambition in ſeeking who ſhould be greateſt; and would have bid them be ſubject to Peter as their Head and Ruler. We ſee not then the leaſt foundation for an univerſal Monarchy in the Church of God; and ſo this form of Government is not determined by any actions or commands of Chriſt. Mat. 18. 1. Mark 9. 34. Luke 9. 46.

§. 7. We come now to conſider the Pleas of others, who join in renouncing any ſupreme power under Chriſt, over the Church of God; but differ as to the particular forms of Government in the Church; thoſe who are for an inequality, uſually fix on the imparity between the Apoſtles and the L X X. Thoſe that are for a parity upon Mat. 20. 25. and Mat. 18. 17. I ſhall here proceed in the former method, to ſhew that none of thoſe can prove the form they contend for as only neceſſary, nor their adverſaries prove it unlawful. Firſt then, for the inequality between the Apoſtles and the L X X. Diſciples: By that inequality is meant, either only an inequality of order, or elſe, an inequality carrying ſuperiority and ſubordination. It is evident that the L X X. Diſciples were not of the ſame Order with the twelve Apoſtles, whom Chriſt had deſigned for the chief Government of his Church, after his Aſcenſion; and in this reſpect the compariſon of the twelve Heads of the Tribes, and the ſeventy Elders, ſeems parallel with the twelve Apoſtles, and the L X X. Diſciples; but if by imparity, be meant, that the twelve Apoſtles had a ſuperiority of power and juriſdiction over the L X X. Diſciples, there is not the leaſt evidence or foundation in Reaſon or Scripture for it. For the L X X. did not derive their power from the Apoſtles, but immediately from Chriſt, they enjoyed the ſame privileges, were ſent upon the ſame meſſage, (making way for Chriſt's entertainment in the ſeveral Cities they went to) yea all things were parallel between them and the Apoſtles in their Miſſion, (unleſs any difference be made in the Cities they went to, and their number.) So that there is no ſuperiority of office in the Apoſtles, above the L X X. nor of power and juriſdiction over them; their Commiſſions being the ſame: And it ſeems moſt probable, that both their Miſſions were only temporary; and after this the L X X. remained in the nature of private Diſciples, till they were ſent abroad by a new Commiſſion after the reſurrection, for preaching the Goſpel, and planting Churches. For we ſee that the Apoſtles themſelves were only Probationers, till Chriſt ſolemnly authorized them for their Apoſtolical employment, Mat. 28. 18. John 20. 21. when their full Commiſſions were granted to them, and then indeed they acted with a plenitude of power, as Governours of the Church, but not before. Nothing can be inferred then for any neceſſary ſtanding rule for Luke 10. 1.

Church-Government, from any compariſon between the Apoſtles and the LXX. during the life of Chriſt, becauſe both their Miſſions were temporary and occaſional. Only we ſee, that becauſe Chriſt did keep up the number of the Twelve ſo ſtrictly, that as the LXX. were a diſtinct number from them, ſo when one was dead, another was to be choſen in his ſtead, (which had been needleſs, if they had not been a diſtinct Order and College by themſelves) it is thence evident that the Apoſtolical power, was a ſuperior power to any in the Church; and that ſuch an inequality in Church-Officers as was between them and particular Paſtors of Churches, is not contrary to what our Saviour ſaith, when he forbids that dominion and authority in his Diſciples, which was exerciſed by the Kings of the earth, Mat. 20. 25. Luke 22. 25. which places, becauſe they are brought by ſome, to take away all inequality among Church-Officers, I ſhall ſo far examine the meaning of them, as they are conceived to have any influence thereupon. Firſt then, I ſay, That it is not only the abuſe of civil power, which our Saviour forbids his Diſciples, but the exerciſe of any ſuch power as that is. And therefore the Papiſts are miſtaken, when from the words of Luke, Vos autem non ſic, they conclude all power is not forbidden, but only ſuch a tyrannical power, as is here ſpoken of. For thoſe words are not a limitation and modification of the power ſpoken of, but a total prohibition of it; for, Firſt, The compariſon is not between the Apoſtles and Tyrants, but between them and Princes; yea ſuch as Luke calls εὐεργέται. Luk. 22.25. Indeed had Chriſt ſaid, The Kings of the earth abuſe their authority, vos autem non ſic, then it would have been only a limitation of the exerciſe of power; but the mere exerciſe of civil authority being ſpoken of before, and then it being ſubjoined, but you not ſo; it plainly implies a forbidding of the power ſpoken of, in the perſons ſpoken to. But, ſay they, the words uſed in Matthew are κατακυριεύουσιν and κατεξουσιάζουσιν, which import the abuſe of their power which is forbidden; but I anſwer, Firſt, In Luke it is otherwiſe, for there it is the ſimple κυριεύουσιν and ἐξουσιάζοντες, when it follows, ὑμεῖς δὲ οὐχ οὕτως. So that if the abuſe be forbidden in one, the uſe is in the other: But, Secondly, κατακυριεύειν, by the LXX. is uſed frequently for κυριεύειν, and רדה is often rendred by that word, as Pſalm 72. 7. He ſhall have dominion, καὶ κατακυριεύσει, Pſalm 110. 2. κατακυρίευε, Rule thou in the midſt of thine enemies; in both which places it is ſpoken of Chriſt's Kingdom. So v. Pſal. 109. Jer. 3. Numb. 23—32. in Geneſis 1. 28. πληρώσατε τὴν γῆν καὶ κατακυριεύσατε αὐτῆς. Repleniſh the earth, and have dominion over it. In all which places it is uſed ſimply for dominion, and not for tyrannical power.

It is not then the abuſe of civil power, but the uſe of it, which is here forbidden; which will be more evident, Secondly, From the importance of the Phraſe οὐχ οὕτως; which anſwers to the Hebrew לאכן and ſimply denies what went before; as when Cain expreſſeth his fear of being kill'd, Gen. 4. 14. the Septuagint render God's anſwer by οὐχ οὕτως, whereby is not denyed only the manner of his death to be as Abel's was, but it is ſimply denied; and ſo Pſalm 1. 4. the LXX. render לא כן הרשעים by οὐχ οὕτως οἱ ἀσεβεῖς· οὐχ οὕτως, the wicked are not ſo. So, when Chriſt ſaith, Mat. 19. 8. ἀπ᾽ ἀρχῆς δὲ οὐ γέγονεν οὕτω, from the beginning it was not ſo; it imports an abſolute denial of giving Bills of divorce from the beginning. Thirdly, This no ways anſwers to the ſcope of the Apoſtle's contention, which was merely about primacy and power, and not at all about the abuſe of this power. So that by this place, all affectation and uſe of a civil, co-active, external power is forbidden to the Officers of the Church; the power of the Church being only a directive, voluntary power; and is rather a Miniſtry than a power, as our Saviour expreſſeth there, Mat. 20. 26. Luke 22. 26. But having thus excluded all Civil Power from the Governours of the Church, as ſuch: I ſay, Secondly, That this place doth no ways imply a prohibition of all inequality among the Governours of the Church; which is abundantly cleared by this reaſon, becauſe by the acknowledgment of all parties, the Apoſtles had a ſuperior power over the ordinary Paſtors of Churches: Now if the exerciſe of all ſuperiority had been forbidden, this muſt have been forbidden too, as implying plainly an exerciſe of authority in ſome over others in the Church. And therefore Muſculus thus explains the place, Non exigit hoc Chriſtus ut omnes in regno ſuo ſint æquales, ſed nè quiſpiam cupiat magnus & primus haberi & videri. It is not an inequality of Order, but Ambition, which Chriſt forbids; and therefore he obſerves, that Chriſt ſaith not, Let none be great among you, and none firſt; which ſhould have been, if all primacy and ſuperiority had been forbidden, and a neceſſity of an equality among Church-Officers; but he that will be great among you, let him be your Miniſter. Let thoſe that are above others, look upon themſelves as the ſervants of others, and not as their maſters. For God never beſtows any power on any, for the ſake of thoſe that have it, but for the ſake of thoſe for whom they are employed: When men ſeek then their own greatneſs, and not the ſervice of the Church, they flatly contradict this precept of Chriſt, But with you it ſhall not be ſo. But however an inequality of power and Order for the Church's good is not thereby prohibited; which is ſufficient for my purpoſe.

§. 8. The next place to be conſidered is that in Mat. 18. 15, 16, 17. If thy brother ſhall treſpaſs againſt thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone; if he ſhall hear thee, thou haſt gained thy brother. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witneſſes every word may be eſtabliſhed. And if he ſhall neglect to hear them, tell it to the Church; but if he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican. It ſeems a very ſtrange thing to conſider, that this one place hath been preſſed by all parties, to ſerve under them, for the maintenance of their own particular form of Government; ſo that, (as the Jews fable of the Manna) it hath had a different taſte, according to the diverſity of the palates of men. Thoſe that are for a Congregational Church, being the firſt receptacle of Church power, ſet this place in the front of their arguments; thoſe who plead for Standing Preſbyteries, Lay-Elders, ſubordination of Courts, fetch all theſe out of this place; thoſe that are for a power of Church Diſcipline to be only lodged in a higher Order of Church-Officers ſucceeding the Apoſtles, derive the ſucceſſion of that power from this place; nay, leſt quidlibet ſhould not be proved è quolibet, the Papiſts deſpair not of proving the conſtant viſibility of the Church, the ſubordination of all to the Pope, the infallibility of general Councils, all out of this place. Methinks then it might be argument enough of the incompetency of this place to determine any one particular form, when it is with equal confidence on all ſides brought to prove ſo many; eſpecially if it be made appear, that the general rule laid down in theſe words, may be obſerved under a diverſity of forms of Government. For whether by the Church we mean the community of the faithful in a particular Congregation, or the ſtanding Officers of ſuch a Church, or a Conſiſtorial-Court, or Synodical-Aſſembly, or higher Church-Officers, it is ſtill the duty of men, in caſe of offences, to tell the Church for redreſs of grievances, or vindication of the perſon himſelf, that he hath diſcharged his duty.

This place then determines not what this Church is, nor what the form of its Government ſhould be, when the ſenſe of it holds good and true under ſuch diverſity of forms. But we ſhall farther enquire, what influence this place can have upon the modelling the Government To. 2. l. 10. c. 5. ſ. 2. in the Church of God. For Chamier tells us, the prima Politiæ Eccleſiaſticæ origo is to be found in theſe words; it will be then worth our enquiry to ſee what foundation for Church-Government can be drawn out of theſe words. In which the variety of Expoſitions, (like a multitude of Phyſicians to a diſtempe'd Patient) have left it worſe than they found it; I mean more difficult and obſcure. We ſhall therefore endeavour to lay aſide all pre-conceptions by other mens judgments and opinions, and ſee what innate light there is in the Text it ſelf, to direct us to the full ſenſe and meaning of it. Two things the great difficulty of the place lies in, What the offences are here ſpoken of? What the Church is which muſt be ſpoken to? For the Firſt, I conceive it evident to any unprejudicated mind, that the matter our Saviour ſpeaks of, is a matter of private offence and injury, and not a matter of ſcandal, as ſuch conſidered in a Church-ſociety; which I make appear thus: Firſt, From the parallel place to this, Luke 17. 3. If thy brother treſpaſs againſt thee, rebuke him, and if he repent, forgive him. This can be nothing elſe but a matter of private injury, becauſe it is in the power of every private perſon to forgive it; which it was not in his power to do, were it a matter of ſcandal to the whole Church; unleſs we make it among Chriſtians, (as it was among the Jews) that every private perſon might excommunicate another, and ſo releaſe him afterward. Secondly, It manifeſtly appears from St. Peter's words next after this Paragraph, Mat. 18. 20. Lord, how often ſhall my brother ſin againſt me, and I forgive him, till ſeven times? &c. Chriſt anſwers him, till ſeventy times ſeven, that is, as often as he doth it. And thence Chriſt brings the parable of the King forgiving his ſervants, v. 23. Thirdly, Were it meant of any ſcandalous ſin committed with the privacy of any particular perſon, (as many underſtand treſpaſſing againſt thee, that is, te conſcio) then this inconvenience muſt neceſſarily follow, that matters of ſcandal muſt be brought to the Church's cognizance, when there can be no way to decide them, that is, when one offends, and only one perſon knows it; here will be a ſingle affirmation on one ſide, and denial on the other ſide, and ſo there can be no way to decide it; the matter here ſpoken of then is ſomewhat only relating to the offence or injury of ſome particular perſon, and not a matter of ſcandal to the whole Church. The Queſtion then as propounded to be ſpoken to by our Saviour, is, What is to be done in caſe of private offences between man and man? and not in caſe of ſecret ſins againſt God, and ſcandalous to the Church: Now to this our Saviour lays down his anſwer gradually: Firſt, There muſt be private admonition; if that ſucceed not, admonition before witneſſes; if not that, telling the Church; if not that neither, reputing him as a Heathen and Publican. Now in this anſwer we muſt conceive our Saviour ſpeaks as to an ordinary caſe, ſo in a way eaſie to be underſtood by all that heard him; and therefore fore he muſt ſpeak in alluſion to what was at that time among the Jews in ſuch caſes, which is freely acknowledged both by Calvin and Beza Beza in loc. upon the place. Nam certè tanquam de Judæis hæc dici apparet, ſaltem ex eo quod addit, ſit tibi ſicut Ethnicus & Publicanus. We muſt then ſee what the cuſtom was among the Jews in ſuch caſes, and how far our Saviour doth either approve the cuſtom received, or appoint new. The Law was very ſtrict in caſe of offences, for every man in any wiſe to rebuke his neighbour, and not to ſuffer ſin upon him; Arguendo argues, Lev. 19. 17. our old Tranſlation renders it, Thou ſhalt plainly rebuke thy Neighbour. Now this piece of neceſſary Diſcipline our Saviour endeavours to recover among them, which it ſeems was grown much out of uſe with them. For Rabbi Chanina, as Mr. Selden obſerves, gave this as one De ſyned. l. 1. c. 9. In Gemar. Babyl. ad tit. Shabbath. c. 16. f. 119. reaſon of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, becauſe they left off reproving one another: Non exciſa fuiſſent Hieroſolymæ, niſi quoniam alter alterum non coarguebat. Our Saviour therefore enforceth this Law upon them in caſe of offences; firſt to deal plainly with their Neighbour in reproving him; but our Saviour reſts not here, but being himſelf a pattern of meekneſs and charity, he would not have them to reſt in a bare private admonition, but to ſhew their own readineſs to be reconciled, and willingneſs to do good to the ſoul of the offending party thereby, he adviſeth farther, to take two or three witneſſes with them, hoping thereby to work more upon him; but if ſtill he continues refractory, and is not ſenſible of his miſcarriage, tell it the Church. What the Church here is, is the great Controverſie; ſome, as Beza, and his followers, underſtand an Eccleſiaſtical Sanhedrin among the Jews, which had the proper cognizance of Eccleſiaſtical cauſes; but it will be hard to prove any ſuch V. Grotium in Mat. 5. 12. Sanhedrin in uſe among them; the Prieſts and Levites indeed were very often choſen into the Sanhedrin, (which it may be is the ground of the Selden de ſyned. l. 2. c. 8. miſtake) but there was no ſuch Sanhedrin among them, which did not reſpect matters criminal and civil; ſo we muſt underſtand what Joſephus Joſeph. l. 2. cont. Appion. ſpeaks of the Prieſts among the Jews. Τούτοις δὲ ἦν καὶ τοῦ νόμου καὶ τῶν ἄλλων ἐπιτηδευμάτων ἀκριβὴς ἐπιμέλεια· καὶ γὰρ ἐπόπται πάντων, καὶ δικασταὶ τῶν ἀμφισβητουμένων, καὶ κολασταὶ τῶν κατεγνωσμένων οἱ ἱερεῖς ἐτάχθησαν. The Prieſts were always very ſtudious of the Law, and other matters of concernment. Theſe were appointed as the Overſeers of all things, Judges of Controverſies, and the Puniſhers of condemned Perſons. Thus we ſee he is ſo far from attributing a diſtinct Eccleſiaſtical-Court to them, that he ſeems to make them the only Judges in civil and criminal cauſes. Others by the Church, underſtand the Chriſtian Church, but herein they are divided, ſome underſtand by it only the Officers of the Church, ſo Chryſoſtome τοῖς προεδρεύουσι. Euthymius Eccleſiam nunc vocat præſides fidelium Eccleſiæ. Others underſtand it not in its repreſentative notion, but in its diffuſive capacity, as taking in all the members. But our Saviour ſpeaking to a preſent caſe, muſt be ſuppoſed to lay down a preſent remedy, which could not be, if he gave only rules for governing his Church, which was not as yet gathered nor formed, there being then no Court Eccleſiaſtical for them to appeal unto. Suppoſe then this caſe to have fallen out immediately after our Saviour's ſpeaking of it, that one brother ſhould treſpaſs againſt another, either then notwithſtanding our Saviour's ſpeech, (which ſpeaks to the preſent time, Go and tell the Church) the offended brother is left without a power of redreſs, or he muſt underſtand it in ſome ſenſe of the word Church, which was then in uſe among the Jews. And theſe who tell us, That unleſs ἐκκλησία be underſtood for a Church as we underſtand it, it would be no eaſie matter for us now to conceive what the Holy Ghoſt meant by it, would do well withal to conſider how thoſe to whom Chriſt ſpoke, ſhould apprehend his meaning, if he ſpoke in a ſenſe they never heard of before. And certainly our beſt way to underſtand the meaning of Scripture, is to conſider, what, of whom, to whom the Scripture ſpeaks; for although the Scripture, as a rule of faith for us, be ſuppoſed to be ſo written, as to be eaſily underſtood by us, yet as the parcels of it were ſpoken upon ſeveral occaſions, they muſt be ſuppoſed to be ſo ſpoken, as to be apprehended by them to whom they were ſpoken in the common ſenſe of the words, if nothing peculiar be expreſſed in the ſpeech, whereby to reſtrain them to another ſenſe. And therefore the Church muſt be underſtood in the ſame ſenſe wherein the word קהל or the Syriack anſwering to it was apprehended among the Jews in our Saviour's time. Which could not be for any new Conſiſtory or Sanhedrin to be erected under the Goſpel. Thence others conceiving that Chriſt did ſpeak according to the cuſtom of the Jews, by the Church, underſtand nothing elſe but the Sanhedrin, and ſo make the ſenſe of the words to be this. The caſe our Saviour ſpeaks to is that of private quarrels, wherein our Saviour lays down two Directions in a way of charity, private admonition, and before witneſſes; but if the party continues refractory, then it may be lawful to convent him before the Courts of Judicature among them, the Triumvirate, the Twenty three, or the great Sanhedrin; for although the Romans had taken away the power of the Jews in capital matters, yet they allowed them liberty of judging in caſe of private quarrels; but if he neglect to hear the Sanhedrin, then it may be lawful to implead him before the Governour of the Province in his Court of Judicature, by which Heathens and Publicans were to be judged; which is meant by let him be to thee, not as a brother Jew, but as a Heathen and a Publican. This Expoſition is ſaid to be firſt broached by Eraſtus, but much improved and enlarged by Rev. Biſhop Bilſon, who ſpends a whole Chapter upon it. But this Expoſition, though it ſeems fair and plauſible, yet there are ſeveral things in it which keep me from embracing it; as Firſt, It ſeems not very probable that our Saviour ſhould ſend his Diſciples to whom he ſpeaks, to the Jewiſh Sanhedrin, for the ending any controverſies ariſing among themſelves; knowing how bitter enemies they were to all who were followers of Chriſt. Secondly, It ſeems not very agreeable with the ſcope of our Saviour's ſpeech, which was to take up differences as much as may be among his diſciples, and to make them ſhew all lenity and forbearance towards thoſe that had offended them, and to do good to the ſouls of thoſe that had injured and provoked them; whereas this command of telling the Sanhedrin, and impleading offenders before Heathen-Courts, tends apparently to heighten the bitterneſs and animoſities of mens ſpirits one againſt another, and lays Religion ſo open to obloquies, which makes Paul ſo ſeverely reprove the Chriſtians at Corinth, for going to Law before Heathen Magiſtrates; therefore to ſay that Chriſt allows their going to Law before Heathens, and Paul to forbid it, were inſtead of finding a way to end the differences among Chriſtians, to make one between Chriſt and Paul. Thirdly, The thing chiefly aimed at by Chriſt, is not a man's vindication of himſelf, or recovering loſſes by injuries received, but the recovering and gaining the offending brother? which evidently appears by what our Saviour adds to the uſing admonition in private, if he ſhall hear thee, thou haſt gained thy brother. Now κερδαίνειν in the New Teſtament is uſed for the converſion and turning others from ſin. That I might gain them that are under the Law, 1 Corinth. 9. 19, 20, &c. ſo 1 Pet. 3. 1. explained by Jam. 5. 20. Our Saviour then ſpeaks not to the manner of proceeding as to civil injuries, which call for reſtitution, but to ſuch as call for reconciliation. And ſo the caſe I conceive is that of private differences and quarrels between men, and not Law ſuits, nor civil cauſes: I mean ſuch differences as reſpect perſons, and not things, which our Saviour lays down theſe rules for the ending of. And therefore I cannot but wonder to ſee ſome men inſiſt ſo much on that place againſt ſuch an Expoſition of this Luke 12. 14. where Chriſt ſaith, Who made me a judge and a divider among you? For doth it any ways follow, becauſe Chriſt would not take upon him to be a temporal Judge among the Jews, therefore he ſhould take no courſe for the ending differences among his Diſciples, and the taking away all animoſities from among them? Nay, on the contrary, doth not our Saviour very often deſignedly ſpeak to this very purpoſe, to root out all bitterneſs, malice, envy, and rancour from mens ſpirits, and to perſuade them to forgive injuries, even to pray for perſecutors, and by any means to be reconciled to their Brethren. Which he makes to be a duty of ſo great neceſſity, that if a man had brought his gift to the Altar, and remembred his brother had ought againſt him, he bids him leave his gift there, and go, and be reconciled to his brother, and then offer up the gift. We ſee hereby how ſuitable it was to our Saviour's Doctrine and deſign, to lay down rules for the ending any differences ariſing among his Diſciples; and this being now cleared to be the ſtate of the caſe, it will not be difficult to reſolve what is meant by telling the Church: Which I make not to be any appeal to a juridical Court, acting authoritatively over the perſons brought before it, but the third and higheſt ſtep of charity in a man towards a perſon that hath offended him, viz. that when neither private admonition, nor before two or three witneſſes would ſerve to reclaim the offender, then to call a ſelect company together, (which is the natural importance of the word ἐκκλησία) and before them all to lay open the cauſe of the breach and difference between them, and to refer it to their arbitration to compoſe and end it. Which Senſe of the place, I humbly conceive to have the leaſt force in it, and in every part of it to be moſt genuine and natural, and fully agreeable to the received practice among the Jews; which the Author of the Book Muſar, cited by Druſius, fully acquaints us with, whoſe words I ſhall tranſcribe, as being a plain Paraphraſe on theſe of our Saviour. Qui arguit ſocium ſuum, debet primum hoc facere placide inter ſe & ipſum ſolum verbis mollibus, Ita ut non pudefaciat eum. Si reſipiſcit bene eſt; ſin, debet eum acritèr arguere & pudefacere inter ſe & ipſum. Si non reſipiſcit, debet adhibere ſocios, ipſumque coram illis pudore afficere; ſi nec hoc modo quicquam proficit, debet eum pudefacere coram multis, ejuſque delictum publicare. Nam certè detegendi ſunt hypocritæ. That which this Author calls pudefacere eum coram multis, is that which our Saviour means when he bids him tell the Church, or the Congregation, as our old tranſlation renders it. This the Jews called reproving of men כרבים before a multitude, as the Vulg. Latin, though falſly renders that place Leviticus 19. 17. publice argue eum, and to this the Apoſtle may allude, when he ſpeaks of the ἡ ἐπιτιμία ἡ ὑπὸ τῶν πλειόνων, 2 Cor. 2. 6. the cenſure of many; and the reproof ἐνώπιον πάντων before all, 1 Tim. 5. 20. which was to be in matters of publick ſcandal upon Religion, שמום כרברים as the Jews call them, but in caſe the offender ſhould ſtill παρακούειν ſlight this overture of reconciliation, before the company ſelected for hearing the caſe, then ſaith our Saviour, look upon him as an obſtinate refractory creature, and have no more to do with him, than with a Heathen and a Publican; by which terms the moſt wilful obſtinate ſinners were ſet out among the Jews, and by which our Saviour means a man's withdrawing himſelf, as much as in him lies, from all familiar ſociety from ſuch a perſon. And thus ſaith Chriſt, Whatſoever you bind in earth, ſhall be bound in heaven, and whatſoever you looſe on earth ſhall be looſed in heaven, v. 18. that is, if after all your endeavours of reconciliation, the offender will hearken to no agreement, it is an evidence and token That man's ſin is bound upon him, (that is, ſhall not be pardoned ſo long as he continues impenitent) but if he repent of his offence, and you be reconciled, as the offence is removed on earth thereby, ſo the ſin is looſed in heaven, that is, forgiven. The guilt of ſin that binds, it being an obligation to puniſhment; and ſo the pardon of ſin that looſeth, as it cancels that obligation. And ſo Grotius obſerves, that δεῖν is the ſame with κρατεῖν, and λύειν with αφίεναι; what is called retaining in one place, is binding in another; and what is looſing in one place, is remitting in the other. But now, although I aſſert this to be the true, proper, genuine meaning of this difficult place, yet I deny not but that this place hath influence upon Church-Government; but I ſay, the influence it hath, is only by way of Accommodation, and by Analogy deduced from it. According to which, theſe things, I conceive, have foundation in theſe words, Firſt, Gradual Appeals from the method here laid down by our Saviour. Secondly, Church-Cenſures, and the duty of ſubmitting to Church-Authority; for although before any Church-power was actually ſet up, (as when our Saviour ſpake theſe words then there was none) yet after that Church-Government was fixed and ſet up, it muſt in reaſon be ſuppoſed that all matters of the nature of ſcandals to the Church, muſt be decided there. Thirdly, The lawfulneſs of the uſe of excommunication in Chriſtian Churches; for if every particular perſon might withdraw from the ſociety of ſuch a one as continues refractory in his offences, then much more may a whole ſociety, and the officers of it declare ſuch a one to be avoided both in religious and familiar civil ſociety, which is the formal nature of excommunication. Herein we ſee the wiſdom of our Saviour, who in ſpeaking to a particular caſe, hath laid down ſuch general rules as are of perpetual uſe in the Church of God for accommodating differences ariſing therein. Thus have we hitherto cleared, that our Saviour hath determined no more of Church-Government, than what is appliable to a diverſity of particular forms, and ſo hath not, by any Law or practice of his own, determined the neceſſity of any one form.

The next thing pleaded for determining the form of Government, is Apoſtolical practice; two things enquired into concerning that, what it was? how far it binds? The Apoſtles inveſted with the power and authority of governing the whole Church of Chriſt by their Commiſſion, John 20. 21. Mat. 28. 18. What the Apoſtles did in order to Church-Government before Pentecoſt, κλῆρος ἀποστολῆς, τόπος ἴδιος explained. What the Apoſtles did in order to ſetling particular Churches? the names and office of Biſhops, Preſbyters, Deacons conſidered. Four general conſiderations laid down about the Apoſtles practice. Firſt, It cannot be fully known what it was. 2. Great probability they obſerved no one certain form in ſetling Churches; proved from Epiphanius, Jerome, Ambroſe or Hilary. 3. Their caſe different from ours in regard of the paucity of believers. 4. If granted for any form, yet proves not the thing in queſtion. For, 1. *Offices appointed by them are ceaſed. Widows, Deaconeſſes aboliſhed. §. 1. Having found nothing, either in our Saviour's practice, or in the rules laid down by him, (conceived to reſpect Church-Government) which determines any neceſſity of one particular form; the only argument remaining, which can be conceived of ſufficient ſtrength to found the neceſſity of any one form of Government, is, the practice of the Apoſtles, who were by their employment and commiſſion entruſted with the Government of the Church of God. For our Saviour after his reſurrection taking care for the planting and governing of his Church after his aſcenſion to Glory, doth at two ſeveral times call his Apoſtles together, and gives now their full Charter and Commiſſion to them; the firſt, containing chiefly the power it ſelf conferred upon them, Joh. 20. 21. the other the extent of that power, Mat. 28. 19. in the former our Saviour tells them, As the Father had ſent him, ſo did he ſend them. Which we muſt not underſtand of a parity and equality of power, but in a ſimilitude of the Miſſion; that as Chriſt before had managed the great affairs of his Church in his own perſon, ſo now (having according to the Prophecies made of him at the end of ſeventy weeks, made reconciliation for iniquity by his death, and brought in everlaſting righteouſneſs by his reſurrection,) he diſpatched abroad his Goſpel-Heralds to proclaim the Jubilee now begun, and the Act of Indempnity now paſt upon all penitent offenders, which is the ſenſe of the other part of their commiſſion, Whoſeſoever ſins ye remit, they are remitted, and whoſeſoever ſins ye retain, they are retained, Joh. 20. 23. i. e. as many as upon the preaching the Goſpel by you, ſhall come in and yield up themſelves to the tenders of Grace proclaimed therein, ſhall have their former rebellions pardoned; but ſuch as will ſtill continue obſtinate, their former guilt ſhall ſtill continue to bind them over to deſerved puniſhment. And to the end the Apoſtles might have ſome evidence of the power thus conferred

Dan. 9. 24. with Rom. 4. 25.

Joh.20.22. ferred upon them, he breaths the Holy Ghoſt on them, and ſaid, receive ye the Holy Ghoſt; which we are not to underſtand of the extraordinary Gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, which were not received till the day of Pentecoſt, Acts 2. 1. but of the Authoritative power of preaching the Goſpel, which was now conferred upon them, by this ſolemn rite of breathing the Holy Ghoſt on the Apoſtles. In which ſenſe the Church of England underſtands that expreſſion in the Ordination of Miniſters, as it implies only the conferring thereby an authority for the preaching of the Goſpel, which being conveyed by Ordination, is fitly expreſſed by the ſame words which our Saviour uſed in the conferring the ſame power upon his Apoſtles at his ſending them forth to be Goſpel Preachers.

After this comes the ſolemn appointed meeting of Chriſt with his Mat.28.16. Diſciples at the mountain of Galilee, (where in probability, beſides the 1 Cor.15.6. eleven, were preſent the five hundred brethren at once.) And here Chriſt more ſolemnly inaugurates the Apoſtles in their office, declaring all power to be in his hands, and therefore appoints the Apoſtles to preach the Mar.16.15. Mat.18.19. Goſpel to every creature, that is, to all men indefinitely, Gentiles as well as Jews, which Matthew fully expreſſeth by all Nations. Now are the Apoſtles left as chief Governours of the Church under Chriſt, and in this laſt Commiſſion, wherein the extent of the Apoſtles power is more fully expreſſed, there is nothing mentioned of any order for the Government of the Church under them, nor what courſe ſhould be taken by the Church after their deceaſe. All that remains then to be enquired into, is what the Apoſtles practice was, and how far they acted for the determining any one form of Government as neceſſary for the Church.

§. 2. The Apoſtles being thus inveſted in their authority, we proceed to conſider the exerciſe of this authority for the governing the Church. And here we are to conſider, that the Apoſtles did not preſently, upon their laſt Commiſſion from Chriſt, go forth abroad in the world to preach, but were commanded by Chriſt to go firſt to Jeruſalem, and there to expect the coming of the Holy Ghoſt, according to our Saviour's own appointment, Luke 24. 49. And therefore what Mark adds, Mark 16. 20. that after Chriſt's appearance to them, the Apoſtles went abroad, and preached every where, working miracles, muſt either be underſtood of what they did only in their way returning from Galilee to Jeruſalem; or elſe, more probably, of what they did indefinitely afterwards, For preſently after we find them met together at Jeruſalem, whence Luk.24.52. Acts 1. 12. they came from Mount Olivet, where Chriſt's Aſcenſion was. Here Luk.24.53. we find them employed ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ, ſaith St. Luke in his Goſpel, which we render the Temple, but I underſtand it rather as referring to the action than the place, and is beſt explained by what Luke ſaith in Acts 1. 14. they were προσκαρτεροῦντες τῇ προσευχῇ ϗ τῇ δεήσει, continuing in prayer and ſupplication. And that it cannot be meant of the Temple, Acts 1. 13. appears by the mention of the ὑπερῷον, an upper room, where they continued together. For that it ſhould be meant of any of the ὑπερῷα, about the Temple, is moſt improbable to conceive, becauſe not only V. L'Emper. in Cod. Middoc. c.4. Sect. 5. thoſe ninety Cells about the Temple were deſtined and appointed for the Prieſts in their ſeveral ἐφημερίαις, or times of Miniſtration; and it is moſt unlikely the chief Prieſts and Maſters of the Temple ſhould ſuffer thoſe whom they hated ſo much, to continue ſo near them, without any moleſtation or diſturbance. While the Apoſtles continue here, they proceed to the choice of a new Apoſtle, inſtead of Judas, thereby making it appear how neceſſary that number was to the firſt forming of Churches, when the vacant place muſt be ſupplied with ſo great ſolemnity. Which office of Apoſtleſhip, (which Judas once had, and Matthias was now choſen into) is call'd by Peter κλῆρος διακονίας ϗ ἀποστολῆς. Acts 1. 25. which a learned Interpreter renders the portion of his Apoſtolacy, or the Province which fell to Judas his lot in the diſtribution of them among the Apoſtles, which, ſaith he, is call'd ὁ τόπος ὁ ἴδιος, into which Matthias did πορευθῆναι go, and from which Judas fell by his ſin. This Expoſition is very often ſuggeſted by that learned Author (but with all due reverence to his name and memory) I cannot ſee any ſuch evidence either from Scripture or reaſon, to enforce any ſuch Expoſition of either phraſe, yielding us ſufficient ground to forſake the received ſenſe of both of them. For κλῆρος ἀποστολῆς is plainly nothing elſe but that Office of Apoſtleſhip which belonged to Judas, without any relation to a Province; and ὁ τόπος ὁ ἴδιος, is that proper place which belonged to Judas, as he is call'd υἱὸς ἀπωλείας, the Son of perdition, and no other. But the very foundation of this miſtake, is, that the ſeveral Provinces into which the Apoſtles were to go for preaching the Goſpel, were diſtributed among them before they were filled with the Holy Ghoſt, which is an Hypotheſis will not eaſily be granted by any one that doth but impartially conſider theſe things. That if the Provinces were ſo diſtributed among them, it muſt be either before the death of Chriſt, or after; and it muſt be before, if Judas had a peculiar Province aſſigned to him, which this Expoſition neceſſarily implies; but how Provinces could be divided among them before they had their Commiſſion given them to preach to all Nations, is ſomewhat hard to underſtand. It muſt be then immediately after Chriſt had bid them preach to every creature, that they thus diſtributed the Provinces among them; but ſeveral things make this very improbable. Firſt, The groſs miſtake of the Apoſtles concerning the very nature of Chriſt's Kingdom, which we read, Acts 1. 16. when they jointly aſk Chriſt, Lord wilt thou at this time reſtore the Kingdom to Iſrael? They dreamt ſtill of a temporal Kingdom, according to the common opinion of the Jews; and is it probable they ſhould diſtribute among themſelves the ſeveral Provinces for preaching the Goſpel, who thought that Chriſt's Kingdom would have been eſtabliſhed by other means than going up and down the world? They looked that Chriſt himſelf ſhould do it by his own power, Wilt thou at this time, &c. and did not think it muſt be done by their means, much leſs by their ſingle going into ſuch vaſt parts of the world, as the twelve diviſions of the world would be. Secondly, It appears very improbable any ſuch diviſion of Provinces ſhould be made then, when they were commanded to ſtay at Jeruſalem, and not to ſtir thence till the promiſe of the Spirit was fulfilled upon them. Tarry ye in the City of Jeruſalem, till ye be endued with power from on high, Luke 24. 49. And being aſſembled together with them, he commanded them not to depart from Jeruſalem, but wait for the promiſe of the Father, Acts 1. 4. Is it likely, the Apoſtles, when they were thus ſtraightly charged not to leave Jeruſalem till they were endued with the power of the Holy Ghoſt, ſhould contrive the diſperſing themſelves abroad all over the world? eſpecially when Chriſt told them, that it ſhould be after the coming of the Spirit that they ſhould go abroad, Acts 1. 8. and that the Spirit ſhould fit them for their work, (Joh. 15. 26, 27. Joh. 16. 13.) by teaching them, and teſtifying of Chriſt. Thirdly, If ſuch a diſtribution of Provinces had been made ſo early among the Apoſtles, how Annot. in loc. Diſſert. 3. c. 4. Schiſm, c. 4. Sect. 13. Anſw. to the Cath. c. 4. §. 2. Schiſm diſarmed. Anſw. c. 3. §. 4.

how comes it to paſs, that after they were endued with the Holy Ghoſt, they did not every one betake himſelf to his ſeveral Province? There could have been then no plea nor excuſe made for their ſtay any longer at Jeruſalem, after the promiſe of the Spirit was fulfilled upon them.
And yet after the perſecution raiſed at Jeruſalem, when moſt of the Church were diſperſed abroad, we find the Apoſtles remaining ſtill at Jeruſalem, Acts 8. 1, 14. would they have been ſo long abſent from their charge, if any ſuch diſtribution had been made among themſelves?
Fourthly, The Apoſtles occaſional going to places as they did, argues there was no ſuch ſet diviſion of Provinces among them. The firſt departure of any of the Apoſtles from Jeruſalem, was that of Peter and Acts 8. 14. John, who were ſent by common order of the Apoſtles to Samaria, after they heard that by Philip's preaching, they had received the word of God. Not the leaſt mention of any peculiar Province of theirs, which they were ſent to. So Peter's going from Joppa to Cæſarea, was occaſioned Acts 10. 5. by Cornelius his ſending for him. Fifthly, That Provinces were 32. not divided, appears, becauſe of ſo frequent reading of many of the Apoſtles being together in one place; firſt the whole twelve at Jeruſalem, after that, Peter and John together at Samaria; about four years after Paul's converſion, we meet with James and Peter together at Jeruſalem;
Gal. 1. 18, 19. fourteen years after this, we find James, Peter, and John there.
Gal. 2. 1, 9. Is it any ways probable, if all theſe had their diſtinct Provinces aſſigned then, they ſhould be ſo often found together at Jeruſalem, which certainly muſt belong but to the Province of one of them. Sixthly, It ſeems evident, that they divided not the world into Provinces among them, becauſe it was ſo long before they thought it to be their duty to preach unto the Gentiles; Peter muſt have a viſion firſt before he will go to Acts 10. 11. Cornelius; and as yet we ſee they retained that perſuaſion, that it is unlawful for a Jew to keep company, or come unto one that is of another Nation, Acts 10. 28. Nay, more than this, Peter is accuſed for this very action, before the Apoſtles at Jeruſalem, Acts 11. 2, 3. and they laid this as the ground of their quarrel, that he went in to men uncircumciſed, and did eat with them; how this is reconcilable with the whole world's being divided into Provinces ſo early among the Apoſtles, is not eaſie to conceive; unleſs ſome of them thought it unlawful to go to their own Provinces, which certainly muſt be of the Gentiles moſt of them.
Seventhly, Another evidence that Provinces were not divided ſo ſoon, is, that Peter's Province, ſo much ſpoken of, viz. that of the circumciſion, fell not to his ſhare, till near twenty years after this time we
Gal. 2. 7, 8, 9. now ſpeak of, upon the agreement between Paul and Peter, at Jeruſalem.
Anſwer to Cath. Gent. chap. 4. ſ. 3. numb. 7. If Provinces had been ſo ſoon divided, how comes the Apoſtleſhip of the circumciſion to be now at laſt attributed to Peter? was it not known what Peter's Province was before this time? and if it was, how come Paul and he now to agree about dividing their Provinces? Nay, farther, Eighthly, Theſe Provinces, after all this time were not ſo divided, as to exclude one from another's Province, which is requiſite for a diſtribution of them; much leſs were they ſo at firſt; for as to this diviſion of the Jews and Gentiles between Paul and Peter, it cannot be underſtood excluſively of others, for what work then had the reſt of the Apoſtles to do? Neither taking them diſtributively, was Paul excluded from preaching to the Jews, or Peter to the Gentiles. We ſee Paul was at firſt Acts 9. 15. choſen to be a veſſel to bear Chriſt's name before the Gentiles, and Kings, Acts 9. 20, 22. and the Children of Iſrael. We ſee hereby he was appointed an Apoſtle

as well to Jews as Gentiles; and accordingly we find him preſently preaching Chriſt in the Synagogues, and confounding the Jews. So in all places where Paul came, he firſt preached to the Jews in the Synagogues; Acts 13. 5, 14. and when they would not hearken to him, then he turned to the Gentiles. Neither was this done only before the Apoſtles meeting at Jeruſalem, ſuppoſed to be that ſpoken of Acts 15. but after at Epheſus we find him entering into the Synagogues there, and preaching to the Jews. Acts 19. 8. So likewiſe he did at Corinth, Acts 18. 4. And he reaſoned in the Synagogue every Sabbath, and perſuaded the Jews and the Greeks. Paul then we ſee thought not himſelf excluded from preaching to the Jews, Acts 18. 19. becauſe they were St. Peter's Province. Neither did Peter think himſelf excluded from the Gentiles; he was the firſt that opened the Acts 10. 28. door of faith to them by preaching to them; in which reſpect it is not altogether improbably conceived by ſome, that the power of the Keys Mat. 16. 19. was peculiarly given to him. And afterwards in the open Council at Jeruſalem, he owns himſelf as the Apoſtle to the Gentiles; Acts 15. 7. God made choice among us, that the Gentiles by my mouth ſhould hear the Word of the Goſpel and believe. This then evidently deſtroys any ſuch early diſtinction of Provinces; when Peter, whoſe Province ſeems moſt expreſs in Scripture, viz. the circumciſion, yet we find him him acting as an Apoſtle to the Gentiles too. I deny not but at the meeting of Paul and Peter at Jeruſalem, when they obſerved how God did bleſs the one moſt in the circumciſion, the other in the uncircumciſion, there was an agreement between them for the one to lay out his pains chiefly upon the Jews, and the other upon the Gentiles; and in probability where they met in any City, the one gathered a Church of the Jews, and the other of the Gentiles; but this makes no ſuch diſtinction of Provinces, as to exclude the one from the other's charge; and farther this agreement between Paul and Peter then after both had preached ſo many years, makes it fully clear, that the pretended diviſion of Provinces ſo early among the Apoſtles, is only the wind-egg of a working fancy, that wants a ſhell of reaſon to cover it. As for that diviſion of Provinces mentioned in Eccleſiaſtical writers, though as to ſome few they generally agree; as that Thomas went to Parthia, Andrew went to Scythia, Euſeb. lib. 3. cap. 1. John to the leſſer Aſia, &c. yet as to the moſt, they are at a loſs where to find their Provinces, and contradict one another in reference to them; and many of them ſeem to have their firſt original from the fables of Doratheus, Nicephorus, and ſuch writers.

§. 3. Having ſhewed that the Apoſtles obſerved no ſet order for diſtributing Provinces, we come to ſhew what courſe they took for the ſetling of Churches in the places they went to. In the clearing of which, nothing is more neceſſary than to free our Judgments of thoſe prejudices and prepoſſeſſions which the practice either of the former ages of the Church, or our own have cauſed within us. For it is eaſie to obſerve, that nothing hath been a more fruitful mother of miſtakes, and errors, than the looking upon the practice of the primitive Church through the glaſs of our own cuſtoms. Eſpecially when under the ſame name, (as it is very often ſeen) ſomething far different from what was primarily intended by the uſe of the word, is ſet forth to us. It were no difficult taſk to multiply examples in this kind; wherein men meeting with the ſame names, do apprehend the ſame things by them, which they now through cuſtom ſignifie, without taking notice of any alteration in the things themſelves ſignified by thoſe names. Thus ſince the name

Miſſa was appropriated by the Papiſts to that which they call the ſacrifice of the Altar, wherever they meet among ancient writers with that name, they preſently conceive the ſame thing was underſtood by it then. Whereas it was then only taken for the publick ſervice of the Church, ſo called from the diſmiſſion of the people after it, with an Ite, Miſſa eſt; and from the different forms of Chriſtians they had two ſeveral ſervices, the one called Miſſa Catechumenorum, becauſe at the end of that the Catechumeni were diſmiſſed out of the Aſſembly; the other Miſſa fidelium, at which they received the Lord's-Supper; which afterwards (the former diſcipline of the Church decaying) engroſſed the name Miſſa to its ſelf; and when the ſacrifice of the Altar came up among the Papiſts, it was appropriated to that: For though they innovated things never ſo much, yet it hath been always the Policy of that Church not to innovate names, that ſo the incautelous might be better deceived with a pretence of antiquity; and thus under the anciently ſimple name of Miſſa lies at this day couched a Maſs of errors. So after the word λειτουργεῖν was applied by them to that ſacrifice, wherever they meet that word in Scripture, they interpret it in that ſenſe; and hence when we only read of the teachers at Antioch, λειτουργούντων αὐτῶν, Acts 13. 2. no other rendering of the words will be taken but Sacrificantibus illis, although it be not only contrary to the ſenſe of the word in the New Teſtament, but to the Expoſition of Chryſoſtome, Theophylact, and Œcumenius, who expound it by κηρυττόντων. Thus when publick Liturgies were grown into uſe in the Church after the decay of the Gifts of the firſt primitive Church, Euſebius his bare calling St. James λειτουργὸς (tho' he relates only to his Miniſtry in the Church of Jeruſalem) is enough to entitle him Father to a Liturgy, which ſoon crept forth under his name; by an argument much of the ſame ſtrength with that which ſome have brought for reading Homilies, becauſe it is ſaid of St. Paul, Acts 20. 11. ὁμιλήσας ἄχρις αὐγῆς. Of the ſame ſtamp is Bellarmine's argument for invocation of Saints, becauſe of Jacob's ſaying invocetur ſuper eos nomen meum. But we need not go far for examples of this kind. The buſineſs we are upon, will acquaint us with ſome of them. As the argument for popular election of Paſtors, from the Grammatical ſenſe of the word χειροτονία, for Lay-elders from the name πρεσβύτεροι, and modern Epiſcopacy from the uſe of the word ἐπίσκοπος in Scriptures. Names and things muſt then be accurately diſtinguiſhed, and the ſenſe of the names muſt neither be fetched from the cuſtom now uſed, nor from the Etymology of the word, but from the undoubted practice of Apoſtolical times, if that can be made appear what it was, Which will be beſt done, if we can once find out what courſe and order the Apoſtles took in the forming and modelling the Churches by them planted.

V. Picherellum de Miſſa, cap. 1. Caſaub. Exercit. 16. §. 58.

§. 4. That which we lay then as a foundation, whereby to clear what Apoſtolical practice was, is, that the Apoſtles in the forming Churches did obſerve the cuſtoms of the Jewiſh Synagogue. Totum regimen Eccleſiarum Chriſti conformatum fuit ad Synagogarum exemplar, ſaith Grotius truly. Præſides & curatores Eccleſiarum ad inſtar Preſbyterorum Synagogæ Judaicæ conſtitutos fuiſſe conſtat, as Salmaſius often affirms. In which ſenſe we underſtand that famous ſpeech of the Author of the Commentary on St. Paul's Epiſtles, which goes under the name of Ambroſe, but now judged by moſt to be done by Hilary, a Deacon of the Church of Rome, under which name St. Auguſtine quotes ſome words on the fifth to the Romans, which are found ſtill in thoſe Commentaries. Nam apud omnes utique gentes honorabilis eſt ſenectus; unde & Synagoga & poſtea Eccleſia Seniores habuit, ſine quorum conſilio nihil agebatur in Eccleſiâ, which words are not to be underſtood of a diſtinct ſort of Preſbyters from ſuch as were employed in preaching the Word, but of ſuch Preſbyters as were the common Council of the Church, for the moderating and ruling the affairs of it, which the Church of Chriſt had conſtituted among them, as the Jewiſh Synagogue had before. And from hence we obſerve, that the Ebionites, who blended Judaiſm and Chriſtianity together, (whence Jerome ſaith of them, Dum volunt & Judæi eſſe & Chriſtiani, nec Judæi ſunt nec Chriſtiani, they made a Linſey-woolſey-Religion, which was neither Judaiſm nor Chriſtianity.) Theſe, as Epiphanius tells us, called their publick meeting-place συναγωγὴ and the Paſtors of their Churches Ἀρχισυναγώγους. Thereby implying the reſemblance and analogy between the form of Government in both of them. But this will beſt be made appear by comparing them both together. For which we are to take notice how much our Saviour, in the New Teſtament, did delight to take up the received practices among the Jews only, with ſuch alterations of them as were ſuitable to the nature and doctrine of Chriſtianity; as hath been abundantly manifeſted by many learned men, about the Rites of the Lord's-Supper, taken from the poſt-cœnium among the Jews; the uſe of Baptiſm, from the Baptiſms uſed in initiating Proſelytes; Excommunication from their putting out of the Synagogue. As to which things, it may be obſerved, that thoſe Rites which our Saviour tranſplanted into the Goſpel-ſoil, were not ſuch as were originally founded on Moſes his Law, but were introduced by a confederate Diſcipline among themſelves. And thus it was in reference to the Government of the Synagogues among them; for although the reaſon of erecting them was grounded on a command in the Levitical Law, Levit. 23. 3. where holy Convocations are required upon the Sabbath-days; yet the building of Synagogues in the Land, was not, as far as we can find, till a great while after. For although Moſes required the duty of aſſembling, yet he preſcribes no orders for the place of meeting, nor for the manner of ſpending of thoſe days in God's ſervice, nor for the perſons who were to ſuper-intend the publick worſhip performed at that time. Theſe being duties of a moral nature, are left more undetermined by Moſes his Law, which is moſt punctual in the Ceremonial part of Divine ſervice. And therefore even then when God did determine the poſitives of worſhip, we ſee how much he left the performance of morals to the wiſdom and diſcretion of God's people, to order them in a way agreeable to the mind and will of God. We ſhall not here diſcourſe of the more elder cuſtoms and obſervations of the Synagogues, but take the draught of them by the beſt light we can about our Saviour's time, when the Apoſtles copied out the Government of Chriſtian Churches by them.

V. Bezam in Acts 13. 15. in Acts 11. 30.—6. 3. —14. 12. —20. 28. Apparat. ad lib. de Prim. Papæ. p. 151, 220.

§. 5. About the time of Chriſt we find Synagogues in very great requeſt among the Jews; God ſo diſpoſing it, that the moral part of his ſervice ſhould be more frequented now the Ceremonial was expiring; and by thoſe places ſo erected, it might be more facile and eaſie for the Apoſtles to diſperſe the Goſpel by preaching it in thoſe places, to which it was the cuſtom of the people to reſort. And as Paul at Athens obſerving the Altar inſcribed, Ἀγνώστῳ Θεῷ, To the unknown God, takes his

Text from thence, and begins to preach God and Chriſt to them; ſo the Apoſtles in every Synagogue meet with a copy of the Law, from whence they might better take their riſe to diſcover him who was the end of the Law for righteouſneſs to all that believe. For Moſes of old Acts 15.21. time hath in every City them that preach him, being read in the Synagogues every Sabbath-day. It was their conſtant cuſtom then every Sabbath-day to have the Law publickly read; for which every Synagogue was V. Buxtorf. Synag. Jud. c. 9. p. 216. furniſhed with a moſt exact copy, which was looked upon as the great treaſure and glory of their Synagogue, in the copying out of which, the greateſt care and diligence was uſed. In their Synagogues they read on- V. Lud. de Dieu in Acts 13.15. ly the Law and the Prophets, the כתובים or Hagiographa were not ordinarily read in publick; the Law for the more convenient reading it, was diſtributed into twenty four Sections, which they call'd פרשיות every week one Section being read, (joining twice two leſſer Sections together) the whole Law was read through once every eear.

But here I cannot ſay that the Jews were abſolutely bound up to read the ſeveral Sections appointed for the days, as it is commonly thought, V. Cloppenb. tract. de ſab. deuteroproto & Lud. Capelli ep. ad Clopp. p. 74. cum reſp. Clop. p. 143. Luke 4. 17. (from which Paraſchæ and the times prefixed of reading them, Cloppenburgh fetcheth a new interpretation of the Σάϐϐατον δευτερόπρωτον, which is, that the firſt Sabbath was that of the civil year, which began with the Section בראשית upon the twenty fourth of the month Tiſri; but the ſecond Sabbath after the firſt, was the firſt Sabbath of the ſacred year, which began with the Section החדש upon the Calends of Niſan) but I do not ſee any ſuch evidence of ſo exact and curious a diviſion of the ſeveral Sections ſo long ſince as the time of our Saviour is, which appears by our Saviour's reading in the Synagogue at Nazareth, where it ſeems he read after the Synagogue-cuſtom, as one of the ſeven call'd out by the חזן to read before the people, but we find no Section aſſigned him by him that delivered the book to him (the office of the מגן) but it is ſaid of him, ἀναπτύξας τὸ βιϐλίον εὗρε τ̀ τόπον, when he had unfolded the book, he found out that place in Iſaiah. So that then it ſeems there was no ſuch preciſe obſervation of the ſeveral Sections to be read. And our Saviour's reading the book of the Prophets in the Synagogue, puts us in mind of the הפטרות the Sections of the Prophets anſwer- In Thisbi v. פטר. able to thoſe of the Law; which Elias Levita tells us came up after the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, who ſo ſeverely prohibited the Jews the reading of their Law, but from that time hath been obſerved ever ſince, Acts 13.27. of which we read in Paul's Sermon at Antioch in Piſidia, ſpeaking of Chriſt: For they that dwell at Jeruſalem and their Rulers, becauſe they knew him not, nor the voices of the Prophets, which are read every Sab- Itiner. p. 114. ed. L'Emper. bath-day. Benjamin Tudelenſis, in his Itinerary, tells us, that the ſame cuſtom was not obſerved among all the Jews for the reading the Sections V. L'Emper. in Not. p. 220. of the Law. For in Mitſraim, (which he there takes not for Egypt it ſelf, as it is commonly taken, but for Grand Cairo) where there were near two thouſand Jews, there were two Synagogues, the one of Syrian, the other of Babylonian Jews. The latter read over every week an entire Section of the Law, (as the Jews in Spain in his time did) and ſo finiſhed the Law in a year's ſpace. The Syrian Jews, or thoſe that were born in Judæa, divided every Section into three parts, and read not the Law through but in three years time. Theſe Synagogues were very much multiplied, both in Jeruſalem and elſewhere, about the time of our Saviour's being in the world. When the common tradition of the Jews is, that in Jeruſalem it ſelf, there were Four hundred and eighty one Synagogues, which they ridiculouſly obſerved by their Gematry, from the word מלאתי uſed Iſa. 1. 20. whoſe numeral Letters being put together, amount to that number; but a clearer evidence of the multitude of Synagogues, is our Saviour's ſo often appearing in them; and ſo likewiſe the Apoſtles when they went abroad to preach the Goſpel, we find in moſt places that they firſt entred into the Synagogues, which were, by the liberty given to the Jews, allowed them in all the Cities where they inhabited by the Roman Governours. And ſo in all their diſperſions, both in Babylon, Egypt, and the Weſtern Parts, we read of the Synagogues which the Jews enjoyed, and the liberty they had therein, for exerciſe of their own way of worſhip and diſcipline. And therefore even at Rome we read of their Proſeuchæ,

Which by the old Scholiaſt upon Juvenal, is ſaid to be the place ad quem convenire ſolebant mendici ad ſtipem petendam, of which Turnebus gives this account, Proſeuchæ fana Judæorum erant, ut Alexandriæ & Romæ, alibique, ſic nomen adeptæ quod oracula quædam eſſent, vel (ut Chriſtiani loquuntur) oratoria. Cum autem ad Eleemoſynam Judæi dandam eſſent propenſiſſimi, eò ceu mendicorum conventus coibat; ſed & Judæi & ipſi mendici, inviſi erant omnibus, & mendici ea loca quod domicilia non haberent, diverſores interdum occupabant, in iiſque cubabant, ideoque Proſeuches nomen in contemptum abierat. Scaliger thinks that the Proſeucha differed from the Synagogue; for which he is checked by Grotius, from that place of Philo, where he ſpeaks of Auguſtus giving the Jews the liberty of their Proſeuchæ, for the learning the Religion of their Country, Τὰ γὰρ κατὰ πόλεις προσευχτήρια τί ἕτερόν ἐστιν ἢ διδασκαλεῖα φρονήσεως καὶ ἀνδρείας καὶ σοφρωσύνης καὶ δικαιοσύνης, εὐσεβείας τε καὶ ὁσιότητος καὶ συμπάσης ἀρετῆς, which in brief is that the Proſeuchæ were the Schools of all Religion and Learning, by which words he ſeems to confound not only the Synagogue and the Proſeucha together, but the Synagogue and the בית מרדש which was their Divinity-School, whither they uſed to repair after dinner, upon Sabbath-days, and where the Queſtions about their Law were diſcuſſed; but though I cannot ſay theſe were always diſtinguiſhed, yet in ſome places they were. Such ſeems the School of Tyrannus to be, where Paul taught, having withdrawn himſelf from the Synagogue. And ſo ſometimes the Proſeuchæ were diſtinguiſhed from the Synagogues, as Grotius himſelf elſewhere acknowledgeth, viz. either where there was not a competent number of Jews, (for ten Students in the Law were required to make a Synagogue.) or elſe where the Magiſtrate would not permit the uſe of them, in which caſe the poor Jews were fain to content themſelves with a place remote from the City, either by ſome river, as that προσευχὴ, mentioned Acts 16. 13. or by ſome Grove or Wood, whence that of Juvenal.

§. 6. We now come to enquire after what manner the Government of the Synagogue was modell'd. Wherein we muſt firſt enquire whether there were any peculiar Government belonging to the Synagogue, diſtinct from the civil Conſiſtories which were in uſe among them. This
Dr. Lightfoot Horæ Hebr. in Mat. 2. 23. p. 70. is often left untouched by learned men in their diſcourſe of Synagogues; ſome indeed make the leaſt Conſiſtory or Sanhedrin in uſe among the Jews, viz. the Triumvirate, to be the rulers of the Synagogue, and part of the ten, who were to be where-ever there was a Synagogue. But although I cannot ſee ſufficient evidence for a great Eccleſiaſtical Sanhedrin founded by Moſes, anſwering to the great Sanhedrin of LXXI. yet I conceive it probable, that when Synagogues were ſo multiplied both at home and abroad, there was a diſtinct Bench of Officers, who did particularly belong to the Synagogue to ſuperintend the affairs of that, which I ſhall now endeavour to make out by theſe following reaſons, Firſt, Becauſe the Ten required for the Synagogue are ſet down by Jewiſh writers, as diſtinct from the number required for the civil Conſi-
De Syned. l. 2. c. 5. ſ. 4. ſtory. For in the Gemara Babylonia (cited by Selden) the account given why there muſt be 120 inhabitants where there was to be a Sanhedrin, of twenty three, is this, There muſt be twenty three to make up the Sanhedrin, and three orders of twenty three, (who ſat in a hemicycle under the Sanhedrin, in the ſame form as they ſat) and beſides theſe, the ten who were to be employed wholly in the affairs of the Synagogue, for the Gloſs there explains them to be עשרה בני ארם כטילין מכל סלאכה decem filii hominis vacantes ab omni operi ut parati ſint וערבית לבית הכנסת שחרית domui Synagogæ manè & veſperi, and there adds, that every City, though it be wall'd, where ten ſuch perſons are wanting, is looked on only as a village, and thought unworthy to have a Sanhedrin of twenty three.) So that by this it appears the number of the Decemvirate
In Jud. tit. Sanhed. c. 1. ſect. 5. for the Synagogue, was diſtinct from the Perſons employed in the civil Courts. To the ſame purpoſe Maimonides gives the account of the number of 120; who likewiſe requires the ten for the Synagogue as a Ad Miſn. tit. Sanhed. c. 1. ſect. 6. diſtinct and peculiar number. Atque hi erant viri qui vacabant tantum rebus divinis, nimirum lectioni legis & ſeſſioni in ſynagogis, as Mr. Selden quotes it from another place in him; whereby it is evident that thoſe who were employed in the Synagogue, did make a peculiar Bench and Conſiſtory, diſtinct from the civil Judicature of the place. And therefore the 'Αρχισυνάγωγοι are nor the civil Rulers, but ſome peculiar Officers belonging to the ſervice of the Synagogue. And thence when all civil Power and Government was taken from the Jews, yet they retained their Archiſynagogues ſtill. Whence we read of Archiſynagogues, Cod. Theod. l. 16. tit. 8. l. 13. & 14. Patriarchs and Preſbyters among the Jews in the times of Arcadius and Honorius, when all civil Power and Juriſdiction was taken from them. The Second reaſon is from the peculiar ordination of thoſe who were the Rulers of the Synagogues. This I know is denied by many, becauſe, ſay they, ordination was proper only to the Preſbyters among the Jews, who were thereby made capable of being members of the Sanhedrin, thence it was called סמיכה וקנים ordinatio preſbyterorum, i. e. impoſitio manuum quâ preſbyteri fiunt. This ordination was I grant primarily uſed in order to the making men members of the great Sanhedrin, and therefore the Jews derive the cuſtom of ordaining them, from Moſes his firſt conſtituting the L X X. elders, which, ſay they, was done done by impoſition of hands; which was ſeconded by the example of Moſes laying his hands on Joſhua, from whence the cuſtom was continued down among them till the time of Adrian, who ſeverely prohibited it by an Edict, That whoſoever ſhould ordain another, ſhould forfeit his Life, and ſo every one that was ſo ordained. Thence the Jews tell us that R. Jehuda Ben Baba is called הסומך the Ordainer, becauſe in the time of that Edict he ordained five Preſbyters, without which they had wholly loſt their ſucceſſion of Preſbyters for Courts of Judicature. But though it be thus evident that their ordination was chiefly uſed in order to the fitting men to be members of the Sanhedrin, yet that beſides this, there was a peculiar ordination for perſons not employed in civil matters, will appear, Firſt, From the different forms of their ordination; ſome were general, without any reſtriction or limitation at all; which power was conferred in words to this purpoſe, Ordinatus jam ſis, & ſit tibi facultas judicandi etiam cauſas pœnales. He that was thus ordained, was fit for any court of Judicature; but there was another form of ordination, which was more particular and reſtrained; a form limiting the general power, either to pecuniary caſes, or criminal, or only to the power of binding and looſing, without any judiciary power at all. Now thoſe that were thus ordained, were the Jewiſh Caſuiſts, reſolving men only in foro conſcientiæ of the lawfulneſs and unlawfulneſs of things propounded to them. This they called רשות להורות באסר והתר Facultas decernendi circa ligatum & ſolutum, that is, a power of decreeing what was lawful or unlawful. For in that ſenſe binding and looſing is uſed by the Jewiſh writers. In which ſenſe they tell us commonly that one School, as that of Hillel אוסר binds, that is, judgeth a thing unlawful, another מותר looſeth, (as that of Schammai) that is, judgeth it lawful and free to be done. Now the perſons thus ordained with this power only, were thereby no members of any civil Court of Judicature, nor thereby made capable of it; it appears then that this ordination was peculiar to a particular function, which exactly anſwers to the miniſterial Office under the Goſpel. And that thoſe who were thus ordained, either might not, or did not exerciſe that Office of theirs in the Synagogue, I can ſee no reaſon; I am ſure it was moſt ſuitable to that place, or at leaſt to the בית מדרש where there was ſuch a one diſtinct from the Synagogue.

But a clearer evidence of the particular ordination of thoſe employed in the Synagogue, we have from Benjamin in his Itinerary, for granting his palpable miſtakes about the civil power of the Jews in his time, (which was about the middle of the twelfth Century) ſufficiently diſcovered by the learned L'Empereur, yet as to the ordaining of perſons for the ſeveral Synagogues, we have no ground to ſuſpect his Teſtimony, which is very plain and evident. For ſpeaking of R. Daniel Ben Haſdai, who was the ראש הגולה or the αἰχμαλωτάρχης, the Head of the Captivity, then reſiding at Bagdad: He tells us the Synagogues of Babylon, Perſia, Choreſan, Sheba, Meſopotamia, and many other places, derived power from him על כל קהל וקהל רבוחזן of ordaining a Rabbi and Preacher over every Synagogue, which he tells us was done by laying on his hands upon them. Theſe two the Rabbi and the חזן he makes to be the fixed Officers of every Synagogue, and the office of the latter lay chiefly in expounding the Scriptures. The like he hath of R. Nathaniel the ראש הישיבה to whoſe office it belonged to ordain in all the Synagogues in Egypt רבנים וחזנין the Rabbies and Lecturers of the Synagogue:

Diſſertati. ad Lectorem & in not. 193, &c.

By which we ſee clearly, that there was a peculiar ordination for the Miniſters belonging to the Synagogue. Elench. Triher. c. 10. Thence Scaliger wonders how Chriſt at twelve years old ſhould be permitted to ſit among the Doctors aſking Queſtions, when he was no ordained Rabbi to whom that place belonged. Luke 2. 46. But although ἐν μέσῳ τῶν διδασκάλων may poſſibly mean no more than ſitting on one of the lower ſeats belonging to thoſe who were yet in their קטנות or Minority, where they ſat at the feet of their Teachers, which was not within the Temple its ſelf, but as Arias Montanus thinks, In Appar. de Templo. was at the East-Gate of the Temple, where the Doctors ſat; yet this is evident by Scaliger, that he looked on an ordination for that end, as neceſſary to thoſe who ſat in the Synagogues, as the Doctors there; which is likewiſe affirmed by Grotius, who tells us, that among the Jews, not only all publick civil Offices were conferr'd by impoſition of hands, Sed & in Archiſynagogis & ſenioribus Synagogæ, idem obſervatum, unde mos χειροθεσίας ad Chriſtianos tranſiit; Annot. in Evang. p. 39. but likewiſe all the Rulers and Elders of the Synagogue were ſo ordained, from whence the cuſtom was tranſlated into Chriſtianity, (of which afterwards.) Thus now we have cleared that there was a peculiar Government belonging to the Synagogue, diſtinct from the civil judicatures.

§. 7. Having thus far proceeded in clearing that there was a peculiar form of Government in the Synagogue; we now enquire what that was, and by what Law and rule it was obſerved. The Government of the Synagogue, either relates to the publick ſervice of God in it, or the publick rule of it as a ſociety. As for the ſervice of God to be performed in it, as there were many parts of it, ſo there were many Officers peculiarly appointed for it. The main part of publick ſervice lay in the reading and expounding the Scriptures: For both, the known place of Philo will give us light for the underſtanding them. Lib. omnem probum liberum eſſe. Εἰς ἱεροὺς ἀφικνούμενοι τόπους οἳ καλοῦνται συναγωγαὶ καθ' ἡλικίας ἐν τάξεσιν ὑπὸ πρεσβυτέροις νέοι καθέζονται μετὰ κόσμου προσήκοντος, ἔχοντες ἀκροατικῶς· εἶθ' ὁ μὲν τὰς βίβλους ἀναγινώσκει λαβὼν ἕτερος δὲ τῶν ἐμπειροτάτων, ὅσα μὴ γνώριμα, παρελθὼν ἀναγινώσκει. Coming to their holy places call'd Synagogues, they ſit down in convenient order, according to their ſeveral forms, ready to hear, the young under the elder; then one taketh the book and readeth, another of thoſe beſt ſkill'd comes after and expounds it, In Luc. 4. 16. For ſo Grotius reads it ἀναδιδάσκει for ἀναγινώσκει, out of Euſebius. We ſee two ſeveral Offices here, the one of the Reader in the Synagogue, the other of him that did interpret what was read. Great difference I find among learned men about the חזן of the Synagogue; ſome by him underſtand the ἀναγνώστης, Luke 4. 20. call'd ſometimes in Scripture ὑπηρέτης, and ſo make him the under Reader in the Synagogue; and hence I ſuppoſe it is (and not from looking to the poor, which was the Office of the Parnaſim) that the Office of Deacons in the primitive Church, is ſuppoſed to be anſwerable to the חזנים 6. Ebionites. among the Jews; for the Deacon's Office in the Church, was the publick reading of the Scriptures: And hence Epiphanius parallels the ἀρχισυναγώγους, πρεσβυτέρους and Ἀζανίτας among the Jews, to the Biſhop, Preſbyters and Deacons among the Chriſtians. But others make the Office of the חזן to be of a higher nature, not to be taken for the Reader himſelf, (for that was no ſet Office, but upon every Sabbath-day Synag. Jud. lib. 11. ſeven were call'd out to do that work, as Buxtorf tells us; firſt a Prieſt, then a Levite, and after, any five of the people; and theſe had every one their ſet parts in every Section to read, which are ſtill marked by the numbers in ſome Bibles.) But the חזן was he that did call out every one of theſe in their order to read, and did obſerve their reading, whether they did it exactly or no. So Buxtorf ſpeaking of the חזן, Hic maximè oratione ſive precibus & cantu Eccleſiæ præibat, præerat lectioni legali, docens quod & quomodo legendum, & ſimilibus quæ ad ſacra pertinebant. So that according to him the חזן was the Superintendent of all the publick ſervice, thence others make him parallel to him they call'd שליח ציבור the Angel of the Church, Legatus Eccleſiæ L'Empereur renders it, as though the name were impoſed on him, as acting in the name of the Church, which could only be in offering up publick prayers; but he was Angelus Dei, as he was inſpector Eccleſiæ, becauſe the Angels are ſuppoſed to be more immediately preſent in, and Superviſors over the publick place, and duties of worſhip; ſee 1 Cor. 11. 10. this חזן is by L'Empereur often rendred Concionator Synagogæ, as though it belonged to him to expound the meaning of what was read in the Synagogue, but he that did that, was call'd דרשן from דרש to enquire; thence συζητητὴς τȣ͂ κόσμȣ τȣ́τȣ the enquirer, or diſputer of this world, thence R. Moſes Haddarſan; but it is in vain to ſeek for ſeveral Offices from ſeveral names; nay, it ſeems not evident, that there was any ſet Officers in the Jewiſh Church for expounding Scriptures in all Synagogues, or at leaſt not ſo fixed, but that any one that enjoyed any repute for Religion, or knowledge in the Law, was allowed a free liberty of ſpeaking for the inſtruction of the people, as we ſee in Chriſt and his Apoſtles; for the Rulers of the Synagogue ſent to Paul and Barnabas, after the reading of the Law, that if they had any word of exhortation, they ſhould ſpeak on. From hence it is evident, that there were more than one who had rule over the Synagogues, they being call'd Rulers here. It ſeems very probable, that in every City where there were ten wiſe men, (as there were ſuppoſed to be in every place where there was a Synagogue) that they did all jointly concur for the ruling the affairs of the Synagogue. But what the diſtinct Offices of all theſe were, it is hard to make out, but all joining together ſeem to make the Conſiſtory, or Bench, as ſome call it, which did unanimouſly moderate the affairs of the Synagogue, whoſe manner of ſitting in the Synagogues, is thus deſcribed by Mr. Thorndike out of Maimonides, whoſe words are theſe: How ſit the people in the Synagogue? The Elders ſit with their faces towards the people, and their backs towards the Hecall, (the place where they lay the copy of the Law) and all the people ſit rank before rank, the face of every rank towards the back of the rank before it, ſo the faces of all the people are towards the Sanctuary, and towards the Elders, and towards the Ark; and when the Miniſter of the Synagogue ſtandeth up to prayer, he ſtandeth on the ground before the Ark, with his face to the Sanctuary, as the reſt of the people. Several things are obſervable to our purpoſe in this Teſtimony of Maimonides: Firſt, That there were ſo many Elders in the Synagogue, as to make a Bench or Conſiſtory, and therefore had a place by themſelves, as the Governours of the Synagogue. And the truth is, after their diſperſion we ſhall find little Government among them, but what was in their Synagogues, unleſs it was where they had liberty for erecting Schools of learning. Beſides this College of Preſbyters, we here ſee the publick Miniſter of the Synagogue, the חזן הכנסת i. e. Epiſcopus congregationis, the Superintendent over the Congregation, whoſe peculiar Office it was to pray for, and to bleſs the people. We are here farther to take notice of the form of their ſitting in the Synagogue;

gogue; the Preſbyters ſat together upon a Bench by themſelves, with their faces towards the people, which was in an Hemicycle, the form wherein all the Courts of Judicature among them ſat; which is fully deſcribed by Mr. Selden and Mr. Thorndike in the places above-cited. This was afterwards the form wherein the Biſhop and Preſbyters uſed to ſit in the primitive Church, as the laſt named learned Author largely obſerves and proves. Beſides this College of Preſbyters, there ſeems to be one particularly call'd the Ruler of the Synagogue, ראש הקהל in the Scriptures ἀρχισυνάγωγος or ἄρχων τῆς συναγωγῆς, which in the importance of the New Teſtament Greek, (following that of the Alexandrian Jews, in the Verſion of the Old Teſtament) implies no more than a primacy of order in him above the reſt he was joined with. And thence ſometimes we read of them in the plural number, οἱ ἀρχισυνάγωγοι, Acts 13. 15. implying thereby an equality of power in many; but by reaſon of the neceſſary primacy of one in order above the reſt, the name may be appropriated to the Preſident of the College. Acts 18. 8, 17, we read of two, viz. Criſpus and Soſthenes, and either of them is call'd Ἀρχισυνάγωγος, which could not be, did the name import any peculiar power of Juriſdiction lodged in one excluſive of the reſt; unleſs we make them to be of two Synagogues, which we have no evidence at all for; I confeſs Beza his argument from εἷς τῶν ἀρχισυναγώγων, Mark 5. 22. for a multitude of thoſe ſo called in the ſame Synagogue, is of no great force, where we may probably ſuppoſe there were many Synagogues. But where there is no evidence of more than one in a place, and we find the name attributed to more than one, we have ground to think that there is nothing of power or Juriſdiction in that one, which is not common to more beſides himſelf. But granting ſome peculiarity of honour belonging to one above the reſt in a Synagogue, which in ſome places, I ſee no great reaſon to deny, yet that implies not any power over and above the Bench, of which he was a Member, though the firſt in order; much as the נשיא the Prince of the Sanhedrin, whoſe place imported no power peculiar to himſelf, but only a priority of dignity in himſelf above his fellow Senators; as the Princeps Senatûs in the Roman Republick, anſwering to the אבבית דין in the great Sanhedrin, who was next to the Naſi, as the Princeps Senatûs to the Conſuls, which was only an honorary Dignity, and nothing elſe: Under which diſguiſe that politick Prince Auguſtus raviſhed the Roman Common-wealth of its former liberty. The name ἀρχισυνάγωγος, may, I ſuppoſe, in propriety of ſpeech, be rendred in Latin, Magiſter ordinis, he being by his Office Præſul, a name not originally importing any power, but only dignity: Thoſe whom the Greeks call ἀρχιερέας, the Latins render Magiſtros ſui ordinis, and ſo Suetonius interprets ἀρχιερωσυνήν by Magiſterium Sacerdotii. They who meet then with the name Archiſynagogues either in Lampridius, Vopiſcus, Codex Theodoſii, Juſtinian's Novels, in all whom it occurs, and in ſome places as diſtinct from Preſbyters, will learn to underſtand thereby only the higheſt honour in the Synagogue, conſidering before how little, yea nothing of power the Jews enjoyed under either the Heathen or Chriſtian Emperors.

One thing more we add, touching this honour of the Rulers of the Synagogue among the Jews, that whatever honour, title, power or dignity is imported by that name, it came not from any Law enforcing or commanding it, but from mutual confederation and agreement among the perſons employed in the Synagogue, whoſe natural reaſon did dictate; that where many have an equality of power, it is moſt convenient, (by way of accumulation upon that Perſon, of a power more than he had, but not by deprivation of themſelves of that inherent power which they enjoyed) to entruſt the management of the executive part of Affairs of common concernment to one perſon eſpecially choſen, and deputed thereunto. So it was in all the Sanhedrins among the Jews, and in all well-ordered Senates and Councils in the world. And it would be very ſtrange, that any Officers of a religious ſociety, ſhould upon that account be out-Lawed of thoſe natural Liberties, which are the reſults and products of the free actings of reaſon. Which things, as I have already obſerved, God hath looked on to be ſo natural to man, as when he was moſt ſtrict and punctual in ceremonial commands, he yet left theſe things wholly at liberty. For we read not of any command, that in the Sanhedrin one ſhould have ſome peculiarity of honour above the reſt; this mens natural reaſon would prompt them to, by reaſon of a neceſſary priority of order in ſome above others; which the very inſtinct of nature hath taught irrational creatures, much more ſhould the light of reaſon direct men to. But yet all order is not power, nor all power juridical, nor all juridical power a ſole power; therefore it is a meer Paralogiſm in any from order to infer power, or from a delegated power by conſent, to infer a juridical power by Divine right; or laſtly, from a power in common with others, to deduce a power excluding others. All which they are guilty of, who merely from the name of an Archiſynagogue, would fetch a perpetual neceſſity of juriſdiction in one above the elders joined with him, or from the הנשוא in the Sanhedrin, a power of a ſole ordination in one without the conſent of his fellow Senators. But of theſe afterwards. Thus much may ſuffice for a draught, in little, of the Government of the Jewiſh Synagogue.

§. 8. Having thus far repreſented the Jewiſh Synagogue that the Idea of its Government may be formed in our underſtandings, we now come to conſider how far, and in what the Apoſtles in forming Chriſtian Churches, did follow the pattern of the Jewiſh Synagogue. Which is a notion not yet ſo far improved, as, I conceive it may be, and I know no one more conducible to the happy end of compoſing our differences, touching the Government of the Church, than this is. I ſhall therefore, for the full clearing of it, premiſe ſome general conſiderations to make way for the entertainment of this Hypotheſis in mens minds, at leaſt as probable; and then endeavour particularly to ſhew how the Apoſtles did obſerve the model of the Synagogue, in its publick ſervice, in ordination of Church-officers, in forming Preſbyteries in the ſeveral Churches, in ruling and governing thoſe Preſbyteries. The general conſiderations I premiſe, to ſhew the probability of what I am aſſerting, ſhall be from theſe things, from the community of name and cuſtoms between the believing Jews and others, at the firſt forming Churches; from the Apoſtles forming Churches out of Synagogues in their travelling abroad; from the agreeableneſs of that model of Government to the State of the Chriſtian Churches at that time. I begin with the firſt, From the community of names and cuſtoms, between the believing and unbelieving Jews, at the firſt forming Churches. All the while our bleſſed Saviour was living in the world, Chriſt and his Diſciples went ſtill under the name of Jews; they neither renounced the name, nor the cuſtoms in uſe among them. Our Saviour goes up to the Feaſts at Jeruſalem, conforms to all the rites and cuſtoms in uſe then; not only thoſe commanded by God

himſelf, but thoſe taken up by the Jews themſelves, if not contrary to God's commands, as in obſerving the Feaſt of Dedication, in going into their Synagogues, and teaching ſo often there, in waſhing the Feet of the Diſciples, (a cuſtom uſed by them before the Paſſover) in uſing Baptiſm, for proſelyting men to the profeſſion of Chriſtianity, &c. In theſe and other things our Saviour conformed to the received practice among them, though the things themſelves were no ways commanded by the Law of Moſes. And after his reſurrection, when he took care for the forming of a Church upon the doctrine he had delivered, yet we find not the Apoſtles withdrawing from communion with the Jews, but, on the contrary, we find the Diſciples frequenting the Temple, Acts 2. 46. Acts 3. 1. Acts 5. 20, 21, 26. whereby it appears how they owned themſelves as Jews ſtill, obſerving the ſame both time and place for publick worſhip which were in uſe among the Jews. We find Paul, Acts 9. 20. preſently after his converſion, in the Synagogues, preaching that Chriſt whom he had before perſecuted; and where ever he goes abroad afterwards, we find him ſtill entring into the Synagogues to preach; where Acts 13. 5. we cannot conceive he ſhould have ſo free and eaſie admiſſion, unleſs 14. ——17. 10. the Jews did look upon him as one of their own religion, and obſerv-——18. 4. ing the ſame cuſtoms in the Synagogues with themſelves, only differing ——19. 8. in the point of the coming of the Meſſias, and the obligation of the ceremonial Law, the leaſt footſteps of which were ſeen in the Synagogue worſhip. But that which yet farther clears this, is the general prejudice of the Diſciples againſt the Gentiles, even after the giving the Acts 11. 3. Holy Ghoſt, as appears by their contending with Peter for going in to men uncircumciſed. It is evident that then the Apoſtles themſelves did not clearly apprehend the extent of their commiſſion; for elſe what Acts 10.28. made Peter ſo ſhy of going to Cornelius? But by every creature, and all nations, they only apprehended the Jews in their diſperſions abroad, or at leaſt that all others who were to be ſaved, muſt be by being proſelyted to the Jews, and obſerving the Law of Moſes, together with the Goſpel of Chriſt. And therefore we ſee the neceſſity of circumciſion Acts 15. 1. much preſſed by the believing Jews which came down from Jeruſalem, which raiſed ſo high a diſpute, that a convention of the Apoſtles together at Jeruſalem was called for the ending of it: And even there we ——15. 7. find great heats before the buſineſs could be decided πολλῆς δὲ συζητήσεως γενομένης, After there had been much diſputing. Nay, after this Council, and the determination of the Apoſtles therein, all the eaſe and release that was granted, was only to the Gentile-converts, but the Jews ſtick cloſe to their old Principles ſtill, and are as zealous of the cuſtoms of the Jews as ever before: For which we have a pregnant teſtimony in Acts 21. 20, 21, 22. where the Elders of the Church of Jeruſalem tell Paul there were many myriads Ἰουδαίων τῶν πεπιστευκότων of believing Jews, who were πάντες ζηλωταὶ τοῦ νόμου, all very zealous for the Law ſtill, and therefore had conceived a ſiniſter opinion of Paul, as one who taught a defection from the Law of Moſes, ſaying, They might not circumciſe their Children, nor walk after the cuſtoms. One copy reads it as Beza tells us, τοῖς ἔθεσι τοῖς πατρώοις πορεύεσθαι to follow the cuſtom of their Fathers.
We ſee how equally zealous they are for the cuſtoms obtaining among them, as for the Law its ſelf. And is it then any ways probable that theſe who continued ſuch zealots for the cuſtoms among them, ſhould not obſerve thoſe cuſtoms in uſe in the Synagogues for the Government of the Church? Might not they have been charged as well as Paul, with relinquiſhing the cuſtoms, if they had thrown off the model of the Jewiſh Synagogue, and taken up ſome cuſtoms different from that? And that which farther confirms this, is, that this Church of Jeruſalem continued ſtill in its zeal for the Law, till after the deſtruction of the Temple; and all the ſeveral Paſtors of that Church, (whom Eccleſiaſtical Writers call Biſhops) were of the circumciſion. For both we have the teſtimony of Sulpicius Severus, ſpeaking of the time of Adrian. Et quia Chriſtiani ex Judæis potiſſimum putabantur, (namque tum Hieroſolymæ, non niſi ex circumciſione habebat Eccleſia ſacerdotem) militum cohortem cuſtodias in perpetuum agitare juſſit, quæ Judæos omnes Hieroſolymæ aditu arceret. Quod quidem Chriſtianæ fidei proficiebat; quia tum penè omnes Chriſtum Deum, ſub legis obſervatione, credebant. We ſee hereby that the Chriſtians obſerved ſtill the Law with the Goſpel; and that the Jews and Chriſtians were both reckoned as one body, which muſt imply an obſervation of the ſame rites and cuſtoms among them: For thoſe are the things whereby Societies are diſtinguiſhed moſt. Now it is evident that the Romans made no diſtinction at firſt between the Jews and Chriſtians. Thence we read in the time of Claudius, when the Edict came out againſt the Jews, Aquila and Priſcilla, though converted to Chriſtianity, were forced to leave Italy upon that account, being ſtill looked on as Jews; yet theſe are called by Paul, his helpers in Chriſt Jeſus. For which Onuphrius gives this reaſon, Nullum adhuc inter Judæos & Chriſtianos diſcrimen noſcebatur, which account is likewiſe given by Alphonſus Ciaconius, Congeneres & comprofeſſores ejuſdem religionis gentilibus cenſebantur, (Chriſtiani pariter ac Judæi.) The Edict of Claudius we may read ſtill in Suetonius, Judæos impulſore Chreſto aſſidue tumultuantes Roma expulit. We find here the Edict fully expreſſed for baniſhing the Jews, and the occaſion ſet down; which moſt interpret of the doctrine of Chriſt, as the occaſion of the ſtirs between the Jews and Chriſtians. For the Romans called Chriſt Chreſtus, and Chriſtians, Chreſtiani, as the Authors of the Chriſtians Apologies againſt the Heathens often tell us. But Marcellus Donatus conjectures this Chreſtus to have been ſome ſeditious Jew called by that name, for which he brings many Inſcriptions wherein the name occurs, but none wherein it is given to a Jew; which ſhould be firſt produced, before we leave the received interpretation of it. However that be, we ſee the Jews and Chriſtians equally undergo the puniſhment, without any difference obſerved in them; and therefore when Paul was brought before Gallio the Proconſul of Achaia, he looked upon the difference between the Jews and Paul to be only a Queſtion of words and names, and of their Law, and thereupon refuſed to meddle in it. And ſo Celſus upbraids both Jews and Chriſtians, as though their contentions were about a matter of nothing. By all this we may now conſider how little the Chriſtians did vary from the cuſtoms and practice of the Jews, when they were thought by thoſe who were equally enemies to both, to be of the ſame body and community. Which conſideration will make the thing I aim at, ſeem more probable, when withal we obſerve that the Jewiſh cuſtoms in their Synagogues were thoſe whereby they were moſt known among the Romans; and therefore when they looked on the Chriſtians as of the ſame religion with the Jews, it is evident they obſerved no difference as to their publick practices in their religious Societies. Which is the firſt conſideration, to ſhew how probable it is that Chriſtians

§. 9. To which I add a Second Conſideration, which is the Apoſtles forming Chriſtian Churches out of Jewiſh Synagogues. We have already ſhewed how much their reſort was to them in their preaching from the conſtant practice of Paul, although he was in a more peculiar manner the Apoſtle of the uncircumciſion; much more then is it probable that the others, eſpecially Peter, James and John did reſort to the circumciſion. And in the ſetling things at firſt, we ſee how fearful the Apoſtles were of giving offence to the Jews, how ready to condeſcend to them in any thing they lawfully might. And can we think that Paul would yield Acts 16. 3. ſo far to the Jews, as to circumciſe Timothy, rather than give offence to the Jews in thoſe parts where he was, (and that in a thing which ſee- Gal. 5. 2. med moſt immediately to thwart the deſign of the Goſpel, as circumciſion did, witneſs the Apoſtle himſelf) that yet he would ſcruple the retaining the old model of the Synagogue, when there was nothing in it at all repugnant to the doctrine of the Goſpel, and the nature and conſtitution of Chriſtian Churches? When the Apoſtles then, did not only gather Churches out of Synagogues, but at ſome places, in probability, whole Synagogues were converted, as well as whole Churches formed: What ſhew of reaſon can be given why the Apoſtles ſhould ſlight the conſtitution of the Jewiſh Synagogue, which had no dependence on the Jewiſh Hierarchy, and ſubſiſted not by any command of the ceremonial Law? The work of the Synagogue not belonging to the Prieſts as ſuch, but as perſons qualified for inſtructing others; and the firſt model of the Synagogue-Government, is with a great deal of probability derived from the School of the Prophets, and the Government thereof. This conſideration would be farther improved, if the notion of diſtinct Cœtus of the Jewiſh and Gentile-Chriſtians in the ſame places could be made out by any irrefragable teſtimony of Antiquity, or clear evidence of reaſon drawn from Scripture: Becauſe the ſame reaſon which would ground the diſtinction of the Jewiſh Church from the Gentile, would likewiſe hold for the Jewiſh Church to retain her old form of Government in the Synagogue-way. For it muſt be ſome kind of peculiarity ſuppoſe by the Jews in themſelves as diſtinct from the Gentiles, which did make them form a diſtinct congregation from them; which peculiarity did imply the obſerving thoſe cuſtoms among them ſtill, by which that peculiarity was known to others; among which thoſe of the Synagogue were not the leaſt known or taken notice of. But I muſt freely confeſs, I find not any thing brought Dr. Ham. of Schiſm, ch. 4. §. 6, 7, &c. by that learned perſon who hath managed this Hypotheſis with the greateſt dexterity, to have that evidence in it which will command aſſent from an unprejudicated mind. And it is pity that ſuch infirm Hypotheſes ſhould be made uſe of for the juſtifying our ſeparation from Rome, which was built upon reaſons of greater ſtrength and evidence, than thoſe which have been of late pleaded by ſome aſſertors of the Proteſtant cauſe, though men of excellent abilities and learning. For there are many reaſons convictive enough that Peter had no univerſal power over the Church, ſuppoſing that there was no ſuch thing as a diſtinction between the Jewiſh and the Gentile Cœtus. I deny not but at firſt, before the Jews were fully ſatisfied of the Gentiles right to Goſpel-privileges, they were very ſhy of communicating with them, eſpecially the believing Jews of the Church of Jeruſalem: Upon the occaſion of ſome of whom coming down to Antioch from James, it was that Peter withdrew, and ſeparated himſelf from the Gentiles, with whom before he familiarly converſed. Which action of his is ſo far from being an argument of the ſetling any diſtinct Church of the Jews from the Gentiles there, that it yields many reaſons againſt it. For, Firſt, Peter's withdrawing was only occaſional, and not out of deſign; whereas, had it been part of his commiſſion to do it, we cannot conceive Peter ſo mindleſs of his Office, as to let it alone till ſome Jews came down from Jeruſalem to tell him of it. Secondly, It was not for the ſake of the Jews at Antioch that he withdrew, but for the Jews which came down from Jeruſalem; whereas had he intended a diſtinct Church of the Jews, he would before have ſetled and fixed them as members of another body; but now it evidently appears, that not only Peter himſelf, but the Jews with him, did before thoſe Jews coming to Antioch, aſſociate with the Gentiles, which is evident by v. 13. And other Jews diſſembled likewiſe with him, in ſo much that Barnabas alſo was carried away with their diſſimulation. Whereby it is clear that theſe Jews did before join with the Gentile Chriſtians, or elſe they could not be ſaid to be led away with the diſſimulation of Peter. Thirdly, St. Paul is ſo far from looking upon this withdrawing of Peter, and the Jews from the Gentiles ſociety, to be a part of St. Peter's Office, that he openly and ſharply reproves him for it. What then, was Paul ſo ignorant, that there muſt be two diſtinct Churches of Jews and Gentiles there, that he calls this action of his diſſimulation? In all reaſon then, ſuppoſing this notion to be true, the blame lights on Paul, and not on Peter, as not underſtanding that the Jews were to be formed into diſtinct bodies from the Gentile Chriſtians. And therefore it is obſervable, that the ſame Author who is produced, as aſſerting that ſeorſim quæ ex Judæis erant Eccleſiæ habebantur, nec his quæ erant ex gentibus miſcebantur, is he who makes this reproof of Peter by Paul, to be a mere matter of diſſimulation between them both; which ſenſe of that action, whoſoever will be ſo favourable to it as to embrace it, (as ſome ſeem inclinable to do it) will never be able to anſwer the arguments brought by St. Auguſtine againſt it. This place then was unhappily light upon to ground a diſtinction of the ſeveral Cœtus, or diſtinct Churches of Jews and Chriſtians at Antioch. But it may be, more evidence for it may be ſeen in the Reſcript of the Council of Jeruſalem, which is directed, τοῖς κατ᾽ ἀντιόχειαν ——— ἀδελφοῖς τοῖς ἐξ ἐθνῶν, To the brethren at Antioch, thoſe of the Gentiles. But leaſt ſome hidden myſteries ſhould lie in this curtailing the words, let us ſee them at large: Unto the Brethren, which are of the Gentiles in Antioch, and Syria, and Cilicia. There was nothing then peculiar to thoſe of the Gentiles at Antioch, more than in Syria and Cilicia; and if thoſe words τοῖς ἐξ ἐθνῶν imply a Cœtus diſtinct of Gentile Chriſtians, from the Jews at Antioch, it muſt do ſo through all Syria, and Cilicia, which was Paul's Province, and not Peter's, as appears by his travels in the Acts. Either then the Apoſtle of the uncircumciſion muſt form diſtinct Churches of Jews and Gentiles in his preaching through Syria and Cilicia, (which is irreconcilable with the former pretence of diſtinct Provinces, aſſerted by the ſame Author, who pleads for diſtinct Cœtus) or the τοῖς ἐξ ἐθνῶν can imply no ſuch thing as a diſtinct Church of Gentiles, to whomſoever it is ſpoken; and ſo not at Antioch more than through all Syria and Cilicia. The plain ground then of the Apoſtles inſcribing the order of the Council to the Bretbren of the Gentiles, was, becauſe the matter of that order did particularly concern them, and not the Jews, as is obvious to any that will but caſt an eye upon the 23, 24, 29 Verſes of the 15th of the Acts. As well might then an order ſuppoſed from the Apoſtles to the ſeveral Paſtors of Churches in things concerning them as ſuch, imply that they make diſtinct Churches from their people, as this order concerning the Gentile Brethren, being therefore directed to them, doth imply their making diſtinct Churches from the Jewiſh Brethren in the Cities where they lived together. What is farther produced out of Antiquity to this purpoſe, hath neither evidence nor pertinency enough, to ſtop the paſſage of one who is returning from this digreſſion to his former matter. Although then we grant not any ſuch diſtinct Cœtus of the Jews from the Chriſtians, yet that hinders not, but that both Jews and Chriſtians joining together in one Church, might retain ſtill the Synagogue form of Government among them; which there was no reaſon at all, why the Chriſtians ſhould ſcruple the uſing of, either as Jews or Gentiles; becauſe it imported nothing, either Typical and Ceremonial, or heavy and burdenſome, which were the grounds, why former cuſtoms, in uſe among the Jews, were laid aſide by the Chriſtians. But inſtead of that, it was moſt ſuitable and agreeable to the ſtate of the Churches in Apoſtolical times, which was the third conſideration to make it probable that the Synagogue form of Government was uſed by the Chriſtians. And the ſuitableneſs of this Government to the Churches, lay in the conveniency of it for the attaining all ends of Government in that condition wherein the Churches were at that time. For Church Officers acting then either in gathering or governing Churches, without any authority from Magiſtrates, ſuch a way of Government was moſt ſuitable to their ſeveral Churches, as whereby the Churches might be governed, and yet have no dependency upon the ſecular power, which the way of Government in the Synagogues was moſt convenient for; for the Jews, though they enjoyed a bare permiſſion from the civil ſtate where they lived, yet by the exerciſe of their Synagogue Government, they were able to order all affairs belonging to the ſervice of God, and to keep all members belonging to their ſeveral Synagogues in unity and peace among themſelves. The caſe was the ſame as to Synagogues and Churches; theſe ſubſiſted by the ſame permiſſion which the others enjoyed; the end of theſe was the ſervice of God, and preſerving that order among them, which might beſt become Societies ſo conſtituted; there can be no reaſon then aſſigned, why the Apoſtles in ſetling particular Churches ſhould not follow the Synagogue in its model of Government. Theſe things may ſuffice to make it appear probable that they did ſo, which is all theſe Conſiderations tend to.

§. 10. Having thus prepared the way by making it probable, I now farther enquire into the particular parts of Government, and what orders in the Synagogue were, which there is any evidence for, that the Apoſtles did take up and follow. Here I begin with the thing firſt propounded, The orders of publick Worſhip, which did much reſemble thoſe of the Synagogue; Only with thoſe alterations which did ariſe from the advancing of Chriſtianity. That the Chriſtians had their publick and ſet meetings for the ſervice of God, is evident from the firſt riſing of a ſociety conſtituted upon the account of Chriſtianity. We read of the Three thouſand converted by Peter's Sermon, That they continued in the Apoſtles doctrine and fellowſhip, and breaking of bread and prayers. Where

Where we have all that was obſerved in the Synagogue; and ſomewhat more; here there is publick joining together, implied in the word κοινωνία, their ſolemn prayers expreſſed, which were conſtantly obſerved in the Synagogue; inſtead of reading the Sections of the Law and Prophets, we have the Apoſtles teaching by immediate inſpiration; and to all theſe as the proper ſervice of Chriſtianity, is ſet down the celebration of the Lord's Supper, which we ſhall ſeldom or never in the Primitive Church read the publick ſervice on Lords days performed without. During the Apoſtolical times, in which there was ſuch a Landflood of extraordinary gifts overflowing the Church, in the publick meeting we find thoſe perſons who were indued with thoſe gifts, to be much in exerciſing them (as to the cuſtom, agreeing with the Synagogue, but as to the gifts exceeding it) concerning the ordering of which for the publick edification of the Church, the Apoſtle Paul lays down ſo many rules in the fourteenth Chapter to the Corinthians; but aſſoon as this flood began to abate, which was then neceſſary for the quicker ſoftening the world for receiving Chriſtianity, the publick ſervice began to run in its former channel as is apparent from the unqueſtionable teſtimonies of Juſtin Martyr and Tertullian; who moſt fully relate to us, the order of publick worſhip uſed among the Chriſtians at that time. Juſtin Martyr the moſt ancient (next to Clemens whoſe Epiſtle is lately recovered to the Chriſtian world) of the unqueſtionable writers of the Primitive Church, gives us a clear narration of the publick orders obſerved by the Church in his time: Τῇ τοῦ ἡλίου λεγομένῃ ἡμέρᾳ πάντων κατὰ πόλεις ἢ ἀγροὺς μενόντων ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ συνέλευσις γίνεται, καὶ τὰ ἀπομνημονεύματα τῶν ἀποστόλων, ἢ τὰ συγγράμματα τῶν προφητῶν ἀναγινώσκεται μέχρις ἐγχαρεῖ· εἶτα παυσαμένου τοῦ ἀναγινώσκοντος, ὁ προεστὼς διὰ λόγου τὴν νουθεσίαν καὶ πρόκλησιν τῆς τῶν καλῶν τούτων μιμήσεως ποιεῖται· ἔπειτα ἀνιστάμεθα κοινῇ πάντες, καὶ εὐχὰς πέμπομεν καὶ ὡς προέφημεν, παυσαμένων ἡμῶν τῆς εὐχῆς ἄρτος προσφέρεται καὶ οἶνος καὶ ὕδωρ, καὶ ὁ προεστὼς εὐχὰς ὁμοίως καὶ εὐχαριστίας ὅση δύναμις αὐτῷ ἀναπέμπει, καὶ ὁ λαὸς ἐπευφημεῖ λέγων τὸ Ἀμήν. Upon the day call'd Sunday, all the Chriſtians whether in Town or Country aſſemble in the ſame place, wherein the Memoires or Commentaries of the Apoſtles and the Writings of the Prophets are read as long as the time will permit; Then the Reader ſitting down, the Preſident of the Aſſembly ſtands up and makes a Sermon of Inſtruction and Exhortation to the following ſo good Examples. After this is ended, we all ſtand up to prayers; prayers ended, the Bread, Wine and Water are all brought forth; then the Preſident again praying and praiſing to his utmoſt ability, the People teſtifie their conſent by ſaying Amen.

Juſt. Mart Apol.2.p.98 ed. Par.

What could have been ſpoken with greater congruity or correſpondency to the Synagogue, abating the neceſſary obſervation of the Euchariſt as proper to Chriſtianity?

Here we have the Scriptures read by one appointed for that purpoſe, as it was in the Synagogue; after which follows the word of Exhortation in uſe among them by the Preſident of the Aſſembly anſwering to the Ruler of the Synagogue; after this, the publick prayers performed by the ſame Preſident, as among the Jews by the publick Miniſter of the Synagogue (as is already obſerved out of Maimoni,) then the ſolemn acclamation of Amen, by the people, the undoubted practice of the Synagogue. To the ſame purpoſe Tertullian, who if he had been to ſet forth the practice of the Synagogue, could ſcarce have made choice of words more accommodated to that purpoſe.

Thus much for the general correſpondency between the publick ſervice of the Church and Synagogue; they that would ſee more particulars, may read our learned Mr. Thorndike's Diſcourſe of the ſervice of God in Religious Aſſemblies. Whoſe deſign throughout is to make this out more at large; But we muſt only touch at theſe things by the way, as it were, look into the Synagogue, and go on our way.

§. 11. We therefore proceed from their ſervice, to their cuſtom of ordination, which was evidently taken up by the Chriſtians, from a correſpondency to the Synagogue. For which we are firſt to take notice, that the Rulers of the Church under the Goſpel do not properly ſucceed the Prieſts and Levites under the Law, whoſe office was Ceremonial, and who were not admitted by any ſolemn ordination into their function, but ſucceeded by birth into their places; only the great Sanhedrim did judge of their fitneſs, as to birth and body, before their entrance upon their function. So the Jewiſh Doctors tell us לשכת הגזיה בה היתה סנהדרין גדולה של ישראל ישבת ודנה את הכהונה i. e. In the ſtone Parlour, the great Sanhedrim of Iſrael ſat and did there judge the Prieſts. The Prieſt that was found defective, put on mourning garments, and ſo went forth; he that was not, put on white, and went in and miniſtred with the Prieſts his Brethren. And when no fault was found in the ſons of Aaron, they obſerved a Feſtival ſolemnity for it. Three things are obſervable in this Teſtimony, Firſt, That the inquiry that was made concerning the Prieſts, was chiefly concerning the purity of their birth, and the freedom of their bodies from thoſe defects which the Law mentions, unleſs in the caſe of groſſer and more ſcandalous ſins, as Idolatry, Murther, &c. by which they were excluded from the Prieſtly office. The Second, is, that the great Sanhedrim had this inſpection over, and examination of the Prieſts before their admiſſion; For what that learned man Conſt. L'empereur there conjectures, that there was an Eccleſiaſtical Sanhedrim which did paſs judgment on theſe things, is overthrown by the very words of the Talmudiſts already cited. The laſt thing obſervable, is, the garments which the Prieſts put on, viz. white raiment upon his approbation by the Sanhedrim, and ſoon after they were admitted into the Temple with great joy; to which our Saviour manifeſtly alludes, Revel. 3. 4, 5. Thou haſt a few names even in Sardis which have not defiled their garments, and they ſhall walk with me in white, for they are worthy. He that overcometh, the ſame ſhall be cloathed in white raiment. But the Prieſts under the Law, were never ordained by impoſition of hands, as the Elders and Rulers of the Synagogue were; and if any of them came to that office, they as well as others had peculiar deſignation and appointment to it. It is then a common miſtake to think that the Miniſters of the Goſpel ſucceed by way of correſpondence and Analogy to the Prieſts under the Law; which miſtake hath been the foundation and original of many errors. For when in the Primitive Church, the name of Prieſts came to be attributed to Goſpel Miniſters from a fair compliance (as was thought then) of the Chriſtians only to the name uſed both among Jews and Gentiles; in proceſs of time, corruptions increaſing in the Church, thoſe names that were uſed by the Chriſtians by way of Analogy and Accommodation, brought in the things themſelves primarily intended by thoſe names; ſo by the Metaphorical names of Prieſts and Altars, at laſt came up the ſacrifice of the Maſs; without which, they thought the names of Prieſt and Altars were inſignificant. This miſtake we ſee run all along through the writers of the Church, aſſoon as the name Prieſts was applyed to the Elders of the Church, that they derived their ſucceſſion from the Prieſts of Aaron's order. Preſbyterorum ordo exordium ſumpſit à filiis Aaron. Qui enim ſacerdotes vocabantur in veteri Teſtamento, hi ſunt qui nunc appellantur Preſbyteri: & qui nuncupabantur principes ſacerdotum, nunc Epiſcopi nominantur: as Iſidorus and Ivo tells us. So before them both, Jerome in his known Epiſtle to Evagrius. Et ut ſciamus traditiones Apoſtolicas ſumptas de veteri Teſtamento, Quod Aaron & filii ejus atque Levitæ in Templo fuerunt; hoc ſibi Epiſcopi & Preſbyteri atque Diaconi vendicent in Eccleſia. From which words a learned Doctor, and ſtrenuous aſſerter of the jus divinum of Prelacy, queſtions not but to make Jerome either apparently contradictious to himſelf, or elſe to aſſert that the ſuperiority of Biſhops above Preſbyters, was by his Confeſſion an Apoſtolical tradition. For ſaith he, Nihil manifeſtius dici potuit; and S. 2. Quid ad hoc reſponderi poſſit, aut quo σοφοῦ φαρμάκου artificio deliniri aut deludi tam diſerta affirmatio, fateor ego me divinando aſſequi non poſſe; ſed è contra & iis quæ D. Blondellus, quæ Walo, quæ Ludov. Capellus hâc in re præſtiterunt, mihi perſuaſiſſimum eſſe, Nihil uſpiam contra apertam lucem obtendi poſſe. In a caſe then ſo deſperate as poor Jerome lyes in, by a wound he is ſuppoſed to have given himſelf; when the Prieſt and the Levite hath paſſed him by, it will be a piece of Charity in our paſſing by the way a little to conſider his caſe, to ſee whether there be any hopes of recovery. We take it then for granted, that Jerome hath already ſaid, that Apoſtolus perſpicuè docet eoſdem eſſe Preſbyteros quos & Epiſcopos, in the ſame Epiſtle which he proves there at large; and in another place; Sicut ergo Preſbyteri ſciunt ſe ex Eccleſiæ conſuetudine, ei qui ſibi præpoſitus fuerit, eſſe ſubjectos; ita Epiſcopi noverint ſe magis conſuetudine, quam diſpoſitionis Dominicæ veritate Præſbyteris eſſe majores, & in commune debere Eccleſiam regere. The difficulty now lies in the reconciling this with what is before cited out of the ſame Author; ſome ſolve it by ſaying, that in Jerom's ſenſe, Apoſtolical tradition and Eccleſiaſtical cuſtome are the ſame; as ad Marcellum, he ſaith the obſervation of Lent is Apoſtolica Traditio, and adverſ. Luciferian. ſaith it is Eccleſiæ conſuetudo; ſo that by Apoſtolical tradition, he meant not an Apoſtolical inſtitution, but an Eccleſiaſtical cuſtom. And if Jerome ſpeak according to the general

neral vogue, this ſolution may be ſufficient notwithſtanding what is ſaid againſt it; for according to that common rule of Auſtin, Things that were generally in uſe, and o certain Author aſſigned of them, were attributed to the Apoſtles. Two things therefore I ſhall lay down for reconciling Jerome to himſelf: the firſt is, the difference between Traditio Apoſtolica, and Traditio Apoſtolorum; this latter doth indeed imply the thing ſpoken of to have proceeded from the Apoſtles themſelves, but the former may be applyed to what was in practice after the Apoſtles times; and the reaſon of it is, that whatever was done in the Primitive Church, ſuppoſed to be agreeable to Apoſtolical practice, was call'd Apoſtolical. Thence the Biſhops See was call'd Sedes Apoſtolica, as Tertullian tells us, ob conſanguinitatem doctrinæ. So Sidonius Apollinaris calls the See of Lupus the Biſhop of Tricaſſium in France, Sedem Apoſtolicam. And the Biſhops of the Church were call'd Viri Apoſtolici, and thence the Conſtitutions which go under the Apoſtles names, were ſo call'd, ſaith Albaſpinæus, ab antiquitate; nam cum eorum aliquot ab Apoſtolorum Succeſſoribus (qui teſte Tertulliano Apoſtolici viri nominabantur) facti eſſent, Apoſtolicorum primum Canones, deinde nonnullorum Latinorum ignorantiâ, aliquot literarum detractione, Apoſtolorum dicti ſunt. By which we ſee whatever was conceived to be of any great antiquity in the Church, though it was not thought to have come from the Apoſtles themſelves yet it was call'd Apoſtolical, ſo that in that ſenſe, traditio Apoſtolica is no more than traditio antiqua, or ab Apoſtolicis viris profecta, which was meant rather of thoſe that were conceived to ſucceed the Apoſtles, than of the Apoſtles themſelves. But I anſwer, Secondly, that granting traditio Apoſtolica to mean traditio Apoſtolorum, yet Jerome is far from contradicting himſelf, which is obvious to any that will read the words before, and conſider their coherence. The ſcope and drift of his Epiſtle is to chaſtiſe the arrogance of one who made Deacons ſuperiour to Preſbyters. Audio quendam in tantam erupiſſe vecordiam, ut Diaconus Preſbyteris, i. e. Epiſcopis anteferret, and ſo ſpends a great part of the Epiſtle, to prove that a Biſhop and Preſbyter are the ſame; and at laſt brings in theſe words; giving the account, why Paul to Timothy and Titus mentions no Preſbyters, Quia in Epiſcopo & Preſbyter continetur. Aut igitur ex Preſbytero ordinetur Diaconus, ut Preſbyter minor Diacono comprobetur, in quem creſcat ex parvo; aut ſi ex Diacono ordinatur Preſbyter, noverit ſe lucris minorem, ſacerdotio eſſe majorem. And then preſently adds, Et ut ſciamus traditiones Apoſtolicas ſumptas de veteri Teſtamento, Quod Aaron & filii ejus atque Levitæ in Templo fuerunt, hoc ſibi Epiſcopi & Preſbyteri atque Diaconi vendicent in Eccleſiâ. Is it imaginable that a man who had been proving all along the ſuperiority of a Preſbyter above a Deacon, becauſe of his Identity with a Biſhop in the Apoſtles times, ſhould at the ſame time ſay, that a Biſhop was above a Preſbyter by the Apoſtles inſtitution, and ſo directly overthrow all he had been ſaying before? Much as if one ſhould go about to prove that the Præfectus urbis, and the Curatores urbis, in Alexander Severus his times were the ſame office, and to that end ſhould make uſe of the Conſtitution of that Emperour whereby he appointed fourteen Curatores urbis, and ſet the Præfectus in an office above them. Such an incongruity is ſcarce incident to a man of very ordinary eſteem for intellectuals, much leſs to ſuch a one as Jerome is reputed to be. The plain meaning then of Jerome is no more but this, that as Aaron and his ſons in the order of Prieſt-hood were above the Levites under the Law: ſo the Biſhops and Preſbyters in order of the Evangelical Prieſthood are above the Deacons under the Goſpel. For the compariſon runs not between Aaron and his Sons under the Law, and Biſhops and Preſbyters under the Goſpel; but between Aaron and his Sons, as one part of the compariſon under the Law, and the Levites under them as the other; ſo under the Goſpel, Biſhops and Preſbyters make one part of the compariſon anſwering to Aaron and his Sons, in that wherein they all agree, viz. the Order of Prieſthood; and the other part under the Goſpel, is that of Deacons, anſwering to the Levites under the Law. The oppoſition is not then in the power of Juriſdiction between Biſhops and Prieſts, but between the ſame power of order, which is alike both in Biſhops and Preſbyters, (according to the acknowledgment of all) to the Office of Deacons, which ſtood in competition with them. Thus I hope we have left Jerome at perfect harmony with himſelf, notwithſtanding the attempt made to make him ſo palpably contradict himſelf; which having thus done, we are at liberty to proceed in our former courſe; only hereby we ſee how unhappily thoſe arguments ſucceed, which are brought from the Analogy between the Aaronical Prieſthood, to endeavour the ſetting up of a jus Divinum of a parallel ſuperiority under the Goſpel. All which arguments are taken off by this one thing we are now upon, viz. that the orders and degrees under the Goſpel, were not taken up from Analogy to the Temple, but to the Synagogue; which we now make out as to ordination, in three things: The manner of conferring it. The Perſons authorized to do it. The remaining effect of it upon the perſon receiving it.

Firſt, For the manner of conferring it; that under the Synagogue §. 12. was done by laying on of hands; which was taken up among the Jews, as a ſignificative rite in the ordaining the Elders among them, and thereby qualifying them either to be members of their Sanhedrins, or Teachers of the Law. A twofold uſe I find of this Symbolical-rite, beſide the ſolemn deſignation of the perſon on whom the hands are laid. The firſt is to denote the delivery of the perſon or thing thus laid hands upon, for the right, uſe, and peculiar ſervice of God. And that, I ſuppoſe was the reaſon of laying hands upon the beaſt under the Law, Lev. 16. 21. which was to be ſacrificed, thereby noting their own parting with any right in it, and giving it up to be the Lord's, for a ſacrifice to him. Thus in the civil Law, this delivery is requiſite in the transferring dominion, which they call tranſlatio de manu in manum. The ſecond end of laying on of hands, was the ſolemn invocation of the Divine preſence and aſſiſtance to be upon, and with, the perſon upon whom the hands are thus laid. For the hands with us being the inſtruments of action, they did by ſtretching out their hands upon the perſon, repreſent the efficacy of Divine power which they implored in behalf of the perſon thus deſigned. Tunc enim orabant ut ſic Dei efficacia eſſet ſuper illum, ſicut manus efficaciæ ſymbolum, ei imponebatur, as Grotius obſerves. (Ep. ad Gallos, ep. 154, & 166.) Thence in all ſolemn prayers, wherein any perſon was particularly deſigned, they made uſe of this cuſtom of impoſition of hands; from which cuſtom Auguſtine ſpeaks, Quid aliud eſt manum impoſitio niſi oratio ſuper hominem? (Joh. Cord. & V. in Mat. 9. 19.) Thence when Jacob prayed over Joſeph's Children, he laid his hands upon them; (Gen. 48. 14.) ſo when Moſes prayed over Joſhua. (Numb. 27. 23.) The practice likewiſe our Saviour uſed in bleſſing Children, healing the ſick; and the Apoſtles in conferring the gifts of the Holy-Ghoſt; and from thence

it was conveyed into the practice of the primitive Church, who uſed it in any more ſolemn invocation of the name of God in behalf of any particular perſons, as over the ſick, upon repentance and reconciliation to the Church, in Confirmation, and in Matrimony; which, (as Grotius obſerves) is to this day uſed in the Abiſſine Churches. But the moſt ſolemn and peculiar uſe of this Impoſition of hands among the Jews was in the deſigning of any perſons for any publick employment among them: Not as though the bare impoſition of hands, did confer any power upon the perſon, (no more than the bare delivery of a thing in Law gives a legal title to it, without expreſs transferring dominion with it) but with that ceremony they joined thoſe words whereby they did confer that Authority upon them; which were to this purpoſe הרי את סמוך Ecce ſis tu Ordinatus, or אני סומך אורך ego ordino te, or תהוה סמוך ſis ordinatus, to which they added according to the authority they ordained them to, ſome thing peculiarly expreſſing it, whether it was for cauſes finable, or pecuniary, or binding and looſing; or ruling in the Synagogue. Which is a thing deſerving conſideration by thoſe who uſe the rite of impoſing hands in ordination, without any thing expreſſing that authority they convey by that Ordination. This cuſtom being ſo generally in uſe among the Jews in the time when the Apoſtles were ſent forth with authority for gathering and ſetling Churches, we find them accordingly making uſe of this, according to the former practice, either in any more ſolemn invocation of the preſence of God upon any perſons, or deſignation and appointing them for any peculiar ſervice or function: For we have no ground to think that the Apoſtles had any peculiar command for laying on their hands upon perſons in prayer over them, or ordination of them: But the thing its ſelf being enjoined them, viz. the ſetting apart ſome perſons for the peculiar work of attendance upon the neceſſities of the Churches by them planted, they took up and made uſe of a laudable rite and cuſtom then in uſe upon ſuch occaſions. And ſo we find the Apoſtles uſing it in the ſolemn deſignation of ſome perſons to the Office of Deacons, anſwering to the Acts 6. 6. פרנסין in the Synagogue, whoſe Office was to collect the monies for the poor, and to diſtribute it among them. Afterwards we read it uſed upon an occaſion not heard of in the Synagogue, which was for Acts 8. 17. the conferring the gifts of the Holy-Ghoſt; but although the occaſion was extraordinary, yet ſuppoſing the occaſion, the uſe of that rite in it, was very ſuitable, in as much as thoſe gifts did ſo much anſwer to the שכינה and the רות דקורש which the Jews conceived did reſt upon thoſe who were ſo ordained by impoſition of hands. The next time we Acts 13. 3. meet with this rite, was upon a peculiar deſignation to a particular ſervice of perſons already appointed by God for the work of the Miniſtry, which is of Paul and Barnabas, by the Prophets and Teachers at Antioch; whereby God doth ſet forth the uſe of that rite of ordination to the Chriſtian Churches. Accordingly we find it after practiſed in 1 Tim. 4. 14. the Church, Timothy being ordained by the laying on of the hands of the Preſbytery. And Timothy hath direction given him for the right manage-
1 Tim. 5. 22. ment of it afterwards, Lay hands ſuddenly on no man. For they that would interpret that of reconciling men to the Church by that rite, muſt firſt give us evidence of ſo early an uſe of that cuſtom, which doth not yet appear. But there is one place commonly brought to prove that the Apoſtles in ordaining Elders in the Chriſtian Churches, did

did not obſerve the Jewiſh form of laying on of hands, but obſerved a way quite different from the Jewiſh practice, viz. appointing them by the choice, conſent and ſuffrages of the people. Which place is Acts 14. 23. where it is ſaid of Paul and Barnabas, χειροτονήσαντες δὲ αὐτοῖς πρεσβυτέρους κατ᾽ ἐκκλησίαν, we render it, Ordaining them Elders in every Church. But others from the ſignification of the word χειροτονεῖν, would have it rendred, when they had appointed Elders by the ſuffrages of the people. But how little the peoples power of ordination can be inferred from theſe words, will be evident to any one that ſhall but conſider theſe things. Firſt, That though χειροτονεῖν did originally ſignifie the chuſing by way of ſuffrage among the Greeks, yet before the time of Luke's writing this, the word was uſed for ſimple deſignation without that ceremony. So Heſychius interprets it by καθιστᾶν, the word uſed of Titus for ordaining Elders in every City; and in Demoſthenes, and others, it occurs for νομοθετεῖν; and διατάττειν, to decree and appoint; and that ſenſe of the word appears in Saint Luke himſelf, Acts 10. 41. μάρτυσι τοῖς προκεχειροτονημένοις ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ, Witneſſes fore-appointed of God. Many examples of this ſignification are brought by learned men of writers before, and about the time when Luke writ, from Philo Judæus, Joſephus, Appian, Lucian, and others. But, Secondly, grantiug it uſed in the primary ſignification of the word, yet it cannot be applied to the people, but to Paul and Barnabas; for it is not ſaid that the people did χειροτονεῖν, but that Paul and Barnabas did χειροτονεῖν; now wherever that word is uſed in its firſt ſignification, it is implied to be the action of the perſons themſelves giving ſuffrages, and not for other perſons appointing by the ſuffrages of others. Thirdly, χειροτονεῖν may import no more then χειροθετεῖν, in that laying on of the hands muſt ſuppoſe the ſtretching them out; which is only a common figure in Scripture, for the Antecedent to be put for the Conſequent, or one part for the whole action; and concerning this Senſe of the word in Eccleſiaſtical Writers, ſee the large Quotations in Biſhop Bilſon to this purpoſe. Fourthly, It ſeems ſtrangely improbable that the Apoſtles ſhould put the choice at that time into the hands of the people, when there were none fitted for the work the Apoſtles deſigned them for, but whom the Apoſtles did lay their hands on, by which the Holy Ghoſt fell upon them, whereby they were fitted and qualified for that work. The people then could no ways chuſe men for their abilities, when their abilities were conſequent to their ordination. So much to clear the manner of ordination to have been from the Synagogue.

Perpet. Govern. of Chriſt's Church, c. 7.

§. 13. The Second thing we conſider, is, The perſons authorized to do it. Whom we conſider under a double reſpect, before their liberties were bound up by compact among themſelves, and after. Firſt, Before they had reſtrained themſelves of their own liberty, then the general rule for ordinations among them was כל כיו שנסמך סומך לתלמידיו every one regularly ordained, himſelf had the power of ordaining his Diſciples, as Maimonides affirms. To the ſame purpoſe is that teſtimony of the Gemara Babylonia in Mr. Selden אחד ואחד מסנה את תלמידיו אמר רבי בא בראשונה היה כל Rabbi Abba Bar Jonah ſaid that in times of old, every one was wont to ordain his own Diſciples; to which purpoſe many inſtances are there brought. But it is generally agreed among them, that in the time of Hillel this courſe was altered, and they were reſtrained from their former liberty; in probability finding the many inconveniencies of

ſo common ordinations; or, as they ſay, out of their great reverence to the houſe of Hillel, they then agreed that none ſhould ordain others without the preſence of the הנשיא the Prince of the Sanhedrin, or a licenſe obtained from him for that end; and it was determined that all ordinations without the conſent of the Prince of the Sanhedrin, ſhould be looked upon as null and void, which is atteſted by the former Authors. The ſame diſtinction may be obſerved under the Goſpel in reference to the fixed Officers of the Church; for we may conſider them in their firſt ſtate and period, as the Preſbyters did rule the Churches in common, as Jerome tells us, communi Preſbyterorum concilio Eccleſiæ gnbernabantur; before the juriſdiction of Preſbyters was reſtrained by mutual conſent, in this inſtant, doubtleſs, the Preſbyters enjoyed the ſame liberty that the Preſbyters among the Jews did, of ordaining other Preſbyters, by that power they were inveſted in at their own ordination. To which purpoſe we ſhall only at preſent take notice of the Confeſſion of two Canoniſts, who are the higheſt among the Papiſts, for defence of a diſtinct order of Epiſcopacy. Yet Gratian himſelf confeſſeth, Sacros ordines dicimus Diaconatum & Preſbyteratum; hos quidem ſolos Eccleſia primitiva habuiſſe dicitur. And Johannes Semeca, in his Gloſs upon the Canon-Law; Dicunt quidem quod in Eccleſia prima primitiva commune erat officium Epiſcoporum & Sacerdotum, & nomina erant communia.——— Sed in ſecundâ primitivâ cœperunt diſtingui & nomina & officia. Here we have a diſtinction of the Primitive Church very agreeable both to the opinion of Jerome, and the matter we are now upon; in the firſt Primitive Church, the Preſbyters all acted in common for the welfare of the Church, and either did or might ordain others to the ſame authority with themſelves; becauſe the intrinſecal power of order is equally in them, and in thoſe who were after appointed Governours over Preſbyteries. And the collation of orders doth come from the power of order, and not merely from the power of juriſdiction. It being likewiſe fully acknowledged by the Schoolmen, that Biſhops are not ſuperior above Preſbyters as to the power of order. But the cleareſt evidence of this, is in the Church of Alexandria, of which Jerome ſpeaks; Nam & Alexandria à Marco Evangeliſtâ uſq; ad Heraclam & Dionyſium Epiſcopos, Preſbyteri ſemper unum ex ſe electum, in excelſiori gradu collocatum, Epiſcopum nominabant; quomodo ſi exercitus imperatorem faciat, aut Diaconi eligant de ſe quem induſtrium noverint, & Archidiaconum vocent. That learned Doctor, who would perſuade us that the Preſbyters did only make choice of the perſon, but the ordination was performed by other Biſhops, would do well firſt to tell us who and where thoſe Biſhops in Egypt were, who did conſecrate or ordain the Biſhop of Alexandria after his election by the Preſbyters; eſpecially, while Egypt remained but one Province, under the Government of the Præfectus Auguſtalis. Secondly, How had this been in the leaſt pertinent to Jerome's purpoſe, to have made a particular Inſtance in the Church of Alexandria, for that which was common to all other Churches beſides? For the old rule of the Canon-Law for Biſhops was, Electio clericorum eſt, conſenſus principis, petitio plebis. Thirdly, This election in Jerome muſt imply the conferring the power and authority whereby the Biſhop acted. For, Firſt, The firſt ſetting up of this power is by Jerome attributed to this choice, as appears by his words, Quod autem poſtea unus electus eſt qui cæteris præponeretur, in ſchiſ-

matis remedium factum eſt, ne unuſquiſque ad ſe trahens Chriſti Eccleſiam rumperet. Whereby it is evident Jerome attributes the firſt original of that Exſors poteſtas, as he calls it elſewhere in the Biſhop above Preſbyters, not to any Apoſtolical inſtitution, but to the free choice of the Preſbyters themſelves: which doth fully explain what he means by conſuetudo Eccleſiæ, before ſpoken of, viz. that which came up by a voluntary act of the Governours of Churches themſelves. Secondly, It appears, that by election, he means conferring authority, by the inſtances he brings to that purpoſe, as the Roman Armies chuſing their Emperours, who had then no other power but what they received by the length of the ſword; and the Deacons chuſing their Archdeacon, who had no other power, but what was merely conferred by the choice of the College of Deacons. To which we may add what Eutychius, the Patriarch of Alexandria, ſaith in his Origines Eccleſiæ Alexandrinæ, publiſhed in Arabick, by our moſt learned Selden, who expreſly affirms, that the twelve Preſbyters conſtituted by Mark, upon the vacancy of the See, did chuſe out of their number one to be head over the reſt, and the other eleven did lay their hands upon him, and bleſſed him, and made him Patriarch. Neither is the authority of Eutychius ſo much to be ſlighted in this caſe, coming ſo near to Jerome as he doth, who, doubtleſs, had he told us that Mark and Anianus, &c. did all there without any Preſbyters, might have had the good fortune to have been quoted with as much frequency and authority as the Anonymous Author of the martyrdom of Timothy in Photius, (who there unhappily follows the ſtory of the ſeven Sleepers) or the Author of the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions, whoſe credit is everlaſtingly blaſted by the excellent Mr. Daillè, De Pſeudepigraphis Apoſtolorum; ſo much doth mens intereſt tend to the inhancing or abating the eſteem and credit both of the dead and the living. By this we ſee that where no poſitive reſtraints from conſent and choice, for the unity and peace of the Church, have reſtrained mens liberty, as to their external exerciſe of the power of order or juriſdiction, every one being himſelf advanced into the authority of a Church Governour, hath an internal power of conferring the ſame upon perſons fit for it. To which purpoſe the laying on of the hands of the Preſbytery, is no wiſe impertinently alledged, although we ſuppoſe St. Paul to concur in the action, (as it is moſt probable he did) becauſe if the Preſbytery had nothing to do in the ordination, to what purpoſe were their hands laid upon him? Was it only to be witneſſes of the fact, or to ſignifie their conſent? both thoſe might have been done without their uſe of that ceremony; which will ſcarce be inſtanced in, to be done by any but ſuch as had power to confer what was ſignified by that ceremony. We come therefore to the ſecond period or ſtate of the Church, when the former liberty was reſtrained, by ſome act of the Church it ſelf, for preventing the inconveniencies which might follow the too common uſe of the former liberty of ordinations. So Antonius de Roſellis fully expreſſeth my meaning in this; Quilibet Preſbyter & Preſbyteri ordinabant indiſcretè, & ſchiſmata oriebantur. Every Preſbyter and Preſbyters did ordain indifferently, and thence aroſe ſchiſms. Thence the liberty was reſtrained, and reſerved peculiarly to ſome perſons who did act in the ſeveral Preſbyteries, as the הנשיא or Prince of the Sanhedrin, without whoſe preſence no ordination by the Church was

was to be looked on as regular. The main controverſie is when this reſtraint began, and by whoſe act; whether by any act of the Apoſtles, or only by the prudence of the Church it ſelf, as it was with the Sanhedrin. But in order to our peace, I ſee no ſuch neceſſity of deciding it, both parties granting that in the Church ſuch a reſtraint was laid upon the liberty of ordaining Preſbyters: and the exerciſe of that power may be reſtrained ſtill, granting it to be radically and intrinſecally in them. So that this controverſie is not ſuch as ſhould divide the Church. For thoſe that are for ordinations only by a Superiour order in the Church acknowledging a radical power for ordination in Preſbyters, which may be exerciſed in caſe of neceſſity, do thereby make it evident, that none who grant that, do think that any poſitive Law of God hath forbidden Preſbyters the power of ordination; for then it muſt be wholly unlawful, and ſo in caſe of neceſſity it cannot be valid. Which doctrine I dare with ſome confidence aſſert to be a ſtranger to our Church of England, as ſhall be largely made appear afterwards. On the other ſide, thoſe who hold ordinations by Preſbyters lawful, do not therefore hold them neceſſary, but it being a matter of liberty, and not of neceſſity (Chriſt having no where ſaid that none but Preſbyters ſhall ordain) this power then may be reſtrained by thoſe who have the care of the Churches peace, and matters of liberty being reſtrained, ought to be ſubmitted to, in order to the Churches peace. And therefore ſome have well obſerved the difference between the opinions of Jerome and Aërius. For as to the matter it ſelf, I believe upon the ſtricteſt inquiry Medina's judgement will prove true, that Jerome, Auſtin, Ambroſe, Sedulius, Primaſius, Chryſoſtome, Theodoret, Theophylact, were all of Aërius his judgement, as to the Identity of both name and order of Biſhops and Preſbyters in the Primitive Church; but here lay the difference; Aërius from hence proceeded to ſeparation from Biſhops and their Churches, becauſe they were Biſhops. And Blondell well obſerves that the main ground why Aërius was condemned, was for unneceſſary ſeparation from the Church of Sebaſtia, and thoſe Biſhops too who agreed with him in other things, as Euſtathius the Biſhop did: Whereas had his mere opinion about Biſhops been the ground of his being condemned, there can be no reaſon aſſigned, why this hereſie if it were then thought ſo, was not mentioned either by Socrates, Theodoret, Sozomen, or Evagrius, before whoſe time he lived; when yet they mention the Euſtathiani, who were Contemporaries with him. But for Epiphanius and Auguſtine who have liſted him in the roll of hereticks it either was for the other heretical opinions maintained by him, or they took the name heretick (as it is evident they often did) for one who upon a matter of different opinion from the preſent ſenſe of the Church, did proceed to make ſeparation from the Unity of the Catholick Church; which I take to be the trueſt account of the reputed hereſie of Aërius. For otherwiſe is it likely that Jerom who maintained ſo great correſpondency and familiarity with Epiphanius, and thereby could not but know what was the cauſe why Aërius was condemned for hereſie, ſhould himſelf run into the ſame hereſie, and endeavour not only to aſſert, but to avouch and maintain it againſt the Judgment of the whole Church? Jerome therefore was not ranked with Aërius, becauſe though he held the ſame opinion as to Biſhops and Preſbyters, yet he was far from the Conſequence of Aërius that that therefore all Biſhops were to be ſeparated from; nay he was ſo far from thinking it neceſſary to cauſe a ſchiſm in the Church, by ſeparating from Biſhops, that his opinion is clear, that the firſt inſtitution of them, was for preventing ſchiſm, and therefore for peace and unity he thought their inſtitution very uſeful in the Church of God. And among all thoſe fifteen teſtimonies produced by a learned Writer out of Jerome for the ſuperiority of Biſhops above Preſbyters, I cannot find one that doth found it upon any divine right, but only upon the conveniency of ſuch an order for the peace and unity of the Church of God: which is his meaning in that place moſt produced to this purpoſe; Eccleſiæ ſalus in ſummi ſacerdotis dignitate pendet, cui ſi non exſors quædam & ab omnibus eminens detur poteſtas, tot in Eccleſiis efficientur ſchiſmata, quot ſacerdotes. Where nothing can be more evident than that he would have ſome ſupereminent power attributed to the Biſhop for preventing ſchiſms in the Church. But granting ſome paſſages may have a more favourable aſpect towards the ſuperiority of Biſhops over Preſbyters in his other writings, I would fain know whether a man's judgment muſt be taken, from occaſional and incidental paſſages, or from deſigned and ſet diſcourſes; which is as much as to aſk, whether the lively repreſentation of a man by picture, may be beſt taken, when in haſte of other buſineſs he paſſeth by us, giving only a glance of his Countenance, or when he purpoſely and deſignedly ſits in order to that end, that his countenance may be truly repreſented? Beſides, it is well known that Jerome in his Commentaries on Scripture, (where he doth not expreſly declare his own opinion) doth often tranſcribe what he finds in others without ſetting down the name of any Author he had it from. For which we have his ingenuous confeſſion in his Epiſtle to Auguſtine, Itaque ut ſimpliciter fatear, legi hæc omnia (ſpeaking of former Commentaries) & in mente mea plurima conſervans, accito notario, vel mea vel aliena dictavi, nec ordinis, nec verborum interdum, nec ſenſuum memor. A ſtrange way of writing Commentaries on Scripture, wherein a man having jumbled other mens notions together in his brain, by a kind of lottery draws out what comes next to hand, without any choice: yet this we ſee was his practice, and therefore, he puts Auſtin to this hard taſk of examining what all other men had writ before him, and whether he had not tranſcribed out of them, before he would have him charge him with any thing which he finds in his Commentaries. How angry then would that haſty Adverſary have been, if men had told him he had contradicted himſelf in what he writes on the forty fifth Pſalm about Biſhops, if it be compared with his Commentaries on Titus, where he profeſſeth to declare his opinion, or his Epiſtles to Evagrius and Oceanus! But yet ſomething is pleaded even from thoſe places in Jerome, wherein he declares his opinion more fully, as though his opinion was only, that Chriſt himſelf did not appoint Epiſcopacy, which (they ſay) he means by Dominica diſpoſitio, but that the Apoſtles did it, which in oppoſition to the former he calls Eccleſiæ conſuetudo, but elſewhere explains it by traditio Apoſtolica; and this they prove by two things; Firſt, The occaſion of the inſtitution of Epiſcopacy, which is thus ſet down by him, antequam Diaboli inſtinctu, ſtudia in religione fierent, & diceretur in populis, Ego ſum Pauli, ego Apollo, ego autem Cephæ, communi Preſbyterorum conſilio Eccleſiæ gubernabantur. Thence it is argued that the time of this Inſtitution of Biſhops was when it was ſaid at Corinth, I am of Paul, I of Apollos,

Ep. Auguſt. ep. 11.

pollos, and I of Cephas; which was certainly in Apoſtolical times. But to this it is anſwered; Firſt, that it is impoſſible Jerome's meaning ſhould be reſtrained to that individual time, becauſe the Arguments which Jerome brings that the name and office of Biſhops and Preſbyters were the ſame, were from things done after this time. Paul's firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians, wherein he reproves their ſchiſms, was written according to Ludovicus Capellus in the twelfth year of Claudius, of Chriſt fifty one, after which Paul writ his Epiſtle to Titus, from whoſe words Jerome grounds his diſcourſe; but moſt certainly Paul's Epiſtle to the Philippians was not written, till Paul was priſoner at Rome; the time of the writing of it is placed by Capellus in the third of Nero; of Chriſt 56. by Blondell 57. by our Lightfoot 59, by all, long after the former to the Corinthians; yet from the firſt verſe of this Epiſtle, Jerome fetches one of his Arguments. So Paul's charge to the Elders at Miletus, Peter's Epiſtle to the diſperſed Jews, were after this time too, yet from theſe are fetched two more of Jerome's Arguments. Had he then ſo little common ſenſe, as to ſay that Epiſcopacy was inſtituted upon the ſchiſm at Corinth, and yet bring all his Arguments for parity, after the time, that he ſets for the Inſtitution of Epiſcopacy? But ſecondly, Jerome doth not ſay, cum diceretur apud Corinthios, Ego ſum Pauli, &c. but cum diceretur in populis, Ego ſum Pauli, &c. ſo that he ſpeaks not of that particular ſchiſm, but of a general and univerſal ſchiſm abroad among moſt people, which was the occaſion of appointing Biſhops; and ſo ſpeaks of others imitating the ſchiſm and language of the Corinthians. Thirdly, had Epiſcopacy been inſtituted on the occaſion of the ſchiſm at Corinth certainly of all places we ſhould the ſooneſt have heard of a Biſhop at Corinth for the remedying of it; and yet almoſt of all places, thoſe Heralds that derive the ſucceſſion of Biſhops from the Apoſtles times, are the moſt plunged whom to fix on at Corinth. And they that can find any one ſingle Biſhop at Corinth, at the time when Clemens writ his Epiſtle to them (about another ſchiſm as great as the former, which certainly had not been according to their opinion, if a Biſhop had been there before) muſt have better eyes and judgment, than the deſervedly admired Grotius, who brings this in his Epiſtle to Bignonius as one argument of the undoubted antiquity of that Epiſtle: Quod nuſquam meminit exſortis illius Epiſcoporum auctortatis, quæ Eccleſiæ conſuetudine, poſt Marci mortem Alexandriæ, atque eo exemplo alibi, introduci cœpit; ſed plane ut Paulus Apoſtolus oſtendit, Eccleſias communi Preſbyterorum, qui iidem omnes & Epiſcopi ipſi Paulóque dicuntur, conſilio fuiſſe gubernatas. What could be ſaid with greater freedom, that there was no ſuch Epiſcopacy then at Corinth? Fourthly, They who uſe this argument, are greater ſtrangers to St. Jerome's language than they would ſeem to be: whoſe cuſtome it is upon incidental occaſions to accomodate the Phraſe and language of Scripture to them: as when he ſpeaks of Chryſoſtome's fall, Cecidit Babylon, cecidit; of the Biſhops of Paleſtine, Multi utroque claudicant pede; of the Roman Clergy, Phariſæorum conclamavit Senatus; but which is moſt clear to our purpoſe, he applyes this very ſpeech to the men of his own time; Quando non id ipſum omnes loquimur, & alius dicit, Ego ſum Pauli, ego Apollo, ego Cephæ, dividimus ſpiritus unitatem, & eam in partes & membra diſcerpimus. All which inſtances are produced by Blondell, but have the good fortune to be paſt over without being taken notice of. But ſuppoſing, ſay they, that it was not till after the ſchiſm

at Corinth; yet it muſt needs be done by the Apoſtles; elſe how could it be ſaid to be toto orbo decretum, ut unus de Preſbyteris electus ſuperponeretur cæteris? Quomodo enim (ſaith a learned man) fieri potuit, ut toto hoc orbe decerneretur, nullo jam Oecumenico Concilio ad illud decernendum congregato, ſi non ab Apoſtolis ipſis, fidem toto orbe promulgantibus, & cum fide hanc regendi Eccleſias formam conſtituentibus factum ſit? So that he conceives, ſo general an order could not be made, unleſs the Apoſtles themſelves at that time were the authors of it.

But Firſt, Jerom's in toto orbe decretum eſt, relates not to an antecedent order which was the ground of the inſtitution of Epiſcopacy, but to the univerſal eſtabliſhment of that order which came up upon the occaſion of ſo many ſchiſms; it is ſomething therefore conſequent upon the firſt ſetting up Epiſcopacy, which is the general obtaining of it in the Churches of Chriſt, when they ſaw its uſefulneſs in order to the Churches peace; therefore the Emphaſis lies not in decretum eſt, but in toto orbe; noting how ſuddenly this order met with univerſal acceptance when it firſt was brought up in the Church after the Apoſtles death. Which that it was Jerom's meaning, appears by what he ſaith after, paulatim verò (ut diſſentionum plantaria evellerentur) ad unum omnem, ſolicitudinem eſſe delatam: Where he notes the gradual obtaining of it: which I ſuppoſe was thus, according to his opinion; firſt, in the College of Preſbyters appointed by the Apoſtles, there being a neceſſity of order, there was a Preſident among them who had αὐθεντίαν τοῦ πράγματος, as the Preſident of the Senate, i. e. did moderate the affairs of the Aſſembly, by propoſing matters to it, gathering voices, being the firſt in all matters of concernment, but he had not αὐθεντίαν τῶν συνέδρων, as Caſaubon very well diſtinguiſheth them, i. e. had no power over his fellow-Preſbyters, but that ſtill reſided in the College or body of them. After this when the Apoſtles were taken out of the way, who kept the main power in their own hands of ruling the ſeveral Preſbyteries, or delegated ſome to do it (who had a main hand in the planting Churches with the Apoſtles, and thence are called in ſcripture ſometimes Fellow-labourers in the Lord, and ſometimes Evangeliſts; and by Theodoret Apoſtles, but of a ſecond order) after I ſay, theſe were deceaſed, and the main power left in the Preſbyteries, the ſeveral Preſbyters enjoying an equal power among themſelves, eſpecially being many in one City, thereby great occaſion was given to many ſchiſms, partly by the bandying of the Preſbyters one againſt another, partly by the ſidings of the people with ſome againſt the reſt, partly by the too common uſe of the power of ordinations in Preſbyters, by which they were more able to increaſe their own party, by ordaining thoſe who would joyn with them, and by this means to perpetuate ſchiſms in the Church; upon this, when the wiſer and graver ſort conſidered the abuſes following the promiſcuous uſe of this power of ordination; and withal having in their minds the excellent frame of the Government of the Church under the Apoſtles, and their Deputies, and for preventing of future ſchiſms and diviſions among themſelves, they unanimouſly agreed to chooſe one out of their number, who was beſt qualified for the management of ſo great a truſt, and to devolve the exerciſe of the power of ordination and juriſdiction to him; yet ſo as that he act nothing of importance, without the conſent and concurrence of the Preſbyters, who were ſtill to be as the Common Council to the Biſhop. This I take to be the true and juſt account of the Original of Epiſcopacy in the Primitive Church according to Jerome: Which model of Government thus contrived and framed, ſets forth to us a moſt lively character of that great Wiſdom and Moderation, which then ruled the heads and hearts of the Primitive Chriſtians; and which, when men have ſearched and ſtudied all other ways, (the abuſes incident to this Government, through the corruptions of men and times being retrenched) will be found the moſt agreeable to the Primitive form, both as aſſerting the due intereſt of the Preſbyteries, and allowing the due honour of Epiſcopacy, and by the joynt harmony of both carrying on the affairs of the Church with the greateſt Unity, Concord, and Peace. Which form of Government I cannot ſee how any poſſible reaſon can be produced by either party, why they may not with chearfulneſs embrace it.

Secondly, Another evidence that Jerome by decretum eſt did not mean an order of the Apoſtles themſelves, it is by the words which follow the matter of the decree, viz. Ut unus de Preſbyteris electus ſuperponeretur cæteris, one choſen not only out of, but by the Preſbyters, ſhould be ſet above the reſt; for ſo Jerome muſt be underſtood; for the Apoſtles could not themſelves chooſe out of all Preſbyteries one perſon to be ſet above the reſt; and withal the inſtance brought of the Church of Alexandria makes it evident to be meant of the chooſing by the Preſbyters, and not by the Apoſtles. Beſides, did Jerome mean chooſing by the Apoſtles, he would have given ſome intimations of the hand the Apoſtles had in it: which we ſee not in him the leaſt ground for. And as for that pretence, that Eccleſiæ conſuetudo is Apoſtolica Traditio, I have already made it appear that Apoſtolica Traditio in Jerome, is nothing elſe but Conſuetudo Eccleſiæ, which I ſhall now confirm by a pregnant and unanſwerable teſtimony out of Jerome himſelf. Unaquæque provincia abundet in ſenſu ſuo, & precepta majorum leges Apoſtolicas arbitretur. Let every province abound in its own ſenſe, and account of the ordinances of their Anceſtors as of Apoſtolical Laws. Nothing could have been ſpoken more fully to open to us what Jerome means by Apoſtolical traditions, viz. the practice of the Church in former ages, though not coming from the Apoſtles themſelves. Thus we have once more cleared Jerome and the truth together; I only wiſh all that are of his judgment for the practice of the Primitive Church, were of his temper for the practice of their own; and while they own not Epiſcopacy as neceſſary by a divine right, yet (being duly moderated, and joyned with Preſbyteries) they may embrace it, as not only a lawful, but very uſeful conſtitution in the Church of God. By which we may ſee what an excellent temper may be found out, moſt fully conſonant to the primitive Church for the management of ordinations, and Church power, viz. by the Preſidency of the Biſhop and the concurrence of the Preſbytery. For the Top gallant of Epiſcopacy can never be ſo well managed for the right ſteering the ſhip of the Church, as when it is joyned with the under ſails of a moderate Preſbytery. So much ſhall ſuffice to ſpeak here as to the power of ordination, which we have found to be derived from the Synagogue, and the cuſtoms obſerved in it, tranſplanted into the Church.

Hieronym. ep. 20. ad Lucinum.

There

There are yet ſome things remaining as to ordination, wherein the Church did imitate the Synagogue; which will admit of a quick diſpatch, as the number of the perſons, which under the Synagogue were always to be at leaſt three. This being a fundamental conſtitution among the Jews, as appears by their writings, סמיכה זקנים בשלשה Ordination of Preſbyters, by laying on of hands, muſt be done by three at the leaſt. To the ſame purpoſe Maimonides, ואין סימכין סמיכה שהיא מינוי הזקנים לריינות אלא בשלשה They did not ordain any by impoſition of hands into a power of judicature without the number of three. Which number Peter Gallatinus and Poſtellus conceive neceſſary to be all ordained themſelves; but Mr. Selden thinks it was ſufficient if there were but one of that number ſo ordained, who was to be as principal in the action; whoſe opinion is favoured by Maimonides, who adds to the words laſt cited out of him: Of which Three, one at the leaſt muſt be ordained himſelf. Let us now ſee the parallel in the Church of God. The firſt ſolemn ordination of Elders under the Goſpel, which ſome think to be ſet down as a pattern for the Church to follow, is that we read of, Acts 13. 1, 2, 3. which was performed by three; for we read in the firſt verſe, that there were in the Church at Antioch, five Prophets and Teachers, Barnabas, Simeon, Lucius, Manaen, and Saul, of theſe five the Holy Ghoſt ſaid, that two muſt be ſeparated for the work whereto God had called them, which were Barnabas and Saul; there remain only the other three, Simeon, Lucius, and Manaen, to lay their hands on them, and ordain them to their work. Accordingly thoſe who tell us that James was ordained Biſhop of Jeruſalem, do mention the three Apoſtles, who concurred in the ordaining of him. But moſt remarkable for this purpoſe is the Canon of the Nicene Council, wherein this number is ſet down as the regular number for the ordination of Biſhops, without which it was not accounted Canonical. The words are theſe, Επίσκοπον προσήκει μάλιστα μὲν ὑπὸ πάντων τῶν ἐν τῇ ἐπαρχίᾳ καθίστασθαι· εἰ δὲ δυσχερὲς εἴη τὸ τοιοῦτον, ἢ διὰ κατεπείγουσαν ἀνάγκην, ἢ διὰ μῆκος ὁδοῦ, ἐξ ἅπαντος τρεῖς ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ συναγομένους, συμψήφων γινομένων καὶ τῶν ἀπόντων καὶ συντιθεμένων διὰ γραμμάτων, τότε τὴν χειροτονίαν ποιεῖσθαι. i. e. The ordination of a Biſhop ſhould, if poſſible, be performed by all the Biſhops of the Province, which if it cannot eaſily be done, either through ſome urgent neceſſity, or the tedriouſneſs of the way, three Biſhops, at leaſt, muſt be there, for the doing it, which may be ſufficient for the ordination, if thoſe that are abſent do expreſs their conſent, and by Letters approve of the doing of it. To the ſame purpoſe Theodoret, Κανόνες πάντας συγκαλεῖσθαι τῆς ἐπαρχίας τοὺς ἐπισκόπους κελεύουσι, καὶ αὖ πάλιν δίχα τριῶν ἐπισκόπων ἐπισκόπῳ χειροτονίαν ἀπαγορεύουσι γίνεσθαι. The Canons enjoin all the Biſhops of the Province to be preſent at the ordination of one; and forbid the ordination of any, without three being preſent at it. Thus we ſee how the conſtitution of the Synagogue was exactly obſerved in the Church, as to the number of the perſons concurring to a regular ordination. The laſt thing as to ordination, bearing Analogy to the Synagogue, is the effect of this ordination upon the perſon. It was the cuſtom of the Jews, to ſpeak of all that were legally ordained among them, ושרתה עליהן שכינה and the Divine preſence or Shechinah reſted upon them, which ſometimes they called רוח הקורש the Holy Spirit, ſuppoſed to be in a peculiar manner preſent after this ſolemn ſeparation of them from others in the world, and dedication of them unto God. Anſwerable to this may that of our Saviour be, when he gives his Apoſtles authority to preach the Goſpel, he

Joh. 20. 21. doth it in that form of words, Receive ye the Holy Ghoſt; and then gives them the power of binding and looſing, uſually conveyed in the Jewiſh ordinations. v. 29. Whoſe ſins ye remit, they are remitted; and whoſe ſins ye retain, they are retained. So that as under the Law, they by their ordination received a moral faculty or right to exerciſe that power they were ordained to; ſo under the Goſpel, all who are ordained according to Goſpel rules, have a right, authority, and power conveyed thereby, for the diſpenſing of the Word and Sacraments. Which right and power muſt not be conceived to be an internal indelible character, as the Papiſts groundleſly conceive, but a moral legal right, according to the Laws of Chriſt, becauſe the perſons ordained do not act in it in a natural, but a moral capacity, and ſo the effect muſt be moral, and not phyſical, which they muſt ſuppoſe it to be, who make it a Character, and that indelible. Thus much may ſerve to clear how ordination, in all its circumſtances, was derived from the Jewiſh Synagogue.

§. 15. The other thing remaining to be ſpoken to, as to the correſpondence of the Church with the Synagogue in its conſtitution, is, what order the Apoſtles did ſettle in the ſeveral Churches of their plantation, for the ruling and ordering the affairs of them. Before I come to ſpeak ſo much to it as will be pertinent to our preſent purpoſe and deſign, we may take notice of the ſame name for Church-rulers under the Goſpel, which there was under the Synagogue, viz. that of Preſbyters. The name Preſbyter, as the Heb. זקן though it originally import age, yet by way of connotation it hath been looked on as a name both of dignity and power. Becauſe Wiſdom was ſuppoſed to dwell with a multitude of years, therefore perſons of age and experience were commonly choſen to places of honour and truſt, and thence the name importing age, doth likewiſe carry dignity along with it. Exod. 3. 16. 18. 4. 29. 12. 21. 17. 5. 18. 12, &c. Thence we read in the time of Moſes, how often the Elders were gathered together. Thence Eliezer is called זקן ביתו Gen. 24. 2. which the Greek renders πρεσβύτερος τῆς οἰκίας the Seignior Domo, the chief Officer in his houſe; and ſo we read, Gen. 50. 6. זקני ארץ מצרים the Elders of the Land of Egypt. So the Elders of Midian, the Elders of Iſrael, the Elders of the Cities; ſo among the Greeke, γερουσία for their Council of State; and among the Latins Senatus, and our Saxon Aldermen, in all importing both age and honour and power together. But among the Jews, in the times of the Apoſtles, it is moſt evident that the name πρεσβύτεροι imported not only dignity, but power; the Preſbyters among the Jews having a power both of judging and teaching given them by their Semicha or ordination. Now under the Goſpel the Apoſtles retaining the name and the manner of ordination, but not conferring that judiciary power by it, which was in uſe among the Jews, to ſhew the difference between the Law and the Goſpel, it was requiſite ſome other name ſhould be given to the Governours of the Church, which ſhould qualifie the importance of the word Preſbyters to a ſenſe proper to a Goſpel-ſtate; which was the original of giving the name ἐπίσκοποι to the Governours of the Church under the Goſpel: A name importing duty more than honour, and not a title above Preſbyter, but rather uſed by way of diminution and qualification of the power implied in the name of Preſbyter. Therefore to ſhew what kind of power and duty the name Preſbyter imported in the Church, the Office conveyed by that name is call'd ἐπισκοπὴ, and Preſbyters are ſaid ἐπισκοπεῖν, 1 Pet. 5. 2. where it is oppoſed to that κατακυριεύειν τῶν κλήρων, Lording it over the people, as was the cuſtom of the Preſbyters among the Jews. So that if we determine things by importance of words, and things ſignified by them, the power of ordination was proper to the name πρεσβύτερος and not ἐπίσκοπος, becauſe the former name did then import that power, and not the latter. We come therefore from the names to the things then implyed by them, and the Offices eſtabliſhed by the Apoſtles for the ruling of Churches. But my deſign being not to diſpute the arguments of either party, (viz. thoſe who conceive the Apoſtles ſetled the Government of the Church in an abſolute parity; or elſe by ſuperiority and ſubordination among the ſettled Officers of the Church) but to lay down thoſe Principles which may equally concern both, in order to accommodation: I find not my ſelf at preſent concerned to debate what is brought on either ſide for the maintaining their particular opinion, any farther than thereby the Apoſtles intentions are brought to have been to bind all future Churches to obſerve that individual form they conceived was in practice then. All that I have to ſay then concerning the courſe taken by the Apoſtles in ſetling the Government of the Churches, (under which will be contained the full reſolution of what I promiſed, as to the correſpondency to the Synagogue in the Government of Churches) lies in theſe three Propoſitions, which I now ſhall endeavour to clear, viz. That neither can we have that certainty of Apoſtolical practice, which is neceſſary to conſtitute a Divine right: Nor, Secondly, is it probable that the Apoſtles did tie themſelves up to any one fixed courſe in modelling Churches: Nor, Thirdly, if they did, doth it neceſſarily follow that we muſt obſerve the ſame. If theſe three conſiderations be fully cleared, we may ſee to how little purpoſe it is to diſpute the ſignificancy and importance of words and names, as uſed in Scripture, which hitherto the main quarrel hath been about. I therefore begin with the Firſt of theſe, That we cannot arrive to ſuch an abſolute certainty what courſe the Apoſtles took in governing Churches, as to infer from thence the only divine right of that one form which the ſeveral parties imagine comes the neareſt to it. This I ſhall make out from theſe following arguments. Firſt, From the equivalency of the names, and the doubtfulneſs of their ſignification from which the Form of Government uſed in the New Teſtament ſhould be determined. That the form of Government muſt be derived from the importance of the names of Biſhop and Preſbyter, is hotly pleaded on both ſides. But if there can be no certain way found out whereby to come to a determination of the certain ſenſe of thoſe names in Scripture, we are never like to come to any certain knowledge of the things ſignified by thoſe names. Now there is a fourfold equivalency of the names Biſhop and Preſbyter taken notice of. 1. That both ſhould ſignifie the ſame thing, viz. a Preſbyter in the modern notion, i. e. one acting in a parity with others for the Government of the Church. And this ſenſe is evidently aſſerted by Theodoret, ἐπισκόπους τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους καλεῖ· ἄλλως τε οὐδὲ οἷόν τε ἦν πολλοὺς ἐπισκόπους μίαν πόλιν ποιμαίνειν. The Apoſtle, Acts 20. 28. Phil. 1. 1. Titus 1. 5. 1 Tim. 3. 1. doth by Biſhops mean nothing elſe but Preſbyters; otherwiſe it were impoſſible for more Biſhops to govern one City. 2. That both of them ſhould ſignifie promiſcuouſly ſometimes a Biſhop, and ſometimes a Preſbyter; ſo Chryſoſtome, and after him Œcumenius and Theophylact, in Phil. 1. ἐπισκόπους τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους καλεῖ, τότε γὰρ ἐκοινώνουν τοῖς ὀνόμασι· and in Acts 20. 28. ἐπειδὴ τοὺς πολλοὺς λανθάνει ἡ συνήθεια μάλιστα τῆς καινῆς διαθήκης τοὺς ἐπισκόπους πρεσβυτέρους ὀνομάζουσι, καὶ τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους ἐπισκόπους, ἐπισκόπους, σημειωτέον τοῦτο ἐντεῦθεν, καὶ ἐκ τῆς πρὸς Τίτον ἐπιστολῆς, ἔτι δὲ καὶ πρὸς Φιλιππησίους, καὶ ἐκ τῆς πρὸς Τιμόθεον πρώτης. Where they aſſert the Community and promiſcuous uſe of the Names in Scripture; ſo that a Biſhop is ſometimes called a Presbyter, and a Presbyter ſometimes called a Biſhop. 3. That the Name Biſhop, always imports a ſingular Biſhop; but the name Presbyter is taken promiſcuouſly both for Biſhop and Presbyter. 4. That both the Names Biſhop and Presbyter, do import only one thing in Scripture, viz. the Office of a ſingular Biſhop in every Church; which Senſe, though a Stranger to Antiquity, is above all other embraced by a late very learned Man, who hath endeavoured by ſet Diſcourſes to reconcile all the Places of Scripture where the Names occur to this Senſe, but with what Succeſs it is not here a Place to examine. By this Variety of Interpretation of the Equivalency of the Names of Biſhop and Presbyter, we may ſee how far the Argument from the promiſcuous uſe of the Names is from the Controverſie in hand; unleſs ſome evident Arguments be withal brought, that the Equivalency of the Words cannot poſſibly be meant in any other Senſe, than that which they contend for. Equivocal Words can never of themſelves determine what Senſe they are to be taken in, becauſe they are equivocal, and ſo admit of different ſenſes. And he that from the uſe of an equivocal word would infer the neceſſity only of one ſenſe, when the word is common to many, unleſs ſome other argument be brought inforcing that neceſſity, will be ſo far from perſuading others to the ſame belief, that he will only betray the weakneſs and ſhortneſs of his own reaſon. When Auguſtus would be called only Princeps Senatus, could Tacitus hiſt. lib. 1. any one infer from thence, that certainly he was only the προεστὼς in the Senate, or elſe that he had ſuperiority of power over the Senate, when that title might be indifferent to either of thoſe ſenſes? All that can be infer'd from the promiſcuous ſenſe of the words, is that they may be underſtood only in this ſenſe; but it muſt be proved that they can be underſtood in no other ſenſe, before any one particular form of Government as neceſſary can be inferred from the uſe of them. If notwithſtanding the promiſcuous uſe of the name Biſhop and Presbyter, either that Presbyter may mean a Biſhop, or that Biſhop may mean a Presbyter, or be ſometimes uſed for one, ſometimes for the other; what ground can there be laid in the equivalency of the words which can infer the only divine right of the form of Government couched in any one of thoſe ſenſes? So likewiſe it is in the titles of Angels of the Churches; If the Name Angel imports no incongruity, though taken only for the שליח צבור in the Jewiſh Synagogue, the publick Miniſter of the Synagogue, called the Angel of the Congregation, what power can be inferred from thence, any more than ſuch an officer was inveſted with? Again if the προεστὼς or Preſident of the Aſſembly of Presbyters, might be ſo called: what ſuperiority can be deduced thence, any more than ſuch a one enjoys? Nay if in the Prophetical ſtile, an unity may be ſet down by way of Repreſentation of a Multitude: what Evidence can be brought from the name, that by it ſome one particular Perſon muſt be underſtood? And by this means Timothy may avoid being charged

Rev. 2. 4. with leaving his firſt love, which he muſt of neceſſity be, by thoſe that make him the Angel of the Church of Epheſus at the time of writing theſe Epiſtles. Neither is this any ways ſolved by the Anſwer given, that the name Angel is repreſentative of the whole Church, and ſo there is no neceſſity, the Angel ſhould be perſonally guilty of it. For firſt, it ſeems ſtrange that the whole diffuſive body of the Church ſhould be charged with a crime by the name of the Angel, and he that is particularly meant by that name ſhould be free from it. As if a Prince ſhould charge the Major of a Corporation as guilty of rebellion, and by it ſhould only mean that the Corporation was guilty, but the Major was innocent himſelf. Secondly, if many things in the Epiſtles be directed to the Angel, but yet ſo as to concern the whole body, then of neceſſity the Angel muſt be taken as repreſentative of the body; and then why may not the word Angel be taken only by way of repreſentation of the body it ſelf, either of the whole Church, or which is far more probable, of the Conſeſſus or order of Preſbyters in that Church? We ſee what miſerably unconcluding arguments thoſe are which are brought for any form of Government from Metaphorical or Ambiguous expreſſions, or names promiſcuouſly uſed, which may be interpreted to different ſenſes. What certainty then can any rational man find what the form of Government was in the Primitive times, when only thoſe arguments are uſed which may be equally accommodated to different forms? And without ſuch a certainty with what confidence can men ſpeak of a Divine right of any one particular form? Secondly, the uncertainty of the Primitive form is argued, from the places moſt in controverſie about the form of Government; becauſe that without any apparent incongruity they may be underſtood of either of the different forms. Which I ſhall make out by going through the ſeveral places. The Controverſy then on foot is this, (as it is of late ſtated) whether the Churches in the Primitive times were governed by a Biſhop only and Deacons, or by a College of Presbyters acting in a parity of power? The places inſiſted on, on both ſides are theſe, Act. 11. 30. Acts 14. 23. Acts 28. 17. 1 Tim. 3. 1. Titus 1. 5. the thing in controverſy is, whether Biſhops with Deacons, or Presbyters in a parity of power, are underſtood in theſe places? I begin then in order with Acts 11. 30. the firſt place wherein the name ϖρεσβύτεροι occurs, as applied to the officers of the Chriſtian Church. Thoſe that are for a College of Presbyters, underſtand by theſe Elders thoſe of the Church of Jeruſalem, who did govern the Affairs of that Church; thoſe that are for a ſolitary Epiſcopacy by theſe Elders underſtand not the local Elders of Jeruſalem, but the ſeveral Biſhops of the Churches of Judea. Let us now ſee whether there be any evidence from the place to determine which of theſe two muſt neceſſarily be underſtood. There is nothing at all mentioned in the place, but only that upon the occaſion of the Famine they ſent relief to the Brethren of Judea, and ſent it to the Elders by the hands of Barnabas and Saul; Which might either be to the Elders of the Church at Jeruſalem to be diſtributed to the ſeveral Churches of Judea, or elſe to the ſeveral Paſtors of thoſe Churches either collectively as met together at Jeruſalem to receive this contribution, or diſtributively as they were in their ſeveral Churches. The relief might be ſent to all the Brethren of Judea, and yet either be conveyed to the particular Elders of Jeruſalem to ſend it abroad, or to the ſeveral Elders of the Churches within the circuit of Judea. But other places are brought by both parties for their particular ſenſe in this; As Acts 15. 6. here indeed mention is made of the Apoſtles and Elders together at Jeruſalem, but nothing expreſſed whereby we may know whether the fixed Elders of that Church, or elſe the Elders of all the Churches of Judea aſſembled upon this ſolemn occaſion of the Council of the Apoſtles there. So Acts 21. 11. when Paul went in to

James, it is ſaid that All the Elders were preſent. No more certainty here neither; for either they might be the fixed officers of that Church, meeting with James upon Paul's coming; or elſe they might be the Elders of the ſeveral Churches of Judea met together, not to take Account of Paul's Miniſtry (as ſome improbably conjecture,) but aſſembled together there at the Feaſt of Pentecoſt, at which Paul came to Jeruſalem, which is more probable upon the account of what we read, v. 20. of the many thouſand believing Jews then at Jeruſalem who were zealous of the Law: who in all probability were the believing Jews of Judea, who did yet obſerve the annual Feſtivals of Jeruſalem, and ſo moſt likely their ſeveral Elders might go up together with them, and there be with James at Paul's coming in to him. No certainty then of the Church of Jeruſalem how that was governed; whether by Apoſtles themſelves, or other unfixed Elders, or only by James who exerciſed his Apoſtle-ſhip moſt there, and thence afterwards called the Biſhop of Jeruſalem. We proceed therefore to the government of other Churches; and the next place is, Acts 14. 23. And when they had ordained them Elders in every Church. Here ſome plead for a plurality of Elders as fixed in every Church; but it is moſt evident, that the words hold true if there was but one in each Church. For κατ' ἐκκλησίαν here and κατὰ πόλιν Titus 1. 5. (for both places will admit of the ſame anſwer) doth ſignifie no more then oppidatim, or Eccleſiatim, as κατὰ βαθμὸν gradatim, κατ' ἄνδρα, viritim, κατὰ μέρος particulatim, κατὰ κώμην vicatim. No more then is imported than that Elders were ordained, City by City, or Church by Church, as we would render it, and thereby nothing is expreſſed but that no Church wanted an Elder, but not that every Church had more Elders than one. But the place moſt controverted is, Acts 20. 17. And from Miletus, Paul ſent to Epheſus, and called the Elders of the Church. Thoſe that ſay theſe Elders were thoſe only of the Church of Epheſus, ſeem to be moſt favoured by the article τῆς ἐκκλησίας as ſeeming to apply it to that particular Church of Epheſus, and by the Syriack verſion which renders it, Venire fecit Presbyteros Eccleſiæ Epheſi; to the ſame purpoſe likewiſe Hierome underſtands it. On the contrary thoſe that ſay that theſe Elders were thoſe of the ſeveral Churches of Aſia, are favoured by v. 18. that from the firſt day he came into Aſia, he had been with them at all ſeaſons. Now Paul did not remain all the time at Epheſus, as appears by Acts 19. 10, 22, 26. where he is ſaid to preach the word abroad in Aſia and ſo in probability Churches were planted, and Rulers ſetled in them; and that theſe were at this time called to Miletus by Paul, is the expreſs affirmation of Irenæus; In Mileto enim convocatis Epiſcopis & Presbyteris, qui erant ab Epheſo & à reliquis proximis civitatibus, quoniam ipſe feſtinavit Hieroſolymis Pentecoſtem agere. Here is nothing then either in the text or antiquity, that doth abſolutely determine whence theſe Elders came; but there may be a probability on either ſide; and ſo no certainty or neceſſity of underſtanding it either way. And ſo for the other places in Timothy and Titus, it is certain the care of thoſe Perſons did extend to many places; and therefore the Elders or Biſhops made by them are not neceſſarily to be underſtood of a Plurality of Elders in one place. Thus we ſee that there is no incongruity in applying either of theſe two forms to the ſenſe of the places in Queſtion. I diſpute not which is the true, or at leaſt more probable ſenſe, but that we can find nothing in the ſeveral places which doth neceſſarily determine how they are to be underſtood as to one particular form of Government, which is the thing I now aim at the proving of. And if neither form be repugnant to the ſenſe of theſe places, how can any one be neceſſarily inferred from them? As if the ſeveral motions and phænomena of the Heavens may be with equal probability explained according to the Ptolemaick or Copernican Hypotheſis, viz. about the reſt or motion of the Earth; then it neceſſarily follows, that from thoſe Phænomena no argument can be drawn evincing the neceſſity of the one Hypotheſis, and overturning the probability of the other. If that great wonder of Nature the flux and reflux of the Sea, might with equal congruity be ſolved according to the different opinions, of its being cauſed by ſubterraneous fires, or from the motion of the Moon, or the depreſſion of the Lunar vortex, or (which to me is far the moſt probable) by a motion of conſent of the Sea with all the other great bodies of the world, we ſhould find no neceſſity at all of entertaining one opinion above another, but to look upon all as probable, and none as certain. So likewiſe for the compoſition and motion of all natural bodies, the ſeveral Hypotheſes of the old and new Philoſophy implying no apparent incongruity to nature, do make it appear that all or any of them, may be embraced as Ingenious Romances in Philoſophy (as they are no more) but that none of them are the certain truth; or can be made appear ſo to be to the minds of men. So it is in controverſies in Theology, if the matter propounded to be believed, may as to the truth and ſubſtance of it be equally believed under different ways of explication, then there is no neceſſity as to the believing the truth of the thing, to believe it under ſuch an explication of it, more than under another. As for inſtance, in the caſe of Chriſt's deſcent εἰς ᾅδου, if I may truly believe that Chriſt did deſcend εἰς ᾅδου, whether by that we underſtand the ſtate of the dead, or a local deſcent to hell, then there is no neceſſity in order to the belief of the ſubſtance of that article of the ancient Creed (called the Apoſtles) under that reſtriction of a local deſcent. By this time I ſuppoſe it is clear, that if theſe places of Scripture may be underſtood in theſe two different ſenſes of the word Elders, viz. either taken collectively in one City, or diſtributively in many, then there is no certainty which of theſe two ſenſes muſt be embraced, and ſo the form of Church Government, which muſt be thence derived, is left ſtill at as great uncertainty as ever, notwithſtanding theſe places of Scripture brought to demonſtrate it; ὅπερ ἔδει δεῖξαι.

Thirdly, The uncertainty of the primitive Form of Government will be made appear from the Defectiveneſs, Ambiguity, Partiality and Repugnancy of the records of the ſucceeding ages which ſhould inform us what Apoſtolical practice was. When men are by the force of the former arguments driven off from Scripture, then they preſently run to take ſanctuary in the records of ſucceeding ages to the Apoſtles. Thus Eſtius no mean School-man, handling this very queſtion of the difference of Biſhops and Preſbyters, very fairly quits the Scriptures, and betakes himſelf to other weapons. Quod autem jure divino ſint Epiſcopi Preſbyteris ſuperiores, etſi non ita clarum eſt è ſacris literis, aliunde tamen ſatis efficaciter probari poteſt. Ingenuouſly ſaid however; but all the difficulty is how a Jus divinum ſhould be proved when men leave the Scriptures, which makes others ſo loth to leave this hold; although they do it in effect, when they call in the help of ſucceeding ages to make the Scripture ſpeak plain for them. We follow therefore the ſcent of the Game into this Wood of Antiquity, wherein it will be eaſier to loſe

our ſelves then to find that which we are upon the purſuit of, a Jus Divinum of any one particular form of Government. I handle now only the teſtimony of Antiquity (for the practice of it will call for a particular diſcourſe afterwards) and herein I ſhall endeavour to ſhew the incompetency of this Teſtimony as to the ſhewing what certain form of Church Government was practiſed by the Apoſtles; for that I ſhall make uſe of that fourfold argument from the defectiveneſs of this Teſtimony, from the Ambiguity of it, from the Partiality of it, and from the Repugnancy of it to its ſelf. Firſt, then for the defectiveneſs of the teſtimony of Antiquity in reference to the ſhewing what certain form the Apoſtles obſerved in ſetling the Government of Churches; A threefold defectiveneſs I obſerve in it, as to places, as to times, as to Perſons. Firſt defectiveneſs as to places; for him that would be ſatisfied what courſe the Apoſtles took for governing Churches, it would be very requiſite to obſerve the uniformity of the Apoſtles practice in all Churches of their plantation. And if but one place varied, it were enough to overthrow the neceſſity of any one form of Government, becauſe thereby it would be evident, that they obſerved no certain or conſtant courſe, nor did they look upon themſelves as obliged ſo to do. Now the ground of the neceſſity of ſuch an univerſal Teſtimony as to places, is this; We have already made it appear, that there is no Law of Chriſt abſolutely commanding one form, and forbidding all other. We have no way then left to know whether the Apoſtles did look upon themſelves as bound to ſettle one form, but by their practice; this practice muſt be certain and uniform in them; this uniformity muſt be made known to us by ſome unqueſtionable way: the Scriptures they are very ſilent in it, mentioning very little more than Paul's practice, nor that fully and clearly; therefore we muſt gather it from antiquity, and the records of following ages: if theſe now fall ſhort of our expectation, and cannot give us an account of what was done by the Apoſtles in the ſeveral Churches planted by them, how is it poſſible we ſhould attain any certainty of what the Apoſtles practice was? Now that antiquity is ſo defective as to places, will appear from the general ſilence as to the Churches planted by many of the Apoſtles. Granting the truth of what Euſebius tells us, That Thomas went into Parthia, Andrew into Scythia, John into the leſſer Aſia, Peter to the Jews in Pontus, Galatia, Bythinia, Cappadocia, Aſia; beſides what we read in Scripture of Paul, what a pitiful ſhort account have we here given in, of all the Apoſtles travels, and their ſeveral fellow-labourers! And for all theſe, little or nothing ſpoke of the way they took in ſetling the Churches by them planted. Who is it will undertake to tell us what courſe Andrew took in Scythia, in governing Churches? If we believe the records of after-ages, there was but one Biſhop, viz. of Tomis for the whole Countrey; how different is this from the pretended courſe of Paul ſetting up a ſingle Biſhop in every City? where do we read of the Preſbyteries ſetled by Thomas in Parthia or the Indies? what courſe Philip, Bartholomew, Matthew, Simon Zelotes, Mathias took: might not they for any thing we know, ſettle another kind of Government from what we read Paul, Peter or John did, unleſs we had ſome evidence that they were all bound to obſerve the ſame? nay, what evidence have we what courſe Peter took in the Churches of the circumciſion? Whether he left them to their Synagogue way or altered it, and how and wherein? Theſe things ſhould be made appear, to give men a certainty of the way and courſe the A-

poſtles did obſerve in the ſetling Churches by them planted. But inſtead of this, we have a general ſilence in antiquity, and nothing but the forgeries of latter ages to ſupply the vacuity: whereby they filled up empty places as Plutarch expreſſeth it, as Geographers do maps with ſome fabulous creatures of their own invention. Here is work now for a Nicephorus Calliſthus, a Simeon Metaphraſtes, the very Jacobus de Voragine of the Greek Church, (as one well calls him) thoſe hiſtorical Tinkers, that think to mend a hole where they find it, and make three inſtead of it. This is the firſt defect in antiquity as to places. The ſecond is as obſervable as to times; and what is moſt conſiderable: Antiquity is moſt defective where 'tis moſt uſeful, viz. in the time immediately after the Apoſtles, which muſt have been moſt helpful to us in this inquiry. For who dare with confidence believe the conjectures of Euſebius at three hundred years diſtance from Apoſtolical times, when he hath no other teſtimony to vouch, but the Hypotypoſes of an uncertain Clement (certainly not he of Alexandria, if Joſ. Scaliger may be credited) and the Commentaries of Hegeſippus, whoſe relation and authority are as queſtionable as many of the reports of Euſebius himſelf are in reference to thoſe elder times: for which I need no other Teſtimony, but Euſebius in a place enough of its ſelf to blaſt the whole credit of antiquity, as to the matter now in debate. For ſpeaking of Paul and Peter, and the Churches by them planted, and coming to enquire after their ſucceſſors, he makes this very ingenuous confeſſion. Ὅσοι δὲ τούτων, καὶ τινες γνήσιοι ζηλωταὶ γεγονότες τὰς πρὸς αὐτῶν ἱδρυθείσας ἱκανοὶ ποιμαίνειν ἐδοκιμάσθησαν ἐκκλησίας, οὐ ῥᾴδιον εἰπεῖν· μὴ ὅτι γε ὅσους ἄν τις ἐξ τῶν Παύλου φωνῶν ἀνελέξοιτο. Say you ſo? Is it ſo hard a matter to find out who ſucceeded the Apoſtles in the Churches planted by them, unleſs it be thoſe mentioned in the writings of Paul? What becomes then of our unqueſtionable line of ſucceſſion of the Biſhops of ſeveral Churches, and the large Diagramms made of the Apoſtolical Churches, with every ones name ſet down in his order, as if the Writer had been Clarenceaux to the Apoſtles themſelves? Is it come to this at laſt that we have nothing certain, but what we have in Scriptures? and muſt then the Tradition of the Church be our rule to interpret Scriptures by? An excellent way to find out the truth doubtleſs, to bend the rule to the crooked ſtick, to make the Judge ſtand to the opinion of his Lacquey, what ſentence he ſhall paſs upon the cauſe in queſtion: to make Scripture ſtand cap in hand to tradition to know whether it may have leave to ſpeak or no? Are all the great outcries of Apoſtolical tradition, of perſonal ſucceſſion, of unqueſtionable records reſolved at laſt into the Scripture its ſelf by him from whom all theſe long pedegrees are fetched? then let ſuceeſſion know its place, and learn to vail bonnet to the Scriptures? And withal let men take heed of over-reaching themſelves when they would bring down ſo large a Catalogue of ſingle Biſhops from the firſt and pureſt times of the Church? for it will be hard for others to believe them, when Euſebius profeſſeth it is ſo hard to find them. Well might Scaliger then complain that the Interval from the laſt chapter of the Acts to the middle of Trajan, in which time Quadratus and Ignatius began to flouriſh, was tempus ἄδηλον, as Varro ſpeaks, a meer Chaos of time filled up with the rude conceptions of Papias, Hermes and others, who like Hannibal when they could not find a way through, would make one either by force or fraud. But yet, Thirdly, here is another defect conſequent to that of time, which is that of perſons; ariſing not only from a defect of records, the Diptychs of the Church being loſt, which would have acquainted us with the times of ſuffering of the ſeveral Martyrs (by them called their Natalitia) at which times their ſeveral names were Cont. 3. l. 2. c. 5. not. 18. inrolled in theſe Martyrologies, which ſome as Junius obſerves, have ignorantly miſtaken for the time of their being made Biſhops of the places wherein their names were entred, as Anacletus, Cletus, and Clemens at Rome; I ſay the defect as to perſons not only ariſeth hence, but becauſe the Chriſtians were ſo much harraſſed with perſecutions, that they could not have that leiſure then to write thoſe things which the leiſure and peace of our ages have made us ſo eagerly inquiſitive after. Hence even the Martyrologies are ſo full ſtuffed with Fables, witneſs one for all, the famous Legend of Catharina who ſuffered, ſay they, V. Chamier. Tom. 1. l. 2. cap. 16. in Diocletian's time. And truly the ſtory of Ignatius (as much as it is defended with his Epiſtles) doth not ſeem to be any of the moſt probable. For wherefore ſhould Ignatius of all others be brought to Rome to ſuffer, when the Proconſuls and the præſides provinciarum did every where in time of perſecution execute their power in puniſhing Chriſtians at their own tribunals, without ſending them ſo long a journey to Rome to be martyr'd there? And how came Ignatius to make ſo many and ſuch ſtrange excurſions as he did by the ſtory, if the ſoldiers that were his guard were ſo cruel to him, as he complains they were? Now all thoſe uncertain and fabulous narrations as to perſons then, ariſing from want of ſufficient records made at thoſe times, make it more evident how incompetent a Judge Antiquity is as to the certainty of things done in Apoſtolical times. If we ſhould only ſpeak of the Fabulous Legends of the firſt planters of Churches in theſe Weſtern parts, we need no farther evidence of the great defect of Antiquity as to perſons. Not to go out of our own nation; Whence come the ſtories of Peter, James, Paul, Simon, Ariſtobulus, beſides Joſeph of Arimathea, and his company, all being preachers of the Goſpel, and planters of Churches here, but only from the great defect in Antiquity as to the Records of Perſons imployed in the ſeveral places for preaching the Goſpel? Thus much to ſhew the defectiveneſs as to the records of antiquity, and thereby the incompetency of them for being a way to find out the certain courſe the Apoſtles took in ſettling and governing Churches by them planted.

Proleg. in Chron. Euſ.

§. 17. The next thing ſhewing the incompetency of the records of the Church for deciding the certain form of Church Government in the Apoſtles times, is, the Ambiguity of the Teſtimony given by thoſe records. A Teſtimony ſufficient to decide a controverſie, muſt be plain and evident, and muſt ſpeak full and home to the caſe under debate. Now if I make it appear that antiquity doth not ſo; nothing then can be evident from thence, but that we are left, to as great uncertainties as before. The matter in controverſie is, whether any in a ſuperiour order to Preſbyters were inſtituted by the Apoſtles themſelves for the regulating of the Churches by them planted? for the proving of which, three things are the moſt inſiſted on; firſt, the Perſonal ſucceſſion of ſome perſons to the Apoſtles and Churches by them planted; Secondly, the appropriating the name ἐπίσκοποι to Biſhops in a ſuperiour order to Preſbyters, after the Apoſtles deceaſe; Thirdly, the Churches owning the order of Epiſcopacy as of Divine inſtitution. If now we can make theſe three things evident; Firſt, that perſonal ſucceſſion might be without ſuch ſuperiority of order; Secondly, that the names of Biſhop and Preſbyters were common after the diſtinction between them was introduced; and Thirdly, that the Church did not own Epiſcopacy as a Divine inſtitution, but Eccleſiaſtical; and thoſe who ſeem to ſpeak moſt of it, do mean no more; I ſhall ſuppoſe enough done to invalidate the Teſtimony of Antiquity as to the matter in hand. Firſt, then for the matter of ſucceſſion in Apoſtolical Churches, I ſhall lay down theſe four things, to evince that the argument drawn from thence, cannot fully clear the certain courſe which the Apoſtles took in ſettling the Government of Churches. Firſt, that the ſucceſſion might be only as to different degree, and not as to a different order; where the ſucceſſion is clear nothing poſſibly can be inferred from it beyond this. For bare ſucceſſion implies no more than that there was one in thoſe Churches ſucceeding the Apoſtles, from whom afterwards the ſucceſſion was derived. Now then, ſuppoſing only at preſent, that it was the cuſtom in all the Churches at that time to be ruled by a college of Preſbyters acting in a parity of power, and among theſe, one to ſit as the Naſi in the Sanhedrin, having a priority of order above the reſt in place, without any ſuperiority of power over his Colleagues; will not the matter of ſucceſſion be clear and evident enough notwithſtanding this? Succeſſion of perſons was the thing inquired for, and not a ſucceſſion of power; if therefore thoſe that would prove a ſucceſſion of Apoſtolical power, can only produce a liſt and Catalogue of names in Apoſtolical Churches, without any evidence of what power they had, they apparently fail of proving the thing in queſtion, which is not, whether there might not be found out a liſt of perſons in many Churches derived from the Apoſtles times; but whether thoſe perſons did enjoy by way of peculiarity and appropriation to themſelves, that power, which the Apoſtles had over many Churches while they lived? Now this, the meer ſucceſſion will never prove, which will beſt appear by ſome Parallel inſtances. At Athens after they grew weary of their ten years Ἄρχοντες, the people choſe nine every year to govern the affairs of the Common-wealth; theſe nine enjoyed a Parity of power among themſelves, and therefore had a place where they conſulted together about the matters of State, which was called Στρατήγιον, as * Demoſthenes, Plutarch and others tell us: Now although they enjoyed this equality of power, yet one of them had greater dignity than the reſt, and therefore was called Ἄρχων by way of excellency, and his name was only ſet in the publick Records of that year, and there was called Ἄρχων ἐπώνυμος, and the year was reckoned from him, as † Pauſanias and Julius Pollux inform us. Here we ſee now the ſucceſſion clear in one ſingle perſon and yet no ſuperiority of power in him over his Colleagues: The like may be obſerved among the Ephori and Bidiæj at Sparta; the number of the Ephori was always five from their firſt inſtitution by Lycurgus, and not nine (as the Greek Etymologiſt imagines) theſe enjoyed likewiſe a parity of power among them; but among theſe to give name to the year, they made choice of one who was called ἐπώνυμος here too, as the ἄρχων at Athens, and him they called προεστῶτα τῶν ἐφόρων, as Plutarch tells us. Where we have the very name προεστὼς attributed to him that had only this primacy of order without any ſuperiority of power, which is uſed by Juſtin Martyr of the Preſident of Aſſemblies among the Chriſtians. Now from hence we may evidently ſee that meer ſucceſſion of ſingle perſons named above the reſt, in the ſucceſſions in Apoſtolical Churches, cannot inforce any ſuperiority of power in the perſons ſo named, above others ſuppoſed to be as joint-Governours of the Churches with them. I diſpute not whether it were ſo or no; whether according to Blondel the ſucceſſion was from the πρωτοχειροτονηθεὶς, or whether by choice as at Alexandria; but I only now ſhew that this argument from ſucceſſion is weak, and proves not at all the certainty of the power thoſe perſons enjoyed. Secondly, This ſucceſſion is not ſo evident and convincing in all places as it ought to be, to demonſtrate the thing intended. It is not enough to ſhew a liſt of ſome perſons in the great Churches of Jeruſalem, Antioch, Rome, and Alexandria, (although none of theſe be unqueſtionable) but it ſhould be produced at Philippi, Corinth, Cæſarea, and in all the ſeven Churches of Aſia (and not only at Epheſus) and ſo likewiſe in Creet ſome ſucceeding Titus, and not think men will be ſatisfied with the naming a Biſhop of Gortyna ſo long after him. But as I ſaid before, in none of the Churches moſt ſpoken of is the ſucceſſion ſo clear as is neceſſary. For at Jeruſalem it ſeems ſomewhat ſtrange how fifteen Biſhops of the circumciſion ſhould be crouded into ſo narrow a room as they are, ſo that many of them could not have above two years time to rule in the Church. And it would bear an inquiry where the ſeat of the Biſhops of Jeruſalem was from the time of the deſtruction of the City by Titus, (when the walls were laid even with the Ground by Muſonius) till the time of Adrian; for till that time the ſucceſſion of the Biſhops of the circumciſion continues. For Antioch, it is far from being agreed, whether Evodius or Ignatius ſucceeded Peter, or Paul, or the one Peter and the other Paul; much leſs at Rome, whether Cletus, Anacletus, or Clemens are to be reckon'd firſt (but of theſe afterwards) At Alexandria where the ſucceſſion runs cleareſt, the original of the power is imputed to the choice of Preſbyters, and to no divine inſtitution. But at Epheſus the ſucceſſion of Biſhops from Timothy is pleaded with the greateſt confidence, and the teſtimony brought from it is from Leontius Biſhop of Magneſia in the Council of Chalcedon, whoſe words are theſe ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου Τιμοθέου μέχρι νῦν εἴκοσι ἑπτὰ ἐπίσκοποι ἐγένοντο. πάντες ἐν ἐφέσῳ ἐχειροτονήθησαν. From Timothy to this day there hath been a ſucceſſion of ſeven and twenty Biſhops, all of them ordained in Epheſus. I ſhall not inſiſt ſo much on the incompetency of this ſingle witneſs to paſs a judgement upon a thing of that nature, at the diſtance of four hundred years; in which time records being loſt, and Biſhops being after ſettled there, no doubt they would begin their account from Timothy, becauſe of his imployment there once for ſettling the Churches thereabout. And to that end we may obſerve that in the after-times of the Church, they never met with any of the Apoſtles, or Evangeliſts in any place, but they preſently made them Biſhops of that place. So Philip is made Biſhop of Trallis, Ananias Biſhop of Damaſcus, Nicolaus Biſhop of Samaria, Barnabas Biſhop of Milan, Silas Biſhop of Corinth, Sylvanus of Theſſalonica, Creſcens of Calcedon, Andreas of Byzantium, and upon the ſame grounds Peter Biſhop of Rome. No wonder then if Leontius make Timothy Biſhop of Epheſus, and derive the ſucceſſion down from him. But again, this was not an act of the Council its ſelf, but only of one ſingle perſon delivering his private opinion in it; and that which is moſt obſervable is, that in the thing mainly inſiſted on by Leontius, he was contradicted in the face of the whole Council, by Philip a Preſbyter of Conſtantinople. For the caſe of Baſſianus and Stephen about their violent intruſion into the Biſhoprick of Epheſus, being diſcuſſed before the Council; a queſtion was propounded by the Council where the Biſhop of Epheſus was to be regularly ordained, according to the Canons. Leontius Biſhop of Magneſia ſaith, that there had been twenty ſeven Biſhops of Epheſus from Timothy, and all of them ordained in the place. His buſineſs was not to derive exactly the ſucceſſion of Biſhops, but ſpeaking according to vulgar tradition, he inſiſts that all had been ordained there. Now if he be convicted of the crimen falſi in his τὸ ἔργον, no wonder if we meet with a miſtake in his πάρεργον, i. e. if he were out in his allegation, no wonder if he were deceived in his tradition. Now as to the ordination of the Biſhops in Epheſus, Philip, a Preſbyter of Conſtantinople convicts him of falſhood in that; For, ſaith he, John, Biſhop of Conſtantinople going into Aſia, depoſed fifteen Biſhops there, and ordained others in their room. And Aetius, Archdeacon of Conſtantinople, inſtanceth in Caſtinus, Heraclides, Baſilius, Biſhops of Epheſus, all ordained by the Biſhop of Conſtantinople. If then the certainty of ſucceſſion relies upon the credit of this Leontius, let them thank the Council of Chalcedon, who have ſufficiently blaſted it, by determining the cauſe againſt him in the main evidence produced by him. So much to ſhew how far the cleareſt evidence for ſucceſſion of Biſhops from Apoſtolical times, is from being convincing to any rational man. Thirdly, The ſucceſſion ſo much pleaded by the Writers of the primitive Church, was not a ſucceſſion of perſons in Apoſtolical power; but a ſucceſſion in Apoſtolical doctrine; which will be ſeen by a view of the places produced to that purpoſe. The firſt is that of Irenæus. Quoniam valdè longum eſt in hoc tali volumine omnium Eccleſiarum enumerare ſucceſſiones, maximæ & antiquiſſimæ, & omnibus congnitæ à glorioſiſſimis duobus Apoſtolis Petro & Paulo Romæ fundatæ & conſtitutæ Eccleſiæ, eam quam habet ab Apoſtolis traditionem, & annunciatam hominibus fidem, per ſucceſſiones Epiſcoporum pervenientes uſque ad nos, indicantes, confundimus omnes eos, &c. Where we ſee Irenæus doth the leaſt of all aim at the making out of a ſucceſſion of Apoſtolical power in the Biſhops he ſpeaks of, but a conveying of the doctrine of the Apoſtles down to them by their hands; (which doctrine is here called tradition, not as that word is abuſed by the Papiſts to ſignifie ſomething diſtinct from the Scriptures, but as it ſignifies the conveyance of the doctrine of the Scripture its ſelf) which is cleared by the beginning of that Chapter, Traditionem itaq; Apoſtolorum in toto mundo manifeſtatam in Eccleſia adeſt perſpicere omnibus qui vera velint audire; & habemus annumerare eos qui ab Apoſtolis inſtituti ſunt Epiſcopi in Eccleſiis, & ſucceſſores eorum uſq; ad nos qui nihil tale docuerunt neq; cognoverunt, quale ab his deliratur. His plain meaning is, that thoſe perſons who were appointed by the Apoſtles to overſee and govern Churches, being ſufficient witneſſes themſelves of the Apoſtles doctrine, have conveyed it down to us by their ſucceſſors, and we cannot learn any ſuch thing of them, as Valentinus and his followers broached. We ſee it is the doctrine ſtill he ſpeaks of, and not a word what power and ſuperiority theſe Biſhops had over Preſbyters in their ſeveral Churches. To the ſame purpoſe Tertullian, in that known ſpeech of his; Edant origines Eccleſiarum ſuarum, evolvant ordinem Epiſcoporum ſuorum, ita per ſucceſſiones ab initio decurrentem, ut primus ille Epiſcopus aliquem ex Apoſtolis aut Apoſtolicis viris habuerit authorem & anteceſſorem. Hoc modo Eccleſiæ Apoſtolicæ cenſus ſuos deferunt; ſicut Smyrnæorum Eccleſia habens Polycarpum à Johanne conlocatum refert, ſicut Romanorum Clementem à Petro ordinatum edit; proinde utiq; & cæteræ exhibent, quos ab Apoſtolis in Epiſcopatum conſtitutos Apoſtolici ſeminis traduces habeant. A ſucceſſion I grant is proved in Apoſtolical Churches by theſe words of Tertullian, and this ſucceſſion of perſons, and thoſe perſons Biſhops too; but then it is only ſaid, that theſe perſons derived their Office from the Apoſtles, but nothing expreſſed what relation they had to the Church, any more than is implied in the general name of Epiſcopi, nor what power they had over Preſbyters, only that there were ſuch perſons, was ſufficient to his purpoſe, which was to preſcribe againſt Hereticks, i. e. to non-ſuit them, or to give in general reaſons why they were not to be proceeded with as to the particular debate of the things in queſtion between them. For præſcribere in the civil Law, (whence Tertullian tranſplanted that word as many other into the Church) is, cum quis adverſarium certis exceptionibus removet à lite conteſtandâ, ita ut de ſumma rei neget agendum, eamve cauſam ex juris præſcripto judicandam: three De Virgin. veland. c. 1. ſorts of theſe preſcriptions Tertullian elſewhere mentions: Hoc exigere veritatem cui nemo præſcribere poteſt, non ſpatium temporum, non patrocinia perſonarum, non privilegium regionum. Here he ſtands upon the firſt, which is a preſcription of time, becauſe the doctrine which was contrary to that of the Hereticks, was delivered by the Apoſtles, and conveyed down by their ſucceſſors, which was requiſite to be ſhewed, in order to the making his preſcription good. Which he thus farther ex- Cap. 36. de præſcript. plains: Age jam qui voles curioſitatem melius exercere in negotio ſalutis tuæ; percurre Eccleſias Apoſtolicas, apud quas ipſæ adhuc Cathedræ Apoſtolorum ſuis locis preſidentur, apud quas ipſæ authenticæ eorum literæ recitantur, ſonantes vocem & repræſentantes faciem uniuſcujuſque. Proxime eſt tibi Achaia; habes Corinthum. Si non longe es à Macedonia, habes Philippos, habes Theſſalonicenſes. Si potes in Aſiam tendere, habes Epheſum. Si autem Italia adjaces, habes Romam, unde nobis quoque auctoritas preſto eſt. What he ſpoke before of the perſons, he now ſpeaks of the Churches themſelves planted by the Apoſtles, which by retaining the authentick Epiſtles of the Apoſtles ſent to them, did thereby ſufficiently preſcribe to all the novel opinions of the Hereticks. We ſee then evidently, that it is the doctrine which they ſpeak of as to ſucceſſion, and the perſons no farther than as they are the conveyers of that doctrine; either then it muſt be proved, that a ſucceſſion of ſome perſons in Apoſtolical power is neceſſary for the conveying of this doctrine to men, or no argument at all can be inferred from hence for their ſucceeding the Apoſtles in their power, becauſe they are ſaid to Aug. Ep. 42. convey down the Apoſtolical doctrine to ſucceeding ages. Which is Auſtin's meaning, in that ſpeech of his, Radix Chriſtianæ ſocietatis per ſedes Apoſtolorum & ſucceſſiones Epiſcoporum, certa per orbem propagatione diffunditur. The root of Chriſtian ſociety, (i. e. the doctrine of the Goſpel) is ſpread abroad the world, through the channels of the Apoſtolical Aug. Ep. 29. Sees, and the continued ſucceſſions of Biſhops therein. And yet if we may believe the ſame Auſtin, Secundum honorum vocabula quæ jam Eccleſiæ uſus obtinuit, Epiſcopatus Preſbyterio major eſt. The difference between Epiſcopacy and Preſbytery riſes from the cuſtom of the Church, attributing a name of greater honour to thoſe it had ſet above others. And as for Tertullian, I believe neither party will ſtand to his judgment as to the original of Church-power: For he ſaith expreſly, Differentiam inter ordinem & plebem conſtituit Eccleſiæ auctoritas; all the difference between Miniſters and people comes from the Church's authority; unleſs he means ſomething more by the following words, & honor per Ordinis conſeſſum ſanctificatus à Deo, viz. that the honour which is received by ordination from the bench of Church-Officers, is ſanctified by God, i. e. by his appointment as well as bleſſing. For otherwiſe I know not how to underſtand him. But, however, we ſee here he makes the Government of the Church to lie in a Conſeſſus ordinis, which I know not otherwiſe to render, than by a bench of Preſbyters; becauſe only they were ſaid in ordinem cooptari, who were made Preſbyters, and not thoſe who were promoted to any higher degree in the Church. By the way we may obſerve the original of the name of Holy-Orders in the Church, not as the Papiſts, and others following them, as tho' it noted any thing inherent, by way of (I know not what) character in the perſon, but becauſe the perſons ordained were thereby admitted in Ordinem among the number of Church-Officers. So there was Ordo Senatorum, Ordo Equeſtris, Ordo Decurionum, and Ordo Sacerdotum among the Romans, as in this Inſcription.

HERCULIS INVICTI.

From hence the uſe of the word came into the Church, and thence Ordination, ex vi vocis imports no more than ſolemn admiſſion into this order of Preſbyters; and therefore it is obſervable, that laying on of hands never made men Prieſts under the Law, but only admitted them into publick Office. So much for Tertullian's Conſeſſus ordinis, which hath thus far drawn us out of our way, but we now return: And therefore, Fourthly, This perſonal ſucceſſion, ſo much ſpoken of, is ſometimes attributed to Preſbyters, even after the diſtinction came into uſe between Biſhops and them. And that even by thoſe Authors who before had told us the ſucceſſion was by Biſhops, as Irenæus. Cum autem ad eam iterum traditionem, quæ eſt ab Apoſtolis, quæ per ſucceſſiones Preſbyterorum in Eccleſiis cuſtoditur, provocamus eos qui adverſantur traditioni, dicent ſe non ſolum Preſbyteris ſed etiam Apoſtolis exiſtentes ſapientiores, &c. Here he attributes the keeping of the tradition of Apoſtolical doctrine to the ſucceſſion of Preſbyters, which before he had done to Biſhops. And more fully afterwards, Quapropter iis qui in Eccleſiâ ſunt Preſbyteris obaudire oportet, his qui ſucceſſionem habent ab Apoſtolis, ſicut oſtendimus, qui cum Epiſcopatûs ſucceſſione, chariſma veritatis certum ſecundum placitum patris acceperunt. In this place he not only aſſerts the ſucceſſion of Preſbyters to the Apoſtles, but likewiſe attributes the ſucceſſio Epiſcopatûs to theſe very Preſbyters. What ſtrange confuſion muſt this raiſe in any one's mind, that ſeeks for a ſucceſſion of Epiſcopal power above Preſbyters from the Apoſtles, by the Teſtimony of Irenæus, when he ſo plainly attributes both the ſucceſſion to Preſbyters, and the Epiſcopacy too, which he ſpeaks of? And in the next Chapter adds, Tales Preſbyteros nutrit Eccleſia, de quibus & Propheta ait. Et dabo principes tuos in pace, & Epiſcopos tuos in juſtitiâ. Did Irenæus think that Biſhops in a ſuperior order to Preſbyters were derived by an immediate ſucceſſion from the Apoſtles, and yet call the Preſbyters by the name of Biſhops? It is ſaid indeed, that in the Apoſtles times the names

Biſhop and Preſbyter were common, although the Office was diſtinct; but that was only during the Apoſtles life, ſay ſome, when after the name Biſhop was appropriated to that order that was in the Apoſtles (ſo called before) but, ſay others, it was only till ſubject Preſbyters were conſtituted, and then grew the difference between the names. But neither of theſe σοφὰ φάρμακα can draw forth the difficulty in theſe places of Irenæus; for now both the Apoſtles were dead, and ſubject Preſbyters certainly in ſome of theſe Apoſtolical Churches were then conſtituted; whence comes then the community of names ſtill, that thoſe who are ſaid to ſucceed the Apoſtles, are called Biſhops in one place, but Preſbyters in another, and the very ſucceſſion of Epiſcopacy attributed to Preſbyters? Can we then poſſibly conceive that theſe teſtimonies of Irenaus can determine the point of ſucceſſion, ſo as to make clear to us what that power was which thoſe perſons enjoyed, whom he ſometimes calls Biſhops, and ſometimes Preſbyters. But it is not Irenæus alone who tells us that Preſbyters ſucceed the Apoſtles; even Cyprian who pleads ſo much for obedience to the Biſhops as they were then conſtituted in the Church, yet ſpeaks often of his compreſbyteri; and in his Epiſtle to Florentius Papianus, who had reproached him, ſpeaking of thoſe words of Chriſt, He that heareth you, heareth me, &c. Qui dicit ad Apoſtolos, ac per hoc ad omnes præpoſitos qui Apoſtolis vicaria ordinatione ſuccedent, where he attributes Apoſtolical ſucceſſion to all that were præpoſiti, which name implies not the relation to Preſbyters as over them, but to the people, and is therefore common both to Biſhops and Preſbyters; * for ſo afterwards he ſpeaks, nec fraternitas habuerit Epiſcopum, nec plebs Præpoſitum, &c. Jerome ſaith that Preſbyters are loco Apoſtolorum, and that they do Apoſtolico gradui ſuccedere; and the ſo much magnified Ignatius, πρεσβύτεροι εἰς τόπον συνεδρίου τῶν Ἀποστόλων that the Preſbyters ſucceeded in the place of the Bench of Apoſtles; and elſewhere of Sotion the Deacon ὅτι ὑποτάσσεται τῷ ἐπισκόπῳ ὡς χάριτι θεοῦ καὶ τῷ πρεσβυτερίῳ ὡς νόμῳ Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ, as it is read in the Florentine copy ſet out by Voſſius; but in the former Editions both by Vedelius and the moſt learned Primate of Armagh it is read, ὅτι ὑποτάσσεται τῷ ἐπισκόπῳ καὶ τῷ πρεσβυτερίῳ χάριτι Θεοῦ ἐν νόμῳ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ· but that of Voſſius ſeems to be the true reading, to which the old Latin verſion in Biſhop Uſher fully agrees; Quoniam ſubjectus eſt Epiſcopo ut gratiæ Dei, & preſbyterio ut legi Jeſu Chriſti. It might be no improbable conjecture to gueſs from hence at Ignatius his opinion concerning the original both of Epiſcopacy and Preſbytery. The former he looks on as an excellent gift of God to the Church; ſo a learned Doctor paraphraſeth gratiæ dei. i. e. Dono à Deo Eccleſiæ indulto; ſo Cyprian often Divina dignatione, ſpeaking of Biſhops; i. e. that they looked on it as an act of God's ſpecial favour to the Church, to find out that means for unity in the Church, to pitch upon one among the Preſbyters who ſhould have the chief rule in every particular Church; but then for Preſbytery, he looks on that as νόμος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, an Inſtitution and Law of Jeſus Chriſt, which muſt, on that account always continue in the Church. And ſo Sotion did commendably in ſubmitting to the Biſhop as a favour of God to the Church for preventing ſchiſms; on which account it is, and not upon the account of divine inſtitution, that Ignatius is ſo earneſt in requiring obedience to the Biſhop, becauſe, as Cyprian ſaith, Eccleſia eſt plebs Epiſcopo coadunata, & grex Paſtori adhærens; and the Biſhops then being orthodox, he lays ſuch a charge upon the people to adhere to them, (for it is to the people, and not to the Preſbyters he ſpeaks moſt) which was as much as to bid them hold to the unity of the faith, and avoid thoſe pernicious hereſies which were then abroad; and ſo Ignatius and Jerome may eaſily be reconciled to one another; both owning the Council of Preſbyters as of divine inſtitution, and both requiring obedience to Biſhops as a ſingular privilege granted to the Church, for preventing Schiſms, and preſerving unity in the Faith. And in all thoſe thirty five teſtimonies produced out of Ignatius his Epiſtles for Epiſcopacy, I can meet but with one which is brought to prove the leaſt ſemblance of an Inſtitution of Christ for Epiſcopacy; and if I be not much deceived, the ſenſe of that place is clearly miſtaken too. The place is Ep. ad Epheſios: He is exhorting the Epheſians, συντρέχειν τῇ γνώμῃ τοῦ Θεοῦ, which I ſuppoſe may be rendred to fulfil the will of God, ſo ποιῆσαι τὴν γνώμην ſignifies Apocalypſ. 17. 17. and adds, καὶ γὰρ Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς τὸ ἀδιάκριτον ἡμῶν ζῆν, τοῦ πατρὸς ἡ γνώμη, ὡς καὶ οἱ ἐπίσκοποι οἱ κατὰ τὰ πέρατα ὁρισθέντες ἐν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ γνώμῃ, εἰσίν· ὅθεν πρέπει ὑμῖν συντρέχειν τῇ τοῦ ἐπισκόπου γνώμῃ, ὅπερ καὶ ποιεῖτε. He begins to exhort them to concur with the will of God, and concludes his exhortation, to concur with the will or council of the Biſhop; and in the middle he ſhews the ground of the connexion of theſe two together; for Chriſt, ſaith he, who is our inſeparable Life, is the counſel of the Father, and the Biſhops, who are ſcattered abroad to the ends of the earth, are the Counſel of Jeſus Chriſt, i. e. do concur with the will of Chriſt; therefore follow the Counſel of your Biſhop, which alſo you do. Every thing is plain and obvious in the ſenſe here, and very coherent to the expreſſions both before and after; only the ἐν muſt be left out as plainly redundant, and ὁρισθέντες muſt not be rendred determinati, but rather diſterminati, becauſe it refers to a place here, and ſo it notes their being diſperſed into ſeveral places, and ſeparated from one another, thereby implying the unity of their Faith, and the coagulum fidei, notwithſtanding their diſtance from one another, as to place in the world, which in Cyprian's words is, Eccleſia univerſa per totum mundum unitatis vinculo copulata. And certainly a ſtronger argument than this could not have been given for the Epheſians chearful obedience to their Biſhop, (which is the thing he aims at) than the univerſal conſent of all the Biſhops in the Chriſtian World in the unity of the Faith of Chriſt; ſo that as Chriſt is the will and counſel of the Father, becauſe of that harmony and conſent which is between their wills; ſo the Biſhops are the will and counſel of Chriſt, as chearfully uniting in the profeſſion of his Faith. So that we ſee Ignatius himſelf cannot give a doubting mind ſatisfaction of the Divine inſtitution of Biſhops, when in the only place brought to that purpoſe, his ſenſe is quite different from what it is brought for. So that the Records of the Church are far from deciding this controverſie as to the certainty of the form of Government inſtituted by Chriſt, becauſe of the ambiguity of thoſe Records as to the point of ſucceſſion to the Apoſtles, in that this ſucceſſion might be only of a different degree, in that it is not clear and convincing in all places; in that where it is cleareſt, it is meant of a ſucceſſion of doctrine, and not of perſons; in that if it were of perſons, yet Preſbyters are ſaid to ſucceed the Apoſtles as well as Biſhops, by the ſame perſons who ſpeak of theſe. By which laſt thing we have likewiſe cleared the Second thing propounded, to ſhew the ambiguity of the teſtimony of Antiquity, which was the promiſcuous uſe of the names of Biſhops and Preſbyters, after the diſtinction between their Office was brought in by the Church. For we have made it appear that the names are promiſcuouſly uſed, when that ſucceſſion which is ſometimes attributed to Biſhops, is at other times given to Preſbyters. Other inſtances might be brought of that nature, as, firſt, that of Clemens Romanus, in his excellent Epiſtle, which like the River Alpheus had run under ground for ſo many centuries of years, but hath now in theſe laſt times of the world appeared publickly to the view of the world, to make it appear how true that is which he ſaith the Apoſtles

Ep. gr. lat. p. 57. did foreſee, ὅτι ἔρις ἔσται περὶ τοῦ ὀνόματος τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς, that there would be great contention about the name of Epiſcopacy; and ſo there are ſtill, and that from his Epiſtle too. For when in one place he tells us,
Page 54. that the Apoſtles ordained their firſt fruits to be Biſhops and Deacons, τῶν μελλόντων πιστεύειν, of thoſe that ſhould believe; afterwards he makes no
Page 57. ſcruple of calling thoſe Biſhops Preſbyters in ſeveral places, μακάριοι οἱ προοδοιπορήσαντες πρεσβύτεροι, &c. and ſpeaking of the preſent ſchiſm at Corinth, he ſaith, it was a moſt ſhameful thing, and unworthy of Chriſtians. Αἰσχρὰ ἀγαπητοὶ καὶ λίαν αἰσχρὰ καὶ ἀνάξια τῆς ἐν Χριστῷ ἀγωγῆς ἀκούεσθαι, τὴν βεβαιωτάτην καὶ ἀρχαίαν Κορινθίων ἐκκλησίαν δι' ἓν ἢ δύο πρόσωπα στασιάζειν πρὸς τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους. To hear the firm and ancient Church of Corinth, for the ſake of one or two perſons to raiſe a ſedition againſt the Preſbyters; and afterwards,
Page 69. & p. 73. p. 2, 3. μόνον τὸ ποίμνιον τοῦ Χριστοῦ εἰρηνευέτω μετὰ τῶν καθεσταμένων πρεσβυτέρων, Only let the flock of Chriſt enjoy its peace with the Preſbyters which are ſet over it. But becauſe this is ſaid to be ſpoken before the time of diſtinction between Biſhops and Preſbyters, it being ſuppoſed that there were no ſubject Preſbyters then, (although no reaſon can be aſſigned why the Apoſtles ſhould ordain Biſhops τῶν μελλόντων πιστεύειν of thoſe that ſhould believe, and ſhould not likewiſe ordain Preſbyters for them) yet to take away all ſcruple, we ſhall go farther; when ſubject Preſbyters, as they are called, are acknowledged to be, and yet Biſhops are call'd Preſbyters then too: For which we have the clear teſtimony of the Martyrs of the Gallican Church, in their Epiſtle
Apol. p. 31. to Eleutherius, Biſhop of Rome, who call Irenæus πρεσβύτερον ἐκκλησίας, Euſeb. l. 5. cap. 3. when as Blondell obſerves, he had been nine years Biſhop of Lyons, in the place of Pothinus; neither doth Blondell's argument lie here, that becauſe they call him the Preſbyter of the Church, therefore he was no Biſhop, as his Antagoniſt ſuppoſeth; but he freely acknowledgeth him to have ſucceeded Pothinus there in his Biſhoprick; but becauſe after the difference aroſe between Biſhop and Preſbyters, yet they called him by the name of Presbyter, it ſeems very improbable, that when they were commending one to the Biſhop of another Church, they ſhould make uſe of the loweſt name of honour then appropriated to ſubject Presbyters, which, inſtead of commending, were a great debaſing of him, if they had looked on a ſuperior order above thoſe Presbyters, as of divine inſtitution, and thought there had been ſo great a diſtance between a Biſhop and ſubject Presbyters, as we are made to believe there was. Which is, as if the Maſter of a College, in one Univerſity, ſhould be ſent by the Fellows of his Society, to the Heads of the other, and ſhould in his Commendatory-Letters to them, be ſtiled a Senior-Fellow of that Houſe: Would not any one that read this, imagine that there was no difference between a Senior-Fellow and a Maſter, but only a primacy of order, that he was the firſt of the number, without any power over the reſt? This was the caſe of Irenæus; he is ſuppoſed to be Biſhop of the Church of Lyons; he is

ſent by the Church of Lyons on a Meſſage to the Biſhop of Roma; when notwithſtanding his being Biſhop, they call him Preſbyter of that Church, (when there were other Presbyters who were not Biſhops) what could any one imagine by the reading of it, but that the Biſhop was nothing elſe but the Senior-Presbyter, or one that had a primacy of order among, but no divine right to a power of juriſdiction over his fellow-Presbyters? More inſtances of this nature are brought there by that learned Author, which the Reader may compare with the anſwers, and then let him judge whether the Teſtimony of Antiquity have not too much ambiguity in it to decide the Controverſie clearly on either ſide. But that which ſeems yet more material, is that which we obſerved in the third place, that thoſe who acknowledge the ſuperiority of Biſhops over Preſbyters, do impute it to an act of the Church, and not aſcribe it to any divine inſtitution. The teſtimony of Jerome to this purpoſe is well known, and hath been produced already; that of the counterfeit Ambroſe, but true Hilary, is in every one's mouth upon this controverſie; Quia primum Preſbyteri Epiſcopi appellabantur, ut recedente uno ſequens ei ſuccederet; ſed quia cœperunt ſequentes Preſbyteri indigni inveniri ad primatus tenendos, immutata eſt ratio, proſpiciente Concilio ut non ordo ſed meritum crearet Epiſcopum multorum Sacerdotum judicio conſtitutum, ne indignus temerè Uſurparet & eſſet multis ſcandalum. Very ſtrange that an opinion ſo directly contrary to the divine right of Epiſcopacy ſhould be publiſhed by a Deacon of the Church of Rome, and theſe Commentaries cited by Auſtin, with applauſe of the Perſon, without ſtigmatizing him, for a heretick with Aerius, if it had been then the opinion of the Church, that Biſhops in their power over Preſbyters did ſucceed the Apoſtles by a divine right. Nothing more clear, than that he aſſerts all the difference between a Biſhop and Preſbyters to ariſe from an act of the Church chuſing men for their deſerts, when before they ſucceeded in order of place; it is a miſtake of Blondel's, to attribute this to the Nicene Council; doubtleſs he means no more than that Hierom calls Concilium Preſbyterorum, or which he himſelf means by judicium Sacerdotum. The teſtimony of Auſtin hath been already mentioned. Secundum honorum vocabula quæ jam Eccleſiæ uſus obtinuit, Epiſcopatus Preſbyterio major eſt. Thereby implying it was not ſo always; elſe to what purpoſe ſerves that jam obtinuit, and that the original of the difference was from the Church? But more expreſs and full is Iſidore himſelf, the Biſhop of Sevil in Spain ſpeaking of Preſbyters. His ſicut Epiſcopis diſpenſatio myſteriorum Dei commiſſa eſt; præſunt enim Eccleſiis Chriſti, & in confectione corporis & ſanguinis conſortes cùm Epiſcopis ſunt; ſimiliter & in doctrina populi & in officio prædicandi, ſed ſola propter auctoritatem ſummo ſacerdoti Clericorum ordinatio reſervata eſt, ne à multis Eccleſiæ diſciplina vindicata concordiam ſolveret, ſcandala generaret. What could be ſpoken more to our purpoſe than this is? he aſſerts the identity of power, as well as name, in both Biſhops and Preſbyters, in governing the Church, in celebrating the Euchariſt, in the Office of preaching to the people, only for the greater honour of the Biſhop, and for preventing ſchiſms in the Church, the power of ordination was reſerved to the Biſhop; by thoſe words propter auctoritatem, he cannot poſſibly mean the authority of a divine command, for that his following words contradict, that it was to prevent ſchiſms and ſcandals, and after produceth the whole place of Jerome to that purpoſe. Agreeable to this, is the judgment of the ſecond Council of Sevil in Spain, upon the occaſion of the irregular proceedings of ſome Preſbyters ordained by Agapius Biſhop of Corduba. Their words are theſe: Nam quamvis cum Epiſcopis plurima illis Miniſteriorum communis ſit diſpenſatio, quædam novellis & Eccleſiaſticis regulis ſibi prohibita noverint, ſicut Preſbyterorum & Diaconorum & Virginum conſecratio, &c. Hæc enim omnia illicita eſſe Preſbyteris, quia Pontificatus apicem non habent, quem ſolis deberi Epiſcopis authoritate Canonum præcipitur: ut per hoc & diſcretio graduum, & dignitatis faſtigium ſummi Pontificis demonſtretur. How much are we beholding to the ingenuity of a Spaniſh Council, that doth plainly diſavow the pretence of any divine right to the Epiſcopacy by them ſo ſtrenuouſly aſſerted? All the right they plead for, is from the novellæ & Eccleſiaſticæ regulæ, which import quite another thing from divine inſtitution; he that hath not learnt to diſtinguiſh between the authority of the Canons of the Church, and that of the Scriptures, will hardly ever underſtand the matter under debate with us: and certainly it is another thing to preſerve the honour of the different degrees of the Clergy, but eſpecially of the chief among them, viz. the Biſhop, than to obſerve a thing merely out of obedience to the command of Chriſt; and upon the account of divine inſtitution. That which is rejoyned in anſwer to theſe teſtimonies, as far as I can learn, is only this, that the Council and Iſidore followed Jerome, and ſo all make up but one ſingle teſtimony. But might it not as well be ſaid, that all that are for Epiſcopacy did follow Ignatius or Epiphanius, and ſo all thoſe did make up but one ſingle teſtimony on the other ſide? yea I do as yet deſpair of finding any one ſingle teſtimony in all antiquity, which doth in plain terms aſſert Epiſcopacy, as it was ſetled by the practice of the Primitive Church in the ages following the Apoſtles, to be of an unalterable divine right. Some expreſſions I grant in ſome of them ſeem to extol Epiſcopacy very high; but then it is in order to the peace and unity of the Church, and in that ſenſe they may ſometimes be admitted to call it Divine and Apoſtolical, not in regard of its inſtitution, but of its end, in that it did in their opinion tend as much to preſerve the unity of the Church, as the Apoſtles power did over the Churches while they were living. If any ſhall meet with expreſſions ſeeming to carry the fountain of Epiſcopal power higher, let them remember to diſtinguiſh between the power it ſelf, and the reſtrained exerciſe of that power; the former was from the Apoſtles, but common to all diſpenſers of the word; the latter was appropriated to ſome, but by an act of the Church, whereby an eminency of power was attributed to one for the ſafety of the whole. And withal let them conſider that every Hyperbolical expreſſion of a Father will not bear the weight of an argument: and how common it was to call things Divine, which were conceived to be of excellent uſe, or did come from perſons in authority in the Church. One would think that ſhould meet with θεῖον γράμμα in the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon, it could be rendred by nothing ſhort of the Scriptures: whereas they mean no more by it, but only the Emperour's letters to the Council. It hath been already obſerved how ready they were to call any cuſtom of the Church before their times an Apoſtolical tradition. And as the Heathens when they had any thing which they knew not whence it came, they uſually call it Διοπετὲς as though it came immediately from heaven; ſo the Fathers when traditions were conveyed to them, without the names of the Authors, they conclude they could have no other fountain but the Apoſtles. And thus we ſee many traditions in ſeveral Churches directly contrary to one another, were looked on as Apoſtolical, only from the prevalency of this perſwaſion, that whatever they derived from their Fathers, was of that nature. But then for that anſwer to the Council, and Iſidore, and Jerome, that they make but one teſtimony; I ſay, that although the words be of the ſame ſenſe, yet they have the nature of a different teſtimony, upon theſe accounts. Firſt, as produced by perſons of different condition in the Church; ſome think they are even with Jerome when they tell us what a pique there was between him and John Biſhop of Jeruſalem, and that he might have the better advantage of his adverſary, when he could not raiſe himſelf up to the honour of Epiſcopacy, he would bring that down to the State of Preſbytery; but, as ſuch entertain too unworthy thoughts of one of thoſe Fathers, whom they profeſs themſelves admirers of; ſo this prejudice cannot poſſibly lie againſt Iſidore, or the Council: For the firſt was himſelf a Biſhop of no mean account in the Church of God; and the Council was compoſed of ſuch; it could be no bias then of that nature could draw them to this opinion: and no doubt they would have been as forward to maintain their own authority in the Church, as the truth and conſcience would give them leave. Therefore on this account one teſtimony of a ſingle Biſhop, much more of a whole Council of them, againſt their acting by divine authority in the Church, is of more validity than ten for it, in as much as it cannot but be in reaſon ſuppoſed that none will ſpeak any thing againſt the authority they are in, or what may tend in the leaſt to diminiſh it, but ſuch as make more conſcience of the truth, than of their own credit and eſteem in the world. Secondly, In that it was done in different ages of the Church; Jerome flouriſhed about 380. Iſidore ſucceeded Leander in Sevil, 600. the Council ſat, 619. the Council of Aquen which tranſcribes Iſidore and owns his doctrine, 816. So that certainly ſuppoſing the words of all to be the ſame, yet the Teſtimony is of greater force, as it was owned in ſeveral Ages of the Church, by whole Councils, without any the leaſt control that we read of. And if this then muſt not be looked on as the ſenſe of the Church at that time, I know not how we can come to underſtand it: if what is poſitively maintained by different perſons in different ages of the Church, and in different places without any oppoſing it by Writers of thoſe ages, or condemning it by Councils, may not be conceived to be the ſenſe of the Church at that time. So that laying all theſe things together, we may have enough to conclude the Ambiguity at leaſt, and thereby incompetency of the Teſtimony of Antiquity, for finding out the certain form which the Apoſtles obſerved in planting Churches.

We proceed to the third thing to ſhew the incompetency of Antiquity for deciding this controverſy, which will be from the Partiality of the Teſtimony brought from thence. Two things will ſufficiently manifeſt the Partiality of the judgment of Antiquity in this caſe. Firſt, Their apparent judging of the practice of the firſt primitive Church, according to the cuſtoms of their own. Secondly, Their ſtiff and pertinacious adhering to private traditions contrary to one another, and both ſides maintaining theirs as Apoſtolical. First, judging the practice of the Apoſtles by that of their own times; as is evident by Theodoret, and the reſt of the Greek Commentators, aſſigning that as the reaſon why the Preſbyters ſpoken of in the Epiſtles to Timothy and Titus, were not Biſhops in the ſenſe of their age, becauſe there could be but one Biſhop in a City, whereas there are more expreſſed in thoſe places, as being in the §. 18.

the ſeveral Cities: whereas this is denied of Apoſtolical times by the late pleaders for Epiſcopacy; and it is ſaid of them, that they ſpoke according to the Cuſtom of their own time. And it is now thought there were two Biſhops in Apoſtolical times in ſeveral Cities; the one the head of the Jewiſh Cœtus, and the other of the Gentile. I enter not the diſpute again here, whether it were ſo or no, only I hence manifeſt, how far thoſe perſons themſelves who plead for the judgment of the Fathers as deciding this controverſy, are from thinking them impartial judges, when as to the grounds of their ſentence they are confeſſed to ſpeak only of the practice of their own time. Who can imagine any force in Chryſoſtome's argument, that the Preſbyters who laid hands on Timothy muſt needs be Biſhops, becauſe none do ordain in the Church but Biſhops, unleſs he makes this the medium of his argument, that whatever was the practice of the Church in his days, was ſo in Apoſtolical times. There is, I know not what ſtrange influence in a received Cuſtom, if generally embraced, that doth poſſeſs men with a fancy it was never otherwiſe than it is with them; nay when they imagine the neceſſity of ſuch a cuſtom at preſent in the Church, they preſently think it could never be otherwiſe than it is. But of this I have ſpoken ſomewhat already. Secondly, that which makes it appear how partial the judgment of Antiquity is, in adhering to their particular traditions, and calling them Apoſtolical, though contrary to one another. How can we then fix upon the teſtimony of antiquity as any thing certain or impartial in this caſe? when it hath been found ſo evidently partial in a caſe of leſs concernment than this is. A Witneſs that hath once betrayed his faithfulneſs in the open court, will hardly have his evidence taken in a caſe of moment, eſpecially when the cauſe muſt ſtand or fall according to his ſingle teſtimony. For my part, I ſee not how any man that would ſee reaſon for what he doth, can adhere to the Church for an unqueſtionable tradition received from the Apoſtles; when in the caſe of keeping Eaſter, whether with the Jews on the fourteenth Moon, or only on the Lord's day, there was ſo much unreaſonable heat ſhewed on both ſides, and ſuch confidence that on either ſide their tradition was Apoſtolical. The ſtory of which is related by Euſebius, and Socrates and many others. They had herein all the advantages imaginable in order to the knowing the certainty of the thing then in queſtion among them. As their nearneſs to Apoſtolical times, being but one remove from them: yea the perſons contending pleaded perſonal acquaintance with ſome of the Apoſtles themſelves, as Polycarp with John, and Anicetus of Rome, that he had his tradition from St. Peter; and yet ſo great were the heats, ſo irreconcilable the controverſy, that they proceeded to dart the Thunderbolt of excommunication in one anothers faces; as Victor with more zeal than piety, threw preſently the Aſiatick Churches all out of Communion, only for differing as to this tradition. The ſmall coals of this fire kindled a whole Ætna of contention in the Chriſtian world, the ſmoak and aſhes, nay the flames of which, by the help of the Prince of the air were blown over into the boſom of the then almoſt infant Northern Churches of Britain, where a ſolemn diſpute was cauſed upon this quarrel between Colmannus on one ſide, and Wilfride on the other. The like conteſt was upon this occaſion between Auguſtine the Monk, and the Britiſh Biſhops. The obſervation of this ſtrange combuſtion in the primitive Church upon the account of ſo vain, frivilous, unneceſſary a thing as this was, drew this note from a learned and judicious man, formerly quoted, in his Tract of Schiſm; By this we may plainly ſee the danger of our appeal to antiquity, for reſolution in controverted points of faith, O how ſmall relief we are to expect from thence! for if the diſcretion of the chiefeſt Guides and Directors of the Church did in a point ſo trivial, ſo inconſiderable, ſo mainly fail them, as not to ſee the truth in a ſubject, wherein it is the greater marvail how they could avoid the ſight of it, can we without the imputation of great groſſneſs and folly, think ſo poor-ſpirited perſons, competent judges of the queſtions now on foot betwixt the Churches? P. 5. Thus that perſon, as able to make the beſt improvement of the Fathers, as any of thoſe who profeſs themſelves the moſt ſuperſtitious admirers of antiquity. But if we muſt ſtand to the judgment of the Fathers, let us ſtand to it in this, that no tradition is any farther to be embraced, than as it is founded on the word of God. For which purpoſe thoſe words of Cyprian are very obſervable; In compendio eſt autem apud Cyprian ep. 74. n. 13. religioſas & ſimplices mentes, & errorem deponere, & invenire atque eruere veritatem: Nam ſi ad divinæ traditionis caput & originem revertamur, ceſſat error humanus. He aſſerts it an eaſie matter for truly religious and plain-hearted men to lay aſide their error, and to find out the truth, which is by returning to the head and ſpring of divine tradition, viz. the Scriptures; Which he expreſſeth farther, with an elegant ſimilitude; Si Canalis aquam ducens, qui copioſe prius & largiter profluebat, ſubito deficiat, nonne ad fontem pergitur ut illic defectionis ratio noſcatur; ib. n. 14. utrumne areſcentibus venis, in capite unda ſiccaverit; an verò integra deinde & plena procurrens, in medio itinere deſtiterit? ut ſi vitio interrupti aut bibuli canalis affectum eſt, quò minus aqua continua perſeveranter & jugiter flueret, refecto & confirmato canali ad uſum atque ad potum civitatis aqua collecta eadem ubertate atque integritate repreſentaretur, qua de fonte proficiſcitur, Quod & nunc facere oportet Dei ſacerdotes præcepta divina ſervantes, ut ſi in aliquo mutaverit (l. nutaverit) & vacillaverit veritas, ad originem Dominicam, & Evangelicam, & Apoſtolicam traditionem revertamur, & inde ſurgat actus noſtri ratio, unde & ordo & origo ſurrexit. His meaning is; That as when a channel ſuddenly fails, we preſently enquire where and how the breach was made, and look to the ſpring and fountain, to ſee the waters be fully conveyed from thence as formerly; ſo upon any failure in the tradition of the Church, our only recourſe muſt be to the true fountain of tradition the word of God, and ground the reaſon of our actions upon that which was the foundation of our profeſſion. And when Stephen the Biſhop of Rome would tedder him to tradition, Cyprian keeps his liberty by this cloſe queſtion, unde illa traditio? utrumne de Dominica & Evangelica auctoritate deſcendens, an de Apoſtolorum mandatis atque Epiſtolis veniens.—Si ergo aut Evangelio præcipitur, aut in Apoſtolorum Epiſtolis, aut actibus continetur—obſervetur Divina hæc & ſancta traditio. We ſee this good man would not baulk his way one foot for the great bug-bear of Tradition, unleſs it did bear the character of a divine truth in it, and could produce the credentials of Scripture to teſtifie its authority to him. To the ſame purpoſe that ſtout Biſhop of Cappadocia, Firmilian, whoſe unhappineſs with Cyprian's, was only that of Job's friends, that they excellently managed a bad cauſe, and with far more Firmil. ep. of the ſpirit of Chriſtianity, than Stephen did, who was to be juſtified inter ep. in nothing but the truth he defended. Eos autem, ſaith Firmilian, qui Cyprian. 75. n. 9. Romæ ſunt, non ea in omnibus obſervare quæ ſint ob origine tradita, & fruſtra Apoſtolorum auctoritatem prætendere, which he there makes out at large, viz. that the Church of Rome had gathered corruption betimes, which after broke out into an Impoſthume in the head of it. Where then muſt we find the certain way of reſolving the controverſy we are upon? the Scriptures determine it not, the Fathers tell us there is no believing tradition any farther than it is founded in Scripture; thus are we ſent back from one to the other, till at laſt we conclude there is no certain way at all left to find out a deciſion of it. Not that we are left at ſuch uncertainties, as to matters of faith, (I would not be ſo miſtaken) we have Archimedes his Poſtulatum granted us for that, a place to fix our faith on, though the world be moved out of its place, I mean the undoubted word of God; but as to matters of fact not clearly revealed in Scripture, no certainty can be had of them, from the hovering light of unconſtant tradition. Neither is it only unconſtant, but in many things repugnant to its ſelf, which was the laſt conſideration to be ſpoke to in reference to the ſhewing the incompetency of antiquity for deciding our Controverſie. Well then, ſuppoſe we our ſelves now waiting for the final verdict of Church tradition to determine our preſent cauſe: If the Jury cannot agree, we are as far from ſatisfaction as ever; and this is certainly the caſe we are now in. The main difficulty lies in the immediate ſucceſſion to the Apoſtles; if that were but once cleared, we might bear with interruptions afterwards; but the main ſeat of the controverſie lies there, whether the Apoſtles upon their withdrawing from the Government of Churches, did ſubſtitute ſingle perſons to ſucceed them or no; ſo that unleſs that be cleared, the very Deed of gift is queſtioned; and if that could be made appear, all other things would ſpeedily follow. Yes, ſay ſome, that is clear: For at Jeruſalem, Antioch, and Rome, it is evident that ſingle perſons were entruſted with the Government of Churches. In Jeruſalem, ſay they, James, the brother of our Lord, was made Biſhop by the Apoſtles: But whence doth that appear? it is ſaid from Hegeſippus in Euſebius: But what if he ſay no ſuch thing? his words are theſe, διαδέχεται τὴν ἐκκλησίαν μετὰ τῶν ἀποστόλων, which is there interpreted, Eccleſiæ adminiſtrationem una cum cæteris Apoſtolis ſuſcepit. And no more is thereby meant, but that this James, who is by the Ancients conceived to be only a Diſciple before, is now taken into a higher charge, and inveſted in a power of governing the Church as the Apoſtles were. His power it is plain was of the ſame nature with that of the Apoſtles themſelves; and who will go about to degrade them ſo much as to reduce them to the Office of ordinary Biſhops? James in probability did exerciſe his Apoſtleſhip the moſt at Jeruſalem, where by the Scriptures we find him Reſident, and from hence the Church afterwards, becauſe of his not travelling abroad, as the other Apoſtles did, according to the language of their own times, they fixed the title of Biſhop upon him. But greater difference we ſhall find in thoſe who are pleaded to be ſucceſſors of the Apoſtles. At Antioch ſome, as Origen and Euſebius, make Ignatius to ſucceed Peter; Jerome makes him the third Biſhop, and placeth Evodius before him; others therefore to ſolve that, make them cotemporary Biſhops, the one of the Church of the Jews, the other of the Gentiles; with what congruity to their Hypotheſis of a ſingle Biſhop and Deacons placed in every City, I know not, but that Salvo hath been diſcuſſed before. Come we therefore to Rome, and here the ſucceſſion is as muddy as the Tiber it ſelf; for here Tertullian, Ruſinus, and ſeveral others, place Clement next to Peter. Irenæus and Euſebius, ſet Anacletus before him: Epiphanius and Optatus both Anacletus and Cletus; Auguſtinus and Damaſus, with others, make Anacletus, Cletus, and Linus all to precede him. What way ſhall we find to extricate our ſelves out of this Labyrinth, ſo as to reconcile it with the certainty of the form of Government in the Apoſtles times? Certainly, if the Line of ſucceſſion fail us here, when we moſt need it, we have little cauſe to pin our faith upon it, as to the certainty of any particular form of Church-Government ſetled in the Apoſtles times, which can be drawn from the help of the Records of the primitive Church; which muſt be firſt cleared of all Defectiveneſs, Ambiguity, Partiality and Confuſion; before the thing we enquire for, can be extracted out of them.

§. 19. Having thus far ſhewed that we have no abſolute certainty of what form of Government was ſetled by the Apoſtles in the ſeveral Churches of their plantation: The next Conſideration which follows to be ſpoken to, is, That the Apoſtles, in probability, did not obſerve any one fixed courſe of ſetling the Government of Churches, but ſetled it according to the ſeveral circumſtances of places and perſons which they had to deal with. This will be ex abundanti as to the thing by me deſigned, which would be ſufficiently cleared without this; and therefore I lay it not as the foundation of my Theſis, but only as a doctrine of probability, which may ſerve to reconcile the Controverſies on foot about Church-Government. For if this be made appear, then it may be both granted that the Apoſtles did ſettle the Government in the Church in a College of Preſbyters, and in a Biſhop and Deacons too, according to the diverſity of places, and the variety of circumſtances. It is eaſie to obſerve, that as to rites and cuſtoms in the Church, the original of moſt mens miſtakes is, concluding that to be the general practice of the Church, which they meet with in ſome places, whereas that is moſt true which Firmilian tells us, In plurimis provinciis, multa pro locorum & nominum (l. hominum) diverſitate, variantur; nec tamen propter hoc Eccleſiæ Catholicæ pace atque unitate diſceſſum eſt. Thoſe rites varied in divers places, retaining ſtill the Unity of the Faith. So as to matter of Government, mens miſtakes do ariſe from an univerſal concluſion deduced out of particular premiſes; and what they think was done in one place, they conclude muſt be done in all: Whereas theſe are the grounds inducing me probably to conclude, that they obſerved not the ſame courſe in all places. Which when an impartial Reader hath ſoberly conſidered, (with what hath gone before) I am in hopes, the Novelty of this opinion may not prejudicate its entertainment with him. My grounds are theſe, Firſt, From the different ſtate, condition and quantity of the Churches planted by the Apoſtles. Secondly, From the multitude of unfixed officers in the Church then, which acted with authority over the Church where they were reſident. Thirdly, From the different cuſtoms obſerved in ſeveral Churches, as to their Government, after the Apoſtles deceaſe. I begin with the Firſt, The different ſtate, condition and quantity of the Churches planted by the Apoſtles: For which we are to conſider theſe things; Firſt, That God did not give the Apoſtles alike ſucceſs of their labours in all places. Secondly, That a ſmall number of believers did not require the ſame number, which a great Church did, to teach and govern them. Thirdly, That the Apoſtles did ſettle Church-Officers according to the probability of increaſe of believers, and in order thereto, in ſome great places. Firſt, That God did not give the Apoſtles equal ſucceſs to their labours in all places. After God called them to be Fiſhers of men, it was not every draught which filled their net with whole ſhoals of fiſhes; ſometimes they might toil all night ſtill and catch nothing, or very little. It was not every Sermon of Peter's which converted three thouſand; the whole world might at that rate ſoon have become Chriſtian, although there had been but few Preachers beſides the Apoſtles. God gave them ſtrange ſucceſs at firſt, to encourage them the better to meet with difficulties afterwards: In ſome places God told them he had much people, in others, we read but of few that believed. At Corinth Paul plants, and Apollos waters, and God gives an abundant increaſe; but at Athens, (where if moral diſpoſitions had fitted men for grace, and the improvements of nature, we might have expected the greateſt number of Converts) yet here we read of many mocking, and others delaying, Acts17.34. and but of very few believing: Dionyſius and Damaris, and ſome others with them. The plantations of the Apoſtles were very different, not from the nature of the ſoil they had to deal with, but from the different influence of the Divine Spirit upon their endeavours in ſeveral pla-

Rom.16.2. ces. We cannot think that the Church at Cenchrea, (for ſo it is called) was as well ſtockt with believers as that at Corinth. Nay the Churches generally in the Apoſtles times were not ſo filled with numbers, as men are apt to imagine them to be. I can as ſoon hope to find in the Apoſtolical times Dioceſan Churches, as Claſſical and Provincial; yet this doth Par. 1. c. 6. not much advantage the Principles of the Congregational men, as I have
§. 8. *p.*129. already demonſtrated. Yet I do not think that all Churches in the Apoſtles times were but one Congregation; but as there was in Cities many Synagogues, ſo there might be many Churches out of thoſe Synagogues, enjoying their former liberties and privileges. And they that will ſhew me where five thouſand Jews, and more, did ordinarily meet in one of their Synagogues for publick worſhip, may gain ſomething upon me, in order to believing the Church of Jeruſalem to be one congregation, and yet not perſuade me, till they have made it appear, that the Chriſtians then had as publick ſolemn ſet meetings as the Jews had; which he that underſtands the ſtate of the Churches at that time, will hardly yield to the belief of. I confeſs, I cannot ſee any rule in Scripture laid down for diſtributing congregations; but this neceſſity would put them upon; and therefore it were needleſs to preſcribe them; and very little, if any reaſon, can I ſee on the other ſide, why, where there were ſo much people as to make diſtinct congregations, they muſt make diſtinct Churches from one another; but of that largely in the next Chapter. All Churches then we ſee were not of an equal extent. The Second premiſal reaſon will grant, viz. that a ſmall Church doth not require the ſame number of Officers to rule it, which a great one did. For the duty of Officers lying in reference to the people, where the people was but few, one conſtant ſetled Officer, with Deacons under him, might with as much eaſe diſcharge the work, as in a numerous Church, the joint help of many Officers was neceſſary to carry it on. The ſame reaſon that tells us that a large flock of ſheep, conſiſting of many thouſands, doth call for many Shepherds to attend them, doth likewiſe tell us that a ſmall flock may be governed with the care of one ſingle Shepherd watching continually over them. The Third premiſal was, that in great Cities the Apoſtles did not only reſpect the preſent guidance of thoſe that were converted, but eſtabliſhed ſuch as might be uſeful for the converting, and bringing in of others to the faith, who were as yet ſtrangers to the Covenant of promiſe, and aliens from the ϖολιτεία, ſociety of Chriſtians. And here I conceive a miſtake of ſome men lies, when they think the Apoſtles reſpected only the ruling of thoſe which were already converted; for though this were one part of their work, yet they had an eye to the main deſign then on foot, the ſubjecting the world to the obedience of Faith, in order to which it was neceſſary in places of great reſort and extent, to place not only ſuch as might be ſufficient to ſuperintend the affairs of the Church, but ſuch as might lay out themſelves the moſt in preaching the Goſpel, in order to converting others. Having laid down theſe things by way of premiſal, we ſhall ſee what advantage we can make of them, in order to our purpoſe. Firſt, then, I ſay, That in Churches conſiſting of a ſmall number of believers, where there was no great probability of a large increaſe afterwards, one ſingle Paſtor, with Deacons under him, were only conſtituted by the Apoſtles for the ruling of thoſe Churches. Where the work was not ſo great, but a Paſtor and Deacons might do it, what need was there of having more? And in the great ſcarcity of fit perſons for ſettled rulers then, and the great multitude and neceſſity of unfixed Officers for preaching the Goſpel abroad, many perſons fit for that work could not be ſpared to be conſtantly reſident upon a place. Now that in ſome places at firſt there was none placed but only a Paſtor and Deacons, I ſhall confirm by theſe following Teſtimonies. The firſt is that of Clement, in his Epiſtle. Κατὰ χώρας οὖν καὶ πόλεις κηρύσσοντες, καθίστανον τὰς ἀπαρχὰς αὐτῶν, δοκιμάσαντες τῷ πνεύματι, εἰς ἐπισκόπους καὶ διακόνους τῶν μελλόντων πιστεύειν. The Apoſtles therefore preaching abroad through Countries and Cities, ordained the Firſt-fruits of ſuch as believed, having proved them by the ſpirit to be Biſhops and Deacons for them that ſhould afterwards believe. Whether by χώραι we underſtand Villages, or Regions, is not material; for it is certain here the Author takes it as diſtinct from Cities; and there is nothing, I grant, expreſſed where the Apoſtles did place Biſhops and Deacons excluſive of other places, i. e. whether only in Cities or Countries; but it is evident by this, that wherever they planted Churches, they ordained Biſhops and Deacons, whether thoſe Churches were in the City or Country. And here we find no other Officers ſettled in thoſe Churches but Biſhops and Deacons; and that there were no more in thoſe Churches than he ſpeaks of, appears from his deſign of parallelling the Church-Officers in the Goſpel, to thoſe under the Law; and therefore it was here neceſſary to enumerate all that were then in the Churches. The main controverſie is, what theſe Biſhops were; whether many in one place, or only one; and if but one, whether a Biſhop in the modern ſenſe or no. For the firſt, here is nothing implying any neceſſity of having more than one in a place, which will farther be made appear by and by, out of other Teſtimonies, which will help to explain this. As for the other thing, we muſt diſtinguiſh of the notion of a Biſhop: For he is either ſuch a one as hath none over him in the Church; or he is ſuch a one as hath a power over Preſbyters acting under him, and by authority derived from him. If we take it in the firſt ſenſe, ſo every Paſtor of a Church, having none exerciſing juriſdiction over him, is a Biſhop; and ſo every ſuch ſingle Paſtor in the Churches of the primitive times was a Biſhop in this ſenſe, as every Maſter of a Family before Societies for Government were introduced, might be called a King, becauſe he had none above him to command him: But if we take a Biſhop in the more proper ſenſe, for one that hath power over Preſbyters and people, ſuch a one theſe ſingle Paſtors were not, could not be. For it is ſuppoſed that theſe were only ſingle Paſtors; but then it is ſaid, that after other Preſbyters were appointed, then theſe ſingle Paſtors were properly Biſhops? But to that I anſwer, Firſt, They could not be proper Biſhops by vertue of their firſt conſtitution, or then they had no power over any Preſbyters, but only over the Deacons and People; and therefore it would be well worth conſidering how a power of juriſdiction over Preſbyters can be derived from thoſe ſingle Paſtors of Churches that had no Preſbyters joined with them. It muſt be then clearly and evidently proved that it was the Apoſtles intention that theſe ſingle Paſtors ſhould have the power over Preſbyters, when the Church's neceſſity did require their help; which intention muſt be manifeſted and declared by ſome manifeſtation of it as a Law of Chriſt, or nothing can thence be deduced of perpetual concernment to the Church of Chriſt. Secondly. Either they were Biſhops before, or only after the appointment of Preſbyters; if before, then a Biſhop, and a Presbyter having no Biſhop over him, are all one; if after only, then it was by his communicating power to Presbyters to be ſuch, or their choice which made him their Biſhop; if the firſt, then Presbyters, quoad ordinem are only a humane inſtitution, it being acknowledged that no evidence can be brought from Scripture for them; and for any act of the Apoſtles not recorded in Scripture for the conſtituting of them, it muſt go among unwritten Traditions; and if that be a Law ſtill binding the Church, then there are ſuch which occur not in the word of God, and ſo that muſt be an imperfect copy of divine Laws; if he were made Biſhop by an act of the Presbyters, then Presbyters have power to make a Biſhop, and ſo Epiſcopacy is an humane inſtitution, depending upon the voluntary act of Presbyters. But the cleareſt evidence for one ſingle Paſtor with Deacons in ſome Churches at the beginning of Chriſtianity, is that of Epiphanius, which though ſomewhat large, I ſhall recite, becauſe, if I miſtake not, the curtailing of this Teſtimony, hath made it ſpeak otherwiſe than ever Epiphanius meant. Καὶ οὐκ οἶδεν ὁ τὴν ἀκολουθίαν τῆς ἀληθείας ἀγνοήσας, καὶ ἱστορίας βαθυτάταις μὴ ἐντυχών, ὅτι νέου ὄντος κηρύγματος, πρὸς τὰ ὑποπίπτοντα ἔγραφεν ὁ ἅγιος ἀπόστολος· ὅπου μὲν ἦσαν ἐπίσκοποι ἤδη κατασταθέντες, ἔγραφεν ἐπισκόποις καὶ διακόνοις· οὐ γὰρ πάντα εὐθὺς ἐδυνήθησαν οἱ ἀπόστολοι καταστῆσαι. πρεσβυτέρων γὰρ ἐγίνετο χρεία καὶ διακόνων· διὰ γὰρ τῶν δύο τούτων τὰ ἐκκλησιαστικὰ δύναται πληροῦσθαι· ὅπου δὲ οὐκ εὑρέθη τις ἄξιος ἐπισκοπῆς, ἔμεινεν ὁ τόπος χωρὶς ἐπισκόπου· ὅπου δὲ γέγονε χρεία καὶ ἦσαν ἄξιοι ἐπισκοπῆς, κατεστάθησαν ἐπίσκοποι· πλήθους δὲ μὴ ὄντος, οὐχ εὑρέθησαν ἐν αὐτοῖς πρεσβύτεροι κατασταθῆναι, καὶ ἠρκέσθησαν ἐπὶ τῶν κατὰ τόπων μόνῳ ἐπισκόπῳ· ἄνευ δὲ διακόνου ἐπίσκοπον ἀδύνατον εἶναι, &c. The ſenſe of Epiphanius is very intricate and obſcure; we ſhall endeavour to explain it: He is giving Aerius an account why Paul in his Epiſtle to Timothy mentions only Biſhops and Deacons, and paſſeth over Presbyters. His account is this, firſt he chargeth Aerius with ignorance of the ſeries of hiſtory, (which he calls ἀκολουθία τῆς ἀληθείας and the profound and ancient records of the Church, wherein it is expreſſed that upon the firſt preaching the Goſpel, the Apoſtle writ according to the preſent ſtate of things. Where Biſhops were not yet appointed, (for ſo certainly it ſhould be read ὅπου μὴ ἦσαν ἐπίσκοποι, not ὅπου μὲν, for then he muſt contradict himſelf? the Apoſtle writes to Biſhops and Deacons; (for the Apoſtles could not ſettle all things at firſt) for there was a neceſſity of Preſbyters, and Deacons; for by theſe two orders all Eccleſiaſtical offices might be performed; for where (ſo I read it ὅπου γὰρ, not ὅπου δὲ, as the ſenſe clearly carries it) there was not found any worthy of being a Biſhop, the place remained without one: But where neceſſity required one, and there were ſome found fit for that Office, there ſome were ordained Biſhops; but for want of convenient number, there could be no Preſbyters found out to be ordained, and

and in ſuch places they were contented with the Biſhop and Deacons; for without their miniſtry the Biſhop could not be. So that according to Epiphanius, there were three ſeveral ſtates of Churches in the Apoſtles times; firſt ſome Churches where there were only Presbyters and Deacons without a Biſhop. For if Epiphanius ſpeaks not at firſt of places where Presbyters were without a Biſhop, he muſt be guilty of a vain and empty Tautology, for he after tells us where the neceſſity of the Church required it; a Biſhop was made; therefore he ſpeaks of places only where Presbyters and Deacons were; and otherwiſe he would not anſwer Aerius about 1 Tim. 4. 14. which it is his deſign to do, about The laying on of the hands of the Presbytery; he grants then that at firſt in ſome places there were only Presbyters and Deacons, as when the Apoſtle writes to Biſhops and Deacons (where Biſhops at that time of the Church were only Presbyters) of which two orders, Presbyters and Deacons, there was an abſolute neceſſity; and the account he gives why they ſetled no higher orders above them is, οὐ γὰρ πάντα εὐθὺς ἠδυνήθησαν οἱ ἀπόστολοι καταστῆσαι, The Apoſtles could not ſettle all things at firſt; which words are to be read with a Parenthesis, giving an account why ſometimes only Biſhops and Deacons were ſettled, that is, Presbyters ſo called. But, ſaith he, where neceſſity called for a higher order of Biſhops above Presbyters, and any were found qualified for it, there ſuch were appointed; and if by reaſon of the want of Perſons of ſufficient abilities to be made Presbyters in thoſe places, there they were contented with ſuch a ſuperiour Biſhop and Deacons aſſiſting of him; Some Churches then according to his judgment, had a Company of Presbyters to rule them being aſſiſted with Deacons; others had only a ſingle Biſhop with Deacons, and after when the numbers were increaſed, and perſons qualified were found, there were both Biſhop, Presbyters and Deacons. For the account which he gives of the former want of ſome officers in ſome Churches, is this, οὔτω (Read οὔπω, as the learned Dr. well corrects it) τῆς ἐκκλησίας λαβούσης τοῦ πληρώματος τῆς οἰκονομίας, οὕτω κατ' ἐκείνου καιροῦ ἦσαν οἱ τόποι. οὐ γὰρ ἕκαστον πρᾶγμα ἐκ ἀπ' ἀρχῆς τὸ πάντα ἔσχεν, ἀλλὰ προβαίνοντος τοῦ χρόνου τὰ πρὸς τελείωσιν τῶν χρειῶν κατηρτίζετο. For the Church not yet having all her offices filled, things were fain to remain in that ſtate. For nothing can be compleated at firſt, but in proceſs of time every thing receives its due perfection. So that Epiphanius doth not (as it is thought by ſome) ſay, that in the firſt times of the Church, there were none but Biſhops and Deacons in all Churches, but in ſome Churches there were Presbyters and Deacons, in others Biſhops and Deacons, according to the ſtate, condition and neceſſity of the Churches. Epiphanius then fully and clearly expreſſeth my opinion in reference to the Apoſtles not obſerving any one conſtant courſe in all Churches, but letting ſometimes many Presbyters with Deacons, ſometimes only one Paſtor (who is therefore called a Biſhop) with Deacons, and ſo ſetling officers according to the particular occaſions of every Church. The next conſiderable teſtimony to our purpoſe is that of Clemens Alexandrinus in Euſebius concerning St. John after his return out of the Iſle of Patmos to Epheſus, upon the death of Domitian. Ἀπῄει παρακαλούμενος καὶ ἐπὶ τὰ πλησιόχωρα τῶν ἐθνῶν, ὅπου μὲν Ἐπισκόπους καταστήσων, ὅπου δὲ ὅλας ἐκκλησίας ἁρμόσων, ὅπου δὲ γε κλῆρον ἕνα τινα τῶν ὑπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος σημαινομένων κληρώσων. He went abroad upon invitation into the neighbour provinces, in ſome places conſtituting Biſhops, in ſome ſetting in order whole Churches, in o- thers chooſing out one from among the reſt of thoſe who were deſigned by the ſpirit of God, whom he ſet over the Church. So Salmaſius contends it muſt be tranſlated, κλῆρον ἕνα τίνα κληρώσων, chooſing one into the Clergy; for thoſe who were choſen Biſhops are ſaid κληρωθεὶς ἐπισκοπὴν and they that chooſe are ſaid κληρῶσαι. Whence Salmaſius gathers out of theſe words the very thing I am now upon. In majoribus urbibus plures, in minoribus pauciores Preſbyteros ordinari ſolitos probabile eſt; In pagis autem aut vicis, vel puſillis oppidis, quales κώμας vel κωμοπόλεις vocabant Græci, unum aliquem Preſbyterum per illa præcipuè tempora quibus non magnus erat numerus fidelium, ſuffeciſſe veriſimile eſt. That the Apoſtles ſet a greater number of Preſbyters in great Cities, fewer in leſs, and in ſmall villages but one, when the number of believers was but ſmall. We have yet one Author more who ſpeaks fully to our purpoſe. It is the Author of the Commentaries under Ambroſe his name, who frequently aſſerts this opinion I am now making good. Upon the fourth of Epheſians he largely diſcourſeth how things were ſettled at firſt, by the Apoſtles, by degrees, in the Church of God, evidently ſhewing that the Apoſtles did not at firſt obſerve any ſettled conſtant courſe, but acted according to the preſent conveniency, as they ſaw good, in order to the promoting and advancing the Churches intereſt. Poſtquam omnibus locis Eccleſiæ ſunt conſtitutæ, & officia ordinata, aliter compoſita res eſt quam cæperat. Thereby declaring his opinion that while Churches were conſtituting, no certain courſe was obſerved. For as he goes on, Primum enim omnes docebant, & omnes baptizabant, quibuſcunque diebus vel temporibus fuiſſet occaſio, &c. Ut ergo creſceret plebs & multiplicaretur, Omnibus inter initia conceſſum eſt & evangelizare, & baptizare, & ſcripturas in Eccleſia explanare. At ubi omnia loca circumplexa eſt Eccleſia, conventicula conſtituta ſunt, & rectores & cætera officia in Eccleſiis ſunt ordinata; ut nullus de Clero auderet qui ordinatus non eſſet, præſumere officium quod ſciret non ſibi creditum vel conceſſum; & cæpit alio ordine & providentiâ gubernari Eccleſia; quia ſi omnes eadem poſſent, irrationabile eſſet, & vulgaris res, & viliſſima videretur, &c. Ideò non per omnia conveniunt ſcripta Apoſtoli ordinationi quæ nunc eſt in Eccleſia, quia hæc inter primordia ſunt ſcripta; Nam & Timotheum, (Preſbyterum à ſe creatum) Epiſcopum vocat; quia primum Preſbyteri Epiſcopi appellabantur, ut recedente uno ſequens ei ſuccederet, &c. At firſt he ſaith, all Church Offices lay open to all perſons, and every one did preach and baptize upon all occaſions; but afterwards when Congregations were eſtabliſhed and Churches ſetled, then none undertook that office but thoſe that were ordained to it. Thence it is that the Apoſtles writings are not ſuitable to the preſent ſtate of the Church, becauſe they were penned in the time when things were not fully ſetled. For he calls Timothy, who was made a Preſbyter by him, Biſhop; for ſo at firſt the Preſbyters were called, among whom this was the courſe of governing Churches, that as one withdrew, another took his place. This opinion of his he takes occaſion to ſpeak of him in ſeveral other places. Upon Rom. 16. Adhuc rectores Eccleſiæ paucis erant in locis, Governours of Churches were as yet ſet up but in few places. And upon 1 Cor 1. Proptereà Eccleſiæ ſcribit, quia adhuc ſingulis Eccleſiis rectores non erant inſtituti. And on 1 Cor. 11. Convenientibus Presbyteris, quia adhuc rectores Eccleſiis non omnibus locis erant conſtituti. By all which it is moſt evident, that this both learned and ancient Author, cited with no ſmall reſpect by St. Auſtin, doth not conceive that the Apoſtles did obſerve any ſetled form in the governing

Churches, but acted according to principles of prudence, according to the neceſſities and occaſions of the ſeveral Churches by them planted: So that where there were ſmall Churches, one Paſtor with Deacons might ſuffice: in greater Churches ſome were governed by Preſbyters acting in Common Council: others, though very few at firſt, had Rectors placed over them, for ſuperintending the Affairs of the Church.

Secondly, In Churches conſiſting of a multitude of believers, or where there was a probability of great increaſe by preaching the Goſpel, the Apoſtles did ſettle a College of Preſbyters whoſe office was partly to govern the Church already formed, and partly to labour in the converting more. So that in all great Cities where either the work was already great, by the number of believers, in order to the diſcharging of Paſtoral duties to them; or where it was great in reference to the number they laboured in converting of, it ſeems moſt conſonant to reaſon and Scripture, that the work ſhould be carried on by the joynt aſſiſtance of many aſſociated in the ſame work. For, is it any ways probable that the Apoſtle ſhould ordain Biſhops τῶν μελλόντων πιστεύειν, as Clement ſpeaks, of ſuch as ſhould believe, and not ordain perſons in order to the making them believe? They have either a very low opinion of the work of a Goſpel Biſhop, or very little conſideration of the zeal, activity and diligence which was then uſed in preaching, reproving, exhorting, in ſeaſon, out of ſeaſon, that think one ſingle perſon was able to undergo it all. Diſcipline was a great deal more ſtrict then, preaching more diligent, men more apprehenſive of the weight of their function, than for any to undertake ſuch a care and charge of Souls, that it was impoſſible for them, ever to know, obſerve, or watch over, ſo as to give an account for them. Beſides, while we ſuppoſe this one perſon imployed in the duties of his flock, what leiſure or time could ſuch a one have to preach to the Gentiles and unbelieving Jews in order to their Converſion? The Apoſtles did not certainly aim at the ſetting up the honour of any one perſon, making the office of the Church a matter of State and Dignity more than imployment, but they choſe men for their activity in preaching the Goſpel, and for their uſefulneſs in labouring to add continually to the Church. Men that were imployed in the Church then, did not conſult for their eaſe or honour, and thought it not enough for them to ſit ſtill and bid others work; but they were of Paul's mind, Neceſſity was laid upon them, yea, Woe was unto them if they preached not the Goſpel. 1 Cor.9.16. Publick prayers were not then looked on as the more principal end of Chriſtian Aſſemblies than preaching, nor conſequently that it was the more principal office of the Stewards of the myſteries of God, to read the publick prayers of the Church, than to preach in ſeaſon and out of ſeaſon. And is it not great pity two ſuch excellent and neceſſary duties ſhould ever be ſet at variance, much leſs one ſo preferred before the other, that the one muſt be eſteem'd as Sarah, and the other almoſt undergo the hardſhip of Hagar, to be looked on as the Bond-woman of the Synagogue, and be turned out of doors? Praying and preaching are the Jachin and Boaz of the Temple, like Rachel and Leah, both which built up the houſe of Iſrael: but though Rachel be fair and beautiful, yet Leah is the more fruitful: though prayer be lovely and amiable in the ſight of God, when it comes from a heart ſeriouſly affected with what it ſpeaks, yet preaching tends more to the turning mens ſouls from ſin unto God. Were the Apoſtles commiſſioned by Chriſt to go pray or preach? and what is it wherein the Miniſters of the Goſpel ſucceeded the Apoſtles? is it in the office of praying, or preaching? Was Paul ſent not to baptize but to preach the Goſpel? and ſhall we think thoſe who ſucceed Paul in his office of preaching, are to look upon any thing elſe as more their work than that? Are Miniſters in their ordination ſent forth to be readers of publick prayers, or to be Diſpenſers of God's holy word? Are they ordained wholly to this, and ſhall this be the leſs principal part of their work? I, but the reaſon is unanſwerable, that praying is the more principal end of Chriſtian Aſſemblies than preaching; For the one is the end, and the other the means. If by end be meant the ultimate end of all Chriſtian duties, that cannot be prayer: for that is a means it ſelf in order to that; but the chief end is the fitting ſouls for eternal praiſes; if then this unanſwerable reaſon hold good, the principal end of Chriſtian Aſſemblies muſt be only praiſes of God, and not prayers; if by the end be meant the immediate end of preaching as that it refers to, that cannot be; for the immediate end of preaching, if the Apoſtle may be judge, is inſtruction and edification in the faith; Rather preaching is the end of praying, in as much as the bleſſings conveyed by preaching are the things which men pray for. But this is but one of thoſe unhappy conſequences which follows mens judging of the ſervice of God rather by the practices of the Church, when it came to enjoy eaſe and plenty, than by the ways and practices of the firſt and pureſt Apoſtolical times: when the Apoſtles who were beſt able to judge of their own duty, looked upon themſelves as moſt concerned in the preaching of the Goſpel. But to this it is commonly ſaid that there was great reaſon for it then, becauſe the world was to be converted to Chriſtianity, and therefore preaching was the more neceſſary work at that time; but when a Nation is converted to the faith, that neceſſity ceaſeth. It is granted that the preaching of the Goſpel, in regard of its univerſal extent was more neceſſary then, which was the foundation of Chriſt's inſtituting the Apoſtolical office with an unlimited Commiſſion: but if we take preaching as referring to particular Congregations, there is the ſame neceſſity now that there was then. People need as much inſtruction as ever, and ſo much the more in that they are apt to think now the name of Chriſtians will carry them to heaven. It is a too common and very dangerous deceit of men to look upon Religion more as a profeſſion, than matter of Life, more as a Notion than an inward temper. Men muſt be beat off from more things which they are apt to truſt to for Salvation now, than in thoſe times: Men could not think ſo much then, that diligence in publick Aſſemblies, and attendance at publick prayers was the main of Religion. Few would profeſs Chriſtianity in thoſe times, but ſuch as were reſolved before-hand rather to let go their lives than their profeſſion; but the more profeſs it now, without underſtanding the terms of ſalvation by it; the greater neceſſity of preaching to inſtruct men in it. But I think more need not be ſaid of this to thoſe that know it is another thing to be a Chriſtian than to be called ſo. But however it is granted, that in the Apoſtles times preaching was the great work; and if ſo, how can we think one ſingle perſon in a great City was ſufficient, both to preach to, and rule the Church, and to preach abroad in order to the converſion of more from their Gentiliſm to Chriſtianity? Eſpecially if the Church of every City was ſo large as ſome would make it, viz. to comprehend all the believers under the civil juriſdiction of the City, and ſo both City and Country the only charge of one ſingle Biſhop. I think the vaſtneſs of the work, and the Impoſſibility of a right diſcharge of it by one ſingle perſon, may be argument enough to make us interpret the places of Scripture which may be underſtood in that ſenſe, as of more than one Paſtor in every City; as when the Apoſtles are ſaid to ordain Elders in every City, and Paul's calling for the Elders from Epheſus, and his writing to the Biſhops and Deacons of the Church of Philippi; this conſideration, I ſay, granting that the texts may be otherwiſe underſtood, will be enough to incline men to think that in greater Cities there was a Society of Preſbyters acting together for the carrying on the work of the Goſpel, in converting ſome to, and building up of others in the faith of Chriſt. And it ſeems not in the leaſt manner probable to me that the care of thoſe great Churches ſhould at firſt be intruſted in the hands of one ſingle Paſtor and Deacon, and afterwards a new order of Preſbyters erected under them, without any order or rule laid down in Scripture for it, or any mention in Eccleſiaſtical writers of any ſuch after Inſtitution. But inſtead of that in the moſt populous Churches we have many remaining footſteps of ſuch a College of Preſbyters there eſtabliſhed in Apoſtolical times. Thence Ignatius ſays the Preſbyters are ὡς συνέδριον θεοῦ ϗ ὡς σύνδεσμος Ἀποςόλων the Sanhedrin of the Church appointed by God; and the Bench of Apoſtles ſitting together for ruling the affairs of the Church. And Origen calls it σύςημα ἐν ἑκάςῃ πόλει κτισθὲν λόγῳ θεοῦ, a College in every City of God's appointing; and Victor Biſhop of Rome, Collegium noſtrum, and Collegium fratrum; Pius, Pauperem Senatum Chriſti apud Romam conſtitutum. Tertullian, Probatos ſeniores; Cyprian, Cleri noſtri ſacrum venerandumque Conſeſſum; and to Cornelius Biſhop of Rome and his Clergy, Florentiſſimo Clero tecum præſidenti; Jerome, Senatum noſtrum, cœtum Preſbyterorum, & commune conſilium Preſbyterorum quo Eccleſiæ gubernabantur; Hilary, Seniores ſine quorum conſilio nihil agebatur in Eccleſia; the Author de ſeptem ordinibus ad Ruſticum, calls the Preſbyters nogotiorum judices. Eutychius tells us there were twelve Preſbyters at Alexandria to govern the Church; and the author of the Itinerary of Peter, of as many conſtituted at Cæſarea, who though counterfeit, muſt be allowed to ſpeak, though not vera, yet veri ſimilia; though not true, yet likely things. Is it poſſible all theſe authors ſhould thus ſpeak of their ſeveral places, of a College of Preſbyters acting in power with the Biſhop, if at firſt Churches were governed only by a ſingle Biſhop, and afterwards by ſubject Preſbyters that had nothing to do in the rule of the Church; but were only deputed to ſome particular offices under him, which they were impowered to do only by his authority? But the joynt rule of Biſhop and Preſbyters in the Churches will be more largely deduced afterwards. Thus we ſee a Company of Preſbyters ſetled in great Churches; now we are not to imagine that all theſe did equally attend to one part of their work, but all of them according to their ſeveral abilities laid out themſelves; ſome in overſeeing and guiding the Church; but yet ſo as upon occaſion to diſcharge all paſtoral acts belonging to their function; others betook themſelves chiefly to the converſion of others to the faith, either in the Cities or the adjacent Countries. By which we come to a full, clear and eaſie underſtanding of that ſo much controverted place, 1 Tim. 5. 17. Οἱ καλῶς προεςῶτες πρεσβύτεροι διπλῆς τιμῆς ἀξιούσθωσαν, μάλιςα οἱ κοπιῶντες ἐν λόγῳ ϗ διδασκαλίᾳ, The Elders that rule well are counted worthy of double honour, eſpecially they that labour in the word and doctrine. Not as though it implied a diſtinct ſort of Elders from the Paſtors of Churches, but among thoſe Elders that were ordained in the great Churches, ſome attended moſt to ruling the flock already converted, others laboured moſt in converting others to the faith by preaching; though both theſe being entered into this peculiar function of laying themſelves forth for the benefit of the Church, did deſerve both reſpect and maintenance; yet eſpecially thoſe who imployed themſelves in converting others, in as much as their burden was greater, their labours more abundant, their ſuffering more; and their very office coming the neareſt to the Apoſtolical function. So Chryſoſtome reſolves it upon the fourth of the Epheſians, that thoſe who were κατὰ κώμας καὶ πόλεις ἀφωρισμένοι, as Theodoret expreſſeth it, the ποιμένες καὶ διδάσκαλοι, the fixed officers of particular Churches were inferior to thoſe who went abroad preaching the Goſpel; καὶ πάνυ, ſaith he, τῶν περιιόντων καὶ ἐυαγγελιζομένων οἱ καθήμενοι καὶ περὶ ἕνα τόπον ἠσχολημένοι. An evident argument that the Apoſtle doth not intend any ſort of Elders diſtinct from theſe ordained Preſbyters of the Cities, is from that very argument which the greateſt friends to Lay-Elders draw out of this Epiſtle, which is from the promiſcuous acception of the words πρεσβύτερος and ἐπίσκοπος in this very Epiſtle to Timothy: The argument runs thus: The Preſbyters ſpoken of by Paul in his Epiſtle to Timothy, are Scripture-Biſhops; but Lay-Elders are not Scripture-Biſhops; therefore theſe cannot here be meant. The major is their own, from 1 Tim. 3. 1. compared with 4. 14. Thoſe which are called Preſbyters in one place, are Biſhops in another; and the main force of the argument lies in the promiſcuous uſe of Biſhop and Preſbyter; now then if Lay-Elders be not ſuch Biſhops, then they are not Paul's Presbyters; now Paul's Biſhops muſt be διδακτικοὶ fit to teach, and therefore no Lay-Elders. Again we may conſider where Timothy now was, viz. at Epheſus, and therefore if ſuch Lay-Elders any-where, they ſhould be there; Let us ſee then whether any ſuch were here. It is earneſtly pleaded by all who are for Lay-Elders, that the Elders ſpoken of Acts 20. 17. were the particular Elders of the Church of Epheſus, to whom Paul ſpoke, v. 28. where we find their office at large deſcribed. Take heed therefore unto your ſelves, and all the flock over which God hath made you ἐπισκόπους Biſhops or overſeers. Here both we ſee the names Elders and Biſhops confounded again, ſo that he that was an Elder was a Biſhop too; and the office of ſuch Elders deſcribed to be a Paſtoral charge over a flock, which is inconſiſtent with the notion of a Lay-Elder. Paul ſent indefinitely for the Elders of the Church to come to him; if any ſuch then at Epheſus, they muſt come at this ſummons; all the Elders that came were ſuch as were Paſtors of Churches; therefore there could be no Lay-Elders there. I inſiſt not on the argument for maintenance implyed in double honour, which Chryſoſtome explains by τὴν τῶν ἀναγκαίων χορηγίαν a ſupply of neceſſaries to be given to them, as appears by v. 18. which argument Blondel ſaw ſuch ſtrength in, that it brought him quite off from Lay-Elders in that place of Timothy. And he that will remove the controverſy from the Scriptures, to the Primitive Church, (as we have no reaſon to think that if ſuch were appointed, they ſhould be ſo ſoon laid aſide) will find it the greateſt difficulty to trace the footſteps of a Lay-Elder, through the records of antiquity for the three firſt centuries eſpecially. The writers of the Church ſpeak of no Preſbyters but ſuch as preached, as appears by Origen, Cyprian and Clement of Alexandria; Origen ſaith, Omnes Epiſcopi atque omnes Preſbyteri vel Diaconi erudiunt nos, & erudientes adhibent correptionem, & verbis auſterioribus increpant. We ſee all Biſhops, Presbyters, and Dea-

Deacons were in his time preachers. So Cyprian, Et crediderам quidem Preſbyteros & Diaconos qui illic præſentes ſunt, monere vos & inſtruere pleniſſime circa Evangelii legem, ſicut ſemper ab anteceſſoribus noſtris factum eſt; and in another Epiſtle about making Numidicus a Presbyter, he thus expreſſeth it, ut aſcribatur Preſbyterorum Carthaginenſium numero, & nobiſcum ſedeat in Clero; where to ſit as one of the Clergy, and to be a Presbyter, are all one. Again, had there been any ſuch Elders, it would have belonged to them to lay hands on thoſe that were reconciled to the Church after Cenſures; now hands were only laid on ab Epiſcopo & Clero, as the ſame Cyprian tells us. Clemens Alexandrinus deſcribing the Office of a Presbyter, hath theſe words, οὗτος πρεσβύτερος ἐστι τῷ ὄντι τῆς ἐκκλησίας, &c. ἐὰν ποιῇ καὶ διδάσκῃ τὰ τοῦ κυρίου, where teaching is looked on as his proper work; and elſewhere more fully and expreſly, diſcourſing of the ſervice of God, and diſtinguiſhing it according to the twofold ſervice of men, βελτιωτικὴ καὶ ὑπηρετικὴ, he applies theſe to the Church, ὁμοίως δὲ καὶ κατὰ τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τὴν μὲν βελτιωτικὴν οἱ πρεσβύτεροι σώζουσιν εἰκόνα τὴν ὑπηρετικὴν δὲ οἱ διάκονοι. The former he explains afterwards, ὅπως ἂν καὶ παιδεύειν ἢ τεταγμένος εἰς τὴν τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἐπανόρθωσιν. A Preſbyter is one that is ordained or appointed for the inſtruction of others in order to their amendment, implying thereby the Office of a Presbyter to be wholly converſant about teaching others, to whom, on that account, the art of making others better doth properly belong. So much may ſuffice for thoſe firſt times of the Church, that there were no Presbyters then, but ſuch as had the Office of teaching. And for the times afterwards of the Church, let it ſuffice at preſent to produce the teſtimony of a Council held in the beginning of the ſeventh Century, who abſolutely decree againſt all Lay-perſons medling in Church-affairs; Nona actione didicimus, quoſdam ex noſtro Collegio contra mores Eccleſiaſticos, laicos habere in rebus divinis conſtitutos Œconomos. Proinde pariter tractantes eligimus ut unuſquiſque noſtrum ſecundum Chalcedonenſium Patrum decreta, ex proprio Clero Œconomum ſibi conſtituat. Indecorum eſt enim Laicum eſſe vicarium Epiſcopi, & ſeculares in Eccleſia judicare; in uno enim eodemq; officio non debet eſſe diſpar profeſſio. A Canon directly level'd againſt all Lay-Chancellors in Biſhops-Courts, and ſuch Officials: But doth with the ſame force take away all Lay-Elders, as implying it to be wholly againſt the rule of the Church to have ſecular perſons to judge in the Church. But although I ſuppoſe this may be ſufficient to manifeſt the no divine right of Lay-Elders; yet I do not therefore abſolutely condemn all uſe of ſome perſons choſen by the people to be as their repreſentatives, for managing their intereſt in the affairs of the Church. For now the voice of the people, (which was uſed in the primitive times) is grown out of uſe: Such a conſtitution, whereby two or more of the people's choice might be preſent at Church debates, might be very uſeful; ſo they be looked upon only as a prudential humane conſtitution, and not as any thing founded on Divine right. So much may ſerve for the firſt ground of the probability of the Apoſtles not obſerving one ſetled form of Church-Government, which was from the different ſtate, quantity and condition of the Churches by them planted. The ſecond was from the multitude of unfixed Officers reſiding in ſome places, who managed the affairs of the Church in chief during their Reſidence. Such were the Apoſtles and Evangeliſts and all perſons almoſt of note in Scripture. They were but very few, and thoſe in probability not the ableſt, who were left at home to take care of the ſpoil;

the ſtrongeſt and ableſt like Commanders in an Army, were not ſetled in any Troop, but went up and down from this company to that, to order them, and draw them forth: and while they were, they had the chief authority among them; but as Commmanders of the Army, and not as Officers of the Troop. Such were Evangeliſts who were ſent ſometimes into this Country to put the Churches in order there, ſometimes into another; but where ever they were, they acted as Evangeliſts, and not as fixed Officers. And ſuch were Timothy and Titus, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition made againſt it, as will appear to any that will take an impartial ſurvey of the arguments on both ſides. Now where there were in ſome places Evangeliſts, in others not; and in many Churches it may be no other Officers but theſe, it will appear, that the Apoſtles did not obſerve one conſtant form, but were with the Evangeliſts, travelling abroad to the Churches, and ordering things in them as they ſaw cauſe. But as to this I have anticipated my ſelf already. The laſt ground was from the different cuſtom obſerved in the Churches, after the Apoſtles times. For no other rational account can be given of the different opinions of Epiphanius, Jerome and Hilary, but this, that one ſpeaks of the cuſtom of ſome Churches, and the other of others. In ſome, as at Alexandria, the Presbyters might chuſe their Biſhop; in other places it might be as Hilary ſaith, that when the firſt withdrew, another ſucceeded him. Not by a monthly or annual rotation of Preſidents, as ſome have imagined, but by a preſidency for Life of one, upon whoſe death another ſucceeded in his room. For the former opinion hath not any evidence at all for it in Scripture or Antiquity, or in the place brought to prove it. For according to this opinion, Timothy muſt have but his courſe in the rotation of Elders at Epheſus, which ſeems very incongruous to the Office of Timothy. I conclude then, that in all probability the Apoſtles tied not themſelves up to one certain courſe, but in ſome Churches ſetled more or fewer Officers, as they ſaw cauſe, and in others governed themſelves during Life; and that at their death they did not determine any form, is probably argued from the different cuſtoms of ſeveral Churches afterwards.

§. 20. The third Conſideration touching Apoſtolical practice, is concerning the obligatory force of it in reference to us; which I lay down in theſe terms, That a mere Apoſtolical practice being ſuppoſed, is not ſufficient of it ſelf for the founding an unalterable and perpetual right, for that form of Government in the Church, which is ſuppoſed to be founded on that practice. This is a propoſition, I am ſure, will not be yielded without proving it, and therefore I ſhall endeavour to do it by a fourfold argument. Firſt, Becauſe many things were done by the Apoſtles without any intention of obliging any who ſucceed them afterwards to do the ſame: As for inſtance, the twelve Apoſtles going abroad ſo unprovided as they did when Chriſt ſent them forth at firſt, which would argue no great wiſdom or reaſon in that man, that ſhould draw that practice into conſequence now. Of the like nature was Paul's preaching ἀδάπανον εὐαγγέλιον to ſome Churches, receiving no maintenance at all from ſome Churches, as that at Corinth. Which inſtance is a manifeſt evidence of the monſtrous weakneſs of diſcourſe in thoſe who would make that example of Paul obligatory to all Miniſters of the Goſpel now. And while they would by this argument take away their Lands and Tythes, inſtead of them, they give them Plauſtra convitiorum, whole loads of the moſt reproachful ſpeeches that ever were given to any but Chriſt and his Apoſtles. For my part, I think the Miniſters of the Goſpel would want one of the badges of Honour belonging to their Office, were they not thus reproachfully uſed: It is part of the State which belongs to the true Miniſters of the Goſpel to be followed by ſuch black-mouthed Lacquies, who by their virulent ſpeeches are ſo far their friends, as to keep them from that curſe which our Saviour pronounceth, Woe be unto you when all men ſpeak well of you. But let us ſee how much wooll there is after all this cry; too little to cloath the backs of Miniſters, if ſuch perſons might be their Tythe-men; but it is well they are ſo little be-friended, yea ſo much oppoſed by the great Apoſtle, in that ſingular practice of his. For doth he ſay it was unlawful for him to receive a maintenance from the Churches he preached to? Nay, doth he not ſet himſelf to prove not only the lawfulneſs of Miniſters taking it, but the duty of the peoples giving it, 1 Cor. 9. from the ſeventh to the fifteenth verſe, giving many pregnant arguments to that purpoſe? Doth he not ſay that all the Apoſtles beſides him and Barnabas, did forbear working, and conſequently had all their neceſſities (1 Cor. 9. 6.) ſupplied by the Churches? Nay, doth not Paul himſelf ſay, that he (2 Cor. 11. 8.) robbed other Churches, taking wages of them, to do ſervice to them? What! Paul turned hireling, and in the plaineſt terms take wages of Churches? Yet ſo it is, and his forbearing it at Corinth, was apt to be interpreted as an argument that he did not love them, 2 Cor. 11. 11. So far were they from looking upon Paul as a hireling in doing it. Paul is ſtrong and earneſt in aſſerting his right; he might have done it at Corinth, as well as elſewhere; but from ſome prudent conſiderations of his own, mentioned 2 Cor. 11. 12. he forbore the exerciſe of his right among them, although at the ſame time he received maintenance (2 Cor. 11. 9.) from other places. As for any divine right of a particular way of maintenance, I am of the ſame opinion as to that which I am in reference to particular forms of Church-Government; and thoſe that are of another opinion, I would not wiſh them ſo much injury, as to want their maintenance till they prove it. But then, I ſay, theſe things are clear in themſelves, and, I think, ſufficient grounds for conſcience as to the duty of paying on the one ſide, and the lawfulneſs of receiving it on the other. Firſt, That a maintenance in general be given to Goſpel Miniſters, is of Divine right, elſe the labourer was not worthy of his hire; nor could that be true which Paul ſaith, that our Lord hath ordained, (1 Cor. 9. 14.) that they which preach the Goſpel ſhould live of the Goſpel. Secondly, A maintenance in general being due, lawful Authority may determine the particular way of raiſing it; the equity of which way may be beſt derived from what was the moſt ancient practice of the world in dedicating things to God, and was approved by God himſelf, among his own people the Jews: So that the way of maintenance by Tythes is the moſt juſt and equitable way. Thirdly, It being in the Magiſtrate's power to determine the way of maintenance, what is ſo determined, doth bind the conſciences of all ſubject to that power, to an obedience to it for conſcience ſake: In as much as all men are bound thus to obey the Magiſtrate in all things eſtabliſhed by him as Laws; and the very ſame reaſons any can plead for diſobedience as to this, may equally ſerve for diſobedience to any other Laws made by the ſupreme Magiſtrate. This I ſuppoſe is the cleareſt reſolution of that other more vexed than intricate controverſie about the right of Tythes; which I have here ſpoken of by occaſion of the mention of the Apoſtles practice, and becauſe it is reſolved upon the ſame principles with the ſubject I am upon. Mere Apoſtolical practice we ſee doth not bind, becauſe the Apoſtles did many things without intention of binding others. Secondly, The Apoſtles did many things upon particular occaſions, emergences and circumſtances, which things ſo done, cannot bind by virtue of their doing them, any farther than a parity of reaſon doth conclude the ſame things to be done in the ſame circumſtances. Thus Paul's Cœlibate is far from 1 Cor. 9. 5. binding the Church, it being no univerſal practice of the Apoſtles by a Law, but only a thing taken up by him upon ſome particular grounds, not of perpetual and univerſal concernment. So community of goods was uſed at firſt by the Church of Jeruſalem, as moſt ſuitable to the preſent ſtate of that Church; but as far as we can find, did neither per- 1 Cor. 6. 1. petually hold in that Church, nor univerſally obtain among other Chur- 11. 21, 22. ——16. 2. ches, as is moſt clear in the Church at Corinth by their Law-ſuits, by the different offerings of the rich and poor at the Lord's-Supper, and by their perſonal contributions. So the Apoſtles preaching from houſe to houſe, was for want of conveniency then of more publick places as free only for Chriſtians; although that practice binds now as far as the reaſon doth; viz. in its tendency to the promoting the work of Salvation of mens ſouls. Laying on hands for conferring the gifts of the Holy Ghoſt can never certainly bind where the reaſon of it is ceaſed, but may ſtill continue as a rite of ſolemn prayer, and not by virtue of that practice. Obſerving the Apoſtolical decrees of abſtaining from blood, and things ſtrangled and offered to idols, did hold as long as the ground of making them did, which was condeſcenſion to the Jews, although it muſt be withal acknowledged, that the primitive Chriſtians of the ſe- Exercit. Theol. n. 26. cond and third Centuries did generally obſerve them, and the Greek Curcellæus de eſu ſanguinis, &c. Church to this day, and ſome men of note and learning have pleaded for the neceſſary obſervation of them ſtill, as Chriſt. Beoman, Steph. Curcellæus in a Diatriba lately publiſhed to this purpoſe; to which Grotius in Acts 15. 29. Grotius is likewiſe very inclinable. Their arguments are too large here to examine, although I ſee not how poſſibly that place of Paul 1 Cor. 10. 25. can be avoided, Whatever is ſet in the ſhambles eat, making no ſcruple for conſcience ſake.

Part 1. ch. 1. §. 6. I conclude this with what I laid down at the entrance of this Treatiſe, that where any act or Law is founded upon a particular reaſon or occaſion as the ground of it, it doth no farther oblige, than the reaſon or occaſion of it doth continue. Therefore before an acknowledged Apoſtolical practice be looked on as obligatory, it muſt be made appear, that what they did, was not according as they ſaw reaſon and cauſe for the doing it, depending upon the ſeveral circumſtances of time, place, and perſons, but that they did from ſome unalterable Law of Chriſt, or from ſome ſuch indiſpenſable reaſons, as will equally hold in all times, places, and perſons. And ſo the obligation is taken off from Apoſtolical practice, and laid upon that Law and reaſon which was the ground of it. Thirdly, Offices that were of Apoſtolical appointment, are grown wholly out of uſe in the Church, 1 Tim. 5. 9. without mens looking upon themſelves as bound now to obſerve them. As the Widows of the Churches, afterwards from their Office called Rom. 16. 1. Deaconeſſes of the Church, of which number Phebe was one, whom Paul calls the Deaconeſs of the Church at Cenchrea: ſo both Origen and Chryſoſtome underſtand it. Of them and their continuance in the Church for ſome Centuries of years, much is ſpoken by ſeveral Writers, and reſolved by ſeveral Councils; and yet we ſee theſe are laid aſide by the pretenders to hold cloſe to Apoſtolical practice: If that binds, certainly it doth in its plain inſtitutions; if it doth not bind in them, how can it in that which is only gathered but by uncertain conjectures to have been ever their practice? So that in the iſſue, thoſe who plead ſo much for the obligatory nature of Apoſtolical practice, do not think it obligatory; for if they did, how comes this Office of Widows and Deaconeſſes to be neglected? If it be anſwered, that theſe are not uſeful now; then we muſt ſay, that we look upon Apoſtolical practice to be binding no farther than we judge it uſeful, or the reaſon of it holds, which is as much as to ſay, of its ſelf it binds not. Fourthly, rites and cuſtoms Apoſtolical are altered; therefore men do not think that Apoſtolical practice doth bind. For if it did, there could be no alteration of things agreeable thereunto. Now let any one conſider but theſe few particulars, and judge how far the pleaders for a divine right of Apoſtolical practice do look upon themſelves as bound now to obſerve them; as Dipping in Baptiſm, the uſe of Love-feaſts, Community of Goods, the Holy-kiſs, by * Tertullian called ſignaculum orationis: yet none look upon themſelves as bound to obſerve them now, and yet all acknowledge them to have been the practice of the Apoſtles; and therefore certainly though when it may ſerve for their purpoſe, men will make Apoſtolical practice to found a Divine right, yet when they are gone off from the matter in hand, they change their opinion with the matter, and can then think themſelves free as to the obſervation of things by themſelves acknowledged to be Apoſtolical. Thus we are at laſt come to the end of this Chapter, which we have been the longer upon, becauſe the main hinge of this controverſie did lie in the practice of the Apoſtles, which I ſuppoſe now ſo far cleared, as not to hinder our progreſs towards what remains; which we hope will admit of a quicker diſpatch. We come therefore from the Apoſtles, to the Primitive Church, to ſee whether by the practice of what we can find any thing whereby they looked on themſelves as obliged by an unalterable Law to obſerve any one particular form of Church-Government.

The Church's Polity, in the ages after the Apoſtles, conſidered. Evidences thence, that no certain unalterable form of Church-Government was delivered to them. 1. Becauſe Church power did enlarge as the Churches did. Whether any Metropolitan Churches eſtabliſhed by the Apoſtles. Seven Churches of Aſia, whether Metropolitical; Philippi no Metropolis, either in Civil or Eccleſiaſtical ſenſe. Several degrees of enlargement of Churches. Churches firſt the Chriſtians in whole Cities proved by ſeveral arguments; the Eulogiæ an evidence of it. Churches extended into the neighbour territories by the preaching there of City Preſbyters; thence comes the ſubordination between them. Churches by degrees enlarged to Dioceſes; from thence to Provinces. The original of Metropolitans and Patriarchs. 2. No certain form uſed in all Churches. Some Churches without Biſhops, Scots, Goths. Some with but one Biſhop in their whole Country. Scythian, Æthiopian Churches how governed.

verned. Many Cities without Biſhops. Dioceſes much altered. Biſhops diſcontinued in ſeveral Churches for many years. 3. Conforming Eccleſiaſtical Government to the Civil, in the extent of Dioceſes. The ſuburbicarian Churches what. Biſhops anſwerable to the civil Governours. Churches power riſe from the greatneſs of Cities. 4. *Validity of ordination by Preſbyters in places where Biſhops were. §. 1. HAving largely conſidered the actions of Chriſt, and the practice of the Apoſtles, ſo far as they are conceived to have reference to the determining the certain form of Government in the Church; our next Stage is, according to our propounded method, to examine what light the practice of the Church in the Ages ſucceeding the Apoſtles will caſt upon the controverſy we are upon. For although according to the principles eſtabliſhed and laid down by us, there can be nothing ſetled as an univerſal Law for the Church but what we find in Scriptures; yet becauſe the general practice of the Church is conceived to be of ſo great uſe for underſtanding what the Apoſtles intentions as well as actions were, we ſhall chearfully paſs over this Rubicon, becauſe not with an intent to increaſe diviſions, but to find out ſome farther evidence of a way to compoſe them. Our Inquiry then is whether the primitive Church did conceive its ſelf obliged to obſerve unalterably one individual form of Government, as delivered down to them either by a Law of Chriſt, or an univerſal conſtitution of the Apoſtles; or elſe did only ſettle and order things for Church Government, according as it judged them tend moſt to the peace and ſettlement of the Church, without any antecedent obligation, as neceſſarily binding to obſerve only one courſe. This latter I ſhall endeavour to make out to have been the only Rule and Law which the Primitive Church obſerved as to Church-Government, viz. the tendency of its conſtitutions to the peace and unity of the Church; and not any binding Law or practice of Chriſt or his Apoſtles. For the demonſtrating of which I have made choice of ſuch arguments as moſt immediately tend to the proving of it. For if the power of the Church and its officers did increaſe merely from the inlargement of the bounds of Churches; if no one certain form were obſerved in all Churches; but great varieties as to officers and Dioceſes; if the courſe uſed in ſettling the power of the chief officers of the Church was from agreement with the civil government; if notwithſtanding the ſuperiority of Biſhops, the ordination of Preſbyters was owned as valid; if in all other things concerning the Churches Polity, the Churches prudence was looked on as a ſufficient ground to eſtabliſh things, then we may with reaſon conclude that nothing can be inferred from the practice of the Primitive Church, Demonſtrative of any one fixed form of Church Government delivered from the Apoſtles to them. Having thus by a light σκιαγραφία drawn out the ſeveral lines of the pourtraicture of the Polity of the ancient Church, we now proceed to fill them up, though not with that life which it deſerves, yet ſo far as the model of this diſcourſe will permit. Our firſt argument then is from the riſe of the extent of the power of Church Governours, which I aſſert not to have been from any order of the Apoſtles, but from the gradual increaſe of the Churches committed to their charge. This will be beſt done by the obſervation of the growth of Churches, and how proportionably the power of the Governours did increaſe with it, As to that, there are four obſervable ſteps or periods as ſo many ages of growth in the Primitive Churches. Firſt, When Churches and Cities were of the ſame extent. Secondly, When Churches took in the adjoyning territories with the villages belonging to the Cities. Thirdly, When ſeveral Cities with their villages did aſſociate for Church-Government in the ſame province. Fourthly, When ſeveral provinces did aſſociate for Government in the Roman Empire. Of theſe in their Order.

§. 2. The firſt Period of Church-Government obſervable in the primitive Church, was when Churches were the ſame with Chriſtians in whole Cities. For the clearing of this, I ſhall firſt ſhew that the primitive conſtitution of Churches was in a ſociety of Chriſtians in the ſame City. Secondly, I ſhall conſider the form and manner of Government then obſerved among them. Thirdly, Conſider what relation the ſeveral Churches in Cities had to one another. Firſt, That the Primitive Churches were Chriſtians of whole Cities. It is but a late and novel acception of the word Church, whereby it is taken for ſtated fixed congregations for publick worſhip; and doubtleſs the original of it is only from the diſtinction of Churches in greater Cities into their ſeveral κυριακὰ or publick places for meeting, whence the Scotch Kirk, and our Engliſh Church; ſo that from calling the place Church they proceed to call the perſons there meeting by that name; and thence ſome think the name of Church ſo appropriated to ſuch a ſociety of Chriſtians as may meet at ſuch a place, that they make it a matter of religion not to call thoſe places Churches, from whence originally the very name, as we uſe it, was derived. But this may be pardoned among other the religious weakneſſes of well meaning but leſs knowing people. A Church in its primary ſenſe as it anſwers to the Greek ἐκκλησία, applied to Chriſtians, is a Society of Chriſtians living together in one City; whether meeting together in many Congregations or one, is not at all material; becauſe they were not called a Church as meeting together in one place, but as they were a ſociety of Chriſtians, inhabiting together in ſuch a City: not but that I think a ſociety of Chriſtians might be called a Church, where ever they were, whether in a City or Country, but becauſe the firſt and chief mention we meet with in Scripture of Churches, is of ſuch as did dwell together in the ſame Cities; as is evident from many pregnant places of Scripture to this purpoſe. As Acts 14. 23. compared with Titus 1. 5. κατ' ἐκκλησίαν in one place, is the ſame with κατὰ πόλιν in the other. Ordaining Elders in every Church, and ordaining Elders in every City; which implies that by Churches then were meant the body of Chriſtians reſiding in the Cities: over which the Apoſtles ordained Elders to rule them. So Acts 16. 4, 5. As they went through the Cities, &c. and ſo were the Churches eſtabliſhed in the faith. The Churches here were the Chriſtians of thoſe Cities which they went through. So Act. 20. 17. He ſent to Epheſus and called the Elders of the Church. If by the Elders we mean as all thoſe do we now deal with, the Elders of Epheſus, then it is here evident that the Elders of the Church and of the City are all one; but what is more obſervable, verſ. 28. he calls the Church of that City, τὸ ποίμνιον· προσέχετε οὖν ἑαυτοῖς καὶ παντὶ τῷ ποιμνίῳ ἐν ᾧ ὑμᾶς τὸ πνεῦμα ἔθετο ἐπισκόπους, ποιμαίνειν τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τοῦ θεοῦ. Take heed to your ſelves, and to the flock over which God hath made you overſeers, to feed the Church of God. Where ſeveral things are obſervable to our purpoſe;

firſt, that the body of Chriſtians in Epheſus is called τὸ ποίμνιον and ἡ ἐκκλησία, the flock and the Church, and not the ſeveral flocks and Churches, over which God hath made you Biſhops. Secondly, That all theſe ſpoken to were ſuch as had a paſtoral charge of this one flock; Paul calls them ἐπισκόπȣς, and chargeth ποιμαίνειν, to do the work of a Paſtor towards it. So that either there muſt be ſeveral Paſtors taking the paſtoral charge of one congregation which is not very ſuitable with the principles of thoſe I now diſpute againſt; or elſe many congregations in one City are all called but one Church, and one flock, which is the thing I plead for. And therefore it is an obſervation of good uſe to the purpoſe in hand, that the New Teſtament ſpeaking of the Churches in a Province, always ſpeaks of them in the Plural number as the Churches of Judæa, 1 Gal. 22. 1 Theſ. 2. 14. The Churches of Samaria and Gallilee, Act. 9. 31. The Churches of Syria and Cilicia. Act. 15. 41. The Churches of Galatia, 1 Cor. 16. 1. Gal. 1. 1, 2. The Churches of Aſia. Rom. 16. 16. Rev. 1. 11. But when it ſpeaks of any particular City, then it is always uſed in the Singular number, as the Church at Jeruſalem. Act. 8. 1.———15. 4. 22. The Church at Antioch. Act. 11. 26.———13. 1. The Church at Corinth. 1 Cor. 1. 2. 2 Cor. 1. 1. and ſo of all the ſeven Churches of Aſia, the Church of Epheſus, Smyrna, &c. So that we cannot find in Scripture the leaſt footſtep of any difference between a Church and the Chriſtians of ſuch a City; whereas had the notion of a Church been reſtrained to a particular congregation, doubtleſs we ſhould have found ſome difference as to the Scriptures ſpeaking of the ſeveral places. For it is ſcarce imaginable that in all thoſe Cities ſpoken of, as for example Epheſus, where Paul was for above two years together, that there ſhould be no more converts than would make one Congregation. Accordingly in the times immediately after the Apoſtles, the ſame language and cuſtom continued ſtill. So Clement inſcribes his Epiſtle ἡ ἐκκλησία τȣ͂ θεȣ͂ παροικȣ͂σα Ῥώμην τῇ ἐκκλεσία τȣ͂ θεȣ͂ παροικȣ́σῃ Κόρινθον, The Church of God which is at Rome, to the Church of God which is at Corinth. So by that it is plain that all the believers at that time in Rome, made up but one Church, as likewiſe did they at Corinth. So Polycarp in the Epiſtle written by him from the Church at Smyrna to the Church at Philomilium, Ἡ ἐκκλησία τȣ͂ Θεȣ͂ ἡ παροικȣ͂σα Σμύρναν τῇ παροικȣ́σῃ ἐν Φιλομιλίῳ· and ſo in his Epiſtle to the Philippians, Πολύκαρπος καὶ οἱ σὺν αὐτῷ πρεσβύτεροι, τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ παροικȣ́σῃ Φιλίπποις. Polycarp and the Elders with him to the Church which is at Philippi. Origen compares the Church of God at Athens, Corinth, Alexandria, and other places with the people of thoſe ſeveral Cities; and ſo the Churches Senate with the peoples, and the Churches ἄρχων (that is his word) chief ruler, with the Major of thoſe Cities; implying thereby, that as there was one civil ſociety in ſuch places to make a City, ſo there was a ſociety of Chriſtians incorporated together to make a Church. So that a Church ſetled with a full power belonging to it, and exerciſing all acts of Church-Diſcipline within it ſelf, was anciently the ſame with the ſociety of Chriſtians in a City. Not but that the name Church is attributed ſometimes to families, in which ſenſe Tertullian ſpeaks, ubi duo aut tres ſunt, ibi Eccleſia eſt, licet Laici: And may on the ſame account be attributed to a ſmall place, ſuch as many imagine the Church of Cenchrea to be, it being a Port to Corinth on the Sinus Saronicus; but Stephanus Byzantinus calls it πόλις καὶ ἐπίνειον Κορίνθȣ. Suidas ſaith no more of it than that it is ὀνοματόπȣ. Strabo and Pauſanias only ſpeak of the ſituation of it, as

as one of the ports of Corinth, lying in the way from Tegæa to Argos; nor is any more ſaid of it by Pliny, than that it anſwers to Lechæum Plin. Hiſt. l. 4. c. 4. the port on the other ſide upon the Sinus Corinthiacus. Ubbo Emmius Emmius de Græc. Vet. l. 2. in his deſcription of old Greece calls both of them oppidula duo cum duobus præclaris portubus in ora utriuſq; maris, but withal adds, that they were duo urbis emporia, the two Marts of Corinth; therefore in probability, becauſe of the great Merchandiſe of that City, they were much frequented. Cenchrea was about twelve furlongs diſtance from Corinth; Where Pareus conjectures the place of the meeting of the Pareus in Rom. 16. 1. Church of Corinth was, becauſe of the troubles they met with in the City, and therefore they retired thither for greater conveniency and privacy: which conjecture will appear not to be altogether improbable, when we conſider the furious oppoſition made by the Jews againſt the Chriſtians at Corinth, Acts 18. 12. and withal how uſual it was both for Jews and Chriſtians to have their place of meeting at a diſtance from the City. As Acts 16. 13. They went out from Philippi to the rivers V. Heinſ. Exercit. ſacr. l. 5. cap. 10. ſide, where there was a Proſeucha, or a place of prayer, where the Jews of Philippi accuſtomed to meet. According to this interpretation the Church at Cenchrea is nothing elſe but the Church of Corinth there aſſembling: as the Reformed Church at Paris hath their meeting place at Charenton, which might be called the Church of Charenton from their publick Aſſemblies there, but the Church of Paris from the Reſidence of the chief officers and people in that City. So the Church of Corinth might be called the Church at Cenchrea upon the ſame account, there being no evidence at all of any ſettled Government there at Cenchrea diſtinct from that at Corinth. So that this place which is the only one brought againſt that poſition I have laid down, hath no force at all againſt it. I conclude then that Churches and Cities were originally of equal extent, and that the formal conſtitution of a Church lies not in their capacity of aſſembling in one place, but acting as a ſociety of Chriſtians imbodied together in one City, having Officers and Rulers among themſelves, equally reſpecting the whole number of believers: Which leads to the ſecond thing, the way and manner then uſed for the modelling the government of theſe Churches: Which may be conſidered in a double period of time, either before ſeveral Congregations in Churches were ſetled, or after thoſe we now call Pariſhes, were divided. Firſt, Before diſtinct Congregations were ſetled; and this as far as I can find, was not only during the Apoſtles times, but for a competent time after, generally during the perſecution of Churches. For we muſt diſtinguiſh between ſuch a number of believers as could not conveniently aſſemble in one place, and the diſtributing of believers into their ſeveral diſtinct Congregations. I cannot ſee any reaſon but to think that in the great Churches of Jeruſalem, Antioch, Epheſus and the like, there were more believers than could well meet together, conſidering the ſtate of thoſe times; but that they were then diſtributed into their ſeveral δῆμοι or Centuries (as the Athenians, and Romans divided their people) i. e. into ſeveral worſhipping Congregations with peculiar officers, I ſee no reaſon at all for it. They had no ſuch conveniencies then of ſetling ſeveral Congregations under their particular Paſtors: but all the Chriſtians in a City looked upon themſelves as one body, and met together as occaſion ſerved them, where either the chief of the Governours of the Church, the προεστῶς in Juſtin Martyr's language, did perform the ſolemn part of divine worſhip, or ſome other of the Elders that were preſent with them. Is it not ſtrange for men to dream of ſet times, and Canonical hours, and publick places of Aſſemblies at that time, when their chief times of meeting were in the night, or very early in the morning, which Pliny calls conventus antelucanos, whence they were called latebroſa & lucifugax natio; and were fain to make uſe of wax-lights: (which from that cuſtom the Papiſts continue ſtill in their Tapers always burning upon the Altar, from what reaſon I know not, unleſs to ſhew the darkneſs of error and ſuperſtition which that Church lies under ſtill) and the places of the Chriſtians meetings were generally either ſome private rooms, or ſome grotts or Cryptæ, vaults under ground where they might be leaſt diſcerned or taken notice of; or in the Cœmeteria, the Martyrum memoriæ, as they called them, where their common aſſemblies were. Thence Pontius Paulinus, ſpeaking of the Edict of Valerian againſt the Chriſtians, Juſſum eſt ut nulla conciliabula faciant, neque cœmeteria ingrediantur. Indeed when they had any publick liberty granted them, they were ſo mindful of their duties of publick profeſſion of the faith, as to make uſe of publick places for the worſhip of God, as appears by Lampridius in the life of Alexander Severus. Quum Chriſtiani quendam locum qui publicus fuerat occupaſſent, contra popinarii dicerent, ſibi eum deberi, reſcripſit melius eſſe ut quomodocunque illic Deus colatur, quam popinariis dedatur. But in times of perſecution it is moſt improbable that there ſhould be any fixed Congregations and places, when the Chriſtians were ſo much hunted after, and inquired for, as appears by the former Epiſtle of Pliny and the known Reſcript of Trajan upon it, ſo much exagitated by Tertullian. They did meet often it is certain, ad confœderandum diſciplinam, at which meetings Tertullian tells us, Præſident probati quique ſeniores, which he elſewhere explains by Conſeſſus ordinis, the bench of officers in the Church, which did in common conſult for the good of the Church, without any Cantonizing the Chriſtians into ſeveral diſtinct and fixed Congregations. But after that believers were much increaſed, and any peace or liberty obtained, they then began to contrive the diſtribution of the work among the ſeveral Officers of the Church, and to ſettle the ſeveral bounds over which every Presbyter was to take his charge; but yet ſo, as that every Presbyter retained a double aſpect of his office, the one particular to his charge, the other general reſpecting the Church in common. For it is but a weak conceit to imagine that after the ſetling of Congregations, every one had a diſtinct Presbytery to rule it, which we find not any obſcure footſteps of in any of the ancient Churches; but there was ſtill one Eccleſiaſtical Senate which ruled all the ſeveral Congregations of thoſe Cities in common, of which the ſeveral Presbyters of the Congregations were members, and in which the Biſhop acted as the Preſident of the Senate, for the better governing the affairs of the Church. And thus we find Cornelius at Rome ſitting there cum florentiſſimo Clero: thus Cyprian at Carthage, one who pleads as much as any for obedience to Biſhops, and yet none more evident for the preſence and joint concurrence and aſſiſtance of the Clergy at all Church debates; whoſe reſolution from his firſt entrance into his Biſhoprick was to do all things communi concilio Clericorum, with the Common-Council of the Clergy; and ſays they were cum Epiſcopo ſacerdotali honore conjuncti. Victor at Rome decreed Eaſter to be kept on the Lord's day, collatione facta cum Presbyteris & Diaconibus (according as the Latin in that age) as Damaſus the ſuppoſed Author of the lives of the Popes tells us. In the proceedings againſt gainſt Novatus at Rome, we have a clear teſtimony of the concurrence of Preſbyters: where a great Synod was called, as Euſebius expreſſeth Eccleſ. hiſt. l.6. cap.43. it, of ſixty Biſhops, but more Preſbyters and Deacons; and what is more full to our purpoſe, not only the ſeveral Preſbyters of the City, but the Country Paſtors (τῶν κατὰ χώραν ποιμένων διασκεψαμένων) did likewiſe give their advice about that buſineſs. At this time Cornelius tells us there were forty ſix Preſbyters in that one City of Rome, who concurred with him in condemning Novatus. So at Antioch in the caſe of Paulus Samoſatenus we find a Synod gathered, conſiſting of Biſhops, Preſbyters, and Deacons, and in their name the Synodal Epiſtle is penned and directed by the ſame in all the Catholick Church. Eccleſ. hiſt. l.7. cap.30. At the Council of Eliberis in Spain, were preſent but nineteen Biſhops and twenty ſix Preſbyters. The caſe between Sylvanus Biſhop of Cirta in Africk, and Nundinarius the Deacon, was referred by Purpurius to the Clergy to decide it. Apud. Nun. ſub Zenoph. Conſul. For the preſence of Preſbyters at Synods, inſtances are brought ὅλῳ τῷ συλλόγῳ by Blondel in his Apology. P. 200. And that they concurred in governing the Church, and not only by their counſel but authority, appears from the general ſenſe of the Church of God, even when Epiſcopacy was at the higheſt: Nazianzen ſpeaking of the office of Preſbyters, εἴτε λειτουργίαν χρὴ λέγειν εἴτε ἡγεμονίαν, he knew not whether to call it, Miniſtry or Superintendency, and thoſe who are made Preſbyters, ἐπὶ τὸ ἄρχειν ἀναβαίνουσι ἀπὸ τοῦ ἄρχεσθαι, from being ruled, they aſcend to be rulers themſelves. Orat. p. 3. And their power by him is in ſeveral places called Ψυχῶν ἡγεμονία, προστασία, προεδρία· they are called by him, ποιμένες, ἱερεῖς, πρεσβῦται, προστάται, ἄρχοντες. P. 24. 37, 41. P. 29. 42. Chryſoſtome gives this as the reaſon of Paul's paſſing over from Biſhops to Deacons without naming Preſbyters, ὅτι οὐ πολὺ τὸ μέσον· καὶ γὰρ καὶ αὐτοὶ διδασκαλίαν εἰσὶν ἀναδεδεγμένοι, καὶ προστασίαν τῆς ἐκκλησίας. In 1 Tim. hom. 11. Becauſe there is no great matter of difference between a Biſhop and Preſbyters, for theſe likewiſe have the inſtruction and charge of the Church committed to them; which words Theophylact, Chryſoſtome's Eccho, repeats after him, which the Council of Aquen thus expreſſeth, Preſbyterorum vero qui præſunt Eccleſiæ Chriſti miniſterium eſſe videtur, ut in doctrina præſint populis & in officio prædicandi, nec in aliquo deſides inventi appareant. Con. Aquiſ. cap. 5. Clemens Alexandrinus before all theſe, ſpeaking of himſelf and his fellow Preſbyters, Ποιμένες ἐσμὲν οἱ τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν προηγούμενοι. We are Paſtors and Rulers of the Churches. Pædag. l. 1. cap. 6. And that proper acts of diſcipline were performed by them, appears both by the Epiſtles of the Roman Clergy about their preſerving diſcipline to Cyprian, and likewiſe by the act of that Clergy in excluding Marcion from communion with them. So the Preſbyters of the Church of Epheſus excommunicated Noetus; Epiph. hær. 42. for after they had cited him before them, and found him obſtinate in his hereſie, ἐξέωσαν αὐτὸν τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἅμα τοῖς ὑπ' αὐτοῦ δόγμα μεμαθητευμένοις, Id. hæreſ. 57. c. 1. they put both him and his Diſciples out of the Church together. Thus we ſee what the manner of Government in the Church was now: The Biſhop ſitting as in the נשיא in the Sanhedrin, and the Preſbyters ὡς συνεδρευταὶ τῶν ἐπισκόπων, as Ignatius expreſſeth it, acting as the Common-council of the Church to the Biſhop, the Biſhop being as the ἄρχων τῆς ἐκκλησίας, anſwering to the ἄρχων τῆς πόλεως and the Preſbytery as the βουλὴ τῆς ἐκκλησίας, anſwering to the βουλὴ καθ' ἑκάστην πόλιν, as Origen compares them. C. Celſum. l. 3. p. 129. Whereby he fully deſcribes the form of Government in his time in the Church, which was by an Eccleſiaſtical Senate, and a Preſident in it, ruling the Society of Chriſtians in every City. So that the Preſbytery of a great City joyning together for government, were never accounted a Provincial Aſſembly, but only the Senate for government of the Church in the whole City. The erecting Preſbyteries for every particular congregation in a City, is a ſtranger to the ancient conſtitution of Churches, and hath given the greateſt riſe to the independency of particular congregations. For if every particular congregation be furniſhed with a government within its ſelf, then men are apt preſently to think that there is no neceſſity of ſubordination of it to any higher Church-power. Whereas if that primitive conſtitution of Churches be held, that they are ſocieties of Chriſtians under an Eccleſiaſtical Senate in a City, then it is evident that the congregations muſt truckle under the great body, as receiving their government by, and their officers from that Senate of the Church, which ſuperintends, and orders the affairs of that whole body of Chriſtians reſiding in ſuch a place. And this crumbling of Church power into every congregation is a thing abſolutely diſowned by the greateſt, and moſt learned Patrons of Preſbytery beyond the Seas: as may be ſeen both in Calvin, Beza, Salmaſius, Blondel, Gerſome, Bucer and others. It is much diſputed when the firſt diviſion of Parochial congregations in Cities began; Platina attributes it to Evariſtus, and ſo doth Damaſus, Hic titulos in urbe Roma diviſit Preſbyteris. He divided the ſeveral Pariſh Churches to the Preſbyters, theſe were called then tituli; Baronius gives a double reaſon of the name; either from goods belonging to the Prince's Exchequer, which have ſome ſign imprinted upon them that it may be known whoſe they are; ſo ſaith he, the ſign of the Croſs was put upon the Churches to make it known that they were devoted to God's ſervice; or elſe they are called Tituli, becauſe the ſeveral Preſbyters did receive their titles from them; but by the Leave of the great Cardinal, another reaſon may be given of the name more proper than either of theſe. It hath been obſerved by learned men, that the general meetings of the Chriſtians were in the Cœmeteria or dormitories of Chriſtians; ſo they called the Sepulchres then, which were great and capacious vaults fit to receive many people in them; two chief grounds of the Chriſtians meeting in thoſe places; the firſt was their own ſecurity, becauſe the Heathens looked on it as a matter of religion ——— manes temerare ſepultos, to diſturb the aſhes of the dead; but the chief reaſon was to encourage themſelves to ſuffer martyrdom by the examples of thoſe who had gone before them, and lay buried there; thence they were called Martyrum memoriæ, becauſe they did call to mind their actions and conſtancy in the faith. Now from theſe Cœmeteria was afterwards the original of Churches (whence perſons moſt reverenced for piety, were wont ſtill to be buried in Churches, not for any holineſs of the place, but becauſe in ſuch places the Martyrs lay buried) the Churches being raiſed over the vaults wherein the Martyrs lay intombed. Now Churches being raiſed from theſe Cœmeteries, which were called memoriæ martyrum, that they might ſtill retain ſomewhat intimating their former uſe, were called Tituli. For Titulus as Santius obſerves, is ſignum aliquod aut monumentum, quod docet ibi latere aliquid aut accidiſſe, cujus nolumus perire memoriam; thence ſtatues are called Tituli. So Gen. 35. 20. erexit Jacob titulum ſuper ſepulchrum, as the Vulg. Latin renders it: and Gen. 28. 18. Surgeus ergo Jacob mane tulit lapidem quem ſuppoſuerat capiti ſuo, & erexit in Titulum. So Abſalom 2 Sam. 18. 18. erexit ſibi titulum. So that what was erected to maintain and preſerve the memory of any thing, was called Titulus; and

and thence the Churches being built upon the Cœmeteries of the Martyrs, were on that account called Tituli, becauſe intended for the preſervation of their memories. This account of the original of the name I leave to the judgment of learned men; but to proceed, I confeſs it ſeems not probable to me, that theſe tituli were ſo ſoon divided as the time of Evariſtus, who lived in the time of Trajan, when the perſecution was hot againſt the Chriſtians; but Damaſus ſeems not to believe himſelf; for in the life of Dionyſius, he ſaith, Hic Preſbyteris eccleſias diviſit, cœmeteria, parœcias, & diœceſes inſtituit; but moſt probably it began as ſoon as the Churches enjoyed any eaſe and peace, it being ſo neceſſary for the convenient meeting of ſuch a multitude of Chriſtians as there was then. In the life of Marcellus, about forty years after Dionyſius, we read of twenty five Titles in the Church of Rome; of which number what uſe is made for interpreting the number 666, may be ſeen in Mr. Potter's ingenious tract on that ſubject. But when afterwards theſe titles were much increaſed, thoſe Preſbyters that were placed in the ancient titles which were the chief among them, were called Cardinales Preſbyteri, which were then looked on as chief of the Clergy, and therefore were the chief members of the Council of Preſbyters to the Biſhop. So that at this day, the Conclave at Rome, and the Pope's Conſiſtory, is an evident argument in this great degeneracy of it, of the primitive conſtitution of the Government of the Church there, by a Biſhop acting with his College of Preſbyters. Neither was this proper to Rome alone, but to all other great Cities, which when the number of Preſbyters was grown ſo great, that they could not conveniently meet, and join with the Biſhop, for ordering the Government of the Church, there were ſome, as the chief of them, choſen out from the reſt, to be as the Biſhop's Council, and theſe in many places, as at Milan, Ravenna, Naples, &c. were called Cardinales preſbyteri, as well as at Rome; which were abrogated by Pius Quintus, 1568, but the memory of them is preſerved ſtill in Cathedral-Churches, in the Chapter there, where the Dean was nothing elſe but the Archi-preſbyter, and both Dean and Prebendaries were to be aſſiſtant to the Biſhop in the regulating the Church-affairs belonging to the City, while the Churches were contained therein. So much ſhall ſuffice for the model of Government in the Churches while they were contained within the ſame precincts with the City it ſelf.

V. Onuphrium de Epiſc. tit. & Div. Cardinalium.

§. 3. We come in the third place to conſider what relation theſe Churches in great Cities had one to another, and to the leſſer Cities which were under them. And here the grand queſtion to be diſcuſſed is this, Whether the Churches in greater Cities by Apoſtolical inſtitution, had the Government Eccleſiaſtical, not only of the leſſer Villages under them, but likewiſe of all leſſer Cities under the civil juriſdiction of the Metropolis. The affirmative is of late aſſerted by ſome perſons of great renown and learning. The firſt I find maintaining this Hypotheſis of the divine right of Metropolitans, is Fregevilæus Gantius, one of the Reformed Church of France, who hath ſpent a whole Chapter in his Palma Chriſtiana to that purpoſe, and hath made uſe of the ſame arguments which have been ſince improved by all the advantages which the learning of a Reverend Doctor could add to them. But becauſe this principle manifeſtly deſtroys the main foundation of this diſcourſe, it is here requiſite to examine the grounds on which it ſtands, that thereby it may be fully cleared whether the ſubordination of leſs Churches to greater, did only ariſe from the mutual aſſociation of Churches among themſelves, or from Apoſtolical appointment and inſtitution. The two pillars which the divine right of Metropolitans is built upon, are theſe. Firſt, That the Cities ſpoken of in the New Teſtament, in which Churches were planted, were Metropoles in the civil ſenſe. Secondly, That the Apoſtles did ſo far follow the model of the civil Government as to plant Metropolitan Churches in thoſe Cities. If either of theſe prove infirm, the fabrick erected upon them, muſt needs fall; and I doubt not but to make it appear that both of them are. I begin with the firſt. The notion of a Metropolis is confeſſed to be this, a City wherein the Courts of a Civil Judicature were kept by the Roman Governours, under whoſe juriſdiction the whole Province was contained. The Cities chiefly inſiſted on, are the ſeven Cities of the Lydian Aſia, and Philippi, which is called πρώτη πόλις Μακεδονίας. As for the Cities of the Proconſular Aſia, although the bounds and limits of it are not ſo clear as certainly to know whether all theſe Cities were comprehended under it or no, Strabo telling us that Phrygia, Lydia, Caria and Myſia are δυσδιάκριτα παραπίπτοντα εἰς ἄλληλα very hard to be diſtinguiſhed from one another; it being true of all four which was ſaid of Myſia and Phrygia, Geogr. l.13.

Χωρὶς τὰ Μυσῶν καὶ Φρυγῶν ὁρίσματα
Τὸ γοῦν διορίζειν χαλεπόν.

The Phrygian and Myſian borders are diſtinct, but it is hard to find them out. For Laodicea is by Ptolomy referr'd to Caria, Strabo and many others place it in Phrygia, only Stephanus Bizantinus placeth it in Lydia; but granting all that is produced by the late moſt excellent Primate of Armagh, in his learned diſcourſe of the Proconſular Aſia, to prove all theſe ſeven Cities to be in the bounds of this Lydian Aſia, yet it is far from being evident that all theſe Cities were Metropoles in the civil ſenſe. For Strabo tells us, that the Romans did not divide theſe places by Nations, but according to the Dioceſes wherein they kept their Courts and exerciſed judicature. Geogr. l.13. p. 432. ed. Iſ. Caſaub. Theſe Cities wherein the Courts of judicature were kept, were the Metropoles, and mother Cities. Of five of them, Laodicea, Smyrna, Sardis, Epheſus, and Pergamus, Pliny ſaith that the conventus, the civil Courts, were kept in them; Nat. hiſt. l. 5. c. 29, & 30. and they had juriſdiction over the other places by him mentioned; but for the other two, Thyatira and Philadelphia, Philadelphia is expreſly mentioned as one of thoſe Cities which were under the juriſdictio Sardiana, ſo far was it from being a Metropolis of its ſelf, and Thyatira mentioned as one of the ordinary Cities, without any addition of honour at all to it. And for Philadelphia, it was ſo far unlikely to be a Metropolis, that Strabo tells us it was σεισμῶν πλήρης, very ſubject to earthquakes, and therefore had very few inhabitants, thoſe that are, live moſt part in the fields, where they have εὐδαίμονα γῆν, a very rich ſoil: but Strabo, for all that, wonders at the boldneſs of the men that durſt to venture their lives there; and moſt of all admires what was in thoſe mens heads who firſt built a City there. Is it then any ways probable that this ſhould be choſen for a Metropolis, in ſuch an abundance of fair and rich Cities as lay thereabout? But a Salvo is found out for Pliny's not mentioning them as Metropoles, becauſe the addition of theſe two in other Cities, ſeemeth to have been made when Veſpaſian added thoſe many new Provinces to the old Government which Suetonius ſpeaks of; but this Salvo doth not reach the ſore; Sueton. in Veſpat. c. 8. for firſt Pliny wrote his natural Hiſtory, not in the beginning, but toward the latter end of the Empire of Flavius Veſpaſianus, when Titus had been ſix times Conſul, as he himſelf ſaith in his Preface; therefore if there had been any ſuch change, Pliny would have mentioned it. Secondly, The Provinces added by Veſpaſian are expreſly ſet down by Suetonius, viz. Achaia, Lycia, Rhodus, Byzantium, Samos, Thracia, Cilicia, Comagena; not the leaſt mention of the Lydian or Proconſular Aſia, or any alteration made in the Metropolis there. But yet there is a farther attempt made to make Philadelphia a Metropolis, which is from a ſubſcription of Euſtathius in the Council of Conſtantinople ſub Menna, Act. 5. who calls himſelf the Biſhop of the Metropolis of Philadelphia; but what validity there is in ſuch a ſubſcription in the time of the fifth Century, to prove a Metropolis in the firſt, let any one judge, that doth but conſider how common a thing it was to alter Metropoles, eſpecially after the new diſpoſition of the Roman Empire by Conſtantine: But if we do ſtand to the Notitiæ to determine this controverſie, which are certainly more to be valued than a ſingle ſubſcription, the Metropolitanſhip of theſe Cities of the Lydian Aſia will be irrecoverably overthrown. For in the old Notitia taken out of the Vatican MS. and ſet forth with the reſt by Carolus à Sancto Paulo in his Appendix to his Geographia ſacra, Epheſus is made the Metropolis of the Province of Aſia, Sardis of Lydia, Laodicea of Phrygia Capatiana, as it is there written for Pacatiana; but Pergamus placed in the Province of Cæſarea Cappadocia, Philadelphia under Sardis, with Thyatyra. In the Notitia attributed to Hierocles under the Metropolis of Epheſus is placed Smyrna and Pergamus, under Sardis Thyatyra and Philadelphia; ſo likewiſe in the Notitia of the French King's Library. So that neither in the Civil nor Eccleſiaſtical ſenſe can we find theſe ſeven Cities to be all Metropoles. We therefore obſerve St. Paul's courſe, and leaving Aſia, we come into Macedonia, where we are told that Philippi was the Metropolis of Macedonia: I know not whether with greater incongruity to the Civil or Eccleſiaſtical ſenſe; in both which I doubt not but to make it appear that Philippi was not the Metropolis of Macedonia, and therefore the Biſhops there mentioned could not be the Biſhops of the ſeveral Cities under the juriſdiction of Philippi, but muſt be underſtood Phil. 1. 1. of the Biſhops reſident in that City. We begin with it in the civil ſenſe, which is the foundation of the other: It is confeſſed not to have been a Metropolis during its being called Κρηνίδες and Δάτος, it being by Pauſanias called νεωτάτη τῶν ἐν Μακεδονίᾳ πόλεων· By Theophylact out Eliac. B. of an old Geographer, (as it is ſuppoſed) it is ſaid to be μικρὰ πόλις p. 182. ὑπὸ μητροπόλεως Θεσσαλονίκης τελοῦσα; and is it not very improbable that ſo ſmall a City as it is acknowledged to be by Dio, and others, ſhould Dio, l. 47. be the Metropolis of Macedonia, where were at leaſt one hundred and L. 4. c. 11. fifty Cities, as Pliny and Pomponius Mela tell us, by both whom Philippi L. 2. c. 2. is placed in Thracia, and not in Macedonia? But two arguments are brought to prove Philippi to have been a Metropolis; the firſt is from St. Luke, calling it πρώτην τῆς μερίδος Μακεδονίας πόλιν. Acts 16. 12. The firſt City of that part of Macedonia: but rendred by the learned Doctor, the prime City of the Province of Macedonia; but it would be worth knowing where μερίς, in all the Notitiæ of the Roman Empire, was tranſlated a Province: and it is evident that Luke calls it the firſt City, not ratione dignitatis, but ratione ſitûs, in regard of its ſituation, and not its dignity. So Camerarius underſtands Luke, hanc eſſe primam coloniam partis ſeu Plagæ Macedonicæ; nimirum à Thraciæ vicinia iter in Macedoniam ordiens. It is the firſt City of that part of Macedonia when one goes from Thracia into it. And ſo it appears by Dio Lib. 47. p. 397. deſcribing the ſituation of Philippi, that it was the next Town to Neapolis, only the mountain Symbolon coming between them, and Neapolis being upon the ſhore, and Philippi built up in the plain near the mountain Pangæus, where Brutus and Caſſius encamped themſelves: its being then the firſt City of entrance into Macedonia, proves no more that it was the Metropolis of Macedonia, than that Calice is of France, or Dover of England. But it is farther pleaded, that Philippi was a Colony, and therefore it is moſt probable that the ſeat of the Roman judicature was there. But to this I anſwer, firſt, that Philippi was not the only Colony in Macedonia, for Pliny reckons up Caſſandria, Paria, and others; Paterc. l. 2. c. 37. for which we muſt underſtand that Macedonia was long ſince made a Province by Paulus: And in the diviſion of the Roman Provinces by Geog. l. 17. Auguſtus, Strabo reckons it with Illyricum, among the Provinces belonging to the Roman people and Senate, and ſo likewiſe doth Dio. Hiſt. l. 53. But it appears by Suetonius, V. Claudii, cap. 25. that Tiberius, (according to the cuſtom of the Roman Emperors in the danger of war in the Provinces) took it into his own hands, but it was returned by Claudius to the Senate again, Hiſt. l. 57. together with Achaia; thence Dio ſpeaking of Macedonia in the time of Tiberius, ſaith it was governed ἀκληρωτὶ, that is, by thoſe who were ἄρχοντες αἱρετοὶ, the præfecti Cæſaris, ſuch as were ſent by the Emperor to be his Preſidents in the Provinces: the ἄρχοντες κληρωτοὶ were the Proconſuls, who were choſen by lot after their Conſulſhip into the ſeveral Provinces; and therefore Dio expreſſeth Claudius his returning Macedonia into the Senates hands by ἀπέδωκεν τότε τῷ κλήρῳ, he put it to the choice of the Senate again. Now Macedonia having been thus long a Province of the Roman Empire, what probability is there, becauſe Philippi was a Colony, therefore it muſt be the Metropolis of Macedonia? Secondly, We find not the leaſt evidence, either in Scripture, or elſewhere, that the Proconſul of Macedonia had his reſidence at Philippi, yea we have ſome evidence againſt it out of Scripture, Acts 16. 20, 22. καὶ προσαγαγόντες αὐτοὺς τοῖς στρατηγοῖς and brought them to the Magiſtrates; if there had been the tribunal of a Proconſul here, we ſhould certainly have had it mentioned, as Gallio Proconſul of Achaia is mentioned in a V. Pancir. de Magiſt. Municipal. cap. 8. like caſe at Corinth, Acts 18. 12. Two ſorts of Magiſtrates are here expreſſed, the ἄρχοντες, which ſeem to be the rulers of the City, the στρατηγοὶ to be the Duumviri of the Colony, or elſe the Deputies of the Proconſul reſiding there: but I incline rather to the former, στρατηγὸς κολωνίας being only a Duumvir, Exerc. ſacr. l. 5. c. 10. but στρατηγὸς Ῥώμης is a Prætor, as Heinſius obſerves from the Gloſſary of H. Stephens. For every Colony had a Duumvirate to rule it, anſwering to the Conſuls and Prætors at Rome. But all this might have been ſpared, when we conſider how evident it is that Theſſalonica was the Metropolis of Macedonia, as appears by Antipater in the Greek Epigram.

Σοί με Θρηϊκίης σκυληφόρε Θεσσαλονίκη
Μήτηρ ἡ πάσης πέμψε Μακεδονίης.

And the Præfectus prætorio Illyrici had his Reſidence at Theſſalonica, as Theodoret tells us, Θεσσαλονίκη πόλις ἐστὶ μεγίστη καὶ πολυάνθρωπος, &c.

ὅσα τῶν Ἰλλυριῶν τὸν ὕπαρχον ἡγούμενον ἔχει. Theſſalonica was a great populous City, where the Lieutenant of Illyricum did reſide: and ſo in probability did the Vicarius Macedoniæ. It is called the Metropolis of Macedonia likewiſe by Socrates, and in the Eccleſiaſtical ſenſe it is ſo called by Ætius the Biſhop thereof in the Council of Sardica; and Carolus à Sancto Paulo thinks it was not only the Metropolis of the Province of Macedonia, but of the whole Dioceſe (which in the Eaſt was much larger than the Province) I ſuppoſe he means that which anſwered to the Vicarius Macedoniæ. And thence in the Councils of Epheſus and Chalcedon the ſubſcription of the Biſhop of Theſſolonica was next to the Patriarchs. But for Philippi the ſame Author acknowlegeth it not to have been a Metropolitan Church in the firſt ſix Centuries; but after that Macedonia was divided into prima and ſecunda (which was after the diviſion of it in the Empire into prima and ſalutaris) then Philippi came to have the honorary title of a Metropolitan: although in Hierocles his Notitia, Philippi is placed as the twenty firſt City under the Metropoles of Theſſalonica. So much to evidence the weakneſs of the firſt pillar, viz. that theſe Cities were Metropoles in the Civil ſenſe: and this being taken away, the other falls of its ſelf; for if the Apoſtles did model the Eccleſiaſtical Government according to the Civil, then Metropolitan Churches were planted only in Metropolitan Cities, and theſe being cleared not to have been the latter, it is evident they were not the former. But however let us ſee what evidence is brought of ſuch a ſubordination of all other Churches to the Metropolitans, by the inſtitution of the Apoſtles. The only evidence produced out of Scripture for ſuch a ſubordination and dependence of the Churches of leſſer Cities upon the greater, is from Act. 16. 1, 4. compared with Act. 15. 23. the argument runs thus, The queſtion was ſtarted at Antioch, Act. 14. 26. with Act. 15. 2. from thence they ſent to Jeruſalem for a reſolution: the decree of the Council there concerns not only Antioch, but Syria and Cilicia, which were under the Juriſdiction of Antioch: and therefore Metropolitan Churches are jure divino. I am afraid the argument would ſcarce know its ſelf in the dreſs of a Syllogiſm. Thus it runs; If upon the occaſion of the queſtion at Antioch, the decree of the Apoſtles made at Jeruſalem, concern all the Churches of Syria and Cilicia, then all theſe Churches had a dependence upon the Metropolis of Antioch; but the antecedent is true, therefore the conſequent. Let us ſee how the argument will do in another form. If upon the occaſion of the queſtion of Antioch, the decree of the Apoſtles concerned all the Churches of Chriſtians converſing with Jews; then all theſe Churches had dependence upon the Church of Antioch; but, &c. How thankful would the Papiſts have been, if only Rome had been put inſtead of Antioch! and then the concluſion had been true, whatever the premiſes were. But in good earneſt, doth the Churches of Syria and Cilicia being bound by this decree, prove their ſubordination to Antioch, or to the Apoſtles? were they bound becauſe Antioch was ther Metropolis, or becauſe they were the Apoſtles who reſolved the queſtion? but were not the Churches of Phrygia, and Galatia bound to obſerve theſe decrees as well as others? For of theſe it is ſaid that the Apoſtles went through the Cities of them, delivering the decrees to keep, as it is expreſſed Act. 16. 4. compared with the 6 verſe. Or do the decrees of the Apoſtles concern only thoſe to whom they are inſcribed, and upon whoſe occaſion they are penned? Then by the ſame reaſon Paul's Epiſtles piſtles being written many of them upon occaſion, as that to the Corinthians being directed to the Metropolis of Corinth, doth only concern the Church of that City, and thoſe of Achaia that were ſubject to the juriſdiction of the City; and ſo for the reſt of the Epiſtles. A fair way to make the word of God of no effect to us; becauſe forſooth, we live not in obedience to thoſe Metropoles to which the Epiſtles were directed! From whence we are told how many things we may underſtand by this notion of Metropolitans: Eſpecially why Ignatius ſuperſcribes his Epiſtle to the Romans ἐκκλησία ἥτις προκάθηται ἐν τόπῳ χωρίου Ρωμαίων, to the Church which preſides in the place of the Roman region, or the ſuburbicarian Provinces. But let us ſee whether this place may not Exercit.16. n. 150. be underſtood better without the help of this notion. Caſaubon calls it locutionem barbaram; Vedelius is more favourable to it, and thinks ſi non Exercit. in ep. Ignat. adRom.c.2. elegans, ſaltem vitii libera eſt, and explains it by the ſuburbicarian Provinces.: and makes the ſenſe of it to be ἐν τόπῳ ὅς ἐστι χωρίου τοῦ Ρωμαίων, in the place which is the Roman region, and parallels it with the τόπος πόλεως καλουμένης Βηθσαϊδά Luk. 9. 10. Bellarmine thinks he hath found the Pope's univerſal power in this τόπος, but methinks the χωρίον Ρωμαίων ſhould hardly be rendered Orbis univerſus, unleſs Bellarmine were no more skill'd in Greek, than Caſaubon thinks he was, whom he calls in the place forecited, hominem Græcarum literarum prorſus ἀμύητον. The moſt ingenuous conjecture concerning this place, is that of our Laws of the Chur. cap. 18. p. 164. learned Mr. Thorndike. The word τόπος, ſaith he, is here uſed as many times beſides, ſpeaking of thoſe places which a man would neither call Cities nor Towns, as Act. 27. 2. μέλλοντες πλεῖν τοὺς κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν τόπους, being to ſail by the places of Aſia. χώρα, it is plain it ſignifies the countrey, τόπος χωρίου Ρωμαίων then muſt neceſſarily ſignifie here the Vatican lying in the Fields as a ſuburb to Rome, and being the place where St. Peter was buried, and where the Jews of Rome then dwelt, as we learn by Philo, legatione ad Caium, out of whom he produceth a large place to that purpoſe, and ſo makes this the Church of the Jewiſh Chriſtians, the Vatican being then the Jewry of Rome; but there being no clear evidence of any ſuch diſtinction of Churches there, and as little reaſon why Ignatius ſhould write to the Church of Jewiſh Chriſtians, and not to the Church of the Gentile Chriſtians, I therefore embrace his ſenſe of the τόπος χωρίου Ρωμαίων for the Vatican, but explain it in another way, viz. we have already ſhewed that the chief places of meeting for the Chriſtians in Gentile Rome, was in the Cœmeteries of the Martyrs; now theſe Cœmeteria were all of them without the City; and the Cœmeteria where Peter, Linus, Cletus, and ſome other of the Primitive Martyrs lay inter'd in the Vatican, beyond the river Tiber. So Damaſus in the life of Cletus, Qui etiam ſepultus eſt juxta corpus B. Petri in Vaticano. The Church then in the place of the region of the Romans is the Chriſtian Church of Rome, aſſembling chiefly in the Cœmeteries of the Vatican, or any other of thoſe vaults which were in the Fields at a good diſtance from the City. But yet there is one argument more for Metropolitans, and that is from the importance of the word παροικία, which is taken to ſignifie both the City and Countrey; and ſo the inſcription of Clemens his Epiſtle is explained ἐκκλησία θεοῦ ἡ παροικοῦσα Ρώμην, ἐκκλησίᾳ θεοῦ τῇ παροικούσῃ Κόρινθον, i. e. the Church of God dwelling about Rome to the Church dwelling about Corinth, whereby is ſuppoſed to be comprehended the whole territories, which (being theſe were Metropoles) takes in the whole Province. And ſo Polycarp, τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ τοῦ θεοῦ τῇ παροι-

κίᾳ Φιλίπποις, But all this ariſeth from a miſtake of the ſignification of the word παροικεῖν, which ſignifies not ſo much accolere as incolere: and therefore the old Latin verſion renders it Eccleſiæ Dei quæ eſt Philippis. Πάροικος is παρ' ἄλλης πόλεως ἄλλην οἰκῶν, one that removes from one City to ſojourn in other. And the ground of attributing that name to the Chriſtian Churches, was either becauſe that many of the firſt Chriſtians being Jews, they did truly παροικεῖν, being as ſtrangers out of their own countrey, or elſe among the Chriſtians, becauſe by reaſon of their continual perſecutions they were ſtill put in mind of their flitting uncertain condition in the world, their πολίτευμα, countrey, citizenſhip being in heaven. Of this the Apoſtles often tell them: from hence it came to ſignifie the ſociety of ſuch Chriſtians ſo living together; which as it increaſed ſo the notion of the word παροικία increaſed, and ſo went from the City into the countrey, and came not from the countrey into the City; for if παροικεῖν ſhould be taken for accolere, then it neceſſarily follows that ἐκκλησία παροικοῦσα Ῥώμην cannot ſignifie the Church of Rome, and the territories belonging to it, but the Church adjacent to Rome, diſtinct from the City, and the Church in it. For in that ſenſe παροικεῖν is oppoſed to living in the City, and ſo πάροικοι are diſtinct from the Citizens, as in Thucydides and others; but I believe no inſtance can poſſibly be produced wherein παροικία taken in that ſenſe doth comprehend in it both City and countrey. But being taken in the former ſenſe, it was firſt applied to the whole Church of the City: but when the Church of the City did ſpread its ſelf into the Countrey, then the word παροικία comprehended the Chriſtians both in City and Countrey adjoyning to it. Phil. 3. 20.

§. 4. Which leads me to the ſecond ſtep of Chriſtian Churches, when Churches took in the Villages and Territories adjoyning to the Cities: For which we muſt underſtand that the ground of the ſubordination of the Villages and Territories about, did primarily ariſe from hence, that the Goſpel was ſpread abroad from the ſeveral Cities into the Countries about. The Apoſtles themſelves preached, as we read moſt in Scripture, in the Cities, becauſe of the great reſort of people thither; there they planted Churches, and ſetled the Government of them in an Eccleſiaſtical Senate, which not only took care for the government of Churches already conſtituted, but for the gathering more. Now the perſons who were imployed in the converſion of the adjacent Territories, being of the Clergy of the City, the perſons by them converted were adjoyned to the Church of the City; and all the affairs of thoſe leſſer Churches were at firſt determined by the Governours of the City; Afterwards when theſe Churches increaſed, and had peculiar officers ſet over them by the Senate of the City Church, although theſe did rule and govern their flock, yet it always was with a ſubordination to, and dependence upon the government of the City Church. So that by this means, he that was Preſident of the Senate in the City, did likewiſe ſuperintend all the Churches planted in the adjoyning Territories, which was the original of that which the Greeks call παροικία, the Latins the Dioceſe of the Biſhop. The Church where the Biſhop was peculiarly reſident with the Clergy, was called Matrix Eccleſia, and Cathedra principalis, as the ſeveral Pariſhes which at firſt were divided according to the ſeveral regions of the City, were called Tituli, and thoſe planted in the Territories about the City, called Parœcia, when they were applied to the Preſbyters; but when to the Biſhop, it noted a Dioceſe: thoſe that were planted piſtles being written many of them upon occaſion, as that to the Corinthians being directed to the Metropolis of Corinth; doth only concern the Church of that City, and thoſe of Achaia that were ſubject to the juriſdiction of the City; and ſo for the reſt of the Epiſtles. A fair way to make the word of God of no effect to us; becauſe forſooth, we live not in obedience to thoſe Metropoles to which the Epiſtles were directed! From whence we are told how many things we may underſtand by this notion of Metropolitans: Eſpecially why Ignatius ſuperſcribes his Epiſtle to the Romans ἐκκλησία ἥτις προκάθηται ἐν τόπῳ χωρίου Ῥωμαίων, to the Church which preſides in the place of the Roman region, or the ſuburbicarian Provinces. But let us ſee whether this place may not Exercit. 16. n. 150. be underſtood better without the help of this notion. Caſaubon calls it Exercit. in ep. Ignat. ad Rom. c. 2. locutionem barbaram; Vedelius is more favourable to it, and thinks ſi non elegans, ſaltem vitii libera eſt, and explains it by the ſuburbicarian Provinces.: and makes the ſenſe of it to be ἐν τόπῳ ὅς ἐστι χωρίων τοῦ Ῥωμαίων, in the place which is the Roman region, and parallels it with the τόπος πόλεως καλουμένης Βηθσαϊδά Luk. 9. 10. Bellarmine thinks he hath found the Pope's univerſal power in this τόπος, but methinks the χωρίου Ῥωμαίων ſhould hardly be rendered Orbis univerſus, unleſs Bellarmine were no more skill'd in Greek, than Caſaubon thinks he was, whom he calls in the place forecited, hominem Græcarum literarum prorſus ἀμύητον. The moſt ingenuous conjecture concerning this place, is that of our Laws of the Chur. cap. 18. p. 164. learned Mr. Thorndike. The word τόπος, ſaith he, is here uſed as many times beſides, ſpeaking of thoſe places which a man would neither call Cities nor Towns, as Act. 27. 2. μέλλοντες πλεῖν τοὺς κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν τόπους, being to ſail by the places of Aſia. χώρα, it is plain it ſignifies the countrey, τόπος χωρίου Ῥωμάιων then muſt neceſſarily ſignifie here the Vatican lying in the Fields as a ſuburb to Rome, and being the place where St. Peter was buried, and where the Jews of Rome then dwelt, as we learn by Philo, legatione ad Caium, out of whom he produceth a large place to that purpoſe, and ſo makes this the Church of the Jewiſh Chriſtians, the Vatican being then the Jewry of Rome; but there being no clear evidence of any ſuch diſtinction of Churches there, and as little reaſon why Ignatius ſhould write to the Church of Jewiſh Chriſtians, and not to the Church of the Gentile Chriſtians, I therefore embrace his ſenſe of the τόπος χωρίου Ῥωμαίων for the Vatican, but explain it in another way, viz. we have already ſhewed that the chief places of meeting for the Chriſtians in Gentile Rome, was in the Cœmeteries of the Martyrs; now theſe Cœmeteria were all of them without the City; and the Cœmeteria where Peter, Linus, Cletus, and ſome other of the Primitive Martyrs lay inter'd in the Vatican, beyond the river Tiber. So Damaſus in the life of Cletus, Qui etiam ſepultus eſt juxta corpus B. Petri in Vaticano. The Church then in the place of the region of the Romans is the Chriſtian Church of Rome, aſſembling chiefly in the Cæmeteries of the Vatican, or any other of thoſe vaults which were in the Fields at a good diſtance from the City. But yet there is one argument more for Metropolitans, and that is from the importance of the word παροικία, which is taken to ſignifie both the City and Countrey; and ſo the inſcription of Clemens his Epiſtle is explained ἐκκλησία Θεοῦ ἡ παροικοῦσα Ῥώμην, ἐκκλησίᾳ θεοῦ τῇ παροικούσῃ Κόρινθον, i. e. the Church of God dwelling about Rome to the Church dwelling about Corinth, whereby is ſuppoſed to be comprehended the whole territories, which (being theſe were Metropoles) takes in the whole Province. And ſo Polycarp, τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ τοῦ θεοῦ τῇ παροι-

κύσῃ Φιλίπποις, But all this ariſeth from a miſtake of the ſignification of the word παροικεῖν, which ſignifies not ſo much accolere as incolere: and therefore the old Latin verſion renders it Eccleſiæ Dei quæ eſt Philippis. Πάροικος is παρ᾽ ἄλλης πόλεως ἄλλην οἰκῶν, one that removes from one City to ſojourn in other. And the ground of attributing that name to the Chriſtian Churches, was either becauſe that many of the firſt Chriſtians being Jews, they did truly παροικεῖν, being as ſtrangers out of their own countrey, or elſe among the Chriſtians, becauſe by reaſon of their continual perſecutions they were ſtill put in mind of their flitting uncertain condition in the world, their πολίτευμα, countrey, citizenſhip being in heaven. Phil. 3. 20. Of this the Apoſtles often tell them: from hence it came to ſignifie the ſociety of ſuch Chriſtians ſo living together; which as it increaſed ſo the notion of the word παροικία increaſed, and ſo went from the City into the countrey, and came not from the countrey into the City; for if παροικεῖν ſhould be taken for accolere, then it neceſſarily follows that ἐκκλησία παροικοῦσα Ῥώμην cannot ſignifie the Church of Rome, and the territories belonging to it, but the Church adjacent to Rome, diſtinct from the City, and the Church in it. For in that ſenſe παροικεῖν is oppoſed to living in the City, and ſo πάροικοι are diſtinct from the Citizens, as in Thucydides and others; but I believe no inſtance can poſſibly be produced wherein παροικία taken in that ſenſe doth comprehend in it both City and countrey. But being taken in the former ſenſe, it was firſt applied to the whole Church of the City: but when the Church of the City did ſpread its ſelf into the Countrey, then the word παροικία comprehended the Chriſtians both in City and Countrey adjoyning to it.

§. 4. Which leads me to the ſecond ſtep of Chriſtian Churches, when Churches took in the Villages and Territories adjoyning to the Cities: For which we muſt underſtand that the ground of the ſubordination of the Villages and Territories about, did primarily ariſe from hence, that the Goſpel was ſpread abroad from the ſeveral Cities into the Countries about. The Apoſtles themſelves preached, as we read moſt in Scripture, in the Cities, becauſe of the great reſort of people thither; there they planted Churches, and ſetled the Government of them in an Eccleſiaſtical Senate, which not only took care for the government of Churches already conſtituted, but for the gathering more. planted in theſe countrey pariſhes, were called πρεσβύτεροι ἐπιχώριοι, οἱ ἐν χώραις by the Greeks, and by the Latins Preſbyteri regionarii, conregionales, foraſtici, ruris agrorum Preſbyteri; from whom the χωρεπίσκοποι were diſtinct, as evidently appears by the thirteenth Canon of the Council of Neocæſarea: where the Country Preſbyters are forbidden to adminiſter the Lord's Supper in the preſence of the Biſhop or the Preſbyters of the City; but the Chorepiſcopi were allowed to do it. Salmaſius think theſe χωρεπίσκοποι were ſo called as τῶν χωρῶν ἐπίσκοποι, the Epiſcopi villani, ſuch as were only Preſbyters, and were ſet over the Churches in Villages; but though they were originally Preſbyters, yet they were raiſed to ſome higher authority over the reſt of the Preſbyters; and the original of them ſeems to be, that when Churches were ſo much multiplyed in the Countries adjacent to the Cities, that the Biſhop in his own perſon could not be preſent to overſee the actions and carriages of the ſeveral Preſbyters of the Country Churches, then they ordained ſome of the fitteſt in their ſeveral Dioceſes to ſuper-intend the ſeveral Preſbyters lying remote from the City; from which Office of theirs they were called περιοδευταί, becauſe they did περιοδεύειν, go about, and viſit the ſeveral Churches. This is the account given of them by Beza and Blondel as well as others. All theſe ſeveral places that were conveyed to the Faith by the aſſiſtance of the Preſbyters of the City, did all make but one Church with the City. Whereof we have this two-fold evidence. Firſt, From the Eulogiæ which were at firſt parcels of the Bread conſecrated for the Lord's Supper, which were ſent by the Deacons or Acoluthi to thoſe that were abſent, in token of their Communion in the ſame Church. Juſtin Martyr is the firſt who acquaints us with this cuſtom of the Church; After, ſaith he, the Preſident of the Aſſembly hath conſecrated the Bread and the Wine, the Deacons ſtand ready to diſtribute it to every one preſent, καὶ τοῖς οὐ παροῦσιν ἀποφέρουσι, and carry it to thoſe that are abſent. Damaſus attributes the beginning of this cuſtom to Miltiades Biſhop of Rome. Hic fecit ut oblationes conſecratæ per eccleſias ex conſecratione Epiſcopi dirigerentur: quod declaratur fermentum. So Innocentius ad Decentium; De fermento vero quod die Dominica per titulos mittimus, &c. ut ſe à noſtra communione maxime illa die non judicent ſeparatos. Whereby it appears to have been the cuſtom at Rome and other places to ſend from the Cathedral Church the Bread conſecrated to the ſeveral Pariſh Churches, to note their joint-communion in the faith of the Goſpel. Neither was it ſent only to the ſeveral tituli in the City, but to the Villages round about, as appears by the Queſtion propounded by Decentius; although at Rome it ſeems they ſent it only to the Churches within the City, as appears by the Anſwer of Innocentius: but Albaſpinæus takes it for granted as a general cuſtom upon ſome ſet days to ſend theſe Eulogiæ through the whole Dioceſe. Nam cum per vicos & agros ſparſi & diffuſi, ex eadem non poſſint ſumere communione, cuperentque ſemper unionis Chriſtianæ, & Chriſti corporis ſpeciem quam poſſint maximam retinere, ſolenniſſimis diebus & feſtivis ex matrice per parochias benedictus mittebatur panis, ex cujus perceptione communitas quæ inter omnes fideles ejuſdem Diœceſis intercedere debet, intelligebatur & repreſentabatur. Surely then their Dioceſes were not very large; if all the ſeveral Pariſhes could communicate on the ſame Day with what was ſent from the Cathedral Church. Afterwards they ſent not part of the Bread of the Lord's Supper, but ſome other in Analogy to that, to denote their mutual conteſſeration in the faith and communion in the ſame Church. Secondly, It appears that ſtill they were of the ſame Church, by the preſence of the Clergy of the Country at the choice of the Biſhop of the City, and at Ordinations, and in Councils. So at the choice of Boniface, Relictis ſinguli titulis ſuis Preſbyteri omnes aderunt qui voluntatem ſuam, hoc eſt Dei judicium proloquantur; whereby it is evident that all the Clergy had their voices in the choice of the Biſhop. And therefore Pope Leo requires theſe things as neceſſary to the ordination of a Biſhop, Subſcriptio clericorum, Honoratorum teſtimonium, ordinis conſenſus & plebis: and in the ſame Chapter, ſpeaking of the choice of the Biſhop, he ſaith it was done ſubſcribentibus plus minus ſeptuaginta Preſbyteris. And therefore it is obſerved that all the Clergy concurred to the choice even of the Biſhop of Rome, till after the time of that Hildebrand called Greg. 7. in whoſe time Popery came to Age: thence Caſaubon calls it Hereſin Hildebrandinam. Cornelius Biſhop of Rome was choſen Clericorum pene omnium teſtimonio; and in the Council at Rome under Sylveſter it is decreed, that none of the Clergy ſhould be ordained, niſi cum tota adunata Eccleſia. Many inſtances are brought from the Councils of Carthage to the ſame purpoſe, which I paſs over as commonly known. It was accounted the matter of an accuſation againſt Chryſoſtom by his enemies, ὅτι ἄνευ συνεδρίου καὶ παρὰ γνώμην τοῦ κλήρου ποιεῖ τὰς χειροτονίας, that he ordaineth without the Councel and Aſſiſtance of his Clergy. The Preſence of the Clergy at Councils hath been already ſhewed. Thus we ſee how, when the Church of the City was enlarged into the Country, the power of the Governors of the Church in the City was extended with it.

§. 5. The next ſtep obſervable in the Churches increaſe, was when ſeveral of theſe Churches lying together in one Province did aſſociate one with another. The Primitive Church had a great eye to the preſerving unity among all the members of it, and thence they kept ſo ſtrict a correſpondency among the ſeveral Biſhops in the Commercium Formatarum (the formula of writing, which to prevent deceit, may be ſeen in Juſtellus his Notes on the Codex Canonum Eccleſiæ Africanæ) and for a maintaining of nearer correſpondency among the Biſhops themſelves of a Province, it was agreed among themſelves for the better carrying on of their common Work, to call a Provincial Synod twice every Year to debate all cauſes of concernment there among themſelves, and to agree upon ſuch ways as might moſt conduce to the advancing the common intereſt of Chriſtianity. Of theſe Tertullian ſpeaks, Aguntur præcepta per Græcias illas certis in locis Concilia ex univerſis Eccleſiis, per quæ & altiora quæq; in communi tractantur, & ipſa repreſentatio nominis Chriſtiani magna veneratione celebratur. Of theſe the thirty eighth Canon Apoſtolical (as it is called) expreſly ſpeaks (which Canons though not of authority ſufficient to ground any right upon, may yet be allowed the place of a Teſtimony of the practice of the Primitive Church, eſpecially towards the third Century) Δεύτερον τοῦ ἔτους σύνοδος γινέσθω τῶν ἐπισκόπων, καὶ ἀνακρινέτωσαν ἀλλήλως τὰ δόγματα τῆς εὐσεβείας καὶ τὰς ἐμπιπτούσας ἐκκλησιαστικὰς ἀντιλογίας διαλυέτωσαν. Twice a year a Synod of Biſhops was to be kept for diſcuſſing matters of Faith, and reſolving matters of Practice. To the ſame purpoſe the Council of Antioch, A. D. 343. Διὰ τὰς ἐκκλησιαστικὰς χρείας, καὶ τὰς τῶν ἀμφισβητουμένων διαλύσεις, καλῶς ἔχειν ἔδοξε συνόδους καθ᾽ ἑκάστην ἐπαρχίαν τῶν ἐπισκόπων γίνεσθαι δεύτερον τοῦ ἔτους. To theſe Councils the Preſbyters and Deacons came, as appears by that Canon of the Council of Antioch; and in the ſeventh Canon of the Nicene Council by Alphonſus Piſanus the ſame cuſtom is decreed, but no

ſuch thing occurs in the Codex Canonum, either of Tilius or Juſtellus his Edition; and the Arabick Edition of that Council is conceived to have been compiled above Four hundred years after the Council ſet. But however we ſee evidence enough of this practice of celebrating Provincial Synods twice a year; now in the Aſſembling of theſe Biſhops together for mutual council in their affairs, there was a neceſſity of ſome order to be obſerved. There was no difference as to the power of the Biſhops themſelves, who had all equal authority in their ſeveral Churches, and none over one another. For Epiſcopatus unus eſt cujus à ſingulis in ſolidum pars tenetur, as Cyprian ſpeaks; and as Jerome, Ubicunq; Epiſcopus De veritate Eccleſ. fuerit, ſive Romæ, ſive Eugubii, ſive Conſtantinopolis, ſive Rhegii, ſive Alexandriæ, ſive Tanis, ejuſdem eſt meriti, ejuſdem eſt Sacerdotii. Ep. ad Evagrium. Potentia divitiarum & paupertatis humilitas, vel ſublimiorem, vel inferiorem Epiſcopum non facit: Cæterum omnes Apoſtolorum ſucceſſores ſunt. There being then no difference between them, no man calling himſelf Epiſcopum Epiſcoporum, as Cyprian elſewhere ſpeaks, ſome other way muſt be found out to preſerve order among them, and to moderate the affairs of the Councils; and therefore it was determined in the Council of Antioch, that he that was the Biſhop of the Metropolis, ſhould have the Can. 17. honour of Metropolitan among the Biſhops, Διὰ τὸ ἐν τῇ μητροπόλει πανταχόθεν συντρέχειν πάντας τȢς τὰ πράγματα ἔχοντας, ὅθεν ἔδοξε καὶ τῇ τιμῇ προηγεῖσθαι αὐτόν· becauſe of the great confluence of the people to that City, therefore he ſhould have the preheminence above the reſt. We ſee how far they are from attributing any Divine Right to Metropolitans; and therefore the Rights of Metropolitans are called by the ſixth Canon of the Nicene Council, τὰ ἀρχαῖα ἔθη, which had been a diſhonourable introduction for the Metropolitan rights, had they thought them grounded upon Apoſtolical inſtitution. Nothing more evident in Antiquity than the honour of Metropolitans depending upon their Sees; thence when any Cities were raiſed by the Emperor to the honour of Metropoles, their Biſhop became a Metropolitan, as is moſt evident in Juſtiniana prima, and for it there are Canons in the Councils decreeing it; but of this more afterwards. The chief Biſhop of Africa was only called primæ ſedis Epiſcopus: thence we have a Canon in the Codex Eccleſiæ Africanæ, Can 39. Ὥστε τὸν τῆς πρώτης καθέδρας ἐπίσκοπον μὴ λέγεσθαι ἔξαρχον τῶν ἱερέων ἢ ἄκρον ἱερέα, ἢ τοιουτότροπόν τι ποτε· ἀλλὰ μόνον ἐπίσκοπον τῆς πρώτης καθέδρας. That the Biſhop of the chief See ſhould not be called the Exarch of the Prieſts, or chief Prieſt, or any thing of like nature, but only the Biſhop of the chief Seat. Therefore it hath been well obſerved, that the African Churches did retain longeſt the Primitive ſimplicity and humility among them; and when the voice was ſaid to be heard in the Church upon the flowing in of Riches, Hodie venenum effuſum eſt in Eccleſiam, by the working of which poyſon the ſpirits of the Prelates began to ſwell with pride and ambition (as is too evident in Church-Hiſtory) only Africa eſcaped the infection moſt, and reſiſted the tyrannical incroachments of the Roman Biſhop, with the greateſt magnanimity and courage, as may be ſeen by the excellent Epiſtle of the Council of Carthage, to Boniface Biſhop of Rome in the Codex Eccleſiæ Africanæ. Pag. 341. So that however Africa hath been always fruitful of monſters; yet in that ambitious age it had no other wonder but only this, that it ſhould eſcape ſo free from that typhus ſæcularis (as then they called it) that monſtrous itch of pride and ambition. From whence we may well riſe to the laſt ſtep of the power of the Church, which was after the Empire grew Chriſtian, and many Provinces did aſſociate together, then the honour and power of Patriarchs came upon the ſtage. And now began the whole Chriſtian world to be the Cock-pit, wherein the two great Prelates of Rome and Conſtantinople ſtrive with their greateſt force for maſtery of one another, and the whole world with them; as may be ſeen in the actions of Paſchaſinus the Roman Legat in the Council of Chalcedon. From whence forward the great Leviathan by his tumbling in the Waves, endeavoured to get the Dominion of all into his hands: but God hath at laſt put a hook into his noſtrils, and raiſed up the great inſtruments of Reformation, who like the Sword-fiſh have ſo pierced into his Bowels, that by his tumbling he may only haſten his approaching ruine, and give the Church every day more hopes of ſeeing its ſelf freed from the tyranny of an uſurped power. By this ſcheme and draught now of the increaſe of the Churches power, nothing can be more evident, than that it roſe not from any divine inſtitution, but only from poſitive and Eccleſiaſtical Laws made according to the ſeveral ſtates and conditions wherein the Church was; which as it gradually grew up, ſo was the power of the Church by mutual conſent fitted to the ſtate of the Church in its ſeveral ages. Which was the firſt argument that the Primitive Church did not conceive it ſelf bound to obſerve any one unalterable form of Government. This being the chief, the reſt that follow, will ſooner be diſpatched.

The ſecond is from the great varieties as to Government which were in ſeveral Churches. What comes from Divine right is obſerved unalterably in one uniform and conſtant tenour: but what we find ſo much diverſified according to ſeveral places, we may have ground to look on only as an Eccleſiaſtical conſtitution, which was followed by every Church as it judged convenient. Now as to Church Government we may find ſome Churches without Biſhops for a long time, ſome but with one Biſhop in a whole Nation, many Cities without any, where Biſhops were common; many Churches diſcontinue Biſhops for a great while where they had been; no certain rule obſerved for modelling their Dioceſes where they were ſtill continued. Will not all theſe things make it ſeem very improbable that it ſhould be an Apoſtolical inſtitution, that no Church ſhould be without a Biſhop? Firſt then ſome whole Nations ſeem to have been without any Biſhops at all, if we may believe their own Hiſtorians. So if we may believe the great Antiquaries of the Church of Scotland, that Church was governed by their Culdei, as they called their Preſbyters, without any Biſhop over them, for a long time. Johannes Major ſpeaks of their inſtruction in the Faith, Per Sacerdotes & Monachos ſine Epiſcopis Scoti in fide eruditi; but leſt that ſhould be interpreted only of their converſion, Johannes Fordonus is clear and full as to their Government, from the time of their converſion about A. D. 263. to the coming of Palladius A. D. 430. that they were only governed by Preſbyters and Monks. Ante Palladii adventum habebant Scoti fidei Doctores ac Sacramentorum Miniſtratores Preſbyteros ſolummodo, vel Monachos ritum ſequentes Eccleſiæ primitivæ. So much miſtaken was that learned man, who ſaith, that neither Bede nor any other affirm that the Scots were formerly ruled by a Preſbytery, or ſo much as that they had any Preſbyter among them. Neither is it any ways ſufficient to ſay that theſe Preſbyters did derive their authority from ſome Biſhops: For however we ſee here a Church governed without ſuch, or if they had any, they were only choſen from their Culdei, much after the cuſtom of the Church of Alexandria, as Hector Boethius doth imply. And if we believe Philoſtorgius, the Gothick Churches were planted and governed by Preſbyters for above ſeventy years; for ſo long it was from their firſt converſion to the time of Ulphilas, whom he makes their firſt Biſhop. And great probability there is, that where Churches were planted by Preſbyters, as the Church of France by Andochius and Inignus, that afterwards upon the increaſe of Churches and Preſbyters to rule them, they did from among themſelves chuſe one to be as the Biſhop over them, as Pothinus was at Lyons. For we no where read in thoſe early plantations of Churches, that where there were Preſbyters already, they ſent to other Churches to derive Epiſcopal ordination from them. Now for whole Nations having but one Biſhop, we have the teſtimony of Sozomen, that in Scythia, which by the Romans was called Maſia inferior, πολλαὶ πόλεις ὄντες ἕνα πάντες ἐπίσκοπον ἔχουσιν. Although there were many Cities they had but one Biſhop. The like Godignus relates of the Abaſſine Churches, though their Territories be of vaſt extent, there is but only one Biſhop in all thoſe Dominions, who is the Biſhop of Abuna. And where Biſhops were moſt common, it is evident they looked not on it as an Apoſtolical rule for every City to have a Biſhop, which it muſt have if it was an Apoſtolical inſtitution for the Church to follow the Civil Government. Theodoret mentions 800 Churches under his charge, in whoſe Dioceſe Ptolomy placeth many other Cities of note beſides Cyrus, as Ariſeria, Regia, Ruba, Heraclea, &c. In the Province of Tripoly he reckons nine Cities which had but five Biſhops, as appears by the Notitia Eccleſiæ Africanæ. In Thracia every Biſhop had ſeveral Cities under him. The Biſhop of Heraclea that and Panion; the Biſhop of Byze had it and Arcadiopolis; of Cæla had it and Callipolis; Sabſadia had it and Aphrodiſias. It is needleſs to produce more inſtances of this nature, either ancient or modern, they being ſo common and obvious. But farther we find Biſhops diſcontinued for a long time in the greateſt Churches. For if there be no Church without a Biſhop, where was the Church of Rome when from the Martyrdom of Fabian, and the baniſhment of Lucius, the Church was governed only by the Clergy? So the Church of Carthage when Cyprian was baniſhed; the Church of the Eaſt, when Meletius of Antioch, Euſebius, Samoſatenus, Pelagius of Laodicea, and the reſt of the orthodox Biſhops were baniſhed for ten years ſpace, and Flavianus and Diodorus, two Preſbyters, ruled the Church of Antioch the mean while. The Church of Carthage was twenty four years without a Biſhop in the time of Hunerik, King of the Vandals; and when it was offered them that they might have a Biſhop upon admitting the Arians to a free exerciſe of their Religion among them, their anſwer was upon thoſe terms, Eccleſia Epiſcopum non delectatur habere; and Balſamon ſpeaking of the Chriſtian Churches in the Eaſt, determines it neither ſafe nor neceſſary in their preſent ſtate to have Biſhops ſet up over them. And laſtly, for their Dioceſes, it is evident there was no certain rule for modelling them. In ſome places they were far leſs than in others. Generally in the Primitive and Eaſtern Churches they were very ſmall and little, as far more convenient for the end of them in the Government of the Churches under the Biſhop's charge; it being obſerved out of Walafridus Strabo by a learned man, Fertur in Orientis partibus per ſingulas urbes & præfecturas ſingulas eſſe Epiſcoporum gubernationes. In Africk, if we look but into the writings of Auguſtine, we may find hundreds of Biſhops reſorting to one Council. In Ireland alone, St. Patrick is

The next evidence that the Church did not look upon it ſelf as bound by a Divine Law to obſerve any one Model of Government, is the conforming the Eccleſiaſtical Government to the Civil. For if the obligation aroſe from a Law of God, that muſt not be altered according to civil Conſtitutions, which are variable according to the different ſtate and conditions of things. If then the Apoſtles did ſettle things by a ſtanding Law in their own times, how comes the Model of Church-Government to alter with the Civil Form? Now that the Church did generally follow the Civil Government, is freely acknowledged and inſiſted on by learned perſons of all ſides; eſpecially after the diviſion of the Roman Empire by Conſtantine the Great. The full making out of which is a work too large to be here undertaken, and hath been done to very good purpoſe already, by Berterius, Salmaſius, Gothofred, Blondel, and others, in their learned Diſcourſes of the Suburbicarian Provinces. Which whether by them we underſtand that which did correſpond to the Præfecture of the Provoſt of Rome, which was within a hundred miles compaſs of the City of Rome, or that which anſwered to the Vicarius Urbis, whoſe Juriſdiction was over the Ten Provinces diſtinct from Italy, properly ſo called, whoſe Metropolis was Milan; or, which is moſt probable, the Metropolitan Province anſwering to the Juriſdiction of the Præfectus Urbis, and the Patriarchate of the Roman Biſhop to the Vicarius Urbis: which way ſoever we take it, we ſee it anſwered to the Civil Government. I ſhall not here enter that debate, but only briefly at preſent ſet down the Scheme of both Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Government, as it is repreſented by our learned Breerwood. The whole Empire of Rome was divided into Thirteen Dioceſes, whereof ſeven belonged to the Eaſt Empire, and ſix (beſide the Præfecture of the City of Rome) to the Weſt. Thoſe Thirteen Dioceſes, together with that Præfecture, contained among them 120 Provinces, or thereabout; ſo that to every Dioceſe belonged the adminiſtration of ſundry Provinces: Laſtly, Every Province contained many Cities within their Territories. The Cities had for their Rulers thoſe inferior Judges, which in the Law are called Defenſores Civitatum; and their Seats were the Cities themſelves, to which all the Towns and Villages in their ſeveral Territories were to reſort for Juſtice. The Provinces had for theirs, either Proconſules, or Conſulares, or Præſides, or Correctores; four ſundry appellations, but almoſt all of equal Authority, and their Seats were the chiefeſt Cities or Metropoles of the Provinces, of which in every Province there was one, to which all inferior Cities for judgment in matters of importance did reſort. Laſtly, The Dioceſes had for theirs the Lieutenants called Vicarii, and their Seats were the Metropoles or principal Cities of the Dioceſe, whence the Edicts of the Emperour or other Laws were publiſhed and ſent abroad into all the Provinces of the Dioceſe, and where the Prætorium and chief Tribunal for Judgment was placed to determine Appeals, and miniſter Juſtice (as might be occaſion) to all the Provinces belonging to that Juriſdiction. And this was the diſpoſition of the Roman Governours.——— And truly it is wonderful, (ſaith that learned Author) how nearly and exactly the Church in her Government did imitate this civil Ordination of the

the Roman Magiſtrates. For firſt in every City, as there was a Defenſor Civitatis for ſecular Government, ſo was there placed a Biſhop for Spiritual Regiment, (in every City of the Eaſt, and in every City of the Weſt, almoſt a ſeveral Biſhop) whoſe Juriſdiction extended but to the City, and the places within the Territory. For which cauſe the Juriſdiction of a Biſhop was anciently called Παρɛοικία, ſignifying not (as many ignorant Noveliſts think) a Pariſh: as now the word is taken, that is, the Places or Habitations near a Church, but the Towns and Villages near a City: all which, together with the City, the Biſhop had in charge. Secondly, In every Province, as there was a Preſident, ſo there was an Archbiſhop, and becauſe his Seat was the principal City of the Province, he was commonly known by the name of Metropolitan. Laſtly, In every Dioceſe, as there was a Lieutenant-General, ſo was there a Primate ſeated alſo in the principal City of the Dioceſe, as the Lieutenant was, to whom the laſt determining of Appeals from all the Provinces in differences of the Clergy, and the ſovereign care of all the Dioceſes, for ſundry points of Spiritual Government did belong. By this you may ſee that there were Eleven Primates beſides the Three Patriarchs for the Thirteen Dioceſes, (beſides the Præfecture of the City of Rome, which was adminiſtred by the Patriarch of Rome) that of Egypt was governed by the Patriarch of Alexandria, and that of the Orient by the Patriarch of Antiochia, and all the reſt by the Primates, between whom and the Patriarchs was no difference of Juriſdiction and Power, but only of ſome Honour which accrued to them by the dignity of their Sees; as is clearly expreſſed in the third Canon of the Council of Conſtantinople, Τὸν μὲν τοι Κωνςαντινοπόλεως ἐπίσκοπον ἔχειν τὰ πρεσβεῖα τῆς τιμῆς μετὰ τὸν τῆς Ῥώμης ἐπίσκοπον. διὰ τὸ εἶναι αὐτὸν νέαν Ῥώμην, whereby Conſtantinople is advanced to the Honorary Title of a Patriarchat next to Rome, becauſe it was New Rome. In Cod. Can. 166. Whereby it is evident that the Honour belonging to the Biſhop of Old Rome, did ariſe from its being the Imperial City. The Honour of the Biſhop riſing, as Auſtin ſaith, that of the Deacons of Rome did, propter magnificentiam Urbis Romanæ quæ caput eſſe videtur omnium Civitatum. Queſt. ex utroq. Teſt. q. 101. Hereby now we fully ſee what the original was of the power of Archbiſhops, Metropolitans and Patriarchs in the Church, viz. the contemperating the Eccleſiaſtical Government to the Civil.

§. 8. The next evidence that the Church did not look upon its ſelf as bound by a Divine Law to a certain form of Government, but did order things its ſelf in order to peace and unity, is, that after Epiſcopal Government was ſetled in the Church, yet Ordination by Preſbyters was looked on as valid. For which theſe inſtances may ſuffice. About the year 390, Johannes Caſſianus reports, that one Abbot Daniel, inferior to none of thoſe who lived in the Deſart of Scetis, was made a Deacon, Collat. 4. c. 1. à B. Paphnutio ſolitudinis ejuſdem Preſbytero: In tantum enim virtutibus ipſius adaugebat, ut quem vitæ meritis ſibi & gratiâ parem noverat, coæquare ſibi etiam Sacerdotii honore feſtinaret. Siquidem nequaquam ferens in inferiore eum miniſterio diutius immorari, optanſque ſibimet ſucceſſorem digniſſimum providere, ſuperſtes cum Preſbyterii honore provexit. What more plain and evident, than that there a Preſbyter ordained a Preſbyter, which we no where read was pronounced null by Theophilus, then Biſhop of Alexandria, or any others at that time? It is a known inſtance, that in the ordination of Pelagius, firſt Biſhop of Rome, there were only two Biſhops concurred, and one Preſbyter, whereas, according to the fourth Canon of the Nicene Council, three Biſhops are abſolutely required for ordination of a Biſhop; either then Pelagius was no Canonical Biſhop, and ſo the point of Succeſſion thereby fails in the Church of Rome, or elſe a Preſbyter hath the ſame intrinſecal power of ordination which a Biſhop hath, but it is only reſtrained by Eccleſiaſtical Laws. In the time of Euſtathius, Biſhop of Antioch, which was done A. D. 328, as Jacobus Gothofredus proves, till the time of the ordination of Paulinus, A. D. 362. which was for thirty four years ſpace, when the Church was governed by Paulinus and his Colleagues withdrawing from the publick Aſſemblies; it will be hard to ſay by whom the ordinations were performed all this while, unleſs by Paulinus and his Colleagues. In the year 452, it appears by Leo in his Epiſtle to Ruſticus Narbonenſis, that ſome Preſbyters took upon them to ordain as Biſhops, about which he was conſulted by Ruſticus what was to be done in that caſe with thoſe ſo ordained: Leo his reſolution of that caſe is obſervable, Si qui autem Clerici ab iſtis pſeudo-Epiſcopis in iis Eccleſiis ordinati ſunt, quæ ad proprios Epiſcopos pertinebant, & ordinatio eorum cum conſenſu & judicio præſidentium facta eſt, poteſt rata haberi, ita ut in ipſis Eccleſiis perſeverent. “Thoſe Clergy-men who were ordained by ſuch as took upon them the Office of Biſhops, in Churches belonging to proper Biſhops, if the Ordination were performed by the conſent of the Biſhops, it may be looked on as valid, and thoſe Preſbyters remain in their Office in the Church. So that by the conſent ex poſt facto of the true Biſhops, thoſe Preſbyters thus ordained, were looked on as lawful Preſbyters, which could not be, unleſs their Ordainers had an intrinſecal power of Ordination, which was only reſtrained by the Laws of the Church; for if they have no power of Ordination, it is impoſſible they ſhould confer any thing by their ordination. If to this It be anſwered, that the validity of their ordination did not depend upon the conſent of the Biſhops, and that Preſbyters may ordain, if delegated thereto by Biſhops, as Paulinus might ordain on that account at Antioch. It is eaſily anſwered, that this very power of doing it by delegation, doth imply an intrinſecal power in themſelves of doing it. For if Preſbyters be forbidden ordaining others by Scriptures, then they can neither do it in their own perſons, nor by delegation from others. For quod alicui ſuo nomine non licet, nec alieno licebit: And that rule of Cyprian muſt hold true, Non aliquid cuiquam largiri poteſt humana indulgentia, ubi intercedit & legem tribuit divina præſcriptio. There can be no diſpenſing with Divine Laws, which muſt be, if that may be delegated to other perſons, which was required of men in the Office wherein they are. And if Preſbyters have power of conferring nothing by their Ordination, how can an after-conſent of Biſhops make that act of theirs valid, for conferring right and power by it? It appears then, that this power was reſtrained by the Laws of the Church, for preſerving Unity in its ſelf; but yet ſo, that in caſe of neceſſity, what was done by Preſbyters, was not looked on as invalid. But againſt this the caſe of Iſchyras, ordained, as it is ſaid, a Preſbyter by Colluthus, and pronounced null by the Council of Alexandria, is commonly pleaded. but there is no great difficulty in anſwering it. For, Firſt, The pronouncing ſuch an Ordination null, doth not evidence that they looked on the power of Ordination, as belonging of divine right only to Biſhops; for we find by many inſtances, that acting in a bare contempt of Eccleſiaſtical Canons was ſufficient to degrade any from being Preſbyters. Secondly, If Iſchyras had been ordained by a Biſhop, there were circumſtances enough to induce the Council to pronounce it null. Firſt, As done out of the Dioceſe, in which caſe Ordinations were nulled by Concil. Arel. c. 13. Secondly, Done by open and pronouuced Schiſmaticks. Thirdly, Done ſine titulo ἀπολελυμένως, and ſo nulled by the Canons then. Fourthly, Colluthus did not act as a Preſbyter in ordaining, but as a Biſhop of the Meletian party in Cynus, as the Clergy of Mareotis ſpeaking of Iſchyras his Ordination, ὑπὸ Κολλȣ́θȣ τȣ͂ Πρεσβυτέρȣ φαντασθέντος Ἐπισκοπὴν by Colluthus a Preſbyter, making ſhew of being a Biſhop; and is ſuppoſed to have been ordained a Apol. S. 3. à 317. ad. 327. Biſhop by Meletius. More concerning this may be ſeen in Blondel, who fully clears all the particulars here mentioned. So that notwithſtanding this Inſtance, nothing appears, but that the power of Ordination was reſtrained only by Eccleſiaſtical Laws.

§. 9. The laſt thing to prove that the Church did act upon prudence in Church-Government, is, from the many reſtraints in other caſes made by the Church, for reſtraint of that liberty which was allowed by Divine Laws. He muſt be a ſtranger to the ancient Canons, and Conſtitutions of the Church, that takes not notice of ſuch reſtraints made by Canons, as in reference to obſervation of ſeveral Rites and Cuſtoms in the Churches, determined by the Provincial Synods of the ſeveral Churches; for which purpoſe their Provincial Synods were ſtill Ep. 75. kept up in the Eaſtern Church, as appears by the Teſtimony of Firmilian in his Epiſtle to Cyprian: Quæ ex cauſa neceſſariò apud nos fit ut per ſingulos annos ſeniores & præpoſiti in unum conveniamus ad diſponenda ea quæ curæ noſtræ commiſſa ſunt. Ut ſi quæ graviora ſunt communi conſilio dirigantur, lapſis quoque fratribus, &c. medela quæratur, non quaſi à nobis remiſſionem peccatorum conſequantur; ſed ut per nos ad intelligentiam delictorum ſuorum convertantur, & Domino pleniùs ſatisfacere cogantur. The ſeveral Orders about the Diſcipline of the Church were determined in theſe Synods; as to which, he that would find a command in Scripture for their Orders about the Catechumeni, and Lapſi, will take pains to no purpoſe, the Church ordering things it ſelf for the better regulating the ſeveral Churches they were placed over. A demonſtrative argument, that theſe things came not from Divine command, is, from the great diverſity of theſe cuſtoms in ſeveral places: Hiſt. lib. 7. cap. 19. V. Juſtel. Præfat. in Cod. Canonum Univerſ. Eccl. of which beſides Socrates, Sozomen largely ſpeaks, and may be eaſily gathered from the Hiſtory of the ſeveral Churches: When the Church began to enjoy eaſe and liberty, and thereby had opportunity of enjoying greater conveniency for Councils; we find what matters were determined by thoſe Councils, were entered into a Codex Canonum for that purpoſe, which was obſerved next to the Scriptures, not from any obligation of the things themſelves, but from the conduceableneſs of thoſe things (as they judged them) to the preſerving the peace and unity of the Church.

The reaſonableneſs and eaſineſs of Accommodation ſhewed. The whole concluded.*

Having thus far proceeded, through Divine aſſiſtance, in our intended method, and having found nothing determining the neceſſity of any one Form of Government in the ſeveral Laws of Nature and Chriſt, nor in the practice of Apoſtles, or Primitive Church; the only thing poſſible to raiſe a ſuſpition of novelty in this opinion, is, that it is contrary to the judgment of the ſeveral Churches of the Reformation. I know it is the laſt Aſylum which many run to, when they are beaten off from their imaginary fancies, by pregnant teſtimonies of Scripture and Reaſon, to ſhelter themſelves under the Αὐτὸς ἔφη of ſome particu- §. 1.

lar perſons, to whom their underſtandings are bored in perpetual ſlavery: But if Men would but once think their Underſtandings at age to judge for themſelves, and not make them live under a continual Pupillage, and but take the pains to travel over the ſeveral Churches of the Reformation, they would find themſelves freed of many ſtrange miſpriſions they were poſſeſſed with before, and underſtand far better the ground and reaſon of their pitching upon their ſeveral Forms, than they ſeem to do, who found all things upon a Divine Right. I believe there will, upon the moſt impartial ſurvey, ſcarce be one Church of the Reformation brought, which doth imbrace any Form of Government, becuſe it looked upon that Form as only neceſſary by an unalterable ſtanding Law; but every one took up that Form of Government which was judged moſt ſuitable to the ſtate and condition of their ſeveral Churches: But that I may the better make this appear, I ſhall make uſe of ſome arguments whereby to demonſtrate, that the moſt eminent Divines that have lived ſince the Reformation, have been all of this mind, That no one Form is determined as neceſſary for the Church of God in all Ages of the World. For if many of them have in theſi aſſerted the Form of Church-Government mutable; if thoſe who have thought an equality among Miniſters the Primitive Form, have yet thought a Government by Epiſcopacy lawful and uſeful: If, laſtly, thoſe who have been for Epiſcopacy, have not judged it neceſſary, then I ſuppoſe it will be evident, that none of them have judged any one Form taken excluſively of others, to be founded upon an unalterable right: For whatſoever is ſo founded, is made a neceſſary duty in all Churches to obſerve it, and it is lawful to vary from it, or to change it according to the prudence of the Church, according to the ſtate and condition of it. I now therefore undertake to make theſe things out in their order.

§. 2. Firſt, I begin with thoſe who have in theſi aſſerted the mutability of the Form of Church Government. Herein I ſhall not follow the Engliſh humour, to be more acquainted with the ſtate of Foreign places than their own; but it being of greateſt concernment to know upon what accounts Epiſcopal Government was ſetled among our ſelves, in order to our ſubmiſſion to it; I ſhall therefore make enquiry into the judgment of thoſe perſons concerning it, who either have been inſtrumental in ſetling it, or the great defenders of it after its ſettlement. I doubt not but to make it evident, that before theſe late unhappy times, the main ground for ſetling Epiſcopal Government in this Nation, was not accounted any pretence of Divine Right, but the conveniency of that Form of Church Government to the ſtate and condition of this Church at the time of its Reformation: For which we are to conſider, that the Reformation of our Church was not wrought by the Torrent of a popular fury, nor the Inſurrection of one part of the Nation againſt another; but was wiſely, gravely, and maturely debated, and ſetled with a great deal of conſideration. I meddle not with the times of Henry 8. when I will not deny but the firſt quickning of the Reformation might be, but the matter of it was as yet rude and undigeſted; I date the birth of it from the firſt ſettlement of that moſt excellent Prince Edward 6. the Phoſphorus of our Reformation. Who A. D. 1547. was no ſooner entered upon his Throne, but ſome courſe was preſently taken in order to Reformation. Commiſſioners with Injunctions were diſpatched to the ſeveral parts of the Land; but the main buſineſs of the Reformation was referred to the Parliament call'd November 4. the ſame year, when all former Statutes about Religion were recall'd, as may be ſeen at large in Mr. Fox, and Liberty allowed for profeſſing the Goſpel according to the principles of Reformation, all baniſhed perſons for Religion being call'd home. Upon this, for the better eſtabliſhing of Religion, and the publick Order for the Service of God, an Aſſembly of ſelect Divines is call'd, by ſpecial order from the King's Majeſty, for debating of the ſetlement of things according to the Word of God, and the practice of the Primitive Church. Theſe ſate, as Mr. Fox tells us in Windſor-Caſtle; where, as he expreſſeth it, after long, learned, wiſe, and deliberate Adviſes, they did finally conclude and agree upon one uniform order, &c. No more is ſaid by him of it, and leſs by the late Hiſtorian. The proceedings then in order to Reformation, being ſo dark hitherto, and obſcure, by what is as yet extant, much light may accrue thereto by the help of ſome authentick MSS. which by a hand of Providence, have happily come into my hands; wherein the manner and method of the Reformation will be more evident to the World, and the grounds upon which they proceeded. In the Convocation that year ſitting with the Parliament, I find two Petitions made to the Archbiſhop and the Biſhops of the Upper Houſe, for the calling an Aſſembly of ſelect Divines, in order to the ſettling Church Affairs, and for the King's Grant for their acting in Convocation. Which not being yet to my knowledge extant in publick, and conducing to our preſent buſineſs, I ſhall now publiſh from the MS. of Biſhop Cranmer's.

Acts and. Mon. To m 2. p. 657.

Martyrol. in. Tom. 2. p. 658, 659.

They run thus:

Certeyne Petitions and Requeſts made by the Clergy of the Lower Houſe of the Convocation, to the moſt Reverend Father in God, the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury's Grace, and the Reſidue of the Prelates of the Higher Houſe, for the furtherance of certeyne Articles following.

Firſt, "That Eccleſiaſtical Laws may be made and eſtabliſhed in this "Realm, by xxxij. perſons, or ſo many as ſhall pleaſe the King's Ma-"jeſty to name and appoint, according to the effect of a late Statute "made in the Thirty fifth year of the moſt noble King, and of moſt "famous memory, King Henry the Eighth. So that all Judges Eccle-"ſiaſtical proceeding after thoſe Laws, may be without danger and "peril.

"Alſo that according to the ancient cuſtom of this Realm, and the "Tenor of the King's Writs for the ſummoning of the Parliament, "which be now and ever have been directed to the Biſhops of every "Dioceſe, the Clergy of the Lower Houſe of the Convocation may be "adjoined and aſſociate with the Lower Houſe of Parliament, or elſe "that all ſuch Statutes and Ordinances as ſhall be made concerning all "matters of Religion and Cauſes Eccleſiaſtical, may not paſs without "the ſight and aſſent of the ſaid Clergy.

“ Alſo that whereas by the commandment of King Henry the Eighth, certeyne Prelates and other Learned men were appointed to alter the Service in the Church, and to deviſe other convenient and uniform order therein, who according to the ſame appointment did make certeyne Books as they be enformed, their requeſt is that the ſaid Books may be ſeen and peruſed by them for a better expedition of Divine Service to be ſet furthe accordingly.

“ Alſo that Men being called to Spiritual Promotions or Benefices, may have ſome allowance for their neceſſary living, and other charges to be ſuſteyned and born concerning the ſaid Benefices in the firſt year wherein they pay the Firſt-Fruits.

The other is,

“ Where the Clergy in the preſent Convocation Aſſembled have made humble ſuite unto the moſt Reverend Father in God my Lord Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and all other Biſhops, That hit may pleaſe them to be a mean to the King's Majeſty, and the Lord Protector's Grace, that the ſaid Clergy, according to the tenor of the King's Will, and the auncient Laws and Cuſtoms of this noble Realm, might have their rowme and Place, and be aſſociated with the Communs in the nether Houſe of this preſent Parliament, as Members of the Communwealth, and the King's moſt humble Subjects, and if this may not be permitted and granted to them, that then no Laws concerning the Chriſtian Religion, or which ſhall concern eſpecially the perſons, poſſeſſions, rowmes, lyveings, juriſdictions, goods, or cattals of the ſaid Clergy may paſs nor be enacted, the ſaid Clergy not being made privy thereunto, and their anſwers and reaſons not heard. The ſaid Clergy do moſt humbly beſeech an anſwer and declaration to be made unto them, what the ſaid moſt Reverend Father in God, and all other the Biſhops have done in this their humble ſuit and requeſt, to the end that the ſaid Clergy, if nede be, may choſe of themſelf ſuch able and diſcrete perſons which ſhall effectually follow the ſame ſuite in name of them all.

“ And where in a Statute ordained and eſtabliſhed by auctorite of Parliament at Weſtminſter, in the twenty fifth year of the reign of the moſt excellent Prince, King Henry the Eighth, the Clergy of this Realm ſubmitting themſelf to the King's Highneſs, did knowledge and confeſs according to the truth, that the Convocations of the ſame Clergy hath ben and ought to be aſſembled by the King's Writ; And did promiſe further in verbo ſacerdotii, that they never from thence forth wolde preſume to attempt, allege, clayme, or put in ure or enact, promulge or execute any new Canons, Conſtitutions, Ordinances, Provincials, or other, or by whatſoever other name they ſhall be called in the Convocation, oneleſs the Kings moſt Royal Aſſent and Liſence may to them be had, to make, promulge, and execute the ſame. Thus far thoſe Petitions, containing ſome excellent propoſals for a through Reformation. Soon after were called together by the King's ſpecial order, the former ſelect Aſſembly at Windſor Caſtle, where met (as far as I can gueſs by the ſeveral Papers delivered in by every one of them ſingly, and ſubſcribed with their own hands, all which I have peruſed) theſe following perſons. Thomas Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Edward Archbiſhop of Yorke, the Biſhop of Rocheſter, Edmund Biſhop of London, Robert Biſhop of Carliſle, Dr. George Day, Dr. Thomas Robertſon, Dr. I. Redmayne, Dr. Edward Leighton, Dr. Symon Matthew, Dr. William Treſham, Dr. Richard Cozen, Dr. Edgeworth, Dr. Owen Oglethorp, Dr. Thyrleby. Theſe all gave in their ſeveral reſolution in papers, to the Queſtions propounded, with their names ſubſcribed, (a far more prudent way then the confuſion of verbal and tedious diſputes) all whoſe judgments are accurately ſummed up, and ſet down by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury himſelf. Their reſolutions contain diſtinct anſwers to ſeveral ſets of queſtions propounded to them. The firſt Set contained ſeveral queſtions about the Maſs, about the inſtituting, receiving, nature, celebration of it; and whether in the Maſs it be convenient to uſe ſuch ſpeech as the people may underſtand, whether the whole were fit to be tranſlated, or only ſome part of it; with ſeveral other queſtions of the ſame nature. The ſecond Set is more pertinent to our purpoſe, wherein are 17 Queſtions propoſed to be reſolved; Ten of them belong to the number of Sacraments, the other 7 concern Church-Government. The Queſtions are theſe.

T. Cantuarienſ. This is mine opinion and ſentence at this preſent, which I do not temerariouſly define, but do remitt the judgment thereof holly to your Majeſty.

Which I have exactly tranſcribed out of the Original, and have obſerved generally the form of writing at that time uſed. In the ſame MS. it appears, that the Biſhop of St. Aſaph, Therleby, Redman, and Cox, were all of the ſame opinion with the Archbiſhop, that at firſt Biſhops and Preſbyters were the ſame; and the two latter expreſly cite the opinion of Jerome with approbation. Thus we ſee by the teſtimony, chiefly of him who was inſtrumental in our Reformation, that he owned not Epiſcopacy as a diſtinct order from Preſbytery of Divine Right, but only as a prudent conſtitution of the Civil Magiſtrate for the better governing in the Church.

§. 3. We now proceed to the re-eſtabliſhment of Church-Government under our moſt happy Queen Elizabeth. After our Reformation had truly undergone the fiery tryal in Queen Mary's days, and by thoſe flames was made much more refined and pure, as well as ſplendid and illuſtrious: In the articles of Religion agreed upon, our Engliſh Form of Church-Government was only determined to be agreeable to God's Holy Word, which had been a very low and diminiſhing expreſſion, had they looked on it as abſolutely preſcribed and determined in Scripture, as the only neceſſary Form to be obſerved in the Church. The firſt who ſolemnly appeared in vindication of the Engliſh Hierarchy was Arch-Biſhop Whitgiſt, a ſage and prudent perſon, whom we cannot ſuppoſe either ignorant of the ſenſe of the Church of England, or afraid or unwilling to defend it. Yet he frequently againſt Cartwright aſſerts, Pag. 3.

of Epiſcopacy as founded upon Apoſtolical practice, is quite ſubverted and deſtroyed. To come nearer to our own unhappy times:
Not long before the breaking forth of thoſe never ſufficiently to be lamented inteſtine Broils, we have the judgment of two learned, judicious, rational Authors fully diſcovered as to the point in queſtion.
The firſt is that incomparable man, Mr. Hales, in his often cited Tract of Schiſm, whoſe words are theſe: But that other head of Epiſcopal Page 13.
Ambition concerning Supremacy of Biſhops in divers Sees, one claiming ming Supremacy over another, as it hath been from time to time a great treſpaſs againſt the Church's peace, ſo it is now the final ruin of it: The Eaſt and Weſt through the fury of the two prime Biſhops, being irremediably ſeparated without all hope of reconcilement. And beſides all this miſchief, it is founded on a Vice contrary to all Chriſtian humility, without which no man ſhall ſee his Saviour. For they do but abaſe themſelves and others, that would perſuade us, that Biſhops by Chriſt's inſtitution have any ſuperiority over men, farther than of Reverence, or that any Biſhop is ſuperior to another, farther than poſitive order agreed upon among Chriſtians hath preſcribed: for we have believed him that hath told us, that in Jeſus Chriſt there is neither high nor low: and that in giving honours every man ſhould be ready to prefer another before himſelf: which ſaying cuts off all claim certainly of ſuperiority, by title of Chriſtianity, except men think that theſe things were ſpoken only to poor and private men. Nature and Religion agree in this, that neither of them hath a hand in this Heraldry of ſecundum ſub & ſupra; all this comes from compoſition and agreement of men among themſelves; wherefore this abuſe of Chriſtianity to make it a Lacquey to Ambition, is a Vice for which I have no extraordinary name of ignominy, and an ordinary I will not give it, leſt you ſhould take ſo tranſcendent a Vice to be but trivial. Thus that grave and wiſe perſon, whoſe words ſavour of a more than ordinary tincture of a true ſpirit of Chriſtianity, that ſcorns to make Religion a footſtool to pride and ambition. We ſee plainly he makes all difference between Church-Officers to ariſe from conſent of parties, and not from any Divine Law. To the ſame purpoſe Mr. Chillingworth propounds this Queſtion among many others to his Adverſary: Whether any one kind of theſe external Forms and Orders and Government be ſo neceſſary to the being of a Church, but that they may be diverſe in diverſe places, and that a good and peaceable Chriſtian may and ought to ſubmit himſelf to the Government of the place where he lives, whoſoever he be? Which Queſtion according to the tenour of the reſt to which it is joined, muſt as to the former part be reſolved in the Negative, and as to the latter in the Affirmative. Which is the very thing I have been ſo long in proving of, viz. that no one form of Church-Government is ſo neceſſary to the being of a Church, but that a good and peaceable Chriſtian may and ought to conform himſelf to the Government of that place where he lives. So much I ſuppoſe may ſuffice to ſhew that the opinion which I have aſſerted, is no ſtranger in our own Nation, no not among thoſe who have been profeſſed defenders of the Eccleſiaſtical Government of this Church.

Chillingw. Ep. 1. ch. 6. §. 39.

§. 4. Having thus far acquainted our ſelves with the ſtate and cuſtoms of our own Country, we may be allowed the liberty of viſiting forreign Churches, to ſee how far they concur with us in the matter in queſtion. The firſt perſon whoſe judgment we ſhall produce aſſerting the mutability of the form of Church-Government, is that great light of the German Church, Chemnitius, whom Brightman had ſo high an opinion of as to make him to be one of the Angels in the Churches of the Revelation. He diſcourſing about the Sacrament of Order, as the Papiſts call it, lays down theſe following

Exam. Con. Trid. cap. 2. de ſacram. ord. can. 1. 413, 414.

Hypotheſes as certain truths. 1. Non eſſe Dei verbo mandatum qui vel quot tales gradus ſeu ordines eſſe debent. 2. Non fuiſſe tempore Apoſtolorum in omnibus Eccleſiis & ſemper eoſdem & totidem gradus ſeu ordines, id quod ex Epiſtolis Pauli ad diverſas Eccleſias ſcriptis manifeſtè colligitur. 3. Non fuit tempore Apoſtolorum talis diſtributio graduum illorum, quin ſæpius unus & idem omnia illa officia, quæ ad miniſterium pertinent, ſuſtineret. Liberæ igitur fuerunt Apoſtolorum tempore tales ordinationes habitâ ratione ordinis, decori & ædificationis, &c. Illud Apoſtolorum exemplum Primitiva Eccleſia eadem ratione & ſimili libertate imitata eſt. Gradus enim officiorum miniſterii diſtributi fuerunt: non autem eadem plane ratione ſicut in Corinthiaca vel Epheſina Eccleſia, ſed pro ratione circumſtantiarum cujuſq; Eccleſiæ, unde colligitur quæ fuerit in diſtributione illorum graduum libertas. The main thing he aſſerts, is, the Churches freedom and liberty as to the orders and degrees of thoſe who ſuperintend the affairs of the Church, which he builds on a threefold foundation, 1. That the word of God no where commands, what or how many degrees and orders of Miniſters there ſhall be. 2. That in the Apoſtles times, there was not the like number in all Churches, as is evident from Paul's Epiſtles. 3. That in the Apoſtles times, in ſome places, one perſon did manage the ſeveral Offices belonging to a Church. Which three Propoſitions of this learned Divine, are the very baſis and foundation of all our foregoing diſcourſe, wherein we have endeavoured to prove theſe ſeveral things at large. The ſame learned perſon hath a ſet diſcourſe to ſhew how by degrees the offices in the Church did riſe, not from any ſet or ſtanding Law, but for the convenient managery of the Church's affairs, and concludes his diſcourſe thus, Et hæc prima graduum ſeu ordinum origo in Eccleſia Apoſtolica oſtendit quæ cauſa, quæ ratio, quis uſus & finis eſſe debeat hujuſmodi ſeu graduum, ſeu ordinum; ut ſcilicet pro ratione cœtûs Eccleſiaſtici, ſingula officia qua ad miniſterium pertinent, commodius, rectius, diligentius, & ordine cum aliqua gravitate ad ædificationem obeantur. The ſum is, It appears by the practice of the Apoſtolical Church, that the ſtate, condition and neceſſity of every particular Church, ought to be the Standard and Meaſure what Offices and degree of perſons ought to be in it. As to the uncertain number of Officers in the Churches in Apoſtolical times, we have a full and expreſs teſtimony of the famous Centuriators of Magdeburge. Quot vero in qualibet Eccleſia perſonæ Miniſterio functæ ſint, non eſt in hiſtoriis annotatum, nec uſquam eſt præceptum, ut æque multi in ſingulis eſſent, ſed prout paucitas aut multitudo cœtus poſtulavit, ita pauciores aut plures ad miniſterium eccleſiæ ſunt adhibiti. We ſee by them there is no other certain rule laid down in Scripture, what number of perſons ſhall act in the governing every Church; only general prudence according to the Churches neceſſity, was the ground of determining the number then, and muſt be ſo ſtill. The next perſon whoſe judgment is fully on our ſide, is a perſon both of learning and moderation, and an earneſt reſtorer of Diſcipline as well as Doctrine in the Church. I mean Hieron Zanchy, who in ſeveral places hath expreſſed his judgment to the purpoſe we are now upon. The fulleſt place is in his Confeſſion of Faith, penned penned by him in the ſeventieth year of his age; and if ever a man ſpeaks his mind, it muſt be certainly when he profeſſeth his judgment in a ſolemn manner by way of his laſt Will and Teſtament to the world (that when the Soul is going into another world, he may leave his mind behind him.) Thus doth Zanchy in that Confeſſion, in which he declares this to be his judgment as to the form of Church-Government; That in the Apoſtles times there were but two orders under them, viz. of Paſtors and Teachers: but preſently ſubjoyns theſe words, Interea tamen non improbamus Patres, quod juxta variam, tum verbi diſpenſandi, tum regendæ Eccleſiæ rationem, varios quoque ordines miniſtrorum multiplicârint, quando id iis liberum fuit, ſicut, & nobis; & quando conſtat id ab illis factum honeſtis de cauſis, ad ordinem, ad decorum & ad ædificationem eccleſiæ pro eo tempore pertinentibus. And in the next Section, Novimus enim Deum noſtrum Deum eſſe ordinis non confuſionis, & eccleſiam ſervari ordine, perdi autem ἀταξία, qua de cauſa multos etiam & diverſos, non ſolum olim in Iſraele, verum etiam poſt in eccleſia ex Judæis & Gentibus collecta, miniſtrorum ordines inſtituit; & eandem etiam ob cauſam, liberum reliquit Eccleſiis, ut plures adderent vel non adderent, modo ad ædificationem fieret. He aſſerts it to be in the Church's power and liberty to add ſeveral orders of Miniſters according as it judgeth them to tend to edification; and ſaith, he is far from condemning the Courſe of the Primitive Church in erecting one as Biſhop over the Preſbyters, for better managing Church affairs; yea Arch-Biſhops, Metropolitans, and Patriarchs as inſtituted by the Primitive Church before the Nicene Council, he thinks may be both excuſed and defended, although afterward they degenerated into Tyranny and Ambition. And in his obſervations upon his confeſſion, penned chiefly upon the occaſion of the exceptions of Magnus quidem Vir (ſome will gueſs who that was) taken at the free delivery of his mind concerning the Polity of the Primitive Church, he hath expreſſions to this purpoſe: That what was unanimouſly determined by the Primitive Church without any contradiction to Scripture, did come from the Holy Spirit. Hinc ſit, ſaith he, ut quæ ſint hujuſcemodi, ea ego improbare nec velim, nec audeam bona conſcientia. Quis autem ego ſim, qui, quod tota eccleſia approbabit, improbem? Such things, ſaith he, as are ſo determined, I neither will nor can with a ſafe conſcience condemn. For who am I, that I ſhould condemn that which the whole Church of God hath approved? A ſentence as full of judgment as modeſty. And that he might ſhew he was not alone in this opinion, he produceth two large and excellent diſcourſes of Martin Bucer concerning the Polity of the ancient Church, which he recites with approbation; the one out of his Commentaries on the Epheſians, the other de diſciplina Clericali, whereby we have gained another teſtimony of that famous and peaceable Divine, whoſe judgment is too large to be here inſerted. The ſame opinion of Zanchy may be ſeen in his Commentaries upon the fourth Command, wherein he aſſerts no particular form to be preſcribed, but only general rules laid down in Scripture, that all be done to edification; ſpeaking of the original of Epiſcopacy which came not diſpoſitione Divina, but conſuetudine Eccleſiaſtica, atque ea quidem minime improbanda; neque enim hunc ordinem prohibuit Chriſtus, ſed potius regulam generalem reliquit per Apoſtolum, ut in Eccleſia omnia fiant ad ædificationem. It is then moſt clear and evident that neither Bucer, Chemnitius or Zanchy did look upon the Church as ſo bound up by any immutable form of Church-Government laid down in Scripture, but it might lawfully and laudably alter it for better edification of the Church. For theſe learned Divines conceiving that at firſt in the Church there was no difference between Biſhop and Preſbyter, and commending the Polity of the Church when Epiſcopacy was ſet in a higher order, they muſt of neceſſity hold that there was no obligation to obſerve that Form which was uſed in Apoſtolical times.

Our next enquiry is into the opinion of the French Church and the eminent Divines therein. For Calvin and Beza, we have deſigned them under another rank. At preſent we ſpeak of thoſe who in theſi aſſert the form of Church-Government mutable. The firſt we meet with here who fully lays down his opinion as to this matter, is, Joh. Fregevil, who although in his Palma Chriſtiana he ſeems to aſſert the Divine right of primacy in the Church, yet in his Politick Reformer, he aſſerts both forms of Government by equality and inequality, to be lawful. And we ſhall the rather produce his teſtimony, becauſe of the high character given of him by the late Rev. Biſhop Hall. Wiſe Fregevil, a deep head, and one that was able to cut even betwixt the League, the Church and State; His words are theſe, As for the Engliſh-Government, I ſay it is grounded upon God's word ſo far forth as it keepeth the ſtate of the Clergy inſtituted in the Old Teſtament, and confirmed in the New. And concerning the Government of the French Church, ſo far as concerneth the equality of Miniſters, it hath the like foundation in God's Word: namely in the example of the Apoſtles; which may ſuffice to authorize both theſe Forms of eſtate; albeit in ſeveral times and places none can deny but that the Apoſtles among themſelves were equal, as concerning authority, albeit there were an order for their precedency. When the Apoſtles firſt planted Churches, the ſame being ſmall and in affliction, there were not as yet any other Biſhops, Prieſts, or Deacons but themſelves; they were the Biſhops and Deacons, and together ſerved the Tables. Theſe men therefore whom God raiſeth up to plant a Church, can do no better, than after the examples of the Apoſtles to bear themſelves in equal authority. For this cauſe have the French Miniſters, planters of the Reformed Church in France uſurped it, howbeit proviſionally —— reſerving liberty to alter it, according to the occurrences. But the equality that reſted among the Biſhops of the Primitive Church, did increaſe as the Churches increaſed; and thence proceeded the Creation of Deacons, and afterwards of other Biſhops and Prieſts; yet ceaſed not the Apoſtles equality in authority; but they that were created, had not like authority with the Apoſtles; but the Apoſtles remained as Sovereign Biſhops, neither were any greater than they. Hereof I do infer that in the ſtate of a mighty and peaceable Church, as is the Church of England, or as the Church of France (or ſuch might be if God ſhould call it to reformation) the ſtate of the Clergy ought to be preſerved. For equality will be hurtful to the State, and in time breed confuſion. But as the Apoſtles continued Churches in their equality ſo long as the Churches by them planted were ſmall; ſo ſhould equality be applied in the planting of a Church, or ſo long as the Church continueth ſmall, or under perſecution; yet may it alſo be admitted as not repugnant to God's Word in thoſe places where already it is received, rather than to innovate any thing. I ſay therefore that even in the Apoſtles times the ſtate of the Clergy increaſed as the Church increaſed. Neither was the Government under the Bondage of Egypt, and during the peace of the Land of Canaan alike; for Iſraelites had firſt Judes, and after their ſtate increaſed, Kings. Thus far that Politique Reformer. Whoſe words are ſo full and pertinent to the ſcope and drift of this whole Treatiſe, that there is no need of any Commentary to draw them to my ſenſe. The next I ſhall pitch upon in the French Church, is, a Triumvirate of three as learned perſons in their ſeveral ways as moſt that Church or any ſince the Reformation hath bred; they are Blondel, Bochartus, and Amyraldus. The firſt is that Church Antiquary Blondel, the known and learned Aſſertor of Jerome's opinion concerning the Primitive equality of Preſbyters, who was likewiſe of Jerome's mind as to the mutability of that form, if the Church ſaw fit, as appears by theſe words of his, ſpeaking of that form of Eccleſiaſtical Polity which Hilary ſpeaks of, viz. the eldeſt Preſbyters having the Primacy of Order above the reſt. Fac tamen, ſaith he, Apoſtolis non modo non improbantibus, ſed palam, laudantibus ortam, ego ſanè liberè ab initio obſervatam, Chriſtianiſque, ſive ab Apoſtolis, ſive ab eorum diſcipulis traditam, ſed ut mutabilem & pro uſu ac arbitrio Eccleſiæ mutandam (prout in cauſâ conſimili piæ memoriæ Crakanthorpius ſenſit) crediderim: and not long after, Nec conſeſſus capite carentes, aut multipliciter minùs horremus, quàm fervidiores Hierarchici; quibus indagandum curatiùs incumbit; An paſtorum cuiquam quocunque titulo nunc gaudeat, divino jure προστασία eaque perpetua decreta ſit; An verò in Arbitrio Eccleſiæ, ipſe (qui præeſt Eccleſiæ) ſpiritus reliquerit, ut quocunque modo liberet, ſibi de capite ἰσοτίμων collegia providerent. Whereby that moſt learned Writer for Preſbytery (as ſome have called him) evidently aſſerts the mutability of the particular Form of Church-Government, and that it is left to the prudence and arbitrement of the Church, to conclude and determine, in what way and manner the Rulers of the Church ſhall act, for moderating the common concernments of the Church. The next is the learned and ingenuous Bochartus, who ex profeſſo, doth aſſert the opinion I have been pleading thus long in the behalf of, in his Epiſtle to Dr. Morley. He having declared himſelf to be of Jerome's mind, as to the Apoſtles times, that the Churches were governed communi conſilio Preſbyterorum; and withal, aſſerting the great antiquity of Epiſcopacy, as ariſing ſoon after the Apoſtles times, and that magno cum fructu, as a very uſeful form of Government: He ſubjoins theſe words directly, overthrowing the Divine Right of either form of Government, by Epiſcopacy or Preſbytery. Nec Apoſtolorum praxim puto vim habuiſſe legis, in rebus ſuâ naturâ ἀδιαφόροις. Proinde tam qui Preſbyteralem, Preſbyteralem, quam Epiſcopalem ordinem juris divini eſſe aſſerunt, videntur τῆς ἀνθολκῆς ἀμετρίᾳ τοῦ μέσου διαμαρτεῖν. And therefore aſſerts, that the Form of Government muſt be determined, as that in the State is, according to the ſuitableneſs of it to the ſtate, temper and condition of the People it is intended for. The laſt is, judicious Amyraldus, whom one deſervedly calls, one of the greateſt wits of this Age, in his propoſals for peace with the Lutherans, ſpeaking of the different Forms of Church Government in the ſeveral Churches of the Reformation, he lays down this for a foundation of union among the ſeveral Churches. Quando igitur Chriſtus quidem & Apoſtoli hoc diſertè conſtituerunt, debere particulares Eccleſias omnes gubernari à Paſtoribus, & aliquâ regiminis formâ temperari, quod ipſa rei neceſſitas flagitat; quæ verò regiminis iſta forma potiſſimùm eſſe debeat, utrum alii aliis auctoritate præcellant, necne, neque rei natura definivit, neque à Chriſto aut Apoſtolis æque diſertè conſtitutum eſt; id primò in pacificatione ſtatuendum eſſe videtur, ut quo jure hactenus fuerunt Eccleſiarum Evangelicarum Paſtores, eodem porrò eſſe pergant, neque aliæ aliarum ſtatum convellere nitantur. "That every Church be permitted freely to enjoy its "own Form, ſince ſome kind of Government is neceſſary in all "Churches, but no one Form is preſcribed by Chriſt or his Apoſtles; and more fully afterwards to the ſame purpoſe. Quemadmodum etſi igitur Politiarum formæ aliæ aliis aptiores ad finem illum Politicum obtinendum, & accommodatiores eſſe videntur; Deus tamen qui omnis ſocietatis auctor eſt atque cuſtos, noluit omnes hominum cœtus eodem jure teneri, ſed cuique communitati poteſtatem eſſe voluit ſuas leges ſibi condendi, quas ipſe Divinâ ſuâ auctoritate ſancit; ſic dubitandum quidem non eſt quin ex variis illis adminiſtrandarum Eccleſiarum rationibus, nonnullæ ſint aliquanto quam aliæ conducibiliores ad eum finem adipiſcendum quem religio conſtitutum habet: At voluit tamen ſapientiſſimus indulgentiſſimuſque Deus, cuiq; Eccleſiæ jus eſſe ſibi leges eas ferendi quæ ad diſciplinam ſpectant, & ad ordinem conſervandum. Whereby he "grants as much freedom and liberty to every Church, to preſcribe "Laws to its ſelf, for the regulating the affairs of the Church, as "to any State to pitch upon its particular rules and ways of Govern-"ment; ſo the Church doth in its orders but obſerve the general rules laid down in Scripture. Having thus fully ſhewed how many of the moſt eminent Divines of the Reformation have embraced this opinion of the mutability of the Form of Church-Government, both in our own and foreign Churches, who were far from being the Proſelytes of Eraſtus; it were eaſie to add Mantiſſæ loco the concurrent judgment of many very learned Men, as the excellent Hugo Grotius, my Lord Bacon, Sir Will. Morrice, and others, who have in print delivered this as their judgment; but ſeeing ſuch is the temper of many, as to caſt by their judgments with an opinion of their partiality towards the Government of the Church; I have therefore contented my ſelf with the judgment of Divines, moſt of them of the higheſt rank ſince the Reformation: whoſe judgments certainly will be ſufficient to remove that prejudice, wherewith this opinion hath been entertained among the blind followers of the ſeveral parties. So much for thoſe, who in terms aſſert the Form of Church-Government not to depend upon an unalterable Law, but to be left to the prudence and diſcretion of every particular Church, to determine it according to its ſuitableneſs to the ſtate, condition, and temper of the people whereof it conſiſts, and conduceableneſs to the ends for which it is inſtituted.

§. 6. We come now in the ſecond place to thoſe, who though they look upon equality of Miniſters as the Primitive Form, yet do allow Epiſcopal Government in the Church as a very lawful and uſeful conſtitution. By which it is evident, that they did not judge the Primitive Form to carry an univerſal obligation along with it, over all Churches, Ages, and Places. Upon this account our learned Crakanthorp frees all the Reformed Churches from the charge of Aërianiſm, laid upon them by the Archbiſhop of Spalato (when he licked up his former vomit in his Conſilium reditûs) Crakanthorp's words are theſe, ſpeaking of Luther, Calvin, Beza, and all the Reformed Churches; Non habent illi ſcio, diſtinctos à Preſbyteris, eiſque in ordinandi & excommunicandi poteſtate ſuperiores Epiſcopos. At Imparitatem iſtam quod fecit Aërius, non verbo Dei repugnare docent; non damnant eam vel in noſtrâ, vel in univerſali per annos ſuper mille quingentos Eccleſiâ. Per verbum Dei & Jus Divinum, liberum & licitum utrumvis cenſent, vel Imparitatem iſtam admittere vel Paritatem; In Arbitrio hoc eſſe ac poteſtate cujuſvis Eccleſiæ cenſent, utrum Paritatem ordinum admittunt, an Imparitatem. So that according to the opinion of this learned Divine, all the Reformed Churches were free from the Imputation of Aërianiſm, becauſe they aſſerted not an Imparity among the Miniſters of the Goſpel to be unlawful; but thought it was wholly in the Churches liberty, to ſettle either a Parity or Imparity among them, as they judged convenient. But to deſcend more particularly to the Heroes of the Reformation, we have a whole Conſtellation of them together in the Auguſtane Confeſſion, where they fully expreſs their minds to this purpoſe; Hâc de re in hoc conventu ſæpe teſtati ſumus nos ſummâ voluntate cupere, conſervare Politiam Eccleſiaſticam, & gradus in Eccleſiâ factos etiam humanâ authoritate. Scimus enim bono & utili conſilio à Patribus Eccleſiaſticam diſciplinam, hoc modo, ut veteres Canones deſcribunt, conſtitutam eſſe. And afterwards, Sævitia Epiſcoporum in causâ eſt, quare alicubi diſſolvitur illa Canonica Politia, quam magnopere cupiebamus conſervare. And again, Hic iterum volumus teſtatum, nos libentèr conſervaturos eſſe Eccleſiaſticam & Canonicam Politiam, ſi modo Epiſcopi deſinant in Eccleſias noſtras ſævire. Hac noſtra voluntas, & coram Deo & apud omnes gentes ad omnem poſteritatem excuſabit nos, nè nobis imputari poſſit, quod Epiſcoporum authoritas labefactetur. And yet farther, Sæpe jam teſtati ſumus, nos non ſolum poteſtatem Eccleſiaſticam, quæ in Evangelio inſtituta eſt, ſummâ pietate venerari, ſed etiam Eccleſiaſticam Politiam, & gradus in Eccleſiâ magnoperè probare, & quantùm in nobis eſt conſervare cupere. We ſee with what induſtry they purge and clear themſelves from the imputation of bearing any ill will to the ſeveral degrees that were inſtituted by the Church; nay they profeſs themſelves deſirous of retaining them, ſo the Biſhops would not force force them to do any thing againſt their Conſciences. To the ſame purpoſe they ſpeak in the Smaraldian Articles. None ſpeaks more fully of the agreeableneſs of the Form of Government uſed in the Ages after the Apoſtles to the Word of God, then that excellent ſervant of God, as Biſhop Downam often calls him, Calvin doth: For in his Inſtitutions he ſpeaks thus of the Polity of the Primitive Church; Tametſi enim multos Canones ediderunt illorum temporum Epiſcopi quibus plus viderentur exprimere quàm ſacris literis expreſſum eſſet; ea tamen cautione totam ſuam Œconomiam compoſuerunt ad unicam illam verbi Dei normam, ut facile videas nihil fere hâc parte habuiſſe à verbo Dei alienum. Although the Biſhops of thoſe times did make many Canons, wherein they did ſeem to expreſs more than was in the Word of God; yet they uſed ſuch caution and prudence in the eſtabliſhing the Church's Polity according to the Word of God, that hardly will any thing be found in it diſagreeing to God's holy Word. And afterwards ſpeaking of the Inſtitution of Archbiſhops and Patriarchs, he ſaith it was ad Diſciplinæ conſervationem, for preſerving the Church's Diſcipline: and again, Si rem omiſſo vocabulo intuemur, reperiemus veteres Epiſcopos non aliam regendæ Eccleſiæ formam voluiſſe fingere, ab ea quam Deus verbo ſuo præſcripſit. If we conſider the matter it ſelf of the Church's Polity, we ſhall find nothing in it deſcrepant from, or repugnant to that Form which is laid down in the Word of God. Calvin then, whatever Form of Government he judged moſt ſuitable to the ſtate and temper of the Church wherein he was placed, was far from condemning that Polity which was uſed in the Primitive Church by a difference as to degrees among the Miniſters of the Goſpel. He did not then judge any form of Government to be ſo deliver'd in Scriptures as unalterably to oblige all Churches and Ages to obſerve it. Beza ſaith, he was ſo far from thinking that the humane order of Epiſcopacy was brought into the Church through raſhneſs or ambition, that none can deny it to have been very uſeful as long as Biſhops were good. And thoſe that both will and can, let them enjoy it ſtill. His words are theſe, Abſit autem ut hunc ordinem, etſi Apoſtolica & mere divina diſpoſitione non conſtitutum, tamen ut temere aut ſuperbe invectum reprehendam; cujus potius magnum uſum fuiſſe quamdiu boni & ſancti Epiſcopi Eccleſiis præfuerunt, quis inficiari poſſit? Fruantur igitur illo qui volent & poterunt. And elſewhere profeſſeth all reverence, eſteem, and honour to be due to all ſuch modern Biſhops, who ſtrive to imitate the example of the Primitive Biſhops in a due reformation of the Church of God, according to the rule of the Word. And looks on it as a moſt falſe and impudent Calumny of ſome that ſaid as though they intended to preſcribe their form of Government to all other Churches; as though they were like ſome ignorant fellows who think nothing good but what they do themſelves: How this is reconcileable with a novel pretence of a jus divinum, I cannot underſtand. For certainly if Beza had judged that only Form to be preſcribed in the Word which was uſed in Geneva, it had been but his duty to have deſired all other Churches to conform to that. Neither ought Beza then to be looked on as out-going his Maſter Calvin in the opinion about the right of Church-Government. For we ſee he goes no farther in it than Calvin did. All that either of them maintained, was, that the form of Government in uſe among them, was more agreeable to the Primitive form, than the modern Epiſcopacy was, and that Epiſcopacy lay more open to Pride, Lazineſs, Ambition, and Tyranny, as they had ſeen and felt in the Church of Rome. Therefore not to give occaſion to ſuch incroachments upon the liberty of mens Conſciences, as were introduced by the tyranny of the Roman Biſhops, they thought it the ſafeſt way to reduce the Primitive parity; but yet ſo, as to have an Eccleſiaſtical Senate for one Church containing Cities and Territories, as is evident at Geneva, and that Senate to have a Preſident in it; and whether that Preſident ſhould be for life, or only by courſe, they judged it an accidental and mutable thing; but that there ſhould be one, eſſential and neceſſary. This is expreſly and fully the judgment of that moſt Reverend and Learned man, Th. Beza, as he declares it himſelf. Eſſentiale fuit in eo de quo hic agimus, quod ex Dei Ordinatione perpetua neceſſe fuit, eſt, & erit, ut in Preſbyterio quiſpiam & loco & dignitate primus actioni gubernandæ præſit, cum eo quod ipſi divinitus attributum eſt jure. Accidentale autem fuit, quod Preſbyteri in hac ϖροστασία alii aliis per vices initio ſuccedebant; qui ϖροστασίας modus paulatim poſtea viſus eſt mutandus, ut unus quiſpiam judicio cæterorum compreſbyterorum delectus, Preſbyterio ϖροεστὼς eſſet, & permaneret. It will be worth our while truly to ſtate the Queſtion of Church-Government between the Church of England, and that of Geneva, in the time of Queen Elizabeth, and thereby we ſhall ſee how ſmall the difference was between them. That the Churches in the Primitive times, did take in the Chriſtians in whole Cities, and adjoining Territories, is acknowledged on both ſides; Calvin and Beza being both expreſs in it, and the Conſtitution of the Church of Geneva ſpeaks as much.

Unicuique civitati (ſaith Calvin) *erat attributa certa regio, quæ Preſbyteros inde ſumeret, & velut corpori Eccleſiæ illius accenſerentur. That for more convenient order, there was one to preſide over the Eccleſiaſtical Senate, is confeſſed as eſſential by Beza; and Calvin acknowledgeth that even in Apoſtolical times, non eam fuiſſe tunc æqualitatem inter Eccleſiæ miniſtros, quin unus aliquis authoritate & conſilio præeſſet. There was no ſuch equality among the Miniſters of the Church, but that ſome one was over the reſt in Authority and Counſel. Wherein then lay the difference? For we have already ſeen that our Great Divines then, did not look upon their form of Government as neceſſary, but only lawful; and Calvin and Beza would not be thought to preſcribe their form to other Churches. All the difference then was, not whether their form of Government was founded on Divine Right? not whether Epiſcopacy in the Church was lawful or no? not whether Dioceſan Churches were unlawful? or whether every Congregation ſhould have an Eccleſiaſtical Senate? But whether it were more agreeable to the Primitive form, that the Preſident of the Eccleſiaſtical Senate ſhould have only an order among, or a degree above the Senate its ſelf? But chiefly it was, whether in the preſent ſtate of the Reformed

Churches it were more convenient wholly to lay aſide the form of Government by Biſhops, which hath been ſo much abuſed in the Roman Church; and to reduce all Miniſters of the Goſpel to an equality, with only a precedency of order, thereby to free themſelves from the imputation of Ambition, and to prevent it in others; or elſe it were more prudent only to retrench the abuſes of Epiſcopacy under the Papacy, and to reduce it to that form wherein it was practiſed in the Church, before the tyranny and uſurpation of the Roman Biſhop had engroſſed all Eccleſiaſtical power into his own hands? The former part was embraced generally by the Reformed Churches, the latter by our Church of England; ſo that the Queſtion was not about Divine Right, but about a matter of Prudence; not what form was ſetled by a Law of Chriſt, but what form was ſuitable to the preſent ſtate of the Churches of the Reformation. Therefore we ſee none of the foreign Divines did charge the Government of this Church with unlawfulneſs but inconveniency, as it was a ſtep to pride and ambition, and an occaſion whereby men might do the Church injury by the exceſs of their power, if they were not men of an excellent temper and moderation. Thence that prediction of Padre Paulo, that the Church of England would then find the inconveniency of Epiſcopacy, when a high-ſpirited Biſhop ſhould once come to rule that Church; and ſo Beza, when he had freed the Biſhops of the Reformation from that imputation, of Lording it over their Brethren, which he had charged the Roman Biſhops with, yet he adds, that he would beg them rather to lay down their power, than to tranſmit that power to thoſe after them, hanc ipſorum moderationem & æquitatem minime forſan ſequturis, who it may be were not like to ſucceed them in their meekneſs and moderation. What juſt reaſon were there was for ſuch fears, or may be ſtill, let thoſe judge who are fitteſt to do it; thoſe I mean who have the power not only to redreſs, but prevent abuſes encroaching by an irregular power. It was not then any unlawfulneſs in the Government of Epiſcopacy it ſelf, but its liableneſs to abuſes, which made the Reformed Churches reduce modern Epiſcopacy into a mere Preſidency of Order, which was not ſo liable to the ſame inconveniencies. A clear evidence that they judged not the Government unlawful, is, their often profeſſion of a ready and chearful obedience to Biſhops, if they would embrace the Goſpel, and ſtand up in defence of the true Doctrine. For which we have the teſtimony of George Prince of Anhalt, in the Preface to his Sermon about falſe Prophets, ſpeaking of Biſhops and Archbiſhops: "Utinam ſicut nomina gerunt & titulos, ita ſe reipſa præſta-

Word of God, they would obey them with all chearfulneſs and joy of heart. To the ſame purpoſe Melancthon writing to Camerarius: “ By what Right or Law may we diſſolve the Eccleſiaſtical Polity, if “ the Biſhops will grant us that which in reaſon they ought to grant? “ and though it were lawful for us ſo to do, yet ſurely it were not “ expedient. Luther was ever of this opinion. The ſame is profeſſed by Calvin, and that according to his temper in a higher manner; “ Verum autem nobis ſi contribuant Hierarchiam in qua emineant Epiſcopi, ut Chriſto ſubeſſe non recuſent, ut ab illo tanquam “ ab unico capite pendeant, & ad ipſum referantur, in qua ſi fraternam charitatem inter ſe colant & non alio modo quam ejus veritate “ colligati, tum vero nullo non Anathemate dignos fatemur, ſi qui “ erunt, qui eam non reverentèr & ſumma cum obedientia obſervent. If Biſhops would but ſubmit themſelves to Chriſt, thoſe that would not then ſubmit themſelves to them, he thinks there is no Anathema of which they are not worthy. Jacobus Heerbrandus, Divinity-Profeſſor at Tübinge, profeſſeth it to be the moſt ſound Conſtitution of Church-Government, wherein every Dioceſe had its Biſhops, and every Province an Archbiſhop. Saluberrimum eſſet ſi ſingulæ Provinciæ ſuos Epiſcopos, & Epiſcopi ſuos Archiepiſcopos haberent. Hemingius acknowledgeth a diſparity among Church-Officers, and accounts it a piece of barbariſm to remove it. “ Quanquam enim poteſtas “ omnium eadem eſt miniſtrorum quantum ad ſpiritualem juriſdictionem attinet; tamen diſpares dignitatis ordines & gradus ſunt; “ idq; partim jure divino, partim Eccleſiæ approbatione. But he qualifies what he had ſaid of Jus divinum by his following words; “ Eccleſia cui Dominus poteſtatem dedit in ædificationem, ordinem “ miniſtrorum inſtituit pro commodo ſuo, ut omnia ſint ritè ordinata “ ad inſtaurationem corporis Chriſti. Hinc Eccleſia purior ſecuta “ tempora Apoſtolorum, fecit alios Patriarchas, alios Chorepiſcopos, alios Paſtores & Catechetas; and afterwards, Inter miniſtros agnoſcit etiam Eccleſia noſtra gradus dignitatis, & ordines “ pro diverſitate donorum, laborum magnitudine, ac vocationum “ diverſitate ac judicat Barbaricum eſſe de Eccleſia hunc ordinem “ tollere velle. Three things he placeth a ſuperiority of dignity in; Excellency of Gifts, Greatneſs of Labours, Difference of Calling: And the truth is, the two former ought to be the meaſure of dignity in the Church, the Eminence of mens abilities, and the abundance of their labours above others. The neceſſity of a Superintendent, or an Inſpector over other Miniſters, is largely diſcovered by Zepper de Politia Eccleſiaſtica, who likewiſe agrees with the former Divines in his judgment of the firſt inſtitution of Epiſcopacy. “ Eadem officia “ in primitiva etiam Eccleſia, poſt Apoſtolorum tempora in uſu manſerunt, paucis quibuſdam gradibus, pro illorum temporum neceſſitate additis, qui tamen nihil fere à mente D. Pauli & verbi divini “ alienum habuerunt. Whereby he both aſſerts it to be in the power of the Church to add diſtinct degrees from what were in the primitive Church; and that ſuch ſo added, are no ways repugnant to the Word of God. According to this judgment of their Divines is the practice of the Foreign Proteſtant Churches; in Sweden there is one Archbiſhop, and ſeven Biſhops; and ſo in Denmark, though not with ſo great authority in Holſtein, Pomeren, Mecklenburgh, Brunſwick, Luneburgh, Bremen, Oldenburgh, Eaſt-Friezeland, Heſſen, Saxony, and all the upper part of Germany, and the Proteſtant Imperial Cities, Church-Government is in the hands of Superintendents. In the Palatinate they had Inſpectores and Præpoſiti, over which was the Eccleſiaſtical Conſiſtory of three Clergy-men, and three Counſellors of State with their Preſident; and ſo they have their Præpoſitos in Wetteraw, Heſſen, and Anhalt. In Tranſylvania, Polonia, and Bohemia, they have their Seniores enjoying the ſame power with ancient Biſhops. So that we ſee all theſe Reformed Churches and Divines, although they acknowledge no ſuch thing as a Divine right of Epiſcopacy, but ſtiffly maintain Jerome's opinion of the primitive equality of Goſpel Miniſters; yet they are ſo far from accounting it unlawful to have ſome Church-Officers, acting in a higher degree above others, that they themſelves embrace it under different names and titles, in order to the Peace, Unity and Government of their ſeveral Churches; whereby they give us an evident demonſtration, that they looked not upon the Primitive Form to be immutable, but that the orders and degrees of Miniſters is only a prudential thing, and left in the liberty of every particular Church, to be determined according to their tendency to preſerve the peace and ſettlement of a Church.

We come in the laſt place to thoſe who hold Epiſcopacy to be the Primitive Form, yet not unalterably binding all Churches and places, but that thoſe Churches who are without it, are truly conſtituted Churches; and Miniſters are lawfully ordained by mere Preſbyters. This is largely proved by Mr. Francis Maſon, in his excellent Defence of the Ordination of Miniſters beyond the Seas: to which I refer the Reader. Only I ſhall ſhew out of him how the ſtate of the Queſtion about the Jus divinum of Epiſcopacy is formed: “First, If by jure divino you mean that which is according to Scripture, then the preheminence of Biſhops is jure divino; for it hath been already proved to be according to Scripture. Secondly, If by jure divino you mean the Ordinance of God, in this ſenſe alſo it may be ſaid to be jure divino. For it is an Ordinance of the Apoſtles, whereunto they were directed by God's Spirit, even by the Spirit of Prophecy, and conſequently the Ordinance of God. But if by jure divino you underſtand a Law and Commandment of God, binding all Chriſtian Churches univerſally, perpetually, unchangably, and with ſuch abſolute neceſſity, that no other form of Regiment may in any caſe be admitted; in this ſenſe neither may we grant it, nor yet can you prove it to be jure divino.

Certain brief treatiſes, &c. Oxford, 1641. Sect. 18.

Whereby we ſee this learned and moderate man was far from unchurching all who wanted Biſhops; and abſolutely declares, that though he looks on Epiſcopacy as an Apoſtolical Inſtitution, yet that no unalterable divine right is founded thereupon. So before him the both learned and pious Biſhop, G. Downam, explains pimſelf concerning the right of Epiſcopacy, in theſe remakable words; “Though Defence of Sermon, l. 4. cap. 6. p. 139.

“ in reſpect of the firſt Inſtitution, there is ſmall difference between an Apoſtolical and Divine Ordinance, becauſe what was ordained by the Apoſtles, proceeded from God, (in which ſenſe, and no other, I do hold the Epiſcopal Function to be a Divine Ordinance, I mean in reſpect of the firſt Inſtitution) yet in reſpect of perpetuity, difference by ſome is made between thoſe things which be divini, and thoſe which be Apoſtolici juris; the former in their underſtanding being perpetually, generally, and immutably neceſſary, the latter not ſo. So that the meaning of my defence plainly is, that the Epiſcopal Government hath this commendation above other forms of Eccleſiaſtical Government, that in reſpect of the firſt Inſtitution, it is a Divine Ordinance; but that it ſhould be ſuch a Divine Ordinance as ſhould be generally, perpetually, immutably, neceſſarily obſerved, ſo as no other form of Government may in no caſe be admitted, I did not take upon me to maintain: With more to the ſame purpoſe in ſeveral places of that defence. And from hence it is acknowledged by the ſtouteſt Champions for Epiſcopacy, before theſe late unhappy diviſions, that Ordination performed by Preſbyters, in caſes of neceſſity, is valid; which I have already ſhewed doth evidently prove that Epiſcopal Government is not founded upon any unalterable Divine Right: For which purpoſe many evidences are produced from Dr. Field of the Church, lib. 3. c. 39. B. Downam, l. 3. c. 4. B. Jewel, P. 2. p. 131. Saravia, cap. 2. p. 10, 11. B. Alley, Prælect. 3. & 6. B. Pilkington, B. Bridges, B. Bilſon, D. Nowel, B. Davenant, B. Prideaux, B. Andrews, and others; by our Reverend and Learned Mr. Baxter in his Chriſtian Concord, to whom may be added the late moſt Reverend and Eminent the Biſhop of Durham, Apol. Cathol. p. 1. l. 1. c. 21. and the Primate of Armagh, whoſe Judgment is well known as to the point of Ordinanation. So much may ſuffice to ſhew, that both thoſe who hold an equality among Miniſters to be the Apoſtolical form, and thoſe that do hold Epiſcopacy to have been it, do yet both of them agree at laſt in this, that no one form is ſetled by an unalterable Law of Chriſt, nor conſequently founded upon Divine Right. For the former, notwithſtanding their opinion of the Primitive Form, do hold Epiſcopacy lawful; and the latter, who hold Epiſcopacy to have been the Primitive Form, do not hold it perpetually and immutably neceſſary, but that Preſbyters, (where Biſhops cannot be had) may lawfully diſcharge the Offices belonging to Biſhops; both which Conceſſions do neceſſarily deſtroy the perpetual Divine Right of that Form of Government they aſſert; which is the thing I have been ſo long in proving, and I hope made it evident to any unprejudicated mind.

From p. 53. to p. 63.

Having laid down this now as a ſure foundation for peace and union, it were a very eaſie matter to improve it in order to an Accommodation of our preſent differences about Church-Government. I ſhall only lay down three general Principles deducible from hence, and leave the whole to the mature conſideration of the Lovers of Truth and Peace. The firſt Principle is, That Prudence muſt be uſed in ſetling the Government of the Church. This hath been the whole deſign of this Treatiſe, to prove that the Form of Church-Government is a mere matter of prudence, regulated by the Word of God. But I need not inſiſt on the Arguments already brought to prove it: for as far as I can find, although the ſeveral parties in their contentions with one another plead for Divine Right, yet when any one of them comes to ſettle their own particular Form, they are fain to call in the help of Prudence, even in things ſuppoſed by the ſeveral parties, as neceſſary to the eſtabliſhment of their own Form. The Congregational men may deſpair of ever finding Elective Synods, an explicite Church-Covenant, or poſitive ſigns of Grace in admiſſion of Church-Members in any Law of Chriſt: nay, they will not generally plead for any more for them, than general rules of Scriptures, fine Similitudes, and Analogies, and evidence of natural reaſon; and what are all theſe at laſt to an expreſs Law of Chriſt, without which it was pretended nothing was to be done in the Church of God? The Preſbyterians ſeem more generally to own the uſe of General Rules, and the Light of Nature; in order to the Form of Church-Government, as in the Subordination of Courts, Claſſical Aſſemblies, and the more moderate ſort, as to Lay-Elders. The Epiſcopal men will hardly find any evidence in Scripture, or the practice of the Apoſtles, for Churches conſiſting of many fixed Congregations for Worſhip, under the charge of one Perſon, nor in the Primitive Church, for the Ordination of a Biſhop without the preceding election of the Clergy, and at leaſt conſent and approbation of the People; and neither in Scripture, nor Antiquity, the leaſt footſtep of a delegation of Church-power. So that upon the matter at laſt, all of them make uſe of thoſe things in Church Government, which have no other foundation but the Principles of Humane Prudence, guided by the Scriptures; and it were well if that were obſerved ſtill. The ſecond Principle is, That Form of Government is the beſt according to Principles of Chriſtian Prudence, which comes the neareſt to Apoſtolical practice, and tends moſt to the advancing the peace and unity of the Church of God. What that Form is, I preſume not to define and determine, but leave it to be gather'd from the evidence of Scripture and Antiquity, as to the Primitive practice, and from the nature, ſtate and condition of that Church wherein it is to be ſetled, as to its tendency to the advancement of peace and unity in it. In order to the finding out of which, that Propoſal of his late moſt excellent Majeſty of glorious memory, is moſt highly juſt and reaſonable. His Majeſty thinketh it well worthy the ſtudies and endeavours of Divines of both Opinions, laying aſide emulation and private intereſts, to reduce Epiſcopacy and Preſbytery into ſuch a well-proportion'd Form of Superiority and Subordination, as may beſt reſemble the Apoſtolical and Primitive times, ſo far forth as the different condition of the times, and the exigences of all conſiderable circumſtances will admit.

If this Propoſal be embraced, as there is no reaſon why it ſhould not; then, all ſuch things muſt be retrieved which were unqueſtionably of the Primitive practice, but have been grown out of uſe through the length and corruption of times. Such are the reſtoring of the Preſbyteries of the ſeveral Churches, as the Senate to the Biſhop, with whoſe council and advice all things were done in the Primitive Church. The contracting of Dioceſes into ſuch a compaſs as may be fitted for the perſonal inſpection of the Biſhop, and care of himſelf and the Senate; the placing of Biſhops in all great Towns of reſort, eſpecially County Towns; that according to the ancient courſe of the Church, its Government may be proportioned to the Civil Government. The conſtant preaching of the Biſhop in ſome Churches of his charge, and reſidence in his Dioceſe; The ſolemnity of Ordinations, with the conſent of the People; The obſerving Provincial Synods twice every Year. The imploying of none in judging Church-Matters but the Clergy. Theſe are things unqueſtionably of the Primitive practice, and no argument can be drawn from the preſent ſtate of things, why they are not as much, if not more neceſſary than ever. And therefore all who appeal to the practice of the Primitive Church, muſt condemn themſelves, if they juſtifie the neglect of them. But I only touch at theſe things, my deſign being only to lay a foundation for a happy union. Laſtly, What Form of Government is determined by lawful Authority in the Church of God, ought ſo far to be ſubmitted to, as it contains nothing repugnant to the Word of God. So that let mens judgments be what they will concerning the Primitive Form, ſeeing it hath been proved, that that Form doth not bind unalterably and neceſſarily, it remains that the determining of the Form of Government is a matter of liberty in the Church; and what is ſo, may be determined by lawful Authority; and what is ſo determined by that Authority, doth bind men to obedience, as hath been proved by the 5 Hypotheſis, in the entrance of this Treatiſe. I conclude all with this earneſt deſire, That the Wiſe and Gracious God would ſend us one heart and one way, that he would be the Compoſer of our differences, and the Repairer of our breaches, that of our ſtrange diviſions and unchriſtian animoſities, while we pretend to ſerve the Prince of Peace, we may at laſt ſee

Concerning the Power of Excommunication
IN A Chriſtian Church.

109: 2: F.

The Name of Power in a Church explained. The miſtake of which, the Foundation of Eraſtianiſm. The Notion of the Church opened, as it is the ſubject of Power. The Church proved to be a Society diſtinct from the Commonwealth; by reaſon of its different Nature, and Divine Inſtitution; diſtinct Officers, different Rights, and Ends, and peculiar Offences. The Power of the Church doth not ariſe from mere confederation. The Church's Power founded on the nature of the Chriſtian Society, and not on particular Precepts. The Power of Church-Officers not merely Doctrinal, proved by ſeveral Arguments. Church Power as to particular perſons antecedent to confederation. The Power of the Keys relates to Baptiſm. The Church's Power extends to Excommunication; what it is, and what grounds it had under the Law. No excluſion from Temple-worſhip among the Jews. Excommunication neceſſary in a Chriſtian Church, becauſe of the conditions ſuppoſed to communion in it. Of the Inceſtuous perſon, and the Grounds of the Apoſtolical Cenſure. Objections againſt Excommunication anſwered. The fundamental Rights of the Church continue after its being incorporated into the Civil State. The Magiſtrate's Power, as to Excommunication cleared.

Append. to c. 8. part. 8. §. 1.

IT is a matter of daily obſervation and experience in the World, how hard it is to keep the eyes of the underſtanding clear in its judgment of things, when it is too far engaged in the duſt of Controverſie. It being ſo very difficult to well manage an impetuous purſuit after any Opinion; nothing being more common than to ſee men out-run their mark, and through the force of their ſpeed to be carried as far beyond it, as others in their Opinion fall ſhort of it. There is certainly a kind of ebriety of the mind, as well as of the body, which makes it ſo unſtable and pendulous, that it oft times reels from one extream unto the quite contrary. This as it is obvious in moſt eager controvertiſts of all Ages, ſo eſpecially in ſuch, who have diſcovered the falſity of an opinion they were once confident of, which they think they can never after run far enough from: So that while they ſtart at an apparition they ſo much dread, they run into thoſe untrodden paths, wherein they loſe both themſelves and the Truth they ſought for.

§. 2. Thus we find it to be in the preſent controverſie, for many out of their juſt zeal againſt the extravagancies of thoſe who ſcrued up Church-Power to ſo high a peg, that it was thought to make perpetual diſcord with the Commonwealth, could never think themſelves free from ſo great an inconvenience, till they had melted down all Spiritual Power into the Civil State, and diſſolved the Church into the Commonwealth. But that the World may ſee I have not been more forward to aſſert the juſt power of the Magiſtrate in Eccleſiaſticals, as well as Civils, than to defend the Fundamental Rights of the Church, I have taken this opportunity more fully to explain and vindicate that part of the Church's Power, which lies in reference to Offenders; it being the main think ſtruck at by thoſe who are the followers of that noted Phyſitian, who handled the Church ſo ill, as to deprive her of her expulſive faculty of Noxious humours, and ſo left her under a Miſerere mei.

§. 3. I ſhall therefore endeavour to give the Church her due, as well as Caſar his, by making good this following Principle or Hypotheſis, upon which the whole hinge of this Controverſie turns, viz. That the power of inflicting Cenſure, upon Offenders in a Chriſtian Church, is a fundamental Right, reſulting from the conſtitution of the Church, as a Society by Jeſus Chriſt; and that the ſeat of this Power is in thoſe Officers of the Church, who have derived their power originally from the Founder of this Society, and act by vertue of the Laws of it.

§. 4. For the clear ſtating of this Controverſie, it will be neceſſary to explain, what that Power is, which I attribute to the Church, and in what notion the Church is to be conſidered as it exerciſeth this Power. Firſt, concerning the proper notion of Power, by it I cannot ſee any thing elſe to be underſtood, than a right of governing or ordering things which belong to a Society. And ſo Power implies only a moral faculty in the perſon enjoying it, to take care ne quid civitas detrimenti capiat, whereby it is evident that every well conſtituted Society muſt ſuppoſe a Power within its ſelf of ordering things belonging to its welfare, or elſe it were impoſſible, either the being, or the rights and privileges of a Society could be long preſerved. Power then in its general and abſtracted notion, doth not neceſſarily import either meer Authority, or proper Coaction; for theſe, to any impartial judgment, will appear to be rather the ſeveral modes whereby power is exerciſed, than any proper ingredients of the ſpecifick Nature of it: which in general, imports no more than a right to govern a conſtituted Society; but how that right ſhall be exerciſed, muſt be reſolved not from the notion of Power, but from the nature and conſtitution of that particular Society in which it is lodged and inherent.

§. 5. It appears then from hence to be a great miſtake and abuſe of well-natured Readers, when all power is neceſſarily reſtrained, either to that which is properly Coercive, or to that which is merely Arbitrary, and only from conſent. The Original of which miſtake is, the ſtating the Notion of Power from the uſe of the Word, either in ancient Roman Authors, or elſe in the Civil Laws, both which are freely acknowleged to be ſtrangers to the exerciſe of any other Power, than that which is merely authoritative and perſwaſive, or that which is Coactive and Penal. The ground of which is, becauſe they were ignorant of any other way of conveyance of Power, beſides external force, and arbitrary conſent; the one in thoſe called Legal Societies, or Civitates, the other Collegia and Hæteriæ. But ſo as that do acknowledge that God hath a right of commanding men to what Duty he pleaſe himſelf, and appointing a Society upon what terms beſt pleaſe him, and giving a Power to particular perſons to govern that Society, in what way ſhall tend moſt to advance the Honour of ſuch a Society, may eaſily be made appear, that there is a kind of Power neither properly Co-active, nor merely Arbitrary, viz. ſuch a one as immediately reſults from Divine Inſtitution, and doth ſuppoſe conſent to ſubmit to it as a neceſſary Duty in all the Members of this Society.

§. 6. This Power, it is evident, is not merely Arbitrary either in the Governours or Members; for the Governours derive their Power or Right of Governing from the Inſtitution of Chriſt, and are to be regulated by his Laws in the Execution of it, and the Members, though their conſent be neceſſarily ſuppoſed, yet that conſent is a Duty in them, and that Duty doth imply their ſubmiſſion to the Rulers of this Society: Neither can this Power be called Co-active, in the ſenſe it is commonly taken; for co-active power, and external force are neceſſary correlates to each other, but we ſuppoſe no ſuch thing as a power of outward force to be given to the Church as ſuch, for that properly belongs to a Commonwealth. But the power which I ſuppoſe to be lodged in the Church, is ſuch a power as depends upon a Law of a Superiour, giving right to Govern, to particular Perſons over ſuch a Society, and making it the Duty of all Members of it to ſubmit unto it, upon no other Penalties, than the excluſion of them from the Privileges, which that Society enjoys. So that ſuppoſing ſuch a Society as the Church is, to be of Divine Inſtitution, and that Chriſt hath appointed Officers to rule it, it neceſſarily follows, that thoſe Officers muſt derive their power, i. e. their right of Governing this Society, not merely from conſent and confederation of Parties, but from that Divine Inſtitution, on which the Society depends. The want of underſtanding the right Notion of Power in the ſenſe here ſet down, is certainly the πρῶτον ψεῦδος of Eraſtianiſm, and that which hath given occaſion to ſo many to queſtion any ſuch thing as Power in the Church, eſpecially, when the more zealous than judicious Defenders of it have rather choſen to hang it upon ſome doubtful places of Scripture, than on the very Nature and Conſtitution of the Chriſtian Church, as a Society inſtituted by Jeſus Chriſt.

§. 7. This being then the nature of power in general, it is I ſuppoſe clear, that an outward co-active force is not neceſſary in order to it, for if ſome may have a Right to Govern and others may be obliged to Obedience to thoſe Perſons antecedently, to any Civil Conſtitution; then ſuch Perſons have a juſt power to inflict cenſures upon ſuch as tranſgreſs the Rules of the Society, without any outward force. It is here very impertinent to diſpute, what effects ſuch cenſures can have upon wilful Perſons without a Co-active power; If I can prove, that there is a right to inflict them in Church-Offices, and an Obligation to ſubmit to them in all Offenders; I am not to trouble my ſelf with the Event of ſuch things as depend upon Divine Inſtitutions. I know it is the great Objection of the Followers of Eraſtus, that Church-cenſures are inflicted upon Perſons unwilling to receive them, and therefore muſt imply external co-active force, which is repugnant to the Nature of a Church. But this admits (according to the Principles here eſtabliſhed) of a very eaſie ſolution; for I deny not that Church Power goes upon conſent, but then it's very plain here was an antecedent conſent to ſubmit to cenſures in the very entrance into this Society, which is ſufficient to denominate it a voluntary act of the Perſons undergoing it; and my reaſon is this, every Perſon entring into a Society, parts with his own freedom and liberyy, as to matters concerning the governing of it, and profeſſeth ſubmiſſion to the Rules and Orders of it: Now a Man having parted with his freedom already, cannot re-aſſume it when he pleaſe, for then, he is under an Obligation to ſtand to the Covenants made at his entrance; and conſequently his undergoing what ſhall be laid upon him by the Laws of this Society, muſt be ſuppoſed to be voluntary, as depending upon his conſent at firſt entrance, which in all Societies muſt be ſuppoſed to hold ſtill, elſe there would follow nothing but confuſion in all Societies in the World, if every Man were at liberty to break his Covenants, when any thing comes to lie upon him according to the Rules of the Society, which he out of ſome private deſign would be unwilling to undergo. Thus much may ſerve to ſettle a-right the Notion of Power; the want of underſtanding which hath cauſed all the confuſion of this Controverſie.

§. 8. The next thing is, In what Notion we are to conſider the Church, which is made the ſubject of this Power. As to which we are to conſider this Power; either as to its right, or in actu primo; or as to its exerciſe, or in actu ſecundo: Now if we take this Power as to the fundamental Right of it; then it belongs to the Univerſal Church of Chriſt, which ſubſiſts as a viſible Society, by vertue of that Law of Chriſt, which makes an owning the Profeſſion of Chriſtianity the Duty of all Church-members. If we conſider this Power in the exerciſe of it, then (it being impoſſible that the Univerſal Church ſhould perform the executive part of this power relating to Offences) I ſuppoſe it lodged in that particular Society of Chriſtians, which are united together in one body in the community of the ſame Government; but yet, ſo, as that the adminiſtration of this Power, doth not belong to the body of the Society conſidered complexly, but to thoſe Officers in it, whoſe care and charge it is, to have a peculiar overſight and inſpection over the Church, and to redreſs all diſorders in it. Thus the viſive faculty is fundamentally lodged in the Soul, yet all exterior acts of ſight are performed by the Eyes, which are the ἐπίσκοποι Overſeers of the Body, as the other are of the Church, ſo that the exerciſe and adminiſtration of this power, belongs to the ſpecial Officers and Governours of the Church; none elſe being capable of exerciſing this Power of the Church as ſuch, but they on whom it is ſetled by the Founder of the Church it ſelf.

§. 9. This Society of the Church may be again conſidered, either as ſubſiſting without any influence from the civil Power, or as it is owned by, and incorporated into a Chriſtian State. I therefore demand, Whether it be abſolutely neceſſary for the ſubſiſtance of this Chriſtian Society, to be upheld by the Civil Power, or no? And certainly none who conſider the firſt and pureſt Ages of the Chriſtian Church, can give any entertainment to the Affirmative, becauſe then the Church flouriſhed in its greateſt purity, not only when not upheld, but when moſt violently oppoſed by the Civil Power; If ſo then its being united with the Civil State is only accidental as to the conſtitution of a Church; and if this be only accidental, then it muſt be ſuppoſed furniſhed with every thing requiſite to its well ordering accidentally to any ſuch Union, and abſtractly from it. For can we imagine our Bleſſed Saviour ſhould inſtitute a Society, and leave it deſtitute of Means to uphold its ſelf, unleſs it fell into the Hands of the Civil Power? or that he left every thing tending thereto, merely to Prudence, and the Arbitrary Conſtitutions of the Perſons joining together in this Society? Did our Saviour take care there ſhould be a Society, and not provide for Means to uphold it? Nay, it is evident, he not only appointed a Society, but Officers to rule it. Had thoſe Officers then a Right to Govern it or no, by vertue of Chriſt's inſtitution of them? if not, they were rather Bibuli than Cæſares, Cyphers than Conſules in the Church of God. If they had a power to Govern, doth not that neceſſarily imply a Right to inflict Cenſures on Offenders, unleſs we will ſuppoſe that either there can be no Offenders in a Chriſtian Church, or that thoſe Offenders do not violate the Laws of the Society, or there be ſome Prohibition for them to exerciſe their power over them (which is to give power with one Hand, and take it away with the other) or that this power cannot extend ſo far as to exclude any from the Privileges of the Church: Which is the thing to be diſcuſſed.

§. 10. Having thus cleared our way, I now come to the Reſolution of the Queſtion it ſelf, in order to which I ſhall endeavour to demonſtrate, with what Evidence the Subject is capable of, theſe following things. Firſt, That the Church is a peculiar Society in its own Nature, diſtinct from the Commonwealth. Secondly, That the power of the Church over its Members doth not ariſe from mere confederation or conſent of Parties. Thirdly, That this Power of the Church doth extend to the Excluſion of Offenders from the Privileges of it. Fourthly, That the Fundamental Rights of the Church do not eſcheat to the Commonwealth upon their being united in a Chriſtian State. If theſe Principles be eſtabliſhed, the Churches Power will ſtand upon them, as on a firm and unmoveable Baſis.

§. 11. I begin with the firſt. That the Church is a peculiar Society in its own Nature, diſtinct from the Commonwealth, which I prove by theſe Arguments.

1. Thoſe Societies, which are capable of ſubſiſting apart from each other, are really, and in their own Nature diſtinct from one another; but ſo it is with the Church and Commonwealth. For there can be no greater Evidence of a Real Diſtinction than Mutual Separation; and I think the proving the poſſibility of the Souls exiſting, ſeparate from the body, is one of the ſtrongeſt Arguments to prove it to be a ſubſtance really diſtinct from the body, to which it is united; although we are often fain to go the other way to work, and to prove poſſibility of Separation from other Arguments evincing the Soul to be a diſtinct ſubſtance; but the reaſon of that is for want of evidence as to the ſtate of ſeparate Souls, and their viſible exiſtence, which is repugnant to the immateriality of their Natures. But now, as to the matter in hand, we have all evidence deſirable; for we are not put to prove poſſibility of Separation, merely from the different conſtitution of the things united, but we have evidence to Senſe of it, that the Church hath ſubſiſted when it hath been not only ſeparated from, but perſecuted by all Civil Power. It is with many Men as to the Union of Church and State, as it is with others, as to the Union of the Soul and Body; when they obſerve how cloſe the Union is, and how much the Soul makes uſe of the Animal Spirits in moſt of its Operations, and how great a Sympathy there is between them, that, like Hippocrates his Twins, they laugh and weep together, they are ſhrewdly put to it, how to fancy the Soul to be any thing elſe than a more vigorous mode of matter; ſo theſe obſerving how cloſe an Union and Dependence there is between the Church and State in a Chriſtian Commonwealth, and how much the Church is beholding to the Civil Power in the Adminiſtration of its Functions, are apt to think that the Church is nothing but a higher mode of a Commonwealth, conſidered as Chriſtian. But when it is ſo evident that the Church hath, and may ſubſiſt, ſuppoſing it abſtracted from all Civil Power, it may be a ſufficient demonſtration that however near they may be when united, yet they are really, and in their own nature, diſtinct from each other. Which was the thing to be proved.

§. 12. 2. Thoſe are diſtinct Societies, which have every thing diſtinct in their nature from each other, which belong to the Conſtitution or Government of them; but this is evident, as to the Church and Commonwealth, which will appear, becauſe their Charter is diſtinct, or that which gives them their Being as a Society: Civil Societies are founded upon the neceſſity of particular Mens parting with their peculiar Rights, for the preſervation of themſelves, which was the impulſive cauſe of their entring into Societies; but that which actually ſpeaks them to be a Society, is the mutual conſent of the ſeveral Parties joining together, whereby they make themſelves to be one Body; and to have one common Intereſt. So Cicero de Repub. defines Populus, to be cœtus multitudinis, juris conſenſu & utilitatis communione ſociatus. There is no doubt, but God's general providence is as evidently ſeen in bringing the World into Societies, and making them live under Government, as in diſpoſing all particular Events which happen in thoſe Societies; but yet the way, which Providence uſed in the conſtitution of theſe Societies, is by inclining Men to conſent to aſſociate for their mutual benefit and advantage: So that natural Reaſon conſulting for the good of Mankind, as to thoſe Rights which Men enjoy in common with each other, was the main foundation upon which all Civil Societies were erected. We find no poſitive Law enacting the being of Civil Societies, becauſe Nature its ſelf would prompt Men for their own Conveniences to enter into them. But the ground and foundation of that Society, which we call a Church, is a matter which natural Reaſon and common Notions can never reach to: And therefore an aſſociating for the preſerving of ſuch, may be a Philoſophical Society, but a Chriſtian it cannot be: And they that would make a Chriſtian Church to be nothing elſe but a Society of Eſſens, or an ὁμακοεῖον of Pythagoreans, do either not underſtand, or not conſider whereon this Chriſtian Society is founded; for it is evident they look on it as a merely voluntary thing, that is not at all ſetled by any Divine poſitive Law.

§. 13. The truth is, there is no principle more conſiſtent with the Opinion of thoſe who deny any Chriſtian power in a Chriſtian ſtate, than this is, and it is that, which every one, who will make good his ground muſt be driven to; for it is evident, that in matters merely voluntary, and depending only on confederation, ſuch things being liable to a Magiſtrate's power, there can be no plea from mutual conſent, to juſtifie any oppoſition to ſupream Authority in a Commonwealth. But then, how ſuch perſons can be Chriſtians, when the Magiſtrates would have them to be otherwiſe, I cannot underſtand; nor how the primitive Martyrs were any other than a company of Fools or Madmen, who would hazard their Lives for that which was a mere Arbitrary thing, and which they had no neceſſary Obligation upon them to profeſs. Miſtake me not, I ſpeak not here of mere acts of Diſcipline, but of the Duty of outward profeſſing Chriſtianity; if this be a Duty, then a Chriſtian

Society is ſetled by a poſitive Law; if it be not a Duty, then they are Fools who ſuffer for it: So that this Queſtion reſolved into its Principles, leads us higher than we think for, and the main thing in debate muſt be, Whether there be an Obligation upon Conſcience for Men to aſſociate in the Profeſſion of Chriſtianity, or no? If there be, then the Church, which is nothing elſe but ſuch an aſſociation, is eſtabliſhed upon a Poſitive Law of Chriſt; if there be not, then thoſe Inconveniences follow, which are already mention'd.

§. 14. We are told indeed by the Leviathan with confidence enough, that no Precepts of the Goſpel are Law, till enacted by Civil Authority; but it is little wonder, that he, who thinks an immaterial ſubſtance implies a contradiction, ſhould think as much of calling any thing a Law, but what hath a Civil Sanction. But I ſuppoſe all thoſe who dare freely own a ſupream and infinite Eſſence to have been the Creator, and to be the Ruler of the World, will acknowledge his Power to oblige Conſcience, without being beholding to his own Creature to Enact his Laws, that Men might be bound to obey them. Was the great God fain to be beholding to the Civil Authority he had over the Jewiſh Commonwealth (their Government being a Θεοκρατία) to make his Laws obligatory to the Conſciences of the Jews? What, had not they their Beings from God? and can there be any greater ground of obligation to Obedience, than from thence? Whence comes Civil Power to have any Right to oblige Men more, than God, conſidered as Governour of the World, can have? Can there be indeed no other Laws according to the Leviathan's Hypotheſis, but only the Law of Nature and Civil Laws? But I pray whence comes the Obligation to either of theſe, that theſe are not as Arbitrary as all other Agreements are? And is it not as ſtrong a dictate of Nature as any can be (ſuppoſing that there is a God) that a Creature which receives its Being from another, ſhould be bound to obey him, not only in the Reſultancies of his own Nature, but with the arbitrary Conſtitutions of his Will: Was Adam bound to obey God or no, as to that poſitive Precept of eating the Forbidden Fruit, if no Civil Sanction had been added to that Law? The truth is, ſuch Hypotheſes as theſe are, when they are followed cloſe home, will be found to kennel in that black Den, from whence they are loath to be thought to have proceeded.

§. 15. And now, ſuppoſing that every full Declaration of the Will of Chriſt, as to any poſitive Inſtitution, hath the force and power of a Law upon the Conſciences of all, to whom it is ſufficiently propoſed: I proceed to make appear, that ſuch a divine poſitive Law there is, for the exiſtence of a Church, as a viſible Body and Society in the World: By which I am far from meaning ſuch a conſpicuous Society, that muſt continue in a perpetual viſibility in the ſame place; I find not the leaſt intimation of any ſuch thing in Scripture; but that there ſhall always be ſome where or other, in the World, a Society owning and profeſſing Chriſtianity, may be eaſily deduced from thence; and eſpecially on this account, that our Saviour hath required this, as one of the Conditions in order to eternal Felicity, that all thoſe who believe in their Hearts, that Jeſus is the Chriſt, muſt likewiſe confeſs him with their Mouths to the World: And therefore, as long as there are Men to believe in Chriſt, there muſt be Men that will not be aſhamed to aſſociate, on the account of the Doctrine he hath promulged to the World. That one Phraſe in the New Teſtament, ſo frequently uſed by our Bleſſed Saviour, of the Kingdom of Heaven (importing a Goſpel-ſtate) doth evidently declare a Society, which was conſtituted by him, on the principles of the Goſpel-Covenant. Wherefore ſhould our Saviour call Diſciples, and make Apoſtles, and ſend them abroad with full commiſſion to gather and initiate Diſciples by Baptiſm; did he not intend a viſible ſociety for his Church? Had it not been enough for Men to have cordially believed the Truth of the Goſpel, but they muſt be entred in a ſolemm viſible way, and join in participation of viſible Symbols of Bread and Wine, but that our Saviour required external profeſſion and Society in the Goſpel as a neceſſary duty, in order to obtaining the privileges conveyed by his Magna Charta in the Goſpel. I would fain know by what argument we can prove, that any humane Legiſlator, did ever intend a Commonwealth to be governed according to his mode, by which we cannot prove that Chriſt by a poſitive Law, did command ſuch a ſociety, as ſhould be governed in a viſible manner, as other ſocieties are? Did he not appoint Officers himſelf in the Church, and that of many ranks and degrees? Did he not inveſt thoſe Officers with authority to rule his Church? Is it not laid as a charge on them, to take heed to that flock, over which God had made them Overſeers? Are there not Rules laid down for the peculiar exerciſe of their Government over the Church in all the parts of it? Were not theſe Officers admitted into their function by a moſt ſolemn viſible Rite of Impoſition of Hands? And are all theſe ſolemn tranſactions a mere piece of ſacred Pageantry? And they will appear to be little more, if the Society of the Church be a mere Arbitrary thing, depending only upon conſent and confederation, and not ſubſiſting by vertue of any Charter from Chriſt, or ſome poſitive Law, requiring all Chriſtians to join in Church ſociety together.

§. 16. But if now from hence it appears (as certainly it cannot but appear) that this Society of the Church doth ſubſiſt by vertue of a Divine poſitive Law, then it muſt of neceſſity be diſtinct from a Civil Society, and that on theſe Accounts: Firſt, becauſe there is an antecedent obligation on Conſcience to aſſociate on the account of Chriſtianity, whether Humane Laws prohibit or command it. From whence, of neceſſity it follows, that the conſtitution of the Church is really different from that of the Commonwealth; becauſe whether the Commonwealth be for, or againſt this Society, all that own it are bound to profeſs it openly, and declare themſelves Members of it. Whereas, were the Church and Commonwealth really and formally the ſame, all obligation to Church ſociety, would ariſe merely from the Legiſlative Power of the Commonwealth. But now there being a Divine Law, binding in Conſcience, whoſe obligation cannot be ſuperſeded by any Humane Law, it is plain and evident, where are ſuch vaſtly different obligations, there are different Powers; and in this ſenſe I know no incongruity, in admitting Imperium in Imperio, if by it we underſtand no external coactive power, but an internal power laying obligation on Conſcience, diſtinct from the power lodged in a Commonweatlh conſidered as ſuch. An outward coactive power was always diſowned by Chriſt, but certainly not an internal Power over Conſcience to oblige all his Diſciples to what Duties he thought fit.

Secondly, I argue from thoſe Officers, whoſe rights to govern this Society are founded on that Charter, whereby the Society it ſelf ſubſiſts. Now I would willingly know why, when our Saviour diſowned all outward power in the World, yet he ſhould conſtitute a Society, and appoint Officers in it, did he not intend a peculiar diſtinct Society, from the other Societies of the World. And therefore the argument frequently uſed againſt Church-power, becauſe it hath no outward force with it by the conſtitution of Chriſt, is a ſtrong argument to me of the peculiarity of a Chriſtian Society from a Commonwealth; becauſe Chriſt ſo inſtituted it, as not to have it ruled at firſt by any outward force or power. When Chriſt ſaith his Kingdom was not of this World; he implies, that he had a Society that was governed by his Laws in the World, yet diſtinct from all mundane Societies: had not our Saviour intended his Church to have been a peculiar Society diſtinct from a Commonwealth, it is hard to conceive why our Saviour ſhould interdict the Apoſtles the uſe of a civil coactive power: Or why inſtead of ſending abroad Apoſtles to preach the Goſpel, he did not employ the Governors of Commonwealths to have enforced Chriſtianity by Laws and temporal Edicts, and the ſeveral Magiſtrates to have impowered ſeveral perſons under them to preach the Goſpel in their ſeveral Territories? And can any thing be more plain, by our Saviour's taking a contrary courſe, than that he intended a Church Society to be diſtinct from Civil, and the power belonging to it (as well as the Officers) to be of a different nature from that which is ſetled in a Commonwealth. I here ſuppoſe, that Chriſt hath by a poſitive Law eſtabliſhed the Government of his Church upon Officers of his own appointment; which I have largely proved elſewhere, and therefore ſuppoſe it now. Thirdly, I argue from the peculiar rights belonging to theſe Societies: For if every one born in the Commonwealth, have not thereby a right to the privileges of the Church; nor every one by being of the Church, any right to the benefits of the Commonwealth; it muſt neceſſarily follow, that theſe are diſtinct from one another. If any one by being of the Commonwealth, hath right to Church-privileges, then every one born in a Commonwealth may challenge a right to the Lord's-Supper without Baptiſm, or open profeſſing Chriſtianity, which I cannot think any will be very ready to grant. Now there being by Divine appointment the ſeveral rights of Baptiſm and the Lord's-Supper, as peculiar Badges of the Church as a viſible Society, it is evident, Chriſt did intend it a Society diſtinct from the Commonwealth.

Fourthly, I argue from the different ends of theſe Societies. A Commonwealth is conſtituted for civil ends, and the Church for ſpiritual: for ends are to be judged by the primary conſtitution, but now it is plain, the end of civil ſociety is for preſervation of mens rights as men (therefore Magiſtracy is called by St. Peter ἀνθρωπίνη κτίσις:) but this Chriſtian Society doth not reſpect men under the connotation of Men, but as Chriſtians. The anſwer given to this is very ſhort and inſufficient, when it is ſaid, that every man in a Commonwealth, is to act upon ſpiritual accounts and ends: For there is a great deal of difference between Chriſtianities having an influence upon mens actings in a Common-wealth, and making a ſociety the ſame with a Commonwealth. To argue therefore from one to another, is a ſhortneſs of diſcourſe I cannot but wonder at: unleſs it could be proved, that Chriſtianity aimed at nothing elſe but regulating Men in the affairs of a Commonwealth, which is a task I ſuppoſe will not be undertaken.

Laſtly, I argue from the peculiar offences againſt this Society, which are, or may be diſtinct from thoſe againſt a Commonwealth. I deny not, but moſt times they are the ſame, but frequently they differ, and when they are the ſame, yet the conſideration of them is different in the Church and

Commonwealth, for which I ſhall ſuppoſe the Six Arguments produced in the laſt chapter of the firſt part to ſtand good, which will ſtrongly hold to excommunication in the Chriſtian Church, though there produced only for the Jewiſh. I would fain know what is to be done in many Offences, known to be againſt the Laws of Chriſt, and which tend to the Diſhonour of the Chriſtian Society, which the Civil and Municipal Laws, either do not, or may not take cognizance of? Thus much may ſerve, as I think, to make evident, that the Church in its own Nature, is a Peculiar Society diſtinct from a Commonwealth, which was the firſt Propoſition to be proved. Iren. p. 1. c. 8.

§. 17. The Second is, That the power of the Church over its Members in caſe of Offences, doth not ariſe merely from confederation and conſent, though it doth ſuppoſe it. This Church power may be conſidered two ways. Either, firſt, as it implies the Right in ſome Inflicting Cenſures. Or, ſecondly, as it implies in others, the Duty of ſubmitting to cenſures inflicted; now as to both theſe, I ſhall prove that their original is higher than mere Confederation.

1. As to the Right of inflicting Cenſures on theſe accounts. Firſt, What ever Society doth ſubſiſt by vertue of a Divine Conſtitution, doth by vertue thereof derive all power for its Preſervation, in peace, unity, and purity; but it is plain, that a power of cenſuring Offenders, is neceſſary for the Churches preſervation in peace and purity; and it is already proved, that the Church hath its Charter from Chriſt, and therefore from him it hath a power to inflict Puniſhments on Offenders, ſuitable to the Nature of the Society they are of. I am very prone to think, that the ground of all the Miſtakes on this Subject have riſen from hence, that ſome, imprudently enough, have fixt the Original of this Power on ſome ambiguous places of Scripture, which may, and it may be, ought to be taken in a different ſenſe; and their Adverſaries, finding thoſe places weak and inſufficient proofs of ſuch a power, have from thence rejected any ſuch kind of power at all; But certainly, if we ſhould reject every Truth that is weakly proved by ſome who have undertaken it, I know no Opinion would bid ſo fair for acceptance as Scepticiſm, and that in reference to many weighty and important Truths; for how weakly have ſome proved the Exiſtence of a Deity, the Immortality of the Soul, and the Truth of the Scriptures by ſuch Arguments, that if it were enough to overthrow an Opinion to be able to anſwer ſome Arguments brought for it, Atheiſm it ſelf would become plauſible. It can be then no Evidence, that a thing is not true, becauſe ſome Arguments will not prove it; and truly, as to the matter in hand, I am fully of the Opinion of the excellent H. Grotius, ſpeaking of Excommunication in the Chriſtian Church: Neque ad eam rem peculiare præceptum deſideratur, cum Eccleſiæ cœtu à Chriſto ſemel conſtituto, omnia illa imperata cenſeri debent, ſine quibus ejus cœtus puritas retineri non poteſt. And therefore Men ſpend needleſs pains to prove an Inſtitution of this power by ſome poſitive Precept, when Chriſt's founding his Church as a peculiar Society, is ſufficient proof he hath endowed it with this fundamental Right, without which the Society were arena ſine calce, a company of Perſons without any common tye of Union among them; for if there be any ſuch Union, it muſt depend on ſome Conditions, to be performed by the Members of that Society, which how could they require from them, if they have not power to exclude them upon non performance? In Luc. 6. 22.

2. I prove the Divine Original of this power from the ſpecial appointment and deſignation of particular Officers by Jeſus Chriſt, for the ruling of this Society. Now I ſay, that Law which provides there ſhall be Officers to govern, doth give them power to govern, ſuitable to the nature of their Society: Either then you muſt deny, that Chriſt hath by an unalterable Inſtitution appointed a Goſpel Miniſtry, or that this Miniſtry hath no Power in the Church, or that their Power extends not to Excommunication. The firſt I have already proved, the ſecond follows from their appointment: For by all the Titles given to Church-Officers in Scripture, it appears they had a power over the Church, (as ἐπίσκοποι, προεστῶτες, ἡγούμενοι, ποιμένες.) All which, as you well know, do import a right to govern the Society over which they are ſet. And that this power ſhould not extend to a power to exclude convict Offenders, ſeems very ſtrange, when no other Puniſhment can be more ſuitable to the nature of the Society than this is; which is a debarring him from the Privileges of that Society, which the Offender hath ſo much diſhonoured. Can there be any Puniſhment leſs imagined towards contumacious Offenders than this is, or that carries in it leſs of outward and co-active force, it implying nothing but what the Offender himſelf freely yielded to at his entrance into this Society.

§. 18. All that I can find replied by any of the Adverſaries of the Opinion I here aſſert, to the Argument drawn from the Inſtitution and Titles of the Officers of the Church, is, that all thoſe Titles which are given to the Miniſters of the Goſpel in the New Teſtament, that do import Rule and Government, are all to be taken in a Spiritual Senſe, as they are Chriſt's Miniſters and Ambaſſadors to preach his Word and declare his Will to his Church. So that all power ſuch Perſons conceive to lye in thoſe Titles, is only Doctrinal and Declarative; but how true that is, let any one judge that conſiders theſe things.

1. That there was certainly a power of Diſcipline then in the Churches conſtituted by the Apoſtles, which is moſt evident, not only from the Paſſages relating to Offenders in Saint Paul's Epiſtles, eſpecially to the Corinthians and Theſſalonians, but from the continued Practice of ſucceeding Ages manifeſted by Tertullian, Cyprian, and many others. There being then a power of Diſcipline in Apoſtolical Churches, there was a Neceſſity it ſhould be adminiſtred by ſome Perſons who had the care of thoſe Churches; and who were they but the ſeveral Paſtors of them? It being then evident that there was ſuch a Power, doth it not ſtand to common ſenſe it ſhould be implied in ſuch Titles, which in their natural Importance do ſignifie a Right to govern, as the names of Paſtors and Rulers do?

2. There is a diverſity in Scripture made between Paſtors and Teachers, Epheſ. 4. 11. Tho' this may not (as it doth not) imply a neceſſity of Two diſtinct Offices in the Church, yet it doth a different reſpect and connotation in the ſame Perſon, and ſo imports that Ruling carries in it ſomewhat more than mere Teaching, and ſo the power implied in Paſtors to be more than merely Doctrinal, which is all I contend for, viz. a Right to govern the Flock committed to their charge.

3. What poſſible difference can be aſſigned between the Elders that Rule well, and thoſe which labour in the Word and Doctrine, (1 Tim. 5. 17.) if all their Ruling were merely labouring in the Word and Doctrine? and all their Governing nothing but Teaching? I intend not to prove an Office of Rulers diſtinct from Teachers from hence (which I know neither this place nor any other will do) but that the formal Conception of Ruling, is different from that of Teaching.

4. I argue from the Analogy between the Primitive Churches and the Synagogues, that as many of the names were taken from thence where they carried a power of Diſcipline with them, ſo they muſt do in ſome proportion in the Church; or it were not eaſie underſtanding them. It is moſt certain the Preſbyters of the Synagogue had a power of Ruling, and can you conceive the Biſhops and Preſbyters of the Church had none, when the Societies were much of the ſame Conſtitution, and the Government of the one was tranſcribed from the other, as hath been already largely proved?

5. The acts attributed to Paſtor in Scripture, imply a power of Governing, diſtinct from mere Teaching; ſuch are ποιμαίνειν, uſed for a Right to Govern, Matth. 2. 6. Revel. 12. 5. ——— 19. 15. which Word is attributed to Paſtors of Churches in reference to their Flocks, Acts, 20. 28. 1 Pet. 5. 2. and προστασία, is applied to Miniſters, when they are ſo frequently called προεστῶτες, which notes præſidentiam cum poteſtate; for Heſychius renders it by κυβέρνησιν, and the προστάται at Athens had certainly a power of Government in them.

6. The very word κυβερνήσεις, is attributed to thoſe who have overſight of Churches, 1 Cor. 12. 8. by which it is certainly evident, that a power more than Doctrinal is underſtood, as that it could not then be underſtood of a power merely civil. And this I ſuppoſe may ſuffice to vindicate this Argument from the Titles of Church-Officers, in the New Teſtament, that they are not inſignificant things; but the Perſons who enjoyed them had a Right to govern the Society over which the Holy Ghoſt hath made them Overſeers.

§. 19. 3. I argue that the Church-Power ariſeth not merely from conſent, becauſe the Church may exerciſe her Power on ſuch, who have not actually confederated with her; which is in admitting Members into the Church: For if the Church-Officers have power to judge whether Perſons are fit to be admitted, they have power to exclude from admiſſion ſuch whom they judge unfit, and ſo their power is exerciſed on thoſe who are not confederated. To this it may be anſwered, That the conſent to be judged, gives the Church power over the Perſon ſuing for admiſſion. I grant it doth, as to that particular perſon; but the Right in general of judging concerning Admiſſion, doth argue an antecedent power to an actual confederation. For I will ſuppoſe that Chriſt ſhould now appoint ſome Officers to found a Church, and gather a Society of Chriſtians together, where there hath been none before: I now aſk Whether theſe “ Officers have power to admit any into the “ Church or no? This I ſuppoſe cannot be denied, for to what End “ elſe were they appointed? If it be granted they have power to admit “ perſons, and thereby make a Church, then they had power antece-“ dently to any Confederation, for the Confederation was ſubſequent “ to their Admiſſion: And therefore they who had power to admit,
“ could not derive their power from Confederation. This Argument, “ to me, puts the Caſe out of diſpute, that all Church power cannot a-“ riſe from mere Confederation.

And that which farther evidenceth that the Power of the Church doth not ariſe from mere conſent, is that Deed of Gift whereby our Bleſſed Saviour did confer the Power of the Keys on the Apoſtle Peter, as the repreſentative in that Action of the whole College of the Apoſtles and Governours of the Church, of which power all the Apoſtles were actually infeoffed, John 20. 23. By which Power of the Keys is certainly meant ſome Adminiſtration in the Church, which doth reſpect it as a viſible Society, in which Senſe the Church is ſo frequently called, as in that place, the Kingdom of Heaven; and in all probability the Adminiſtration intended here by the Power of the Keys, is that we are now diſcourſing of, viz. the Power of Admiſſion into the Church of Chriſt, in order to the Pardon of the Sins of all penitent Believers, and the ſhutting out of ſuch who were manifeſtly unworthy of ſo holy a Communion. So that the power of the Keys doth not primarily reſpect excluſion out of the Church, and receiving into it again upon Abſolution, but it chiefly reſpects the power of Admiſſion into the Church, though by way of connotation and anology of Reaſon it will carry the other along with it. For if the Apoſtles, as Governours of the Church, were inveſted with a power of judging of Men's fitneſs for Admiſſion into the Church as Members of it, it ſtands to the higheſt Reaſon that they ſhould have thereby likewiſe a power conveyed to them, of excluding ſuch as are unworthy after their Admiſſion; to maintain communion with the Church. So that this Interpretation of the Power of the Keys, is far from invalidating the Power of the Church, as to its cenſuring Offenders; all that it pretends to, is only giving a more natural and genuine Senſe of the Power of the Keys, which will appear ſo to be, if we conſider theſe things. 1. That this Power was given to Saint Peter, before any Chriſtian Church was actually formed, which (as I have elſewhere made manifeſt) was not done till after Chriſt's Reſurrection; when Chriſt had given the Apoſtles their Commiſſion to go to Preach and Baptize, &c. Matth. 28. 10. Is it not therefore far more rational, that the Power of the Keys here given, ſhould reſpect the founding of a Church, and admiſſion into it, than ejection out of it (before it was in being) and receiving into it again? And this we find likewiſe remarkably fulfilled in the Perſon of the Apoſtle Peter, who opened the Door of admiſſion into the Chriſtian Church, both to Jews and Gentiles. To the Jews by his Sermon at Pentecoſt, when about 3000 Souls were brought into the Church of Chriſt; to the Gentiles, as is moſt evident in the Story of Cornelius, Acts, 10. 28. who was the firſt Fruits of the Gentiles. So that if we ſhould yield ſo far to the great Inhancers of Saint Peter's Power, that ſomething was intended peculiar to his Perſon in the Keys given him by our Saviour, we hereby ſee how rationally it may be underſtood without the leaſt Advantage to the extravagant Pretenſions of Saint Peter's pretended Succeſſors. 2. The pardon of ſin in Scripture is moſt annexed to Baptiſm and Admiſſion into the Church, and thence it ſeems evident, that the looſing of ſin ſhould be by admitting into the Church by Baptiſm, in the ſame ſenſe by which Baptiſm is ſaid to ſave us, and it is called the waſhing of Regeneration; reſpecting the Spiritual Advantages which come by Admiſſion into the Church of Chriſt; and ſo they are ſaid to have their Sins bound upon them, who continue refractory in their Sins, as Simon Magus is ſaid to be in the bond of iniquity. 3. The Metaphor of the Keys refers moſt to admiſſion into the Houſe, and excluding out of it, rather than ejecting any out of it, and re-admitting them. Thus when Eliakim is ſaid to have the Keys of the Houſe of David, it was in regard of his Power to open and ſhut upon whom he pleaſed. And thus Cyprian, as our learned Mr. Thorndike obſerves, under-underſtands the power of binding and looſing in this ſenſe, in his Epiſtle to Jubaianus, where ſpeaking of the Remiſſion of ſins in Baptiſm, he brings theſe very words of our Saviour to Peter as the evidence of it; That what he ſhould looſe on Earth, ſhould be looſed in Heaven: and concludes with this Sentence, Unde intelligimus non niſi in Eccleſiâ præpoſitis & in Evangelicâ lege ac Dominicâ ordinatione fundatis, licere baptizare, & remiſſionem peccatorum dare; foris autem nec ligari aliquid poſſe nec ſolvi, ubi non ſit qui ligare poſſit aut ſolvere. That which I now infer from this diſcourſe is, that the power of the Church doth not ariſe from mere conſent and confederation, both becauſe this power doth reſpect thoſe who have not actually conſented to it, and becauſe it is ſetled upon the Governors of the Church by Divine Inſtitution. Thus it appears that the right of inflicting cenſures doth not reſult merely ex confederatâ Diſciplinâ, which was the thing to be proved.

§. 20. (2.) The like evidence may be given, for the duty of ſubmitting to penalties or Church-cenſures in the Members of the Church: which that it ariſeth not from mere conſent of parties, will appear on theſe accounts.

1. Every perſon who enters this Society is bound to conſent before he doth it, becauſe of the Obligation lying upon Conſcience to an open profeſſion of Chriſtianity, preſently upon conviction of the underſtanding of the truth and certainty of Chriſtian Religion. For when once the mind of any rational man is ſo far wrought upon by the influence of the Divine Spirit, as to diſcover the moſt rational and undoubted evidences, which there are of the truth of Chriſtianity, he is preſently obliged to profeſs Chriſt openly, to worſhip him ſolemnly, to aſſemble with others for instruction and participation of Goſpel Ordinances; and thence it follows, that there is an antecedent Obligation upon Conſcience to aſſociate with others, and conſequently to conſent to be governed by the Rulers of the Society which he enters into. So that this ſubmiſſion to the power of Church-Officers in the exerciſe of Diſcipline upon Offenders, is implied in the very conditions of Chriſtianity, and the ſolemn profeſſing and undertaking of it. 2. It were impoſſible any Society ſhould be upheld, if it be not laid by the founder of the Society as the neceſſary Duty of all members to undergo the penalties which ſhall be inflicted by thoſe who have the care of governing that Society, ſo they be not contrary to the Laws, Nature and Conſtitution of it. Elſe there would be no proviſion made for preventing diviſions and confuſions which will happen upon any breach made upon the Laws of the Society. Now this Obligation to ſubmiſſion to cenſures, doth ſpeak ſomething antecedentally to the confederation, although the expreſſion of it lies in the confederation its ſelf. By this I hope we have made it evident that it is nothing elſe but a miſtake in thoſe otherwiſe Learned perſons, who make the power of cenſures in the Chriſtian Church to be nothing elſe but a Lex confederatæ Diſciplinæ, whereas this power hath been made appear to be derived from a higher Original than the mere Arbitrary conſent of the ſeveral Members of the Church aſſociating together: And how far the examples of the Synagogues under the Law, are from reaching that of Chriſtian Churches in reference to this, becauſe in theſe the power is conveyed by the Founder of the Society, and not left to any Arbitrary Conſtitutions, as it was among the Jews in their Synagogues. It cannot be denied but conſent is ſuppoſed, and confederation neceſſary in order to Church power; but that is rather in regard of the exerciſe, than the original of it; For although I affirm the original of this power to be of Divine Inſtitution, yet in order to the exerciſe of it in reference to particular perſons (who are not mentioned in the Charter of the power its ſelf) it is neceſſary that the perſons on whom it is exerted, ſhould declare their conſent and ſubmiſſion either by words or actions, to the Rules and Orders of this Society.

Having now proved that the Power of the Church doth not ariſe from mere conſent of parties, the next grand Inquiry is concerning the extent of this power, Whether it doth reach ſo far as to Excommunication? For ſome men who will not ſeem wholly to deny all Power in the Church over Offenders, nor that the Church doth ſubſiſt by Divine Inſtitution, yet do wholly deny any ſuch Power as that of Excommunication, and ſeem rather to ſay that Church-Officers may far more congruouſly to their Office inflict any other mulct upon Offenders, than exclude them from participation of Communion with others in the Ordinances and Sacraments of the Goſpel: In order therefore to the clearing of this, I come to the third Propoſition. §. 21.

That the power which Chriſt hath given to the Officers of his Church, doth extend to the excluſion of contumacious Offenders from the privileges which this Society enjoys. In theſe terms I rather chooſe to fix it, than in thoſe crude expreſſions, wherein Eraſtus and ſome of his followers would ſtate the queſtion, and ſome of their imprudent adverſaries have accepted it, viz. Whether Church-Officers have power to exclude any from the Euchariſt, ob moralem impuritatem? and the reaſons why I wave thoſe terms, are,

1. I muſt confeſs my ſelf yet unſatisfied as to any convincing Argument, whereby it can be proved that any were denied admiſſion to the Lord's Supper, who were admitted to all other parts of Church-Society, and owned as Members in them. I cannot yet ſee any particular Reaſon drawn from the Nature of the Lord's Supper above all other parts of Divine Worſhip, which ſhould confine the cenſures of the Church merely to that Ordinance; and ſo to make the Euchariſt bear the ſame Office in the Body of the Church, which our new Anatomiſts tell us the parenchyme of the Liver, doth in the natural Body, viz. to be colum ſanguinis, to ſerve as a kind of ſtrainer to ſeparate the more groſs and fæculent parts of the Blood from the more pure and ſpirituous; ſo the Lord's Supper to ſtrain out the more impure members of the Church from the more Holy and Spiritual. My judgment then is, that Excommunication relates immediately to the cutting a perſon off from Communion with the Churches viſible Society, conſtituted upon the ends it is; but becauſe Communion is not viſibly diſcerned but in Adminiſtration and Participation of Goſpel Ordinances, therefore Excluſion doth chiefly refer to theſe: and becauſe the Lord's Supper is one of the higheſt privileges which the Church enjoys; therefore it ſtands to reaſon that Cenſures ſhould begin there. And in that ſenſe ſuſpenſion from the Lord's Supper of Perſons apparently unworthy, may be embraced as a prudent, lawful, and convenient abatement of the greater penalty of Excommunication, and ſo to ſtand on the ſame general grounds that the other doth; for Qui poteſt majus, poteſt etiam minus, which will hold as well in moral as natural power, if there be no prohibition to the contrary, nor peculiar reaſon as to the one more than to the other. 1.

2. I diſlike the terms ob moralem impuritatem, on this account, Becauſe I ſuppoſe they were taken up by Eraſtus, and from him by others as the Controverſy was managed concerning Excommunication among the Jews, viz. whether it were merely becauſe of Ceremonial, or elſe like- 2.

wiſe becauſe of moral impurity. As to which I muſt ingenuouſly acknowledge Eraſtus hath very much the advantage of his adverſaries, clearly proving that no perſons under the Law, were excluded the Temple Worſhip becauſe of moral impurity. But then withal I think he hath gained little advantage to his cauſe by the great and ſucceſsful pains he hath taken in the proving of that; My reaſon is, becauſe the Temple-Worſhip or the Sacrifices under the Law were in ſome ſenſe propitiatory, as they were the adumbrations of that grand Sacrifice which was to be offered up for the appeaſing of God's wrath, viz. The Blood of Chriſt; therefore to have excluded any from participation of them, had been to exclude them from the viſible way of obtaining pardon of ſin (which was not to be had without ſhedding of Blood, as the Apoſtle tells Heb. 9.23. us) and from teſtifying their faith towards God and Repentance from dead works. But now under the Goſpel thoſe Ordinances, which ſuppoſe admiſſion into the Church by Baptiſm, do thereby ſuppoſe an all-ſufficient Sacrifice offered for the expiation of ſin, and conſequently the ſubſequent privileges do not immediately Relate to the obtaining of that, but a grateful commemoration of the Death of Chriſt, and a celebration of the infinite mercy and goodneſs of God in the way of Redemption found out by the death of his Son. And thererefore it ſtands to great reaſon that ſuch Perſons, who by their profane and unworthy lives diſhonour ſo Holy a profeſſion, ſhould not be owned to be as good and ſound Members of the Society, founded on ſo Sacred a Foundation, as the moſt Chriſtian and Religious Perſons. To this I know nothing can be objected, but that, firſt, The Paſſover was commemorative among the Jews; and Secondly, That the privileges of that people were then very great above other people, and therefore if God had intended any ſuch thing as Excommunication among his people, it would have been in uſe then. To theſe I anſwer.

1. I grant, the Paſſover was commemorative as to the occaſion of its Inſtitution: but then it was withal Typical and Annunciative of that Lamb of God who was to take away the Sins of the World; therefore no perſon who deſired expiation of ſins, was to be debarred from it; but the Lord's Supper under the Goſpel hath nothing in it propitiatory, but is intended as a Feaſt upon a Sacrifice and a Federal Rite, as hath been fully cleared by a very learned Perſon in his diſcourſe about the true notion of the Lord's Supper.

2. I grant the Jews had very many privileges above other Nations: Nay ſo far, that the whole body of the people were looked upon as God's choſen, and peculiar and holy people; and from thence I juſtly infer, that whatever excluſion was among the people of the Jews from their Society, will far better hold as an argument for Excommunication under the Chriſtian Church, than if it had been a mere debarring from their Levitical Worſhip. And that I ſhould far ſooner inſiſt upon, from the reaſon aſſigned, as the ground of Excommunication, than the other infirm and profligated Argument; and ſo the Excluſion out of the Camp of Iſrael and the Cerith among the Jews, (whatever we underſtand by it) may à pari hold to be a ground of excluſion from the Chriſtian Society: In Imitation of which, I rather ſuppoſe that excluſion out of the Synagogues was after taken up, rather than as a meer Outlawry, when they were deprived of Civil Power.

The Queſtion then being thus clearly ſtated, it amounts to this, whether under the Goſpel, there be any power in the Officers of the Church by virtue of divine Inſtitution to exclude any Offenders out of the Chriſtian Society, for tranſgreſſing the Laws of it? And according to our former Propoſitions, I ſuppoſe it will be ſufficient to prove that power to be of divine Inſtitution, if I prove it to be fundamentally and intrinſecally reſident in the Society its ſelf. For whatever doth immediately reſult from the Society its ſelf, muſt have the ſame Original which the ſubject hath, becauſe this hath the nature of an inſeparable property reſulting from its Conſtitution. For the clearing of which, I ſhall lay down my thoughts of it as clearly and methodically as I can; and that in theſe following Hypotheſes.

1. Where there is a power of declaring any Perſon to be no true member of the Society he is in, there is a formal power of Excommunication: For this is all which I intend by it, viz. An Authoritative pronouncing virtute officii, any Convict Offender to have forfeited his intereſt in the Church as a Chriſtian Society: and to loſe all the Privileges of it: So that if this power be lodged in any Church Officer, then he hath power formally to Excommunicate.

2. Where the enjoyment of the privileges of a Society is not abſolute and neceſſary, but depends upon conditions to be performed by every Member, of which the Society is Judge, there is a power in the Rulers of that Society to debar any perſon from ſuch privileges, upon non-performance of the Conditions. As ſuppoſing the jus Civitatis to depend upon defending the Rights of the City; upon a failing in reference to this, in any perſon admitted to Citizen-ſhip, the Rulers of the City have the ſame power to take that Right away, which they had at firſt to give it; becauſe that Right was never abſolutely given, but upon ſuppoſition that the perſon did not overthrow the ends for which it was beſtowed upon him.

3. The Church is ſuch a Society, in which Communion is not abſolute and neceſſary, but it doth depend upon the performance of ſome Conditions, of which the Governours of it are the competent Judges: And that appears,

1. Becauſe the admiſſion into the Church, depends upon conditions to be judged by Paſtors, as in caſe of adult perſons requiring Baptiſm, and the Children of Infidels being Baptized: in both which caſes it is evident, that Conditions are pre-requiſite, of which the Paſtors are Judges.

2. Becauſe the Privileges of this Society do require a Separation from other Societies in the World, and call for greater holineſs and purity of life; and thoſe very Privileges are pledges of greater benefits which belong only to perſons qualified with ſuitable conditions; it would therefore be a very great diſhonor to this Society, if it lay as common and open as other Societies in the World do, and no more qualifications required from the Members of it.

3. We have inſtances in the ſacred Records of Apoſtolical times, of ſuch ſcandals which have been the ground of the excluſion of the perſons guilty of them from the privileges of the Chriſtian ſociety. And here I ſuppoſe we may (notwithſtanding all the little evaſions which have been found out) fix on the inceſtuous perſon in the Church of Corinth. As to which, I lay not the force of the argument upon the manner of execution of the cenſure then, viz. by delegation from an Apoſtle, or the Apoſtolical Rod, or delivering to Satan; for I freely grant that theſe did then import an extraordinary power in the Apoſtles over Offenders; but I ſay, the ground and reaſon of the exerciſe of that power in ſuch an extraordinary manner at that time, doth ſtill continue, although not in that viſible extraordinary effect which it then had. And whatever practice is founded upon grounds perpetual and common, that practice muſt continue as long as the grounds of it do, and the Churches capacity will admit; (which Hypotheſis is the only rational Foundation on which Epiſcopal Government in the Church doth ſtand firm and unſhaken, and which in the former Diſcourſe I am far from undermining of, as an intelligent Reader may perceive;) now I ſay that it is evident, that the reaſons of the Apoſtles cenſure of that perſon, are not fetched from the want of Chriſtian Magiſtrates, but from ſuch things which will hold as long as any Chriſtian Church: which are the diſhonour of the Society, 1 Cor. 4. 1. the ſpreading of ſuch corruptions farther, if they paſs uncenſured, 1 Cor. 5. 6. and amendment of the perſon, 1 Cor. 5. 5. Upon theſe Pillars the power of cenſures reſts it ſelf in the Church of God, which are the main grounds of penalties in all Societies whatſoever, viz. the preſervation of the honour of them, and preventing of farther miſchief, and doing good to the offending party. And that which ſeems to add a great deal of weight to this inſtance, is, that the Apoſtle checks the Corinthians, that before the exerciſe of the Apoſtolical Rod, they were not of themſelves ſenſible of ſo great diſhonour to the Church as that was, and had not uſed ſome means for the removing ſuch a perſon from their Society; And ye are puffed up, and have not rather mourned, that he that hath done this deed, may be taken away from among you, 1 Corinth. 5. 2. Therein implying, that whether there had been ſuch a thing in the Church, or no, as the Apoſtolical Rod, it had been the duty of a Chriſtian Society to have done their endeavour in order to the removing ſuch a perſon from their number. But farther, I cannot underſtand how it ſhould be a duty in Chriſtians to withdraw from every brother who walketh diſorderly, and Church-Officers not to have power to pronounce ſuch a perſon to be withdrawn from, which amounts to Excommunication. It is not to me at all material, whether they did immediately relate to ci-

2 Cor. 5. 11. vil or ſacred converſe, (concerning which there is ſo much diſpute) for 2 Theſſ. 3. 14. in which ſoever we place it, if Church-Officers have a power to pronounce ſuch a perſon to be withdrawn from, they have a power of Excommunication; ſo we conſider this penalty as inflicted on the perſon in his relation to the Society as a Chriſtian; and withal, how nearly conjoined their civil and ſpiritual eating were together, 1 Corinth. 11. 20, 21. and how ſtrongly the Argument will hold from Civil to Sacred, viz. à remotione unius ad remotionem alterius, not from any fancied pollution in Sacris from the company of wicked men, but from the diſhonour reflecting on the Society from ſuch unworthy perſons partaking of the higheſt privileges of it. Thus from theſe three Hypotheſes this Corollary follows, that where any perſons in a Church do by their open and contumacious offences, declare to the World that they are far from being the perſons they were ſuppoſed to be in their admiſſion into the Church, there is a power reſident in the Paſtors of the Church to debar ſuch perſons from the privileges of it; and conſequently from Communion in the Lord's Supper. 1. Becauſe this expreſſeth the neareſt union, and cloſeſt confederation, as the Συσσίτια among the Grecians Commonwealth did. 2. Becauſe this hath been always looked on with greateſt veneration in the Church of God; and therefore it is leaſt of all fit thoſe perſons ſhould be admitted to the higheſt privileges of the Church, which are unworthy of the loweſt of them.

§. 23. There remain only ſome few Objections which are levelled againſt this opinion concerning the power of Excommunication, which from the Queſtion being thus ſtated and proved, will be ſoon removed. The firſt is, that this Excommunication is an outward puniſhment, and therefore belongs not to Church-Officers, but to the Magiſtrate. 2. Becauſe it neither is, nor ever was in the power of any Church-Officer to debar any offending member from publick Worſhip, becauſe any Heathens may come to it. 3. It cannot lie as to excluſion from the Lord's Supper, becauſe Chriſt is offered as ſpiritual food as well in the Word preached as in the Sacrament. To theſe I anſwer, 1. I do not well underſtand what the Objectors mean by an outward puniſhment; for there can be no puniſhment belonging to a viſible Society, (ſuch as the Church is here conſidered to be) but it muſt be viſible, i. e. outward, or a thing to be taken notice of in the World; and in this ſenſe I deny that all viſible puniſhment belongs only to the Magiſtrate; but if by outward, be meant forcible puniſhment, then I grant that all coactive power belongs to the Magiſtrate; but I deny that Excommunication formally conſidered, is a forcible puniſhment. 1. Becauſe every perſon at his entrance into this Society, is ſuppoſed to declare his ſubmiſſion to the rules of the Society; and therefore whatever he after undergoes by way of penalty in this Society, doth depend upon that conſent. 2. A perſon ſtands Excommunicate legally and de jure, who is declared authoritatively to be no Member of the Society, though he may be preſent at the acts of it, as a defranchiſed perſon may be at thoſe of a Corporation. 3. A perſon falling into thoſe offences which merit Excommunication, is ſuppoſed in ſo doing, voluntarily to renounce his intereſt in thoſe privileges, the enjoyment of which doth depend upon abſtaining from thoſe offences which he wilfully falls into, eſpecially if contumacy be joyned with them, as it is before Excommunication; for then nothing is done forcibly towards him; for he firſt relinquiſheth his right, before the Church-Governor declares him excluded the Society. So that the offendor doth meritoriouſly excommunicate himſelf, the Paſtor doth it formally, by declaring that he hath made himſelf no member by his offences and contumacy joyned with them. To the ſecond I anſwer, That I do not place the formality of Excommunication in excluſion from hearing the Word, but in debarring the perſon from hearing tanquam pars Eccleſiæ, as a member of the Church, and ſo his hearing may be well joyned with that of Heathens and Infidels, and not of Members of the Church. To the third I anſwer, That excluſion from the Lord's Supper is not on the accounts mentioned in the Objection, but becauſe it is one of the chiefeſt privileges of the Church, as it is a viſible Society.

Having thus cleared and aſſerted the power of Excommunication in a Chriſtian Church, there remains only one enquiry more, which is, Whether this power doth remain formally in the Church, after its being incorporated into the Commonwealth, or elſe doth it then eſcheat wholly into the civil Power? The reſolution of which queſtion mainly depends on another ſpoken to already, viz. Whether this power was only a kind of Widows Eſtate, which belonged to it only during its ſeparation from the civil Power, or was the Church abſolutely infeoffed of it as its perpetual Right, belonging to it in all conditions whatſoever it ſhould be in? Now that muſt appear by the Tenure of it, and the Grounds on which it was conveyed, which having been proved already to be perpetual and univerſal, it from thence appears that no acceſſion to the Church can invalidate its former Title. But then as in caſe of Marriage, the right of diſpoſal and well management of the Eſtate coming by the Wife, belongs to the Huſband; ſo after the Church is married into the Commonwealth, the right of ſupream management of this power in an external way doth fall into the Magiſtrates hands. Which may conſiſt in theſe following things. 1. A right of preſcribing Laws for the due management of Church-cenſures. 2. A right of bounding the manner of proceeding in cenſures, that in a ſetled Chriſtian-ſtate, matters of ſo great weight be not left to the Arbitrary pleaſure of any Church-Officers, nor ſuch cenſures inflicted but upon an evident conviction of ſuch great offences which tend to the diſhonour of the Chriſtian Church, and that in order to the amendment of the Offenders life. 3. The right of adding temporal and civil Sanctions to Church cenſures, and ſo enforcing the ſpiritual Weapons of the Church, with the more keen and ſharp ones of the Civil State. Thus I aſſert the force and efficacy of all Church cenſures in foro humano to flow from the Civil Power, and that there is no proper effect following any of them as to Civil Rights, but from the Magiſtrates Sanction. 4. To the Magiſtrate belongs the Right of appeals in caſe of unjuſt cenſures, not that the Magiſtrate can repeal a juſt cenſure in the Church, as to its ſpiritual effect; but he may ſuſpend the temporal effect of it: in which caſe it is the duty of Paſtors to diſcharge their office and acquieſce. But this power of the Magiſtrate in the ſupreme ordering of Eccleſiaſtical as well as Civil Cauſes, I have fully aſſerted and cleared already. From which it follows, That as to any outward effects of the power of Excommunication, the perſon of the ſupreme Magiſtrate muſt be exempted, both becauſe the force of theſe cenſures both flow from him in a Chriſtian State, and that there otherwiſe would be a progreſs in infinitum, to know whether the cenſure of the Magiſtrate were juſt or no. I conclude then, that though the Magiſtrate hath the main care of ordering things in the Church, yet (the Magiſtrates power in the Church being cumulative, and not privative) the Church and her Officers retain the Fundamental Right of inflicting cenſures on offenders: Which was the thing to be proved.

It is reported by Perſons of unqueſtionable credit, that after all the Service B. For, however it hath been maliciouſly ſuggeſted by ſome, and too eaſily believed by others, that I was put upon that* Work, with a deſign to inflame our Differences, and to raiſe a freſh perſecution againſt Diſſenting Proteſtants; I was

I was ſo far from any thought tending that way, that the only Motive I had to undertake it, was, my juſt Apprehenſion, that the Deſtruction of the Church of England, under a Pretence of Zeal againſt Popery, was one of the moſt likely ways to bring it in. And I have hitherto ſeen no cauſe (and I believe I ſhall not) to alter my opinion in this matter; which was not raſhly taken up, but formed in my mind from many years obſervation of the Proceedings of that Reſtleſs Party (I mean the Papiſts*) among us; which hath always aimed at the Ruin of this* Church, as one of the moſt probable Means, if others failed, to compaſs their Ends. As to their ſecret and more compendious ways of doing Miſchief, they lie too far out of our view, till the Providence of God, at the ſame time, diſcovers and diſappoints them; but this was more open and viſible, and although it ſeemed the farther way about, yet they promiſed themſelves no ſmall ſucceſs by it. Many Inſtruments and Engines they made uſe of in this deſign; many ways and times they ſet about it, and although they met with ſeveral diſappointments, yet they never gave it over; but, would it not be very ſtrange, that when they can appear no longer in it, others, out of mere Zeal againſt Popery, ſhould carry on the Work for them?

This ſeems to be a great Paradox to unthinking People, who are carried away with mere Noiſe and Pretences, and hope thoſe will ſecure them moſt againſt the Fears of Popery, who talk with moſt Paſſion, and with leaſt Underſtanding againſt it; whereas no perſons do really give them greater advantages than theſe do. For, where they meet only with intemperate Railings, and groſs Miſunderſtandings of the State of the Controverſies between them and us (which commonly go together) the more ſubtle Prieſts let ſuch alone to ſpend their Rage and Fury; and when the heat is over, they will calmly endeavour to let them ſee, how groſly they have been deceived in ſome things, and ſo will more eaſily make them believe, they are as much deceived in all the reſt. And thus the Eaſt and Weſt may meet at laſt; and the moſt furious Antagoniſts may become ſome of the eaſieſt Converts. This I do really fear will be the caſe of many thouſands among us, who now paſs for moſt zealous Proteſtants; if ever, which God forbid, that Religion ſhould come to be uppermoſt in England. It is therefore of mighty conſequence for preventing the Return of Popery, that men rightly underſtand what it is. For, when they are as much afraid of an innocent Ceremony, as of real Idolatry; and think they can worſhip Images, and adore the Hoſt on the ſame grounds, that they may uſe the Sign of the Croſs, or kneel at the Communion; when they are brought to ſee their miſtake in one caſe, they will ſuſpect themſelves deceived in the other alſo. For they who took that to be Popery which is not, will be apt to think Popery it ſelf not ſo bad as it was repreſented, and ſo from want of right underſtanding the Differences between us, may be eaſily carried from one Extreme to the other. For, when they find the undoubted Practices of the Ancient Church condemned as Popiſh and Antichriſtian by their Teachers, they muſt conclude Popery to be of much greater Antiquity than really it is; and when they can trace it ſo very near the Apoſtles times, they will ſoon believe it ſettled by the Apoſtles themſelves. For, it will be very hard to perſuade any conſidering Men that the Chriſtian Church ſhould degenerate ſo ſoon, ſo unanimouſly, ſo univerſally, as it muſt do, if Epiſcopal Government, and the uſe of ſome ſignificant Ceremonies were any parts of that Apoſtacy. Will it not ſeem ſtrange to them, that when ſome human Polities have preſerved their firſt Conſtitution ſo long, without any conſiderable Alteration, that the Government inſtituted by Chriſt, and ſetled by his Apoſtles, ſhould ſo ſoon after be changed into another kind, and that ſo eaſily, ſo inſenſibly, that all the Chriſtian Churches believed, they had ſtill the very ſame Government which the Apoſtles left them? Which is a matter ſo incredible, that thoſe who can believe ſuch a part of Popery could prevail ſo ſoon in the Chriſtian Church, may be brought upon the like grounds to believe, that many others did. So mighty a prejudice doth the Principles of our Churches Enemies, bring upon the Cauſe of the Reformation. And thoſe who forego the Teſtimony of Antiquity, as all the Oppoſers of the Church of England muſt do, muſt unavoidably run into inſuperable difficulties in dealing with the Papiſts, which the Principles of our Church do lead us through. For we can juſtly charge Popery as an unreaſonable Innovation, when we allow the undoubted Practices and Government of the Ancient Church, for many Ages after Chriſt. But it is obſerved by Biſhop Sanderſon, That thoſe who reject the Uſages of our Church as Popiſh and Antichriſtian, when aſſaulted by Papiſts, will be apt to conclude Popery to be the old Religion, which in the pureſt and primitive Times was profeſſed in all Chriſtian Churches throughout the World. Whereas the ſober Engliſh Proteſtant, is able, by the Grace of God, with much evidence of Truth, and without forſaking his Old Principles, to juſtifie the Church of England from all imputation of Hereſie or Schiſm, and the Religion thereof, as it ſtood by Law eſtabliſhed, from the like imputation of Novelty. Wherein he profeſſes to lay open the inmoſt thoughts of his heart in this ſad buſineſs before God and the World. I might ſhew, by particular Inſtances, from my preſent Adverſaries, that to defend their own practices they are driven to maintain ſuch Principles, as by evident conſequences from them, do overthrow the Juſtice and Equity of the Reformation; but I leave thoſe things to be obſerved in their proper places: Yet I do not queſtion the Sincerity of many Mens Zeal againſt Popery, who, out of a too eager a deſire of upholding ſome particular Fancies of their own, may give too great advantage to our common Enemies.

Preface to 2d Vol. of Serm. Sect. 11.

Preface to the Firſt Volume, Sect. 18.

Three ways Biſhop Sanderſon obſerves, our Diſſenting Brethren, tho' not intentionally and purpoſely, yet really and eventually have been the great Promoters of the Roman Intereſt among us. (1.) By putting to their helping hand to the pulling down of Epiſcopacy. And, ſaith he, it is very well known to many what rejoycing that Vote brought to the Romiſh Party: How even in Rome it ſelf they ſung their Iö-Pæans upon the Tidings thereof, and ſaid triumphantly, Now the day is ours; Now is the Fatal-Blow given to the Proteſtant Religion in England. (2) By oppoſing the Intereſt of Rome with more violence than reaſon. (3) By frequent miſtaking the Queſtion; but eſpecially through the neceſſity of ſome falſe Principle or other, which, having once imbibed, they think themſelves bound to maintain: whatever becomes of the common Cauſe of our Reformation. Which may at laſt ſuffer as much through ſome Mens folly and indiſcretion, who pretend to be the moſt Zealous Proteſtants, as by all the Arts and Deſigns of our open Enemies. For, as the ſame learned and judicious Biſhop, hath ſaid in this caſe, Many a man, when he thought moſt to make it ſure, hath quite marred a good buſineſs, by over-doing it. Thus when the Papiſts of late years, have not been able to hinder the taking many things into conſideration, againſt their intereſt, it hath been obſerved, that their Inſtruments have been for the moſt violent Counſels, knowing, that either they would be wholly ineffectual, or if they were purſued, they might in the end bring more advantage than prejudice to their Cauſe. And it is to be feared, they may ſtill hope to do their buſineſs, as Divines obſerve the Devil doth; who, when he finds one extreme will not do, he tries whether he can compaſs his end by the other: And no doubt they will extremely rejoyce, if they can make ſome Mens fears of Popery, prove at laſt an effectual means to bring it about. As ſome of the Jews of old, out of a raſh and violent zeal for the preſervation of the purity of their Religion (as they pretended) by oppoſing the Sacrifices offer'd by Strangers, and denying the uſe of the lawful Cuſtoms of their Country, brought the Roman Power upon them, and ſo haſten'd the deſtruction both of their Religion and Country too. I do not mention this, as though we could take too great care by good and wholſome Laws to ſtrengthen the Proteſtant Intereſt, and by that means, to keep out Popery; but only to ſhew, what mighty prejudice an indiſcreet Zeal at this time may bring upon us; if Men ſuffer themſelves to be tranſported ſo far as to think that overthrowing the Conſtitution of this Church will be any Means to ſecure the Proteſtant Religion among us.

For, What is it which the Papiſts have more envied and maligned than the Church of England? What is it they have more wiſhed to ſee broken in pieces? As the late Cardinal Barberini ſaid in the hearing of a Gentleman who told it me. He could be contented there were no Prieſts in England, ſo there were no Biſhops; for then he ſuppoſed their Work would do it ſelf. What is it they have uſed more Arts and Inſtruments to deſtroy, than the Conſtitution and Government of this Church? Did not Cranmer and Ridley, and Hooper, and Farrar, and Latimer, all Biſhops of this Church, ſuffer Martyrdom by their means? Had not they the ſame kind of Epiſcopacy which is now among us; and which ſome now are ſo buſie in ſeeking to deſtroy; by publiſhing one Book after another, on purpoſe to repreſent it as unlawful and inconſiſtent with the Primitive Inſtitution? Is all this done for the honour of our Reformation? Is this the way to preſerve the Proteſtant Religion among us; to fill Mens minds with ſuch prejudices againſt the firſt ſettlement of it; as to go about to make the World believe that the Church-Government then eſtabliſhed was repugnant to the Inſtitution of Chriſt; and that our Martyr-Biſhops exerciſed an unlawful Authority over Dioceſan Churches? But, Whither will not Mens indiſcreet Zeal, and lovers of their own Fancies carry them, eſpecially after 40 years preſcription? I do not ſay ſuch Men are ſet on by the Jeſuits, but I ſay, they do their Work as effectually, in blaſting the credit of the Reformation, as if they were. And yet after all theſe pains, and forty years meditations, I do not queſtion but I ſhall make it appear, that our preſent Epiſcopacy, is agreeable to the Inſtitution of Chriſt, and the beſt and moſt flouriſhing Churches. And, wherein doth our Church differ from its firſt Eſtabliſhment? Were not the ſame Ceremonies then appointed? the ſame Liturgy in Subſtance then uſed? concerning which Dr. Taylor who then ſuffered Martyrdom, publickly declared; That the whole Church-Service was ſet forth in King Edward's days, with great deliberation, by the Advice of the beſt learned Men in the Realm, and authorized by the whole Parliament, and received and publiſhed gladly through the whole Realm; which Book was never reformed but once, and yet by that one Reformation, it was ſo fully perfected, according to the Rules of our Chriſtian Religion in every behalf, that no Chriſtian Conſcience could be offended with any thing therein contained, I mean, ſaith he, of that Book reformed. Yet this is that Book, whoſe conſtant uſe is now pleaded by ſome, together with our Ceremonies, as a ground for the neceſſity of Separation from our Churches Communion.

But if we trace the Footſteps of this Separation as far as we can, we may find ſtrong probabilities, that the Jeſuitical Party had a great influence on the very firſt beginnings of it. For which, we muſt conſider, that when the Church of England was reſtored in Queen Elizabeth's Reign, there was no open Separation from the Communion of it, for ſeveral years, neither by Papiſts, nor Non-conformiſts. At laſt, the more Zealous Party of the Foreign Prieſts and Jeſuits, finding this Compliance would in the end utterly deſtroy the Popiſh Intereſt in England, they began to draw off the ſecret Papiſts from all Conformity with our Church, which the old Queen Mary's Prieſts allowed them in: this raiſed ſome heat among themſelves, but at laſt the way of Separation prevailed, as the more pure and perfect way. But this was not thought ſufficient by theſe buſie Factors for the Church of Rome, unleſs they could, under the ſame pretence of purity and perfection, draw off Proteſtants from the Communion of this Church too. To this purpoſe Perſons were imployed under the diſguiſe of more zealous Proteſtants, to ſet up the way of more ſpiritual Prayer, and greater Purity of Worſhip than was obſerved in the Church of England: that ſo the People, under theſe Pretences, might be drawn into Separate Meetings. Of this we have a conſiderable Evidence lately offer'd to the World, in the Examination of a Prieſt ſo employ'd at the Council-Table, A. D. 1567. being the 9th of Q. Elizabeth, which is publiſhed from the Lord Burleigh's Papers, which were in the hands of Arch-Biſhop Uſher, and from him came to Sir James Ware, whoſe Son brought them into England, and lately cauſed them to be Printed. Two years after, one Heath a Jeſuit was ſummon'd before the Biſhop of Rocheſter on a like account, for diſparaging the Prayers of the Church, and ſetting up Spiritual Prayers above them; and he declared to the Biſhop, That he had been ſix years in England, and that he had laboured to refine the Proteſtants, and to take off all ſmacks of Ceremonies, and to make the Church purer. When he was ſeized on, a Letter was found about him from a Jeſuit in Spain, wherein he takes notice, how he was admired by his Flock; and tells him, they looked on this way of dividing Proteſtants as the moſt effectual to bring them all back to the Church of Rome; and in his Chamber, they found a Bull from Pius V. to follow the Inſtructions of the Society for dividing the Proteſtants in England; and the Licenſe from his Fraternity. There is one thing in the Jeſuit's Letter deſerves our farther conſideration, which the Publiſher of it did not underſtand: which is, that Hallingham, Coleman, and Benſon are there mentioned, as Perſons imploy'd to ſow a Faction among the German Hereticks; which he takes to be ſpoken of the Sects in Germany; but by the German Hereticks the Engliſh Proteſtants are meant, i. e. Lutherans: and theſe very Men are mentioned by our Hiſtorians, without knowing of this Letter, as the moſt active and buſie in the beginning of the Separation. Of theſe (ſaith Fuller) Coleman, Button, Hallingham and Benſon were the chief. At which time (ſaith Heylin) Benſon, Button, Hallingham, and Coleman, and others taking upon them to be of more ardent Zeal then others, &c. That time is 1568, which agrees exactly with the Date of that Letter at Madrid, October 26. 1568. And both theſe had it from a much better Author than either of them; Camden I mean; who ſaith, That while Harding, Sanders, and others attacked our Church on one ſide; Coleman, Button, Hallingham, Benſon, and others were as buſie on the other; who, under pretence of a purer Reformation, oppoſed the Diſcipline, Liturgy, and Calling of our Biſhops, as approaching too near to the Church of Rome. And he makes theſe the Beginners of thoſe Quarrels which afterwards brake out with great violence. Now, that there is no improbability in the thing, will appear by the ſuitableneſs of theſe Pretences about Spiritual Prayer, to the Doctrine and Practices of the Jeſuits. For they are profeſſed deſpiſers of the Cathedral Service, and are excuſed from their attendance on it by the Conſtitutions of their Order; and are as great admirers of Spiritual Prayer, and an Enthuſiaſtick way of Preaching, as appears by the Hiſtory of the firſt Inſtitution of their Order, by Orlandinus and Maffeius. They who are acquainted with their Doctrine of Spiritual Prayer, will find that which is admired and ſet up here, as ſo much above Set-Forms, to be one of the loweſt of three ſorts among them. That Gift of Prayer which Men have, but requires the Exerciſe of their own Gifts to ſtir it up, they call Oratio acquiſita, acquired Prayer; although they ſay, the Principle of it is infuſed. The Second is, by a ſpecial immediate influence of the Holy Ghoſt upon the Mind, with the concurrence of infuſed habits. The Third is far above either of theſe, which they call the Prayer of Contemplation, and is never given by way of habit to any; but lies in immediate and unexpreſſible unions. All theſe I could eaſily ſhew to be the Doctrine received and magnified in the Roman Church, eſpecially by thoſe who pretend to greater Purity and Spirituality than others. But this is ſufficient to my purpoſe, to prove, that there is no improbability that they ſhould be the firſt ſetters up of this way in England. And it is obſervable, that it was never known here, or in any other Reformed Church before this time: and therefore the beginning of it is unjuſtly father'd by ſome on T. C. But by whomſoever it was begun, it met with ſuch great ſucceſs in the zeal and warmth of devotion which appeared in it, that no Charm hath been more effectual, to draw injudicious People into a contempt of our Liturgy, and admiring the Way of Separation. When by ſuch Arts the People were poſſeſſed with an Opinion of a more pure and Spiritual Way of Worſhip than was uſed in our Church, they were eaſily drawn into the admiration of thoſe, who found fault with the Liturgy and Ceremonies that were uſed among us; and ſo the Diviſions wonderfully increaſed in a very ſhort time. And the Papiſts could not but pleaſe themſelves to ſee that other Men did their Work ſo effectually for them. For the Authors of the Admonition 14 Elizab. declared, They would have neither Papiſts nor others conſtrained to Communicate: which although, as Arch-Biſhop Whitgift ſaith, they intended as a Plea for their own Separation from the Church, yet, ſaith he, the Papiſts could not have met with better Proctors. And elſewhere he tells them, That they did the Pope very good ſervice, and that he would not miſs them for any thing. For what is his deſire but to have this Church of England (which he hath Accuſed) utterly defaced and diſcredited, to have it by any means overthrown, if not by Foreign Enemies, yet by Domeſtical Diſſention. And, What fitter and apter Inſtruments could he have had for that purpoſe than you, who under pretence of zeal, overthrow that which other Men have builded, under colour of Purity ſeek to bring in Deformity, and under the Cloke of Equality and Humility, would uſurp as great Tyranny and lofty Lordlineſs over your Pariſhes, as ever the Pope did over the whole Church? And in another place, he ſaith, They were made the Engines of the Roman Conclave, whereby they intend to overthrow this Church by our own Folly, which they cannot compaſs by all their Policy. Arch-Biſhop Grindal (as I find in a Letter of his) expreſſed his great fear of two things, Atheiſm and Popery, and both ariſing out of our needleſs Diviſions and Differences, fomented, fomented, he doubts not by Satan the Enemy of Mankind, and the Pope the Enemy of Chriſtendom. By theſe differences, the Enemies of our Religion gain this, That nothing can be eſtabliſhed by Law in the Proteſtant Religion, whoſe every part is oppoſed by one or other of her own Profeſſors; ſo that things continuing looſe and confuſed, the Papiſts have their opportunity to urge their way, which is attended with Order and Government, and our Religion continuing thus diſtracted and divided, ſome vile Wretches lay hold of the Arguments on one ſide to confute the other, and ſo hope at laſt to deſtroy all. Dr. Sutcliffe ſaid long ago, That Wiſe Men apprehended theſe unhappy Queſtions about indifferent things to be managed by the ſubtle Jeſuits, thereby to diſturb the Peace and Settlement of our Church, until at laſt they enjoy their long expected opportunity to ſet up themſelves, and reſtore the exploded Tyranny and Idolatry of the Church of Rome. Among Mr. Selden's MSS. there is mentioned an odd Prophecy, That Popery ſhould decay about 1500, and be reſtored about 1700, which is there ſaid to be moſt likely by means of our Diviſions, which threaten the Reformation, upon the Intereſt of Religion, and open advantages to the Enemies of it, and nothing is there ſaid to be ſo likely to prevent it as a firm eſtabliſhment of ſound Doctrine, Diſcipline, and Worſhip in this Church.

Among the Jeſuit Contzen's directions for reducing Popery into a Country, the moſt conſiderable are, Contzen Politic. l. 2. c. 18. Sect. 6.

(1.) That it be done under a pretence of eaſe to tender Conſciences, which will gain a reputation to the Prince, and not ſeem to be done from his own Inclination, but out of kindneſs to his People.

(2.) That when Liberty is granted, then the parties be forbid to contend with each other, for that will make way the more eaſily for one ſide to prevail, and the Prince will be commended for his love of Peace.

(3.) That thoſe, who ſuſpect the Deſign, and preach againſt it, be traduced as Men that Preach very unſeaſonable Doctrine, that they are Proud, Self-opiniators, and Enemies to Peace and Union.

But, the ſpecial Advice he gives to a Catholick Prince, is,

(4.) To make as much uſe of the Diviſions of his Enemies, as of the Agreement of his Friends. How much the Popiſh Party here hath followed theſe Counſels, will eaſily appear by reflection upon their behaviour theſe laſt twenty years. Sect. 9.

But that which more particularly reaches to our own caſe, is, the Letter of Advice given to F. Young, by Seignior Ballarini, concerning the beſt way of managing the Popiſh Intereſt in England, upon His Majeſty's Reſtauration, wherein are ſeveral very remarkable things. This Letter was found in F. Young's Study, after his death, and was tranſlated out of Italian, and printed in the Collection before mention'd;

The Firſt Advice is, To make the Obſtruction of Settlement their great deſign, eſpecially upon the fundamental Conſtitutions of the Kingdom, whereunto if things ſhould fall, they would be more firm than ever.

(2.) The next thing is, To remove the jealouſies raiſed by Prin, Baxter, &c. of their deſign upon the late Factions; and to ſet up the proſperous way of Fears and Jealouſies of the King and Biſhops.

(3.) To make it appear under-hand, how near the Doctrine, Worſhip, and Diſcipline of England comes to us: at how little diſtance their Common-Prayer is from our Maſs; and that the wiſeſt and ableſt Men of that way are ſo moderate, that they would willingly come over to us, or at leaſt meet us half way; hereby the more ſtayed Men will become more odious, and others will run out of all Religion for fear of Popery.

(4.) Let there be an Indulgence promoted by the Factious, and ſeconded by you.

(5.) That the Trade and Treaſure of the Nation may be engroſſed between themſelves and other diſcontented Parties.

(6.) That the Biſhops and Miniſters of the Church of England be aſperſed, as either worldly and careleſs on the one hand; or ſo factious on the other, that it were well they were removed.

Theſe are ſome of thoſe excellent Advices then given, and how well they have been followed we all know.

For, according to this Counſel, when they could not hinder the Settlement then, The great thing they aimed at for many years, was, the breaking in pieces the Conſtitution of this Church by a General Toleration. This Coleman owned at his Tryal, and after Sentence, declared, That poſſibly he might be of an opinion, that Popery might come in, if Liberty of Conſcience had been granted. The Author of the Two Conferences between L'Cheſe and the four Jeſuits, owns the Declaration of Indulgence, 167½, to be of the Papiſts procuring; but he ſaith, the Preſbyterians preſently ſuſpected the Kindneſs, and like wiſe Men cloſed with the Conformiſts; and refuſed the Bait, however ſpecious it ſeemed, when they ſaw the Hook that lay under it. It was ſo far from this, that when one of the furious Diſſenters, ſuſpected the kindneſs, and made Queries upon the Declaration, wherein he repreſented it as a Stratagem to introduce Popery, and Arbitrary Government; one of the more moderate Party among them, Wrote a Publick Vindication of their accepting the Licences, wherein he declared to the World, in their Name, That they were not concerned what the ſecret deſign might be, ſo long as the thing was good. And why, ſaith he, do you inſinuate Jealouſies? Have not we publick, and the Papiſts only private, Allowance? In fine, we are thankful for the honor put upon us to be publick in our Meetings. Was this the Suſpicion they had of the Kindneſs, and their Wiſdom in joyning with the Conformiſts? If ſuch bold and notorious Untruths are publiſhed now, when every one that can remember but eight years backward, can diſprove them, what account may we expect will be given to Poſterity of the Paſſages of theſe Times, if others do not take care to ſet them right? And I am ſo far from believing that they then cloſed with the Conformiſts, that I date Preſbyterian Separation chiefly from that time. For, did not they take out Indulgences, build Meeting Places, and keep up ſeparate Congregations ever ſince? And did not thoſe, who before ſeem'd moſt inclinable to hold Communion with our Churches, then undertake in Print to defend the lawfulneſs of theſe ſeparate Meetings upon ſuch Principles as will juſtifie any Separation? Upon this, many of thoſe who frequented our Churches before, withdrew themſelves; and ſince they have formed and continued ſeparate Bodies; and upon the death of one Miniſter have choſen another in his room. And, what is a formal Separation if this be not? Then the Ejected Miniſters reſorted to Cities and Corporations, not to ſupply the neceſſities of thoſe who wanted them, but to gather Churches among them. For a very credible Perſon informs us, That in the City he lived in, where there were not above 30 or 40 that ordinarily refuſed the publick, and met privately before the Indulgence; there were ten Non-conformiſt miſt Miniſters that came into their City. And, What could this be for, but to draw People from their Churches, to make up Separate Congregations? And ever ſince that time, they have been hammering out Principles, ſuch as they are, to juſtifie their own practices. But the Presbyterians did not join with the Papiſts for a General Toleration. I grant ſome of them did not, although very powerful Charms were at that time uſed to draw them in: and not a few ſwallowed the Specious Bait, although ſome had the Skill to diſentangle themſelves from the Hook which went along with it. But that this honour doth not belong univerſally to them, I ſhall thus evidently prove.

In A. D. 1675. there was a Book Printed, Entituled, The Peaceable Deſign, or an account of the Non-conformiſts Meetings, by ſome Miniſters of London. In it an Objection is thus put; But What ſhall we ſay then to the Papiſts? The Anſwer is, The Papiſt in our account is but one ſort of Recuſants, and the conſcientious and peaceable among them, muſt be held in the ſame Predicament with thoſe among our ſelves, that likewiſe refuſe to come to Common Prayer. What is this, but joining for a Toleration of Popery? If this be not plain enough, theſe words follow, But as for the common Papiſt, who lives innocently in his way, he is to us as other Separatiſts, and ſo comes under the like Toleration.

This notable Book, with ſome few Additions and Alterations, hath been ſince Printed, and with great ſincerity called, An Anſwer to my Sermon. And the Times being changed ſince, the former Paſſage is thus alter'd, The Papiſt is one, whoſe Worſhip to us is Idolatry, and we cannot therefore allow them the liberty of publick Aſſembling themſelves, as others of the Separation. Is it Idolatry, and not to be tolerated in 1680? And was it Idolatry and to be tolerated in 1675? Or was it no Idolatry then, but is become ſo now, and intolerable Idolatry too? The latter paſſage hath theſe Alterations; in ſtead of, He is to us as other Separatiſts, and ſo comes under the like Toleration; theſe are put in, He is to us, in regard of what he doth in private, in the matter of his God, as others who likewiſe refuſe to come to Common Prayer. Now we ſee Toleration ſtruck out for the Papiſts; but it was not only viſible enough before, but that very Book was Printed with a Deſign to preſent it to the Parliament, which was the higheſt way of owning their Concurrence with the Papiſts for a general Toleration. And the true reaſon of this alteration is, that then was then, and now is now.

And to ſhew yet farther, what influence the Jeſuitical Councils have had upon their People, as to the Courſe of Separation; I ſhall produce the Teſtimony of a very conſiderable Perſon among them, who underſtood thoſe affairs as well as any Man, viz. Mr. Ph. Nye. Who, not long before his Death, foreſeeing the miſchievous conſequence of thoſe extravagant Heats, the People were running into, wrote a Diſcourſe on purpoſe, to prove it lawful to hear the Conforming Miniſters, and anſwers all the common Objections againſt it; towards the Concluſion he wonders, how the differing Parties came to be ſo agreed, in thinking it unlawful to hear us preach; but he ſaith, He is perſuaded it is one conſtant deſign of Satan in the variety of ways of Religion he hath ſet on foot by Jeſuits among us. Let us therefore be more aware of whatſoever tends that way. Here we have a plain Confeſſion of a Leading Man among the Diſſenters, That the Jeſuits were very buſie among them, and that they and the Devil joined together in ſetting them at the greateſt diſtance poſſible from the Church of England; and that thoſe who would countermine the Devil and the Jeſuits, muſt avoid whatever tends to that height of Separation the People were run into. And Mr. Baxter, in thoſe days, viz. but a little before the Indulgence came out, was ſo ſenſible of the Miſchief of Separation, that he ſaith, Our Diviſion gratifieth the Papiſts, and greatly hazardeth the Proteſtant Religion, and that more than moſt of you ſeem to believe, or to regard. Where he ſpeaks to the Separating People. And among other great inconveniences of Separation, which he mentions, this is one, That Popery will get by it ſo great advantage as may hazard us all, and we may loſe that, which the ſeveral Parties do contend about.

Two ways eſpecially Popery will grow out of our Diviſions.

(1.) By the odium and ſcorn of our diſagreements, inconſiſtency, and multiplied Sects: They will perſuade People, that we muſt come for Unity to them, or elſe run mad, and crumble into duſt and individuals. Thouſands have been drawn to Popery, or confirmed in it by this Argument already; and I am perſuaded, that all the Arguments elſe in Bellarmin, and all other Books that ever were written, have not done ſo much to make Papiſts in England, as the Multitude of Sects among our ſelves. Yea, ſome Profeſſors of religious ſtrictneſs, of great eſteem for Godlineſs, have turned Papiſts themſelves, when they were giddy and wearied with turnings; and when they had run from Sect to Sect, and found no conſiſtency in any.

(2.) Either the Papiſts by increaſing the Diviſions, would make them be accounted ſeditious, rebellious, dangerous to the publick Peace; or elſe when ſo many Parties are conſtrained to beg and wait for liberty, the Papiſts may not be ſhut out alone, but have Toleration with the reſt. And, ſaith he, Shall they uſe our hands to do their Works, and pull their Freedom out of the Fire? We have already unſpeakably ſerved them, both in this, and in abating the Odium of the Gun-powder Plot, and their other Treaſons, Inſurrections, and Spaniſh Invaſion.

Thus freely did Mr. Baxter write at that time; and even after the Indulgence, he hath theſe paſſages, concerning the ſeparating and dividing Humour of their People; It ſhameth, it grieveth us to ſee and hear from England, and from New England this common cry, We are endanger'd by Diviſions, principally becauſe the Self-conceited part of the religious People, will not be ruled by their Paſtors, but muſt have their way, and will needs be Rulers of the Church and them. And ſoon after he ſaith to them, You have made more Papiſts than ever you or we are like to recover. Nothing is any whit conſiderable that a Papiſt hath to ſay, till he cometh to your caſe, and ſaith, Doth not experience tell you, that without Papal unity and force, theſe People will never be ruled, or united? It is you that tempt them to uſe Fire and Faggot, that will not be ruled or kept in concord, by the wiſeſt, and holieſt, and moſt ſelf-denying Miniſters upon Earth. (Are not theſe kind words for themſelves, conſidering what he gives to others?) And muſt you, even you, that ſhould be our comfort, become our ſhame, and break our hearts, and make Men Papiſts by your Temptation? Wo to the World becauſe of offences, and wo to ſome by whom they come.

Let now any impartial Reader judge, who did moſt effectually ſerve the Papiſts Deſigns, thoſe who kept to the Communion of the Church of England, or thoſe who fell into the Courſe of Separation? I will allow, what Mr. Baxter ſaith, That they might uſe their endeavours to exaſperate the

the ſeveral Parties againſt each other; and might ſometimes preſs the more rigorous execution of Laws againſt them; but then it was to ſet them at the greater diſtance from us, and to make them more pliable to a General Toleration. And they ſometimes complained, that thoſe who were moſt adverſe to this found themſelves under the ſeverity of the Law, when more tractable men eſcaped; which they have weakly imputed to the implacable temper of the Biſhops, when they might eaſily underſtand the true cauſe of ſuch a diſcrimination: But from the whole it appears, that the grand Deſign of the Papiſts for many years, was to break in pieces the Conſtitution of the Church of England; which being done, they flatter'd themſelves with the hopes of great Acceſſions to their ſtrength and party; and in order to this, they inflamed the differences among us to the utmoſt height, on purpoſe to make all the Diſſenting Parties to join with them for a General Toleration; which they did not queſtion would deſtroy this Church, and advance their Intereſt. Whether they did judge truly in this, I am not to determine; it is ſufficient that they went upon the greateſt Probabilities. But, is it poſſible to imagine ſuch skilful Engineers ſhould uſe ſo much art and induſtry to undermine and blow up a Bulwark, unleſs they hoped to gain the place, or at leaſt ſome very conſiderable advantage to themſelves by it? And it is a moſt unfortunate condition our Church is in, if thoſe who deſign to bring in Popery, and thoſe who deſign to keep it out, ſhould both conſpire towards its deſtruction.

This, which I have repreſented, was the poſture of our Church-Affairs, when the late horrible Plot of the Papiſts, for Deſtruction of the King's Perſon, and Subverſion of our Religion came to be diſcover'd. It ſeems, they found the other methods tedious and uncertain; and they met with many croſs accidents, many rubs and diſappointments in their way; and therefore they reſolved upon a Summary way of Proceeding, and to do their buſineſs by one blow. Which, in regard of the circumſtances of our Affairs, is ſo far from being incredible, that if they had no ſuch deſign, it is rather a Wonder, they had not; eſpecially conſidering the allowed Principles and Practices in the Church of Rome. Upon the diſcovery of the Plot, and the means the Papiſts uſed to confirm the Truth of it (knowing our great proneneſs to Infidelity) by the Murder of a worthy Gentleman who received the Depoſitions, the Nation was extremely alarm'd with the apprehenſions of Popery, and provoked to the utmoſt deteſtation of it. Thoſe who had been long apprehenſive of their reſtleſs deſigns, were glad to ſee others awaken'd; but they ſeemed like Men rouſed out of a deep ſleep, being amazed and confounded, fearful of every thing, and apt to miſtruſt all perſons who were not in ſuch a Conſternation as themſelves. During this heat, ſome of us, both in private, and publick, endeavour'd to bring the Diſſenters to the ſenſe of the neceſſity of Union among Proteſtants, hoping the apprehenſion of preſent danger, common to us all, would have diſpoſed them to a better inclination to the things which belong to our Peace: But finding the Nation thus vehemently bent againſt Popery, thoſe who had formerly carried it ſo ſmoothly and fairly towards the common and innocent Papiſts (as they then ſtiled them) and thought them equally capable of Toleration with themſelves, now they fly out into the utmoſt rage againſt them; and others were apt, by ſly inſinuations, to repreſent thoſe of the Church of England (ſome of whom had appeared with vigour and reſolution againſt Popery, when they were trucking underhand for Toleration with them) as Papiſts in Maſquerade. But now they they tack about, and ſtrike in with the violent Rage of the People, and none ſo fierce againſt Popery as they. What influence it hath had upon others I know not, but I confeſs it did not leſſen my eſteem of the Integrity of thoſe of the Church of England, that they were not ſo much tranſported by ſudden heats, beyond the juſt bounds of Prudence, and Decency, and Humanity, towards their greateſt Enemies, having learnt from the Apoſtle, That, the wrath of Man worketh not the righteouſneſs of God. They expected as little favour from them as any, if they had prevailed, and I doubt not but ſome of them had been made the firſt Examples of their Cruelty. However, this was interpreted to be want of Zeal, by thoſe who think there is no Fire in the Houſe, unleſs it flame out at the Windows; and this advantage was taken by the inveterate Enemies of our Church, to repreſent us all as ſecret friends to the Papiſts (ſo improbable a Lie, that the Devil himſelf would bluſh at the telling of it, not for the Malice, but the Folly and ill Contrivance of it) and thoſe who were more moderate, were content to allow 3 or 4 among the Biſhops to be Proteſtants, and about 4 or 5 among the Clergy of London. To feed this humour (which wonderfully ſpread among more of the People than we could have believed to have been ſo weak) moſt of the Malicious Libels againſt the Church of England were reprinted and diſperſed, and new ones added to them. Among the reſt, one tranſlated out of French, to prove the Advances of the Church of England towards Popery; but ſo unhappily managed, that thoſe Perſons are chiefly mention'd, who had appeared with moſt zeal againſt Popery. Yet, ſo much had the Arts of ſome men prevailed over the Judgment of others, that even this Diſcourſe was greedily ſwallowed by them. But I muſt do the Author of it that Right, to declare, that before his Death, he was very ſenſible of the injury he had done to ſome worthy Divines of our Church therein; and begged God and them pardon for it. Wherein, as he followed the Example of ſome others, who were great Enemies to our Church while they lived, but repented of it when they came to die; ſo, I hope, others, upon better conſideration, will ſee reaſon to follow his. But this was but an inconſiderable trifle in compariſon of what follows. We were ſtill in hopes, that Men ſo Wiſe, ſo Self-denying, as the Non-conformiſt Miniſters repreſent themſelves to the World, would, in ſo Critical a time, have made ſome ſteps or advances towards an Union with us; at leaſt to have let us known their Senſe of the preſent ſtate of things, and their readineſs to join with us as far as they could, againſt the Aſſaults of a Common Enemy. Inſtead of this, thoſe we diſcourſed with, ſeemed farther off than before; and when we leaſt expected ſuch a Blow, under the Name of a Plea for Peace, out comes a Book, which far better deſerved the Title of a Plea for Diſorder and Separation, not without frequent, ſharp, and bitter Reflections on the Conſtitution of our Church, and the Conformity required by Law; as though it had been deſigned on purpoſe, to repreſent the Clergy of our Church as a Company of notorious, lying and perjured Villains; for conforming to the Laws of the Land, and Orders eſtabliſhed among us; for there are no fewer than 30 tremendous Aggravations of the Sin of Conformity ſet down in it. And all this done, without the leaſt Provocation given on our ſide; when all our Diſcourſes that touched them, tended only to Union, and the Deſirableneſs of Accommodation. If this had been the ſingle work of one Man, his Paſſion and Infirmities might have been ſome tolerable excuſe for the indiſcretion of it; but he writes in the Name of a whole Party of Men, and delivers the Senſe of all his Acquaintance; and if thoſe Principles be owned, and allowed by them, there can hardly be expected any ſuch thing as a National Settlement, but all Churches muſt be heaps of Sand, which may lie together till a puff of wind diſperſes them; having no firmer Bond of Union, than the preſent humour and good will of the People. But of the Principles of that Book, I have diſcourſed at large, as far as concerns the buſineſs of Separation in the Second and Third Parts of the following Treatiſe.

But, as though this had not been enough, to ſhew what Enemies to Peace Men may be under a pretence of it; not long after, the ſame Author ſets forth another Book, with this Title, The true and only way of Concord of all the Chriſtian Churches. As though he had been Chriſt's Plenipotentiary upon Earth, and were to ſet the Terms of Peace and War among all Chriſtians; but I wiſh he had ſhewed himſelf ſuch a Pattern of Meekneſs, Humility, Patience, and a peaceable Diſpoſition, that we might not have ſo much reaſon to diſpute his Credentials. But this is likewiſe fraught with ſuch impracticable Notions, and dividing Principles, as though his whole deſign had been, to prove that there is No true way of Concord among Chriſtians; for if there be no other than what he allows, all the Chriſtian Churches this day in the World are in a mighty miſtake. When I looked into theſe Books, and ſaw the deſign of them, I was mightily concerned, and infinitely ſurprized, that a Perſon of his Reputation for Piety, of his Age and Experience in the World, and ſuch a Lover of Peace, as he had always profeſſed himſelf, and one who tells the World ſo often of his dying, and of the Day of Judgment, ſhould think of leaving two ſuch Firebrands behind him, as both theſe Books will appear to any one who duely conſiders them, which have been ſince followed by four or five more to the ſame purpoſe, ſo that he ſeems reſolved to leave his Life and Sting together in the Wounds of this Church. And it made me extremely pity the caſe of this poor Church, when even thoſe who pretend to plead for Peace, and to bring Water to quench her Flames, do but add more Fuel to them. This gave the firſt occaſion to thoſe Thoughts, which I afterwards delivered in my Sermon; for ſince by the means of ſuch Books, the zeal of ſo many People was turned off from the Papiſts againſt thoſe of our Church, I ſaw a plain neceſſity, that either we muſt be run down by the impetuous violence of an enraged, but unprovoked company of Men, or we muſt venture our ſelves to try, whether we could ſtem that Tide which we ſaw coming upon us. And it falling to my Lot to preach in the moſt publick Auditory of the City, at a more than uſual Appearance, being the firſt Sunday in the Term, I conſidered the relation I ſtood in under our Honoured Dioceſan, to the Clergy of the City, and therefore thought my ſelf more obliged to take notice of what concerned the Peace and Welfare of the Churches therein. Upon theſe Conſiderations, I thought fit to take that opportunity, to lay open the due ſenſe I had of the Unreaſonableneſs and Miſchief of the preſent Separation. Wherein I was ſo far from intending to reflect on Mr. B. as preaching in the neighbourhood of my Pariſh, that to my beſt remembrance, I never once thought of it, either in the making or preaching of that Sermon. And yet throughout his Anſwer he would inſinuate, That I had ſcarce any one in my eye but himſelf. His Books indeed had made too great an Impreſſion on my Mind for me eaſily to forget them: But it was the great, the dangerous, the unaccountable Separation, which I knew to be in and about the City, without regard to the Greatneſs or Smallneſs of Pariſhes, to the Abilities or Piety of their Miniſters, ſters, or to the Peace and Order of the Church we live in, which made me fix upon that Subject, although I knew it to be ſo ſore a place, that the Parties moſt concerned, could hardly endure to have it touched, tho' with a ſoft and gentle hand. However, I conſidered the duty which I owe to God, and this Church, above the eſteem and good words of peeviſh and partial Men; as I had before done in my dealing with the Papiſts; and I reſolved to give them no juſt provocation by reproachful Language, or perſonal Reflections; but if Truth and Reaſon would anger them, I did not hold my ſelf obliged to ſtudy to pleaſe them.

But, againſt this whole Undertaking, there have been two common Objections.

Firſt, That it was Unſeaſonable.
Secondly, That it was too Sharp and Severe.
To both theſe I ſhall anſwer:

Firſt, As to the Unſeaſonableneſs of it. What! Was it Unſeaſonable to perſuade Proteſtants to Peace and Unity? That ſurely is very ſeaſonable at any time, and much more then. And I appeal to any one that reads it, whether this were not the chief, and only deſign of my Sermon. And, to ſay, This was Unſeaſonable, is juſt as if a Garriſon were beſieg'd by an Enemy, and in great danger of being ſurprized, and although they had frequent notice of it given them, yet many of the Soldiers were reſolved not to join in a common Body, under command of their Officers, but would run into corners, a few in a company, and do what they liſt, and one ſhould undertake to perſuade them to return to their due obedience, and to mind the common Intereſt, and ſome grave By-ſtanders ſhould ſay, It is true, this is good Counſel at another time, but at this preſent it is very Unſeaſonable. When could it be more ſeaſonable, than when the ſenſe of their danger is greateſt upon them? At another time it might have been leſs neceſſary; but when the common danger is apparent to all, Men of Senſe, or common Ingenuity, could not but take ſuch Advice moſt kindly at ſuch a ſeaſon. But this Advice was not given to themſelves, but to the Magiſtrates and Judges, and that made it look like a deſign to ſtir them up to a perſecution of them. There had been ſome colour for this, if there had been the leaſt word tending that way through the whole Sermon. But this Objection is generally made by thoſe who never read the Sermon, and never intend to read it; and ſuch I have found have ſpoken with the greateſt bitterneſs againſt it. They reſolved to condemn it, and therefore would ſee nothing that might have alter'd their Sentence. It is enough, it was preach'd before the Magiſtrates and Judges, and therefore it muſt be for perſecution of Diſſenters. None are ſo incapable of conviction, as thoſe who preſently determine what a thing muſt be, without conſidering what it is. Is it not poſſible for a Man to ſpeak of Peace before Hannibal, or of Obedience to Government before Julius Cæſar? Muſt one ſpeak of nothing but Drums and Trumpets before great Generals? Which is juſt as reaſonable as to ſuppoſe, that a Man cannot preach about Diſſenters before Judges and Magiſtrates, but he muſt deſign to ſtir them up to the ſevere Execution of Laws? But it is to no purpoſe for me to think to convince thoſe by any Vindication, who will not be at the pains to read the Sermon it ſelf, for their own ſatisfaction. But the Diſſenters themſelves were not there to hear it. And muſt we never preach againſt the Papiſts but when they are preſent? It ſeems they ſoon heard enough of it, by the noiſe and clamour they made about it. Yet ſtill this gives advantage to the Papiſts for us to quarrel among our ſelves. Would to God this advantage had never been given them! And Woe be to them by whom theſe offences come. And what muſt we do? Muſt we ſtand ſtill with open Arms, and naked Breaſts to receive all the Wounds they are willing to give us? Muſt we ſuffer our ſelves to be run down with a popular Fury, raiſed by reviling Books, and Pamphlets, and not open our Mouths for our own Vindication, leſt the Papiſts ſhould overhear us? Which is, as if the unruly Soldiers in an Army muſt be let alone in a Mutiny, for fear the Enemy ſhould take notice, and make ſome advantage to him, but which will be the greater advantage to him, to ſee it ſpread and increaſe, or care taken in time to ſuppreſs it? If our Diſſenters had not appeared more active and buſie than formerly; if they had not both by publick Writings, and ſecret Inſinuations, gone about to blaſt the Reputation of this Church, and the Members of it, ſo diſingenuouſly, as they have done, there might have been ſome pretence for the Unſeaſonableneſs of my Sermon. But when thoſe things were notorious, to ſay it was Unſeaſonable to preach ſuch a Sermon then, or now to defend it; is in effect to tell us, they may ſay and do what they will againſt us, at all ſeaſons; but whatever we ſay or do for our own Vindication is Unſeaſonable; which, under favour, ſeems to be little leſs than a State of Perſecution on our ſide, for it is like ſetting us in the Pillory, for them to throw Dirt at us, without allowing us any means to defend our ſelves.

But ſome complain of the two great Sharpneſs and Severity of it. But, Wherein doth it lie? Not in raking into old Sores, or looking back to the proceedings of former Times? Not in expoſing the particular Faults of ſome Men, and laying them to the charge of the whole Party? Not in ſharp and provoking Reflections on Mens Perſons? All theſe I purpoſely, and with care declined. My deſign being not to exaſperate any; but to perſuade and argue them into a better diſpoſition to Union, by laying open the common danger we are in, and the great Miſchief of the preſent Separation. But I am told by one, There are ſevere Reflections upon the Sincerity and Honeſty of the Deſigns of the Non-conformiſts; by another, that indeed I do not beſpeak for them, Gibbets, Whipping-poſts, and Dungeons, nor (directly) any thing grievous to their Fleſh; but I do not paſs any gentle Doom upon them, in reſpect of their everlaſting State. God forbid, that I ſhould judge any one among them, as to their preſent Sincerity, or final Condition; to their own Maſter they muſt ſtand or fall; but, my buſineſs was to conſider, the nature and tendency of their Actions. My Judgment being, that a cauſeleſs breaking the Peace of the Church we live in, is really as great and as dangerous a Sin as Murder, and in ſome reſpects aggravated beyond it; and herein having the concurrence of the Divines of greateſt reputation both ancient and modern: Would they have had me repreſented that as no Sin, which I think to be ſo great a one; or thoſe as not guilty, whom in my Conſcience I thought to be guilty of it? Would they have had me ſuffered this Sin to have lain upon them without reproving it; or would they have had me found out all the ſoft and palliating conſiderations to have leſſen'd their ſenſe of it? No, I had ſeen too much of this already; and a mighty prejudice done thereby to Men otherwiſe ſcrupulous and conſcientious, that ſeem to have loſt all Senſe of this Sin; as if there neither were, nor could be any ſuch thing; unleſs perhaps they ſhould happen to quarrel among themſelves in a particular Congregation. Which is ſo mean, ſo jejune, ſo narrow a Notion of Schiſm, ſo much ſhort of that Care of the Church's Peace, which Chriſt hath made ſo great a Duty of his Followers, that I cannot but wonder that Men of underſtanding ſhould be ſatisfy'd with it, unleſs they thought there was no other way to excuſe their own actings. And that I confeſs, is a ſhrewd temptation. But, ſo far as I can judge, as far as the Obligation to preſerve the Church*'s* Peace extends, ſo far doth the Sin of Schiſm reach; and the Obligation to preſerve the Peace of the Church extends to all lawful Conſtitutions in order to it; or elſe it would fall ſhort of the Obligation to Civil Peace, which is as far as is poſſible, and as much as lies in us. Therefore to break the Peace of the Church we live in, for the ſake of any lawful Orders and Conſtitutions made to preſerve it, is directly the Sin of Schiſm, or an unlawful breach of the Peace of the Church. And this is not to be determined by Mens Fancies, and preſent Apprehenſions; which they call the Dictates of Conſcience; but upon plain and evident grounds, manifeſting the repugnancy of the things required to the Laws and Inſtitutions of Chriſt, and that they are of that importance that he allows Men rather to divide from ſuch a Communion, than join in the practice of ſuch things. We were in a lamentable caſe, as to the Defence of the Reformation, if we had nothing more to plead againſt the Impoſitions of the Church of Rome, than they have againſt ours; and I think it impoſſible to defend the lawfulneſs of our Separation from them, if we had no better grounds to proceed upon, than they have againſt our Church. For the proof of this, I refer the Reader to the BOOK it ſelf. This then being my opinion concerning their Practices: Was this a fault in me, to ſhew ſome reaſon for it? And how could I do that without proving thoſe Practices to be ſinful? and if they were ſinful, how could they who knowingly and deliberately continue in the Practice of them be innocent? What influence the prejudices of Education, the authority of Teachers, the almoſt invincible Ignorance of ſome weaker People, and the uncurable Byaſs of ſome Mens Minds may have to leſſen their Guilt, I meddle not with; but the Nature of the Actions, and the Tendency of them which I then declared to be ſinful; and I am ſo far from being alter'd in my Judgment by any of the Anſwers I have ſeen, (and I have read all that have been publiſhed) that I am much more confirmed in it. But Dr. O. ſaith, He had ſeen a Collection of ſevere Reflections by the hand of a Perſon of Honour, with his Judgment upon them. I wiſh the Doctor had favour'd me with a ſight of them; but at preſent it is ſomewhat hard for me to make the Objections and Anſwers too. And it was not ſo fairly done to mention them unleſs he had produced them. Therefore to the unknown Objections, I hope no Anſwer is expected.

Miſchief of Impoſ. end of the Preface.

But there is one expreſſion wherein I am charged with a ſcurrilous Sarcaſm, or a very unchriſtian judging Mens Hearts, or a ridiculous Piece of Nonſenſe, viz. when I ſay, That the moſt godly People among them can the leaſt endure to be told of their Faults: Now, ſaith Mr. A. How can they be moſt godly, who cannot bear reproof of their Faults, which is a main part of Godlineſs. I am really ſorry, ſome of my Anſwerers have ſo much made good the truth of that Saying in its plaineſt ſenſe. But there needs no more to clear my Intention in it, but to conſider of whom it is ſpoken, viz. of thoſe, who will not bear being told of the Sin of Separation by their own Teachers. For my Words are, "Is it that they fear the Reproaches of the People? which ſome few of the moſt eminent Perſons among them, have found they muſt undergo, if they touch upon this Subject (for I know not how it comes to paſs, that the moſt godly People among them can the leaſt endure to be told of their Faults.) In all which words I had a particular reſpect to the Caſe of Mr. Baxter, who after he had, with great honeſty, publiſhed his Cure of Diviſions, and therein ſharply rebuked the ſeparating, dividing Humour of the People, who pretended moſt to religious Strictneſs, he met with bitter Reproaches from them for the ſake of this Freedom, that he was forced to publiſh a Defence of his Cure, in Vindication of himſelf from them, wherein he ſaith, He was judged by them to be too cenſorious of them, and too Pref. p. 11, ſharp in telling them of that which he did not doubt to be their Sin: 13. And again, If I be miſtaken, ſhould you be ſo impatient, as not to bear with one, that in ſuch an opinion differeth from you? And why ſhould you not bear with my diſſent, as well as I do with yours? Again, Why ſhould not you bear with leſſer contradiction, when others Page 15. muſt bear with far greater from you? Will you proclaim your ſelves to be the more impatient? You will then make Men think, you are the moſt guilty——— And a little after, And yet you that ſhould be moſt patient, take it for a heinous crime and injury, to be told, that you wrong them, and that you judge too hardly of them; and that their Communion is not unlawful. And when we join to this, what he ſaith elſewhere, that they are the moſt ſelf-conceited Profeſſors who will not be ruled by their Miniſters, but are moſt given to diviſion and ſeparation: In a Paſſage before-mention'd, there needs no more to vindicate the truth of this ſaying, than to ſhew, that the moſt ſelf-conceited do often paſs for the moſt godly among them; which is a figure ſo common, ſo eaſie to be underſtood, that it needs no more Apology, than our Saviour's calling the Phariſees righteous Men, and ſaying, they were ſo whole, as to need no Phyſician. And I cannot think ſuch figures which were uſed by our Saviour, unfit for a Pulpit.

But notwithſtanding all the care I took to prevent giving any juſt occaſion of offence, my Sermon had not been long abroad, but I heard of great Clamours againſt it. At firſt it went down quietly enough, and many of the People began to read and conſider it, being pleaſed to find ſo weighty and ſo neceſſary a Point debated, with ſo much Calmneſs, and freedom from Paſſion. Which being diſcerned by the Leaders and Managers of the Parties, it was ſoon reſolved, that the Sermon muſt be cried down, and the People diſſuaded, by all means, from reading it. If any of them were talked with about it, they ſhrunk up their Shoulders, and looked ſternly, and ſhook their Heads, and hardly forbore ſome bitter Words, both of the Author and the Sermon. Upon this followed a great Cry and Noiſe, both in City and Country, againſt it; and ſome honeſt Perſons really pitied me, thinking I had done ſome very ill thing; ſo many People were of a ſudden ſo ſet againſt me, and ſpoke ſo bitterly of my Sermon. I aſked what the matter was? What falſe Doctrine I had preached? Did they ſuſpect I was turn'd Papiſt, at ſuch a Time when all the Nation was ſet againſt Popery? who had written ſo much againſt it, when others, who are now ſo fierce, were afraid to appear? It was ſomething they ſaid, had angred them ſorely, but they could not tell what; which made me read my Sermon over again, to ſee what offenſive Paſſages there might be in it; after all, I could ſee no juſt cauſe for any offence, unleſs it were, that I perſuaded the Diſſenters to ſubmit to the Church of England, and not the Church of England to ſubmit to them. And this, I believe, lay at the bottom of many Mens Stomachs. They would have had me humour'd the growing Faction, which, under a Pretence of Zeal againſt Popery, deſign'd to overthrow the Church of England; or, at leaſt, have preach'd for Alterations and Abatements, and taking away Ceremonies and Subſcriptions, and leaving them full liberty to do what they pleaſed; and then I might have gained their good opinion, and been thought to have preached a very Seaſonable Sermon. But ſuppoſing my own private opinion were never ſo much for ſome Abatements to be made, that might tend to ſtrengthen and unite Proteſtants, and were conſiſtent with our National Settlement: Had it been ſeaſonable to have ſpoken of the Alteration of Laws before Magiſtrates and Judges, who are tied up to the Laws in being? Is it fit for private Perſons, when Laws are in force, to take upon them to judge what Laws are fit to continue, and what not? I think the alteration of eſtabliſhed Laws, which concern the preſervation of our Church and Religion, one of the weightieſt things that can be taken into conſideration. And although the Arguments are very plauſible one way, yet the Objections are very ſtrong another. The union of Proteſtants, the eaſe of ſcrupulous Conſciences, the providing for ſo many poor Families of ejected Miniſters, are great Motives on one ſide: But,

1. The Impoſſibility of ſatisfying all Diſſenters.
2. The Uncertainty of gaining any conſiderable number by Relaxations.
3. The Difficulty of keeping Factions out of the Church, conſidering the ungovernableneſs of ſome Mens Tempers and Principles.
4. The Danger of breaking all in pieces by Toleration.
5. The Expoſing our ſelves to the Papiſts, and others, by receding too far from the firſt Principles and Frame of our Reformation.

And 6. The Difficulty of keeping out Prieſts, pretending to be allowed Diſſenters, are very weighty Conſiderations on the other ſide.

So that, whatever Men talk of the eaſineſs of taking away the preſent Impoſitions, it is a ſign they look no farther than their own caſe, and do not conſider the Strength and Union of a National Settlement, and the neceſſity thereof to keep out Popery, and how much eaſier it is to break things in pieces, than to ſet them in order again; for new Objections will ſtill be raiſed againſt any Settlement, and ſo the reſult may be nothing but Diſorder and Confuſion. Of what moment theſe things may be thought to other Perſons, I know not, but they were great enough to me, to make me think it very unſeaſonable to meddle with eſtabliſh'd Laws; but on the other hand, I could not but think it ſeaſonable to endeavour to remove ſuch Scruples and Prejudices, as hindred the People moſt from Communion with our Churches; for, as I ſaid in the Epiſtle before the Sermon, "If the People be brought to underſtand and practiſe their duty, as to "Communion with our Churches, other difficulties, which obſtruct our "Union, will more eaſily be removed. This Paſſage Mr. A. tells me, was the Sport and Entertainment of the Coffee-Houſes. I confeſs, I am a great Stranger to the Wiſdom of thoſe places; but I ſee Mr. A. is able to give me an account of the ſage Diſcourſes upon Points of Divinity there. But if thoſe pleaſant Gentlemen would have underſtood the difference between Lay-Communion, and Miniſterial Conformity, they might have apprehended the meaning of that Paſſage. For, I am of opinion, if the People once thought themſelves bound to do, what they may lawfully do, towards Communion with us; many of the Miniſters who ſeem now moſt forward to defend the Separation, would think of putting a fairer Conſtruction upon many things than now they do. And therefore I thought it fitteſt to handle the Caſe of the People, who are either over-violent in theſe matters, without ever conſidering them, or have met with ill Inſtructors, who have not faithfully let them know what the Terms of Communion, as to themſelves were. For the Scruple of the Surplice ſeems to be worn out; Kneeling at the Sacrament is generally allowed by the more judicious Nonconformiſts; and the only Scruple, as to them, about the Sign of the Croſs, Miſchief of Impoſition, Preface, towards the end.

Croſs, is not, whether it be lawful for the Miniſter to uſe it, but whether it be lawful for them to offer their Children to be baptized where it is uſed; and as Mr. Baxter reſolves the caſe; Baptiſm is God's Ordinance, and his privilege, and the Sin (if it be one) is the Miniſters, and not his. Another Man's ſinful Mode will not juſtifie the neglect of our Duty; elſe we might not joyn in any Prayer or Sacrament in which the Miniſter modally ſinneth: that is with none. As to the Uſe of the Liturgy, Mr. Baxter ſaith, he that ſeparateth from all Churches among us, on the account of the unlawfulneſs of our Liturgy, doth ſeparate from them on a Reaſon common to all, or almoſt all Chriſtian Churches upon Earth; the thoughts of which he is not able to bear. And although the new Impoſitions, he ſaith, makes their Miniſterial Conformity harder than formerly; yet the Peoples Conformity is the ſame (if not eaſier, by ſome Amendments of the Liturgy) as when Separation was fully confuted by the old Non-conformiſts. And the moſt learned and worthy of them, he ſaith, wrote more againſt Separation, than the Conformiſts: and the preſent Non-conformiſts have not more Wiſdom, Learning, or Holineſs than they. But, he ſaith, they did not only urge the People againſt Separation, but to come to the very beginning of the publick Worſhip, preferring it before their private Duties. What ground was there now, to make ſuch a hideous Out-cry about a Sermon, which perſuaded Men to no more, than the old pious, and peaceable Nonconformiſts would have done; who talked more ſharply againſt the Sin, and Miſchief of Separation, than I have done; as may be ſeen in the firſt Part of the following Treatiſe?

Ib. & p. 88.

But as if they had been the Papiſts Inſtruments, to execute the fury of their Wrath and Diſpleaſure againſt me, they Summon in the Power of their Party, and reſolve, with their full might, to fall upon me. And, as if it had not been enough to deal with me by open Force, which is more Manly, and Generous; they made uſe of mean and baſe Arts, by ſcurrilous Rimes, by virulent and malicious Libels ſent to me without Names; by idle Stories, and falſe Suggeſtions, to rob me at once, of my reputation, and the Tranquillity of my Mind. But I thank God, I deſpiſed ſuch pitiful Artifices, and ſuch unmanly and barbarous Uſage; which made no other Impreſſion on my mind, but to make me underſtand, that other Men could uſe me, as bad, or worſe, than the Papiſts. But this brought to my Mind a Paſſage of Arch-Biſhop Whitgift, concerning their Predeceſſor's uſage of Biſhop Jewel; after he had ſo ſtoutly defended this Church againſt the Papiſts. But, ſaith he, it is their manner, except you pleaſe their humor in all things, though you otherwiſe deſerve never ſo well, all is nothing with them, but they will deprave you, rail on you, backbite you, invent Lies of you, and ſpread falſe Rumors, as though you were the vileſt Perſons upon Earth. I could hardly have believed ſo ill a Character of Men pretending to any kind of Religion, had I not found ſo juſt a parallel; abating only the due allowances that muſt be made as to my Caſe, with reſpect to the far greater deſerts of that incomparable Biſhop, But notwithſtanding all their hard Cenſures of me, I do aſſure them, I am as firm a Proteſtant as ever I was, and ſhould be ſtill as ready to promote the Intereſt of the Proteſtant Religion, yea, and to do any real Kindneſs to the Diſſenters themſelves, that may be conſiſtent with the National Settlement of our Church, and the Honor of our Reformation.

Arch-Biſhop Whitgift's Defence, &c. p. 423.

After a while, they thought fit to draw their Strength into open Field and the Firſt who appeared againſt me, was Dr. Owen, who treated me with that Civility, and decent Language, that I cannot but return him Thanks for it; however, I was far from being ſatisfied with his Reaſoning, as will appear in the Book it ſelf. The next was Mr. Baxter, who appeared with ſo much Anger, and unbecoming Paſſion; that I truly pitied him; and was ſo far from being tranſported by it, that it was enough to cure an inclination to an indecent paſſion, to ſee how ill it became a Man of his Age, Profeſſion, and Reputation. At firſt he ſent me ſome captious Queſtions for a Trial of Skill; I returned him Anſwer, They were not to the buſineſs; but if he intended to anſwer my Sermon (as I perceived by his Letter he was put upon it, and I knew how hardly he could abſtain from Writing however) I deſired him not to make too haſty a Reply. But he, who ſeldom takes the Advice of his Friends, was, I ſuppoſe, the more provoked by this good Counſel, and ſeems to have written his whole Book in one continued fit of Anger; and by ſome Rules of Civility peculiar to himſelf, he publiſhed my private Letter, without ſo much as letting me know that he intended it. Whatever injurious and ſpiteful Reflections he hath made upon me through his Book, I can more eaſily forgive him, than he can forgive himſelf, when he looks them over again with a better mind. And therefore I paſs over the Scurrility of his Preface, wherein, after he hath in 20 Particulars deſcribed, the moſt unſkilful, proud, partial, obſtinate, cruel, impertinent Adverſaries he could think of places of Scripture, or Similitudes for, he then concludes; But although all this be not the caſe of the Reverend Doctor. What a malicious way of reproaching is this? To name ſo many very ill things, and to leave it to the Reader to apply as much as he pleaſes; and when he is charged with any one to ſay, he meant not that, for he added, although all this be not the caſe of R. Dr. If this be the Juſtice, the Charity, and Ingenuity of Mr. B. and his Brethren, who put him upon Writing, they muſt give me leave to think, there are ſome Non-conformiſt Miniſters, that are not the Wiſeſt, the Meekeſt, nor the moſt Self-denying Men upon Earth. He ſeems much concerned about my being likely to have the laſt Word: Which I am very willing to let him have, hoping he will come to himſelf before he dies; and may live to repent of the Injuries he hath done his Brethren and the Miſchiefs he hath done to the Church of God, by ſo induſtriouſly expoſing the Governors of it, and laying the Foundation for endleſs Separation, as will appear in the following Diſcourſe.

The Third who entred the Liſts, was one, who ſeemed to write more like a well-diſpoſed Gentleman, than like a Divine; he wiſhes very well to the Cauſe he undertakes; he diſcourſes gravely and piouſly, without Bitterneſs and Rancor, or any ſharp Reflections, and ſometimes with a great mixture of Kindneſs towards me; for which, and his Prayers for me, I do heartily thank him. What I find material to the buſineſs in his Book, I have conſider'd in its due place.

The Fourth comes forth with a more than ordinary briſkneſs; and ſeems to ſet up rather for a ſort of Wit, than a grave Divine. His Book reſembled the Bird of Athens, for it ſeems to be made up of Face and Feathers: For, ſetting aſide his bold Sayings, his impertinent Triflings, his hunting up and down for any occaſion of venting his little Stories and Similitudes, there is very little of Subſtance left in him; but what he hath borrowed from Dr. O. or Mr. B. Methinks, ſuch a light, vain, ſcurrilous Way of Writing, doth not become ſuch a Tenderneſs of Conſcience as our Diſſenting Brethren pretend to. There is a ſort of pleaſantneſs of Wit which ſerves to entertain the Reader in the rough and deep Way of Controverſies;

verſies; but certainly there is a difference between the Railery and good Humor of Gentlemen, and the Jeſts of Porters and Watermen. But this Author ſeems to be ambitious of the honor of a ſecond Martin, whoſe way he imitates, and whoſe Wit he equals. Yet this is not his greateſt Fault, for he deals with me as a Man that was by any means to be run down, without regard to common Ingenuity. For, ſuppoſe I had miſtaken the Senſe of my Text, which I am certain I did not; yet I am not the only Perſon in the World that talks impertinently. Suppoſe there had been a a Fault in my Reaſoning, methinks the ſenſe of humane Frailty ſhould make Men not grow inſolent upon ſuch a Diſcovery: and yet I do not know one thing which he hath made it in; as will appear hereafter. But, will nothing ſerve but to repreſent me to the World as a kind of Atheiſtical Hypocrite; i. e. as a ſecret underminer of the proof of a Deity, under the pretence of proving it? Yet, this he doth more than once: which was ſo remote from his Buſineſs, that nothing but a wretched, malicious Deſign of expoſing me, could make him draw it in: He gives a gentle Touch at it in his Preface, to prepare the Reader's Appetite; but p. 70. he charges me with proceeding upon ſuch Principles, as plainly render it impoſſible by any certain Argument to prove the exiſtence of a Deity. Mr. B. had unhappily ſaid, and without the leaſt ground, that my Principles overthrow all Religion; and Mr. A. vouches it, and undertakes to prove it for him. Mr. B. begins his Plea for Peace with a ſaying of St. Auſtin, (he meant St. Hierom) that no Man ought to be patient under the accuſation of Hereſy: What ſhould a Man then be under the accuſation of being guilty of overthrowing all Religion, and rendring it impoſſible, by any certain Argument, to prove that there is a God? According to all Rules of Juſtice, a Charge of ſo high a nature ought not to be brought againſt any Man, without ſuch evidence, as appears clear and convincing to him that brings it. But I very much miſtruſt in this caſe, that Mr. A. in his Conſcience knew, his Proofs to be weak and inſufficient; What then can we think of him that charges another with ſo high a Crime, when he knows that he cannot prove it? His firſt Proof, he takes from my Popiſh Adverſaries, about the inconſiſtency of proving a Deity, by ſuch infallible Arguments, as muſt ſuppoſe the exiſtence of what we prove; as all infallibility from divine Aſſiſtance muſt do. But did I ever ſay, there was no Certainty without infallible Aſſiſtance? And yet this whole matter about Certainty, as to the Proof of a God, and the Chriſtian Religion, I had ſo lately cleared in my laſt Anſwer to the Papiſts, which he refers to in this very place, that he could not but be convinced of the Impertinency of it. His main Argument he pretends to bring from a Principle of my own; for his words are, He lays down this for a Principle, that the Foundation of all Certainty lies in the neceſſary Exiſtence of a being abſolutely perfect; how then, ſaith he, ſhall we come to prove his Exiſtence by ſuch demonſtration, Cui non poteſt ſubeſſe falſum? And then he adds, That I have excluded all Demonſtration from the Works of God, becauſe we muſt firſt know, that there is an inviſible God, before we can certainly know, that there is a viſible World. But if I make it evident, that I lay down no ſuch Principles of my own; and that I do particularly inſiſt upon the certainty of proving a God from his Works, What doth this Man deſerve for his Calumnies?

Several Conferences p. 258. &c.

First, That which he ſaith I lay down for a Principle, I only propoſe as an inference from the Hypotheſis of other Men. For my words are, And if that Principle be ſuppoſed, as the foundation of all Phyſical Certainty, as

as to the Being of things, that there is a God: I ſay, if that Principle be ſuppoſed. From hence appears a double Falſification.

1. That I make it the Principle of all certainty, whereas I expreſly ſet down in their Hypotheſis Phyſical Certainty as to the being of things; but, Is there no certainty but what is Phyſical? What thinks he of Mathematical, or Metaphyſical Certainty? ſo that there might be a Mathematical or Metaphyſical Certainty of the Being of a God, though this Principle were allowed. How then doth this prove, that I render it impoſſible, by any certain Argument, to prove the Exiſtence of a Deity?

2. That I make it a Principle of my own, whereas I only ſuppoſe it as following from a Principle of others. To clear this, it will be neceſſary to lay down the ſcope of that Diſcourſe, which was to prove, that there is a certainty of Faith, as well as of Senſe; and to that end I ſhewed from the nature of the certainty of ſenſe, that it doth fall ſhort of Mathematical Demonſtrations; which having done from other Arguments, I then conſider their Hypotheſis, who derive all Phyſical Certainty from the knowledge of God, who will not ſuffer Mens Minds to be deceived in clear perceptions; then from this Principle being ſuppoſed, I infer ſeveral things for the advantage of the certainty of Faith. 1. That the Foundation of all Certainty, i. e. ſuch as was before ſpoken of, lies in the neceſſary Exiſtence of a being abſolutely perfect which I deduce as a juſt inference from the former Hypotheſis; and therefore on this Suppoſition, ſomething above our Comprehenſion, viz. Abſolute perfection, muſt be made the foundation of our certain knowledge of things, and ſo the difficulty of our conception of matters of Faith, ought to be no hindrance to the certainty of Faith. 2. That we have as great, or greater reaſon to believe, that God will not ſuffer us to be deceived in matters of Faith, as in the objects of our Senſes; becauſe as I there argue, there is no ſuch great danger of being deceived, or in being deceived in the objects of Senſe, as in the matters of Faith. Let any Man now judge, whether this be the diſcourſe of one that rendred it impoſſible, by any certain Argument, to prove the Exiſtence of a Deity? or that I laid down that as a Principle of my own, from which being ſuppoſed, I deduce ſuch inferences as prove the certainty of Faith hath no greater difficulties, than the certainty of Senſe.

Secondly, I am ſo far from excluding the certainty of the Argument from the Works of God to prove his Being, that I particularly and largely inſiſt upon it from p. 401. to p. 411. but he pretends that I bring no Argument but from the Idea of God in our minds, which is ſo falſe, that

(1.) I make uſe of that Argument only to ſhew, that the notion of a God hath no inconſiſtency in it, nothing repugnant to the faculties of our Minds: as appears by that very place he quotes:

(2.) The main Arguments I inſiſt upon, are, That the things in the World are the manifeſt effects of divine Wiſdom, Goodneſs and Power: and that there be ſuch things in the World which are unacceptable without a Deity.

Let any Man now judge, with what Conſcience or Ingenuity, this Man hath managed ſuch an Accuſation againſt me, as that I go upon ſuch Principles, as plainly render it impoſſible, by any certain Argument, to prove the Exiſtence of a Deity.

But it may be he will pretend, that he did not deſign to prove me Atheiſtical but only to ſhew, that I acted very unreaſonably, in requiring a greater certainty in them, as to the Principles of Separation, than I do allow in far greater things. As to his deſign, I leave the Reader to judge by his way of proceeding in it. As to the colour he hath to bring it in, on the account of the Grounds of Separation it is only this; The Sub-Committee of the Aſſembly arguing againſt the diſſenting Brethren, ſaith he, I ſay, That ſuch tenderneſs of Conſcience, as ariſeth out of an opinion, (cui poteſt ſubeſſe falſum) which may be falſe, is not a ſufficient ground, &c. to juſtifie Separation. But here is a dangerous &c. in the middle of a Sentence, which made me look again into the Papers, and there I find ſuch words left out, as fully explain and determine the ſenſe; for the whole Sentence runs thus. We much doubt, whether ſuch tenderneſs of Conſcience, as ariſeth out of an opinion, Cui poteſt ſubeſſe falſum, when the Conſcience is ſo tender, as that it may be withal an erring Conſcience, can be a ſufficient ground to juſtifie ſuch a material Separation as our Brethren plead for. Where we ſee, the force is not laid upon the bare poſſibility of deception, (for then no Separation could be allowed in any caſe, ſince all Men are fallible*) but upon the* ſuppoſition of an actual deception, which an erroneous Conſcience ſuppoſes. For it is ſuch a deception as doth ſuppoſe Tenderneſs of Conſcience, which doth not ariſe from a poſſibility of being deceived, but from an error of Conſcience. The Plea is, Tenderneſs of Conſcience; the Queſtion is, Whether this Plea be ſufficient to juſtifie Separation? We much doubt it, ſay they, Why ſo? the other reply: Our Reaſon is, Becauſe this Tenderneſs may ariſe from an erroneous Conſcience. But why ſhould you ſuſpect an erroneous Conſcience in the Caſe? Becauſe Perſons are liable to be deceived in the Dictates of Conſcience: eſpecially when they go merely upon their own Apprehenſions, without producing Arguments ex Naturâ rei. For all the debate between them about Tenderneſs of Conſcience proceeded upon this. So that their meaning is not here to be taken as to the bare poſſibility of deception, but of ſuch an Opinion, as carried a great probability along with it, that they were actually deceived. And what coherence is there now between this, and the Proof that I bring for the Exiſtence of a Deity? ſo that, it is apparent, that this was an occaſion ſought after, to lay as much load upon me as he could. And by this taſte let the Reader judge, what Ingenuity I am to expect from this Man.

Papers of Accommodation, p. 51.

The Laſt who appeared againſt my Sermon, is called, The Author of the Chriſtian Temper. I was glad to find an Adverſary pretending to that; having found ſo little of it in the Anſwers of Mr. B. and Mr, A. His buſineſs is, To commit the Rector of Sutton, with the Dean of St. Paul's; which was enough to make the common People imagine, this was ſome buſie Juſtice of Peace, who had taken them both at a Conventicle. The whole deſign of that Book doth not ſeem very agreeable to the Chriſtian Temper which the Author pretends to. For it is to pick up all the Paſſages he could meet with, (in a Book written twenty years ſince) with great tenderneſs towards the Diſſenters, before the Laws were eſtabliſh'd. As though, as Mr. Cotton once anſwered in a like caſe, there were no weighty Argument to be found, but what might be gather'd from the weakneſs or unwarineſs of my Expreſſions. And, have you not very well requited the Author of that Book, for the tenderneſs and pity he had for you, and the concernment he then expreſſed, to have brought you in, upon eaſier Terms than were ſince required? And hath he now deſerved this at your hands, to have them all thrown in his face, and to be thus upbraided with his former kindneſs? Is this your Ingenuity, your Gratitude, your Chriſtian Temper? Are you afraid of having too many Friends, that you thus uſe thoſe, whom you once took to be ſuch?

Methinks herein you appear very Self-denying, but I cannot take you to be any of the Wiſeſt Men upon Earth. When you think it reaſonable, that upon longer time, and farther conſideration, thoſe Divines of the Aſſembly, who then oppoſed Separation, ſhould change their Opinions: Will you not allow one ſingle Perſon, who happen'd to write about theſe matters when he was very young, in twenty years time, of the moſt buſie and thoughtful part of his Life, to ſee reaſon to alter his Judgment? But after all this, wherein is it that he hath thus contradicted himſelf? Is it in the Point of Separation, which is the preſent buſineſs? No, ſo far from it, that in that very Book, he ſpeaks as fully concerning the Unlawfulneſs of Separation, as in this Sermon. Which will appear by theſe Particulars in it.

Iren. p. 123. (1.) That it is unlawful to ſet up new Churches, becauſe they cannot conform to ſuch practices which they ſuſpect to be unlawful.

(2.) Thoſe are new Churches, when Men erect diſtinct Societies for worſhip, under diſtinct and peculiar Officers, governing by Laws, and Church Rules, different from that Form they ſeparate from.

Page 124. (3.) As to things in the Judgment of the Primitive and Reformed Churches left undetermin'd by the Law of God, and in matters of meer order and decency, and wholly as to the Form of Government, every one, notwithſtanding what his private Judgment may be of them, is bound for the peace of the Church of God, to ſubmit to the determination of the lawful Governours of the Church. Allow but theſe three Concluſions, and defend the preſent Separation if you can. Why then do you make ſuch a ſtir about other Paſſages in that Book, and take ſo little notice of theſe, which are moſt pertinent and material? Was it not poſſible for you to eſpy them, when you ranſacked every corner of that Book, to find out ſome thing which might ſeem to make to your purpoſe?
Page 5. And yet the very firſt Paſſage you quote, is within two Leaves of theſe;
Page 6, 7. and two Paſſages more you ſoon after quote, are within a Page of them, Page 8. and another in the very ſame Page; and ſo many up and down ſo very near them, that it is impoſſible you ſhould not ſee and conſider them?
Yes, he hath at laſt found ſomething very near them, for he quotes the very Pages where they are. And, he ſaith, he will do me no wrong, for I do diſtinguiſh, he confeſſes, between Non-communion in unlawful or ſuſpected Rites or Practices in a Church, and entering into diſtinct Societies for worſhip. This is doing me ſome right however, although he doth not fully ſet down my meaning. But he urges another Paſſage in the ſame place, viz. That if others caſt them wholly out of Communion, their Separation is neceſſary——— That is no more, than hath been always ſaid by our Divines in reſpect to the Church of Rome. But, will not this equally hold againſt our Church, if it excommunicates thoſe who cannot conform? I anſwer, (1.) Our Church doth not caſt any wholly out of Communion for meer ſcrupulous Non-conformity in ſome particular Rites. For, it allows them to Communicate in other Parts of worſhip, as appeared by all the Non-conformiſts of former times, who conſtantly joined in Prayers and other Acts of worſhip, although they ſcrupled ſome particular Ceremonies. (2.) The caſe is vaſtly different, as to the neceſſity of our Separation, upon being wholly caſt out of Communion by the Church of Rome; and the neceſſity of others ſeparating from us, ſuppoſing a general Excommunication ipſo facto againſt thoſe who publickly defame the Orders of this Church. For that is all which can be inferred from the Canons. For, in the former caſe, it is not a leſſer Excommunication denounced, as it is only in our caſe againſt publick and ſcandalous Offenders, (which is no more than is allowed in all Churches; and is generally ſuppoſed to lay no obligation, till it be duly executed, tho' it be latæ ſententiæ & ipſo facto*) but in the* Church of Rome we are caſt out with an Anathema, ſo as to pronounce us uncapable of Salvation, if we do not return to, and continue in their Communion; and this was it which that Author meant, by being wholly caſt out of Communion, i. e. with the greateſt and higheſt Church Cenſure. (3.) That Author could not poſſibly mean, that there was an equal reaſon in theſe caſes, when he expreſly determines, that in the caſe of our Church, Men are bound in Conſcience to ſubmit to the Orders of it; being only about matters of Decency and Order, and ſuch things which in the Judgment of the Primitive and Reformed Churches are left undetermined by the Law of God. Although therefore he might allow a ſcrupulous forbearance of ſome Acts of Communion, as to ſome ſuſpected Rites, yet upon the Principles there aſſerted, he could never allow Mens proceedings to a poſitive Separation from the Communion of our Church. And ſo much ſhall ſerve to clear the agreement between the Rector of Sutton, and the Dean of St. Paul's. But if any thing in the following Treatiſe be found different from the ſenſe of that Book, I do entreat them to allow me that which I heartily wiſh to them, viz. that in Twenty years time we may arrive to ſuch maturity of Thoughts, as to ſee reaſon to change our opinion of ſome things; and I wiſh I had not cauſe to add, of ſome Perſons too.

There is one thing more which this Author takes notice of, and the reſt do not, (for elſe he offers little or nothing but what is in the others) which is, that when I ſay our differences are condemned by the wiſer Proteſtants abroad, he ſaith, if it be ſo, they may thank their Friends at home, that have miſrepreſented them to the World. Therefore to give ſatisfaction, as to the Judgment of ſome of the moſt eminent and learned Proteſtant Divines abroad now living, I have ſubjoined to the following Treatiſe, ſome late Letters of theirs, to a Perſon of great Honour and Dignity in our Church, to ſhew the Unlawfulneſs of Separation from the Communion of the Church of England. Which were not written by ſuch who had only a partial repreſentation from others at a diſtance, but two of them by thoſe who have been among us, and have been curious obſervers both of the ſeparate Meetings, and of the Cuſtoms of our Churches; and the Third by the Famous and Excellent Monſieur Claude. And if a Council could be called of all the Proteſtant Churches in Chriſtendom, we ſhould not doubt of their determination of the Unlawfulneſs of the preſent Separation.

But before I conclude this Preface, there is a great Objection yet to be removed, which concerns the Time of publiſhing this Treatiſe, which ſome do ſeem to think, to be very unſeaſonable; when there is ſo much talk of Union among Proteſtants, and there appears a more general Inclination to it than formerly. And what, ſay they, can the laying open the Weakneſs of Diſſenters tend to, but to provoke and exaſperate them, and conſequently, to obſtruct the Union ſo much deſired? In ſo doing, I ſhall appear to reſent more the Injuries done to my Self, than the miſchief which may come to the Proteſtant Religion, if this opportunity be not embraced for making an Union among Proteſtants. This is the force of the Objection. To which I anſwer.

God forbid that I ſhould either deſign, or do any thing which tended to obſtruct ſo bleſſed a Work, as a firm and laſting Union among Proteſtants would be. But my buſineſs is, to ſhew the Unreaſonableneſs of thoſe Principles and Practices, which hinder Men from ſuch an Union, and lay a Foundation for perpetual and endleſs Separations. For upon the Principles laid down by ſome of our Diſſenting Brethren, let the Conſtitutions be made never ſo eaſie to themſelves, yet others may make uſe of their grounds, and carry on the Differences as high as ever. Which will render all Attempts of Union vain, and leave the ſame Weapons ready to be taken up by others. If the Union ſo much talked of, be ſuch as tends to the leſſening, and not to the increaſing of our Differences; if it be for ſtrengthening and ſupporting the Proteſtant Religion, and not rather for weakning and betraying it, by laying it more open to the aſſaults of our Enemies; no Man ſhall be more ready to promote it than I; no Man will rejoice more in the accompliſhment of it.

But univerſal liberty is quite another thing from Union; as much as looſing is from binding up; and it is ſtrange if that which the Papiſts, not long ſince, thought the beſt means to bring in Popery, ſhould now be looked on as the moſt effectual way to keep it out. But ſuppoſe the Indulgence be at preſent ſtrictly limited to Diſſenting Proteſtants, are we ſure it ſhall always ſo continue? Will not the ſame Reaſons, as to ſcruple of Conſcience, ſuffering for Religion, &c. extend farther when occaſion ſerves, and the Popiſh Religion get footing on the Diſſenters grounds? Where hath the Church of Rome more Labourers, and a greater Harveſt, than under the greateſt liberty of Conſcience? Let the ſtate of the Northern Kingdoms, as to this matter, be compared with the number of Papiſts in the United Provinces. And it will be found impoſſible to root out Popery where Toleration is allowed. (1.) Becauſe of the various ways of creeping in under ſeveral diſguiſes, which the Prieſts and Jeſuits have; and can never be prevented, where there is a general Indulgence for Diſſenters, and an unaccountable Church Power is allowed to ſeparate Congregations. (2.) Becauſe it will be thought great hardſhip, when Mens heats are over, for them only to be deprived of the liberty of their Conſciences, when the wildeſt Fanaticks are allowed it. (3.) Becauſe the diverſity of Sects which will be kept up by this means, will be always thought a plauſible argument to draw Men to the popiſh Pretences of Unity. (4.) Becauſe the allowed Sects will in probability grow more inſolent upon a legal Indulgence, and bid defiance to the ſettled Conſtitution; as we have ſeen already by the yet viſible effects of the former Indulgence. If Laws would alter the temper of Mens minds, and make proud, ſelf-willed, froward and paſſionate Men, become meek and humble, gentle and peaceable, then it were great pity, ſome Men had not had the Law on their ſide long ago. But is this to be looked for? are we to expect the Laws of Men ſhould work more upon them than the Grace of God? If ſuch then continue peeviſh and quarrelſome, full of wrath and bitterneſs againſt all that are not of their minds; and they meet with Men as froward and contentious as themſelves; will this look like the Union of Proteſtants? And By-ſtanders will be apt to ſay, if this be all that you mean by Union of Proteſtants, viz. a liberty to pray and preach, and to write and diſpute one againſt another, there ſeems to be much more of ſenſe and reaſon in the papal Pretence to Unity and Infallibility.

But what then? Is there nothing to be done for diſſenting Proteſtants, who agree with us in all Doctrinal Articles of our Church, and only ſcruple the uſe of a few Ceremonies, and ſome late Impoſitions? ſhall theſe differences ſtill be continued, when they may be ſo eaſily removed? And ſo many uſeful Men be encouraged, and taken into the Conſtitution? Do we value a few indifferent Ceremonies, and ſome late Declarations, and doubtful Expreſſions, beyond the ſatisfaction of Mens Conſciences, and the Peace and Stability of this Church?

As to this material Queſtion, I ſhall crave leave to deliver my opinion freely and impartially; and that,

I. With reſpect to the Caſe of the People, the Terms of whoſe Union with us, is acknowledged by our Brethren to be ſo much eaſier than their own. But theſe are of two ſorts:

1. Some allow the uſe of the Liturgy, but ſay they cannot join in Communion with us, becauſe the participiation of the Sacraments hath ſuch Rites and Ceremonies annexed to it, which they think unlawful; and therefore till theſe be removed, or left indifferent, they dare not join with us in Baptiſm, or the Lord's-Supper, becauſe in the one the Croſs is uſed, and in the other Kneeling is required. As to theſe I anſwer,

(1.) Upon the moſt diligent ſearch I could make into theſe things, I find no good ground for any ſcruple of Conſcience, as to the uſe of theſe Ceremonies, and as little as any as to the Sign of the Croſs, as it is uſed in our Church; notwithſtanding all the noiſe that hath been made about its being a new Sacrament, and I know not what, but of this at large in the following Treatiſe.

(2.) I ſee no ground for the Peoples ſeparation from other Acts of Communion, on the account of ſome Rites they ſuſpect to be unlawful. And eſpecially when the uſe of ſuch Rites is none of their own Act, as the Croſs in Baptiſm is not; and when ſuch an Explication is annexed concerning the intention of Kneeling at the Lord's-Supper, as is in the Rubrick after the Communion.

(3.) Notwithſtanding, becauſe the uſe of Sacraments in a Chriſtian Church ought to be the moſt free from all exceptions, and they ought to be ſo adminiſtred, as rather to invite than diſcourage ſcrupulous Perſons from joining in them; I do think it would be a part of Chriſtian Wiſdom and Condeſcenſion in the Governours of our Church, to remove thoſe Bars from a freedom in joining in full Communion with us, which may be done, either by wholly taking away the Sign of the Croſs; or if that may give offence to others, by confining the uſe of it to the publick adminiſtration of Baptiſm; or by leaving it indifferent, as the Parents deſire it. As to Kneeling at the Lord's-Supper, ſince ſome Poſture is neceſſary, and many devout People ſcruple any other, and the Primitive Church did in ancient Times, receive it in the poſture of adoration; there is no reaſon to take this away, even in Parochial Churches; provided, that thoſe who ſcruple Kneeling do receive it, with the leaſt offence to others, and rather ſtanding than ſitting, becauſe the former is moſt agreeable to the practice of Antiquity, and of our Neighbour Reformed Churches. As to the Surplice in Parochial Churches, it is not of that conſequence, as to bear a diſpute one way or other. And as to Cathedral Churches, there is no neceſſity of alteration. But there is another thing which ſeems to be of late much ſcrupled in Baptiſm, viz. the uſe of God-fathers and God-mothers excluding the Parents. Although I do not queſtion but the Practice of our Church may be juſtified, (as I have have done it towards the end of the following Treatiſe) yet I ſee no neceſſity of adhering ſo ſtrictly to the Canon herein, but that a little alteration may prevent theſe Scruples, either by permitting the Parents to join with the Sponſors, or by the Parents publickly deſiring the Sponſors to repreſent them in offering the Child to Baptiſm; or, which ſeems moſt agreeable to Reaſon, that the Parents offer the Child to Baptiſm, and then the Sponſors perform the Covenanting part, repreſenting the Child; and the Charge after Baptiſm be given in common, to the Parents and Sponſors.

Theſe things being allowed, I ſee no Obſtruction remaining, as to a full Union of the Body of ſuch Diſſenters with us, in all Acts of Divine Worſhip, and Chriſtian Communion, as do not reject all Communion with us as unlawful.

2. But becauſe there are many of thoſe, who are become zealous Proteſtants, and plead much their Communion with us in Faith and Doctrine, although they cannot join with us in worſhip, becauſe they deny the lawfulneſs of Liturgies, and the right Conſtitution of our Churches; their Caſe deſerves ſome conſideration, whether and how far they are capable of being made ſerviceable to the common Intereſt, and to the ſupport of the Proteſtant Religion among us?

To their Caſe I anſwer,

Firſt, That a general unlimited Toleration to diſſenting Proteſtants, will ſoon bring Confuſion among us, and in the end Popery, as I have ſhewed already; and a ſuſpenſion of all the penal Laws that relate to Diſſenters is the ſame thing with a boundleſs Toleration.

Secondly, If any preſent Favours be granted to ſuch, in conſideration of our circumſtances, and to prevent their conjunction with the Papiſts, for a general Toleration, (for if ever the Papiſts obtain it, it muſt be under their Name) if, I ſay, ſuch favour be thought fit to be ſhewed them, it ought to be with ſuch reſtrictions and limitations, as may prevent the miſchief which may eaſily follow upon it. For all ſuch Meetings are a perpetual reproach to our Churches, by their declaring, that our Churches are no true Churches, that our manner of worſhip is unlawful, and that our Church-Government is Anti-chriſtian; and that on theſe accounts they ſeparate from us, and worſhip God by themſelves. But if ſuch an Indulgence be thought fit to be granted, I humbly offer theſe things to conſideration.

1. That none be permitted to enjoy the privilege of it, who do not declare that they do hold Communion with our Churches to be unlawful. For it ſeems unreaſonable to allow it to others, and will give countenance to endleſs and cauſeleſs Separations.

2. That all who enjoy it, beſides taking the Teſt againſt Popery, do ſubſcribe the Thirty ſix Articles of our Faith, becauſe the pretence of this Liberty is joining with us in Points of Faith; aud this may more probably prevent Papiſts getting in amongſt them.

3. That all ſuch as enjoy it, muſt declare the particular Congregations they are of, and enter their Names before ſuch Commiſſioners as ſhall be authoriſed for that purpoſe; that ſo this may be no pretence for idle, looſe, and profane Perſons, never going to any Church at all.

4. That both Preachers and Congregations be liable to ſevere Penalties, if they uſe any bitter or reproachful words, either in Sermons or Writings, againſt the eſtabliſhed Conſtitution of our Churches; becauſe they deſire only the freedom of their own Conſciences; and the uſing this liberty will diſcover it is not Conſcience, but a turbulent factious Humour, which makes them ſeparate from our Communion.

5. That all indulged Perſons be particularly obliged to pay all legal Duties to the parochial Churches, (leſt mere covetouſneſs tempt Men to run among them) and no Perſons ſo indulged be capable of any publick Office. It not being reaſonable, that ſuch ſhould be truſted with Government, who look upon the Worſhip eſtabliſhed by Law as unlawful.

6. That no other Penalty be laid on ſuch indulged Perſons, but that of Twelve-pence a Sunday for their abſence from the Parochial Churches, which ought to be duly collected for the uſe of the Poor, and cannot be complained of as an heavy burden, conſidering the liberty they do enjoy by it.

7. That the Biſhops, as Viſitors appointed by Law, have an exact Account given to them, of the Rule of their Worſhip and Diſcipline, and of all the Perſons belonging to the indulged Congregations, with their Qualities, and Places of abode; and that none be admitted a Member of any ſuch Congregation, without acquainting their Viſitor with it, that ſo means may be uſed to prevent their leaving our Communion, by giving ſatisfaction to their Scruples. This Power of the Biſhops cannot be ſcrupled by them, ſince herein they are conſidered as Commiſſioners appointed by Law.

8. That no indulged Perſons preſume under ſevere Penalties, to breed up Scholars, or to teach Gentlemens Sons Univerſity Learning; becauſe this may be juſtly looked on as a deſign to propagate Schiſm to Poſterity, and to lay a Foundation for the diſturbance of future Generations.

II. As to the Caſe of the ejected Miniſters, I have theſe things to offer,

1. That bare ſubſcription of the Thirty ſix Articles, concerning Doctrinal Points, be not allowed as ſufficient to qualifie any Man for a Living, or any Church-preferment, for theſe Reaſons, Firſt, Any Lay-man, upon theſe Terms, may not only be capable of a Living, but may take upon him to adminiſter the Sacraments; which was never allowed in any well-conſtituted Church in the Chriſtian World. And ſuch an allowance among us, inſtead of ſetling and uniting us, will immediately bring things into great confuſion, and give mighty advantage to the Papiſts againſt our Church. And we have reaſon to fear, a deſign of this Nature, under a pretence of Union of Proteſtants, tends to the ſubverſion of this Church, and throwing all things into confuſion, which at laſt will end in Popery.

Secondly, This will bring a Faction into the Church, which will more endanger it than external oppoſition. For ſuch Men will come in triumphantly, having beaten down Three of the Thirty nine Articles, and being in legal poſſeſſion of their Places, will be ready to defie and contemn thoſe who ſubmitted to the reſt, and to glory in their Conqueſts, and draw Followers after them, as the victorious Confeſſors againſt Prelacy and Ceremonies. And can they imagine thoſe of the Church of England will ſee the reputation of the Church, or their own, to ſuffer ſo much, and not appear in their own Vindication? Things are not come to that paſs, nor will they ſuddenly be, that the Friends of the Church of England will be either afraid, or aſhamed to own her Cauſe. We do heartily and ſincerely deſire Union with our Brethren, if it may be had on juſt and reaſonable Terms; but they muſt not think, that we will give up the Cauſe of the Church for it, ſo as to condemn its Conſtitution, or make the Ceremonies unlawful, which have been hitherto obſerved and practiſed in it. If any Expedient can be found out for the eaſe of other Mens Conſciences, without reflecting on our own; if they can be taken in, without reproach or diſhonour to the Reformation of the Church; I hope no true Son of the Church of England will oppoſe it. But if the deſign be to bring them in as a Faction to bridle and control the Epiſcopal Power, by ſetting up forty Biſhops in a Dioceſe againſt one; if it be for them to trample upon the Church of England, and not to ſubmit to its Order and Government upon fair and moderate terms, let them not call this a deſign of Union, but the giving Law to a Party, to oppoſe the Church of England. And what the ſucceſs of this will be, let wiſe Men judge.

Thirdly, If a ſubſcription to Thirty ſix Articles were ſufficient by the Statute 13 El. c. 12. I do not underſtand how by virtue of that Statute a Man is bound publickly to read the Thirty nine Articles in the Church, and the Teſtimonial of his Subſcription, on pain of being deprived ipſo facto, if he do not. For the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke ſaith, That ſubſcription to the Thirty nine Articles is required by force of the Act of Parliament, 13 Eliz. c. 12. And he adds, That the Delinquent is diſabled and deprived ipſo facto; and that a conditional ſubſcription to them was not ſufficient, was reſolved by all the Judges in England. But how a Man ſhould be deprived ipſo facto, for not ſubſcribing, and reading the Thirty nine Articles, as appears by the Caſes mentioned in Coke; and yet be required only to ſubſcribe to Thirty ſix, by the ſame Statute, is a thing too hard for me to conceive.

Co. Inſt. 4. Part 323, 324.

2. But notwithſtanding this, if any temper can be found out, as to the manner of Subſcription, that may give eaſe to the Scruples of our Brethren, and ſecure the Peace of the Church, the deſired Union may be attained without that apparent danger of increaſing the Factions among us.

And this I ſuppoſe may be done, by an abſolute ſubſcription to all thoſe Articles which concern the Doctrine of the true Chriſtian Faith, and the uſe of the Sacraments; and a ſolemn Promiſe under their hand, or Subſcription of peaceable ſubmiſſion, as to the reſt, ſo as not to oppoſe or contradict them, either in Preaching or Writing; upon the ſame penalty as if they had not ſubſcribed to the Thirty ſix. Which may be a more probable means to keep the Church in quiet, than forcing a more rigorous Subſcription upon them, or leaving them at their full liberty.

3. As to the other Subſcription required, 1 Jac. to the Three Articles. The firſt is provided for, by the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy. The third is the ſame with the Subſcription to the Thirty nine Articles. And as to the ſecond, about the Book of Common-Prayer, &c. it ought to be conſidered,

(1.) Whether, for the ſatisfaction of the ſcrupulous, ſome more doubtful and obſcure Paſſages may not yet be explained or amended? Whether the New Tranſlation of the Pſalms were not fitter to be uſed, at leaſt in Parochial Churches? Whether Portions of Canonical Scripture were not better put inſtead of Apocrypha Leſſons? Whether the Rubrick about Salvation of Infants, might not be reſtored to its former place, in the Office of Confirmation, and ſo the preſent exceptions againſt it be removed? Whether thoſe expreſſions which ſuppoſe the ſtrict exerciſe of Diſcipline, in burying the Dead, were not better left at liberty in our preſent Caſe? Such a Review made by wiſe and peaceable Men, not given to wrath and diſputing, may be ſo far from being a diſhonour to this Church, that it may add to the glory of it.

(2.) Upon ſuch a Review, whether it be not great Reaſon that all Perſons who officiate in the Church, be not only tied to a conſtant uſe of it in all publick Offices, (as often as they adminiſter them) which they ought in Perſon frequently to do, but to declare at their firſt entrance upon a Parochial Charge, their approbation of the uſe of it, after their own reading of it, that ſo the People may not ſuſpect them to carry on a factious Deſign, under an outward pretence of Conformity to the Rules of the Church they live in.

(3.) Whether ſuch a ſolemn uſing the Liturgy, and Approbation and Promiſe of the uſe of it, may not be ſufficient, inſtead of the late Form of declaring their Aſſent and Conſent, which hath been ſo much ſcrupled by our Brethren?

Theſe are all the things which appear to me reaſonable to be allowed in order to an Union, and which I ſuppoſe may be granted without detriment or diſhonour to our Church. There are other things very deſirable towards the happineſs and flouriſhing of this Church, as the exerciſe of Diſcipline in Parochial Churches, in a due ſubordination to the Biſhop; the reforming the Eccleſiaſtical Courts as to Excommunication, without prejudice to the excellent Profeſſion of the Civil Law; the building of more Churches in great Pariſhes, eſpecially about the City of London; the retrenching Pluralities; the ſtrictneſs and ſolemnity of Ordinations; the making a Book of Canons ſuitable to this Age, for the better regulating the Converſations of the Clergy. Such things as theſe, might facilitate our Union, and make our Church, in ſpite of all its Enemies, become a praiſe in the whole earth.

The Zeal I have for the true Proteſtant Religion, for the Honour of this Church, and for a firm Union among Brethren, hath tranſported me beyond the bounds of a Preface; which I do now conclude with my hearty Prayers to Almighty God, that he, who is the God of Peace, and the Fountain of Wiſdom, would ſo direct the Counſels of thoſe in authority, and incline the hearts of the People, that we may neither run into a Wilderneſs of Confuſion, nor be driven into the Abyſs of Popery; but that the true Religion being preſerved among us, we may with one heart and mind ſerve the only true God, through his only Son Jeſus Chriſt the Prince of Peace, and our alone Advocate and Mediator. Amen.

An Hiſtorical Account of the Riſe and Progreſs of Separation.

§ 1. No Separation in the beginning of the Reformation, although there were then the ſame Reaſons which are now pleaded. § 2. Our Terms of Communion being the ſame which were required by the Martyrs in Queen Mary's days. §. 3. A true account of the Troubles of Francford. Mr. B's miſtake about them. §. 4. The firſt cauſes of the diſlike of our Ceremonies. § 5. The Reaſons of retaining them at the time of Reformation. § 6. The Tendencies to Separation checked by Beza and other Reformed Divines abroad. § 7. The Heats of the Nonconformiſts gave occaſion to Separation. § 8. Their zeal againſt it notwithſtanding; their repreſenting the ſinfulneſs and miſchief of it. § 9, 10. The true ſtate of the Controverſie between the Separatiſts and Nonconformiſts. § 11. Their Anſwers to the Separatiſts Reaſons. § 12. The progreſs of Separation. The Schiſms and Diviſions among the Separatiſts the occaſion of Independency. That makes Separation more inexcuſable, by owning ſome of our Churches to be true Churches. § 13. The miſchiefs which followed Independency both abroad, and § 14. hither into England. § 15. The Controverſie ſtated between the Divines of the Aſſembly and the Diſſenting Brethren. § 16. The Cauſe of the Aſſembly given up by the preſent Diſſenters. § 17. The old Nonconformiſts Judgment of the unlawfulneſs of mens preaching here, when forbidden by Laws, fully cleared from ſome late Objections.

Sect. I. FOR our better underſtanding the State of this Controverſie, it will be neceſſary to premiſe theſe two Things.

1. That although the preſent Reaſons for Separation would have held from the beginning of our Reformation, yet no ſuch thing was then practiſed, or allowed, by thoſe who were then moſt zealous for Reformation.

2. That when Separation began, it was moſt vehemently oppoſed by thoſe Non-conformiſts who diſliked many things in our Church, and wiſhed for a farther Reformation. And from a true Account of the State of the Controverſie then, it will appear, that the Principles owned by them, do overthrow the preſent practice of Separation among us.

In the making out of theſe, I ſhall give a full account of the Riſe and Progreſs of this Controverſie about Separation from the Communion of our Church.

I. That although the preſent Reaſons for Separation would have held from the beginning of the Reformation, yet no ſuch thing was then practiſed, or allowed by thoſe who were then moſt zealous for Reformation. By Separation we mean nothing elſe, but Withdrawing from the conſtant Communion of our Church, and joyning with ſeparate Congregations for greater Purity of Worſhip, and better means of Edification. By the preſent Reaſons for Separation we underſtand ſuch as are at this day inſiſted on, by thoſe who pretend to juſtifie theſe Practices; and thoſe are ſuch, as make the Terms of Communion with our Church to be unlawful. And not one of all thoſe, which my Adverſaries at this time hope to juſtifie the preſent Separation by, but would have had as much force in the beginning of the Reformation. For our Church ſtands on the ſame Grounds; uſeth the ſame Ceremonies (only fewer;) preſcribes the ſame Liturgy (only more corrected;) hath the ſame conſtitution and frame of Government; the ſame defect of Diſcipline; the ſame manner of appointing parochial Miniſters; and at leaſt as effectual means of Edification, as there were when the Reformation was firſt eſtabliſhed. And what advantage there is, in our preſent circumſtances, as to the Number, Diligence and Learning of our allowed Preachers; as to the retrenching of ſome Ceremonies, and the Explication of the meaning of others; as to the Miſchiefs we have ſeen follow the practice of Separation, do all make it much more unreaſonable now, than it had been then.

Sect. II. It cannot be denied, that there were different apprehenſions concerning ſome few things required by our Church in the beginning of the Reformation; but they were ſuch things, as are the leaſt ſcrupled now. Rogers refuſed the wearing of a ſquare Cap, and Tippet, &c. unleſs a Difference were made between the Popiſh Prieſts and ours. Hooper at firſt ſcrupled the Epiſcopal Habits, but he ſubmitted afterwards to the uſe of them. Bucer, and ſome others, diſliked ſome things in the firſt Common-Prayer-Book of Edward the Sixth, which were corrected in the Second: So that upon the Review of the Liturgy there ſeemed to be little or no diſſatisfaction left in the Members of our Church; at leaſt, as to thoſe things which are now made the grounds of Separation. For we read of none, who [illegible] the conſtant uſe of the Liturgy, or to comply with thoſe very few Ceremonies which were retained, as the Croſs in Baptiſm, and Kneeling at the Communion, which are now thought ſuch Bugbears to ſcare People from our Communion, and make them cry out in ſuch a dreadful manner of the Miſchief of Impoſitions; as though the Church muſt unavoidably be broken in pieces by the weight and burden of two or three ſuch inſupportable Ceremonies. Now we are told, That it is unreaſonable that any ſhould create a neceſſity of Separation, and then complain of an Impoſſibility of Union. By whom? At what time? In what manner was this neceſſity of Separation created? Hath our Church made any new Terms of Communion, or alter'd the old ones? No: the ſame ſame Author ſaith, It is perpetuating the old Conditions, and venturing our Peace in an old Worm-eaten Bottom, wherein it muſt certainly miſcarry.

Not to inſiſt on his way of Expreſſion, in calling the Reformation an old Worm-eaten Bottom; which ill becomes them that would now be held the moſt zealous Proteſtants. I would only know, if thoſe Terms of Communion which were impoſed by the Martyrs, and other Reformers, and which are only continued by us, do, as this Author ſaith, Create a Neceſſity of Separation; how then it came to paſs, that in all King Edward's Days, there was no ſuch thing as Diviſion in our Church about them?

Freſh ſuit againſt Ceremonies, p. 467.

And even Dr. Ames, who ſearched as carefully as any into this matter, can bring no other Inſtances of any differences then, but thoſe of Rogers and Hooper: he adds indeed, That Ridley and others agreed with Hooper. Wherein? What, in oppoſing our Ceremonies, when Hooper himſelf yielded in that which he at firſt ſcrupled? No, but there was a perfect reconciliation between them, before they ſuffered. And what then? Is there any the leaſt colour of Evidence, that before that Reconciliation, either Hooper or Rogers held ſeparate Aſſembles from the Conformiſts, or that Ridley ever receded from his ſtedfaſt adhering to the Orders of this Church? This is then a very mean Artifice, and diſingenuous Inſinuation. For although Ridley, in his Letter to Hooper, out of his great Modeſty and Humility, ſeems to take the blame upon himſelf, by attributing the greater Wiſdom to Hooper in that difference; yet he doth not retract his Opinion, but only declares the hearty love that he bore to him, for his conſtancy in the Truth. Neither do we find that ever Hooper, repented of his Submiſſion, to which he was ſo earneſtly perſuaded, both by Peter Martyr, and Martin Bucer; and Peter Martyr in his Letter to Bucer condemns his frowardneſs, and ſaith, That this cauſe was by no means approved by the wiſer and better ſort of Men. But Ames ſaith, Mr. Bradford might have been added, who calleth forked Caps and Tippets, Antichriſtian Pelf and Baggage. Suppoſe this were true, it proves no more than that a good Man had an unreaſonable Scruple, and ſuch as is thought ſo by our Brethren themſelves at this day. But did he ever divide the Church on ſuch an account as this? Did he ſet up ſeparate Congregations, becauſe a ſquare Cap and a Tippet would not go down with him? No, he was a far better Man than to do ſo. But if the whole words had been ſet down, the ſeeming force of theſe words had been taken away, for they are theſe; The cognizance of the Lord ſtandeth not in forked Caps, Tippets, ſhaven Crowns, or ſuch other Baggage and Antichriſtian pelf, but in ſuffering for the Lord's ſake; i. e. it is more a Mark of God's Service to ſuffer Martyrdom as a Prote[illegible]nt, than to be at eaſe as a Romiſh Prieſt, for he puts them althogether, Caps, Tippets, and ſhaven Crowns. And what is this to the Impoſitions of our Church, or Separation on the account of them? Dr. Ames knew too much, to pretend to any think like that in thoſe Times; for there was no ſuch thing as Separation from our Church then heard of, on the account of theſe dividing Impoſitions. Some furious Anabaptiſts it may be, or ſecret Papiſts then had ſeparate Meetings, of which Ridley bids enquiry to be made in his Articles of Viſitation; but no Proteſtants, none that joined in the Articles of our Faith, and Subſtantials of Religion with our Church, as Dr. O. ſpeaks, did then apprehend any neceſſity of Separation from it; not for the

the ſake of the aerial Sign of the Croſs; nor kneeling at the Communion; nor the religious obſervation of Holy-days; nor the conſtant uſe of the Liturgy; nor any one of all the particulars mentioned by Dr. O. which, he ſaith, makes our Communion unlawful, and ſeparation from it to be neceſſary. How come theſe Terms to be ſo unlawful now, which were then approved by ſuch holy, learned, and excellent Men as our firſt Reformers? Were they not arrived to that meaſure of Attainments, or Comprehenſion of the Truths of the Goſpel, that Men in our Age are come to? Is it credible, that Men of ſo great integrity, ſuch indefatigable induſtry, ſuch profound judgment, as Cranmer and Ridley, who were the Heads of the Reformation, ſhould diſcern no ſuch ſinfulneſs in theſe things, which now every diſſenting Artificer can cry out upon as unlawful? Is it poſſible, that Men that ſifted every thing with ſo much care themſelves, and made uſe of the beſt help from others, and begg'd the Divine Aſſiſtance, ſhould ſo fatally miſcarry in a matter of ſuch mighty importance to the Souls of Men? Could not Latimer, or Bradford, or ſuch holy and mortified Men as they, diſcern ſo much as a Mote of unlawfulneſs in thoſe Times, which others eſpy ſuch Beams in now? What makes this wonderful difference of eye-ſight? Were they under a cloudy, and dark, and Jewiſh Diſpenſation; and all the clear Goſpel Light of Diviſion and Separation reſerved for our Times? Did they want warmth and zeal for Religion, who burnt at the Stake for it? Doth God reveal his Will to the meek, the humble, the inquiſitive, the reſolute Minds? And would he conceal ſuch weighty things from thoſe who were ſo deſirous to find the Truth, and ſo reſolved to adhere to it? If Dioceſan Epiſcopacy, and the Conſtitution of our Church were ſuch an unlawful thing, as ſome now make it, it is ſtrange ſuch Men ſhould have no ſuſpicion of it, no not when they went to ſuffer? For as H. Jacob, the old Nonconformiſt, ſaith, in anſwer to Johnſon the Separatiſt, Did not M. Cranmer, hold himſelf for Arch-Biſhop ſtill, and that he was by the Pope unjuſtly and unſufficiently depoſed, and by Queen Mary forcibly reſtrained from it? Did he ever repent of holding that Office to his death? Alſo did not Ridley ſtand upon his Right to the Biſhoprick of London, though ready to die? Latimer, though he renounced his Biſhoprick, yet he kept his Miniſtry, and never repented him of it. Philpot never diſliked his Archdeaconry; yea, when he refuſed bloody Bonner, yet he appealed to his Ordinary, the Biſhop of Wincheſter. The like mind is to be ſeen in Biſhop Farrar. And generally, whoſoever were Miniſters then of the Prelats Ordination, they never renounced it, though they died Martyrs. Johnſon indeed quotes ſome Paſſages of Bradford, Hooper and Bale againſt the Hierarchy; but he notoriouſly miſapplies the words of Bradford, which are, The time was, when the Pope was out of England, but not all Popery; which he would have underſtood of the Times of Reformation, under Edward VI. whereas he ſpeaks them expreſly of King Henry's days. And it is not credible, Hooper ſhould think the Hierarchy unlawful, who (as it is generally believed) had the adminiſtration of two Biſhopricks at once. Bale's words were ſpoken in Henry VIII. his time, and could not be meant of a Proteſtant Hierarchy, for he was after a Biſhop himſelf. But H. Jacob anſwers to them all, That ſuppoſing theſe Men diſliked the Hierarchy, it made the ſtronger againſt the Principles of Separation: Seeing for all that, they did not refuſe to communicate and partake with them then as true Chriſtians. And that not only occaſionally, and at certain ſeaſons, but they maintained conſtant and fixed Communion with our Church, as the Members of it.

Sect. 3. Thus matters ſtood as to communion with our Church in the days of Edward VI. but as ſoon as the Perſecution began in Queen Mary's time, great numbers were forced to betake themſelves to foreign parts, whereof ſome went to Zurick, others to Baſil, others to Straſburg, and others to Frankford. Grindal, in a Letter to B. Ridley, ſaith, they were nigh an hundred Students and Miniſters then in exile: Theſe, with the People in all other Places, Geneva excepted, kept to the Orders eſtabliſhed in our Church; but at Frankford ſome began to be very buſie in reforming our Liturgy, leaving out many things, and adding others, which occaſioned the following Troubles of Frankford. The true ground whereof is commonly much miſ-repreſented. Mr. Baxter ſaith, The difference was between thoſe which ſtrove for the Engliſh Liturgy, and others that were for a free way of praying, i. e. as he explains it, from the preſent ſenſe and habit of the Speaker; but that this is a great miſtake, will appear from the account publiſhed of them, A. D. 1575. by one that was a Friend to the Diſſenting Party. From which it appears, that no ſooner were the Engliſh arriv'd at Frankford, but the Miniſter of the French Congregation there, came to them, and told them, he had obtained from the Magiſtrates the freedom of a Church for thoſe who came out of England, but eſpecially for the French; they thanked him and the Magiſtrates for ſo much kindneſs, but withal let them underſtand this would be little benefit to the Engliſh, unleſs they might have the liberty of performing all the Offices of Religion in their own Tongue. Upon an Addreſs made to the Senate, this requeſt was granted them; and they were to make uſe of the French Church at different times, as the French and they could agree, but with this expreſs Proviſo, that they ſhould not diſſent from the French in Doctrine, or Ceremonies, leſt they ſhould thereby miniſter occaſion of offence. But afterwards, it ſeems, the Magiſtrates did not require them to be ſtrictly tied up to the French Ceremonies, ſo they did mutually agree. Upon this, they peruſed the Engliſh Order, and endeavour'd to bring it as near as they could to the French Model, by leaving out the Reſponſes, the Litany, Surplice, and many other things, and adding a larger Confeſſion, more ſuitable to the State and Time; after which a Pſalm was ſung; then the Miniſter, after a ſhort Prayer for Divine Aſſiſtance, (according to Calvin's Cuſtom) was to proceed to the Sermon, which being ended, then followed a general Prayer for all Eſtates, particularly for England, ending with the Lord's Prayer; and ſo repeating the Articles of the Creed, and another Pſalm ſung, the People were diſmiſſed with the Bleſſing. By which we ſee, here was not the leaſt controverſie, whether a Liturgy or not; but whether the Order of Service was not to be accommodated, as much as might be, to the French Model. However, when they ſent to the Engliſh in other Places to reſort thither, by reaſon of the great Conveniencies they enjoy'd, and acquainted them with what they had done; it gave great offence to them, which they expreſſed in their Letters. Thoſe of Zurick ſent them word, They determined to uſe no other Order, than that which was laſt eſtabliſhed in England; and in another Letter, They deſire to be aſſured from them, that if they removed thither, they ſhould all join in the ſame Order of Service concerning Religion, which was in England, laſt ſet forth by King Edward. To this the Congregation of

Frankford returned anſwer, That they could not, in all points, warrant the full uſe of the Book of Service, which they impute to their preſent Circumſtances, in which they ſuppoſe ſuch Alterations would be allowed; but they intended not hereby to deface the worthy Laws and Ordinances of King Edward. Theſe learned Men of Straſburg, underſtanding their reſolutions, ſend Grindal to them, with a Letter ſubſcribed by Sixteen, wherein they intreat them, To reduce the Engliſh Church there, as much as poſſible, to the Order lately ſet forth in England, leſt, ſay they, by much altering of the ſame, they ſhould ſeem to condemn the chief Authors thereof, who, as they now ſuffer, ſo are they moſt ready to confirm that fact with the price of their Bloods; and ſhould alſo both give occaſion to our Adverſaries to accuſe our Doctrine of imperfection, and us of mutability; and the godly to doubt of that truth wherein before they were perſuaded, and to hinder their coming thither, which before they had purpoſed. And to obtain their deſire, they tell them, They had ſent Perſons for that end, to negotiate this Affair with the Magiſtrates, and, in caſe they obtained their Requeſt, they promiſed to come and join with them; and they did not queſtion the Engliſh in other Places would do the ſame. Notwithſtanding the weight of theſe Reaſons, and the deſireableneſs of their Brethrens company in that time of exile, they perſiſt in their former Reſolutions, not to have the entire Engliſh Liturgy; for by this time Knox was come from Geneva, being choſen Miniſter of the Congregation: However, they returned this anſwer to Straſburg, That they made Page 19. as little alteration as was poſſible; for, certain Ceremonies the Country would not bear; and they did not diſſent from thoſe which lie at the ranſom of their Bloods for the Doctrine, whereof they have made a moſt worthy Confeſſion. About this time, ſome ſuggeſted, that they ſhould take Page 21. the Order of Geneva, as fartheſt from ſuperſtition; but Knox declined this, till they had adviſed with the learned Men at Straſburg, Zurick, Emden, &c. knowing, that the Odium of it would be thrown upon him. But finding their Zeal and Concernment for the Engliſh Liturgy, he, with Whittingham, and ſome others, drew up an Abſtract of it, and ſent it to Calvin, deſiring his Judgment of it. Who, upon peruſal of it, Calvin, Ep. being throughly heated in a Cauſe that ſo nearly concerned him, writes 164. a very ſharp Letter, directed to the Brethren at Frankford; gently rebuking them for their unſeaſonable Contentions about theſe matters, but ſeverely reproving the Engliſh Divines, who ſtood up for the Engliſh Liturgy, when the Model of Geneva ſtood in competition with it. And yet, after all his Cenſures of it, he confeſſes, the things he thought moſt unfit, were tolerable; but he blames them, if they did not chuſe a better, when they might chuſe; but he gives not the leaſt encouragement to Separation if it were continued; and he declares for his own part, how eaſie he was to yield in all indifferent things, ſuch as external Rites are. And he was ſo far, in his Judgment, from being for free Prayer, or making the conſtant uſe of a Liturgy a ground of Separation, as Dr. O. doth, that when he delivered his Opinion, with the greateſt freedom, to the then Protector, about the beſt method of Reformation, he declares, That Ep. 55. he did mightily approve a certain Form, from which Men ought not to vary, both to prevent the inconveniencies which ſome Mens folly would betray them to, in the free way of praying; and to manifeſt the general conſent of the Churches in their Prayers; and to ſtop the vain affectation of ſome, who love to be ſhewing ſome new things. Let Mr. Br. now judge, whether it were likely that the Controverſie then at Frankford, was, as he ſaith, ſaith, between them that were for the Engliſh Liturgy, and others that were for a free way of praying; when Calvin, to whom the Diſſenters appealed, was ſo much, in his Judgment, againſt the latter. And it appears, by Calvin's Letter to Cox, and his Brethren, that the State of the Caſe at Frankford had not been truly repreſented to him; which made him write with greater ſharpneſs than otherwiſe he would have done; and he expreſſes his ſatisfaction, that the matter was ſo compoſed among them, when by Dr. Cox his means, the Engliſh-Liturgy was brought into uſe at Frankford. And to excuſe himſelf for his liberal Cenſures before, he mentions Lights, as required by the Book, which were not in the ſecond Liturgy of Edward the Sixth. So that either they deceived him, who ſent him the Abſtract; or he was put to this miſerable ſhift to defend himſelf; the matter being ended contrary to his expectation. For, although upon the receipt of Calvin's Letter, the Order of Geneva had like to have been preſently voted in, yet there being ſtill ſome faſt Friends to the Engliſh-Service, they were fain to compromiſe the matter, and to make uſe of a mixt Form for the preſent. But, Dr. Cox, and others, coming thither from England, and miſliking theſe Alterations, declared, That they were for having the face of an Engliſh Church there; and ſo they began the Litany next Sunday; which put Knox into ſo great a rage, that inſtead of purſuing his Text, (which was directly contrary) he made it his buſineſs, to lay open the nakedneſs of our Church, as far as his Wit and Ill-Will would carry him. He charged the Service-Book with Superſtition, Impurity, and Imperfection; and the Governors of our Church with ſlackneſs in Reformation, want of Diſcipline, with the buſineſs of Hooper, allowing Pluralities; all the ill things he could think on. When Cox and his Party, (with whom, at this time, was our excellent Jewel) were admitted among them, they preſently forbad Knox having any thing farther to do in that Congregation; who being complained of ſoon after for Treaſon againſt the Emperor, in a Book by him publiſhed, he was forced to leave the City, and to retire to Geneva, whither moſt of his Party followed him. And thus ſaith Grindal, in his Letter to Biſhop Ridley, The Church at Frankford was well quieted by the Prudence of Mr. Cox, and others, which met there for that purpoſe.

Sect. 4. It is obſerved by the Author of the Life of Biſhop Jewel, (before his Works) that this Controverſie was not carried with them out of England, but they received new impreſſions from the places whither they went. For as thoſe who were Exiles in Henry the Eighth's time, (as particularly Hooper, who lived many years in Switzerland) brought home with them a greater liking of the Church's Model, where they had lived, (which being ſuch as their Country would bear, they ſuppoſed to be nearer Apoſtolical Simplicity, being far enough from any thing of Pomp, or Ceremony) which created in them an averſion to the Ornaments and Veſtments here uſed: So now, upon this new Perſecution, thoſe who had friendſhip at Geneva, as Knox and Whittingham, or were otherwiſe much obliged by thoſe of that way, as the other Engliſh were, who came firſt to Frankford, were ſoon poſſeſſed with a greater liking of their Model of Divine Service, than of our own. And when Men are once engaged in Parties, and ſeveral Intereſts, it is a very hard matter to remove the Prejudices which they have taken in, eſpecially when they have great Abettors, and ſuch, whoſe Authority goes beyond any Reaſon with them. This is the true Foundation of thoſe unhappy Differences which have ſo long continued among us, about the Orders and Ceremonies of our Church. For when Calvin and ſome others found, that their Counſel was not like to be followed in our Reformation, our Biſhops proceeding more out of reverence to the ancient Church, than mere oppoſition to Popery, (which ſome other Reformers made their Rules) they did not ceaſe, by Letters, and other ways, to inſinuate, that our Reformation was imperfect, as long as any of the Dregs of Popery remained. So they called the uſe of thoſe Ceremonies, which they could not deny to have been far more ancient than the great Apoſtaſie of the Roman Church. Calvin, in his Letter to the Protector, avows this to be the beſt Rule of Reformation, To go as far from Popery as they could; and therefore what Habits and Ceremonies had been abuſed in the time of Popery were to be removed, leſt others were hardned in their Superſtition thereby: but at laſt he yields to this moderation in the caſe, That ſuch Ceremonies might be retained as were eaſie, and fitted to the Capacities of the People, provided they were not ſuch, as had their beginning from the Devil, or Antichriſt, i. e. were not firſt begun in the time of Popery. Now by this Rule of Moderation our Church did proceed; for it took away all thoſe Ceremonies which were of late invention. As in Baptiſm, of all the multitude of Rites in the Roman Church, it reſerved, in the Second Liturgy, only the Croſs after Baptiſm, which was not ſo uſed in the Roman Church, for there the Sign of the Croſs is uſed in the Scrutinies before Baptiſm; and the anointing with the Chryſm in vertice after it; inſtead of theſe, our Church made choice of the Sign of the Croſs after Baptiſm being of uncontrolable Antiquity, and not uſed till the Child is baptized. In the Euchariſt, inſtead of fifteen Ceremonies required in the Church of Rome, our Church hath only appointed Kneeling. I ſay appointed, for although Kneeling at the elevation of the Hoſt, be ſtrictly required by the Roman Church, yet in the Act of receiving it is not; (as manifeſtly appears by the Pope's manner of receiving, which is not Kneeling, but either Sitting, as it was in Bonaventure's time; or after the faſhion of Sitting, or a little leaning upon his Throne, as he doth at this day) therefore our Church taking away the adoration at the elevation, leſt it ſhould ſeem to recede from the practice of Antiquity, which received the Euchariſt in the poſture of adoration then uſed, hath appointed Kneeling to be obſerved of all Communicants. Inſtead of the great number of conſecrated Veſtments in the Roman Church, it only retained a plain linen Garment, which was unqueſtionably uſed in the Times of St. Hierome, and St. Auguſtin. And laſtly, As to the Epiſcopal Habits, they are retained only as a Mark of diſtinction of a certain Order of Men; the colour of the Chimere being changed from ſcarlet to black. Theſe are now the Ceremonies, about which all the noiſe and ſtir hath been made in our Church; and any ſober, conſidering Man, free from paſſion and prejudice, would ſtand amazed at the clamour and diſturbance which hath been made in this Church, and is at this Day, about the intolerable Miſchief of theſe Impoſitions.

Sect. 5. But the moſt material Queſtion they ever aſk, is, Why were theſe few retained by our Reformers, which were then diſtaſtful to ſome Proteſtants, and were like to prove the occaſion of future Contentions?

I will here give a juſt and true account of the Reaſons which induced our Reformers either to retain or to appoint theſe Ceremonies, and then proceed.

I. One

I. Out of a due reverence to antiquity. They would hereby convince the Papiſts they did put a difference between the groſs and intolerable Superſtitions of Popery, and the innocent Rites and Practices which were obſerved in the Church before. And what could more harden the Papiſts, than to ſee Men put no difference between theſe? It is an unſpeakable advantage which thoſe do give to the Papiſts, who are for reforming 1600 years backward, and when they are pinch'd with a Teſtimony of Antiquity, preſently cry out of the Myſtery of Iniquity working in the Apoſtles times; as though every thing which they diſliked, were a part of it. Next to the taking up Arms for Religion, which made Men look on it as a Faction and Deſign, there was ſcarce any thing gave ſo great a check to the Progreſs of the Reformation in France, eſpecially among learned and moderate Men, as the putting no difference between the Corruptions of Popery, and the innocent Cuſtoms of the ancient Church. For the time was when many great Men there, were very inclinable to a Reformation; but when they ſaw the Reformers oppoſe the undoubted Practices of Antiquity, equally with the modern Corruptions, they caſt them off, as Men guilty of an unreaſonable humour of Innovation; as may be ſeen in Thuanus, and Fran. Baldwin's Eccleſiaſtical Commentaries, and his Anſwers to Calvin and Beza. But our Reformers, altho' they made the Scripture the only Rule of Faith, and rejected all things repugnant thereto, yet they deſigned not to make a Transformation of a Church, but a Reformation of it; by reducing it as near as they could, to that ſtate it was in, under the firſt Chriſtian Emperors, that were ſound in Religion; and therefore they retained theſe few Ceremonies, as Badges of the reſpect they bore to the ancient Church.

II. To manifeſt the Juſtice and Equity of the Reformation, by letting their Enemies ſee, they did not break Communion with them for mere indifferent things. For ſome of the popiſh Biſhops of that time were ſubtle and learned Men, as Gardiner, Heath, Tonſtall, &c. and nothing would have rejoiced them more, than to have ſeen our Reformers boggle at ſuch Ceremonies as theſe; and they would have made mighty advantage of it among the People. Of which we have a clear inſtance in the caſe of Biſhop Hooper's ſcrupling the Epiſcopal Veſtments. Peter Martyr, tells him plainly, That ſuch needleſs ſcrupuloſity would be a great hindrance to the Reformation. For, ſaith he, ſince the People are with difficulty enough brought to things neceſſary, if we once declare things indifferent to be unlawful, they will have no patience to hear us any longer. And withal, hereby we condemn other reformed Churches, and thoſe ancient Churches, which have hitherto been in great eſteem.

III. To ſhew their conſent with other Proteſtant Churches, which did allow and practice the ſame, or more Ceremonies, as the Lutheran Churches generally did. And even Calvin himſelf, in his Epiſtle to Sadolet, declared, That he was for reſtoring the face of the ancient Church; and in his Book of the true way of Reformation, he ſaith, He would not contend about Ceremonies, not only thoſe which are for decency, but thoſe that are ſymbolical. Œcolampadius looked on the geſture at the Sacrament as indifferent. Bucer thought the uſe of the Sign of the Croſs after Baptiſm neither indecent nor unprofitable. Since therefore, ſo great a number of Proteſtant Churches uſed the ſame Ceremonies; and the chief Leaders of other reformed Churches thought them not unlawful, our firſt Reformers for this, and the foregoing Reaſons, thought it fit to retain them, as long as they were ſo few, ſo eaſie both to be practiſed and underſtood.

Sect. 6. But the impreſſions which had been made on ſome of our Divines abroad, did not wear off at their return home, in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's Reign. For they retained a ſecret diſlike of many things in our Church; but the Act of Uniformity being paſſed, and the uſe of the Liturgy ſtrictly enjoined; I do not find any Separation made then on the account of it; no, not by the diſſenting Brethren, that withdrew from Frankford to Geneva. Knox was forbidden to preach here, becauſe of ſome perſonal Reflections on the Queen; but Whittingham, Sampſon, Gilby, and others accepted of Preferment and Employment in the Church. The Biſhops, at firſt, ſhewed kindneſs to them, on the account of their forward and zealous preaching, which, at that time was very needful, and therefore many of them were placed in London. Where, having gained the People by their zeal and diligence in preaching, they took occaſion to let fall at firſt their diſlike of the Ceremonies, and a deſire of a farther Reformation of our Liturgy; but finding that they had gained ground, they never ceaſed, till by inveighing againſt the Livery of Antichriſt, as they called the Veſtments and Ceremonies, they had inflamed the People to that degree, that Gilby himſelf inſinuates, That if they had been let alone a little longer, they would have ſhaken the Conſtitution of this Church. This was the firſt occaſion of preſſing Uniformity with any rigor, and therefore ſome examples were thought fit to be made for the warning of others. But as kindneſs made them preſumptuous, ſo this ſeverity made them clamorous, and they ſent bitter complaints to Geneva. Beza, after much importunity, undertook to give an anſwer to them; which being of great conſequence to our preſent buſineſs, I ſhall here give a fuller account of it. We are then to underſtand, that about this time, the diſſenting Party being exaſperated, by the ſilencing ſome of their moſt buſie Preachers, began to have ſeparate Meetings: This Beza takes notice of in his Epiſtle to Grindal, Biſhop of London; and it appears, by an Examination taken before him, 20th of June, 1567, of certain Perſons, who were accuſed not only for abſenting themſelves from their Pariſh-Churches, but for gathering together, and making Aſſemblies, uſing Prayers and Preachings, and miniſtring Sacraments among themſelves, and hiring a Hall in London, under pretence of a Wedding, for that purpoſe.

Beza Epiſt. 13.

Part of a Regiſter, p. 23.

The Biſhop of London firſt rebuked them for their lying Pretences, and then told them, That in this ſevering themſelves from the Society of other Chriſtians, they not only condemned them, but alſo the whole ſtate of the Church reformed in King Edward*'s days, which was well reformed according to the word of God; yea, and many good Men have ſhed their blood for the ſame, which your doings condemn. Have ye not*, ſaith he, the Goſpel truly preached, and the Sacraments miniſtred accordingly, and good order kept, although we differ from other Churches in Ceremonies, and in indifferent things, which lie in the Prince's power to command for order ſake? To which one of them anſwered, That as long as they might have the Word freely preached, and the Sacraments adminiſtred, without the preferring of idolatrous Gear about it, they never aſſembled together in Houſes: but their Preachers being diſplaced by Law for their Nonconformity, they be-thought themſelves what was beſt for them to do; and calling to mind, there was a Congregation there in the days of Queen Mary, which followed the Order of Geneva, they took up that, and this Book and Order, ſaith he, we hold. Another anſwered, That they did not refuſe Communion for preaching the Word, but becauſe they had tied the Ceremonies of Antichriſt to it, and ſet them up before it, ſo that no Man may preach, or miniſter the Sacraments without them. Things being come to this height, and Separation beginning to break out, the wiſer Brethren thought not fit to proceed any farther, till they had conſulted their Oracle at Geneva. Beza being often ſolicited by them, with doleful Complaints of their hard uſage, and the different Opinions among themſelves, what they were to do, at laſt reſolves to anſwer, but firſt he declares, How unwilling he was to interpoſe in the Differences of another Church, eſpecially when but one Party was heard; and he was afraid, this was only the way to exaſperate and provoke more, rather than cure this evil, which he thought was not otherwiſe to be cured, but Precibus & Patientiâ, by Prayers and Patience. After this general Advice, Beza freely declares his own Judgment, as to the Reformation of ſeveral things he thought amiſs in our Church; but as to the caſe of the ſilenced Preachers, and the Peoples Separation, he expreſſes his mind in that manner, that the Diſſenters at this day, would have publiſhed their Invectives againſt him, one upon the back of another. For, (1.) As to the ſilenced Miniſters, he ſaith, That if the preſſing Subſcription continued, he perſuades them rather to live privately, than to yield to it. For, they muſt either act againſt their Conſciences, or they muſt quit their Employments; for, ſaith he, the third thing that may be ſuppoſed, viz. That they ſhould exerciſe their Function againſt the Will of the Queen and the Biſhops, we tremble at the thoughts of it, for ſuch reaſons, as may be eaſily underſtood, though we ſay never a word of them. What! is Beza for ſilencing, and ſtopping the Mouths of ſuch a number of faithful and able Miniſters, and at ſuch a time, when the Church was in ſo great neceſſity of preaching, and ſo many Souls like to be famiſhed for the want of it? when St. Antholins, St. Peters, St. Bartholomews, at which Gilby ſaith their great preaching then was, were like to be left deſtitute of ſuch Men? Would Beza, even Beza, at ſuch a time as that, be for ſilencing ſo many Preachers, i. e. for their ſitting quiet, when the Law had done it: And would not he ſuffer them to preach, when they ought to have done it, though againſt the Will of the Queen and the Biſhops? It appears, that Beza was not of the mind of our Adverſaries; but that he was of the contrary, it appears plainly by this, That before he perſuades the Diſſenting Miniſters rather to live privately, than to ſubſcribe; and that he expreſſes no ſuch terrible apprehenſions at their quitting their Places, as he doth at their preaching in oppoſition to the Laws. (2.) As to the caſe of the People, his Advice was, As long as the Doctrine was ſound, that they ſhould diligently attend upon it, and receive the Sacraments devoutly, and to join amendment of Life with their Prayers, that by thoſe means they might obtain a through Reformation. So that nothing can be more expreſs againſt Separation, than what is here ſaid by Beza, for, even as to the Miniſters, he ſaith, Though he did not approve the Ceremonies, yet ſince they are not of the nature of things evil in themſelves, he doth not think them of that moment, that they ſhould leave their Functions for the ſake of them, or that the People ſhould forſake the Ordinances, rather than hear thoſe who did conform. Than which words, nothing can be plainer againſt Separation. And it farther appears, by Beza's reſolution of a caſe concerning a Schiſm in the French Church, then in London, That he looked on it as a Sin, for any one to ſeparate from a Church wherein ſound Doctrine, and a holy Life, and the right uſe of the Sacraments is kept up. And, by Separation, he ſaith, he means, not merely going from one Church to another, but the diſcontinuing Communion with the publick Aſſemblies, as though one were no Member of them.

Beza's Authority being ſo great with the Diſſenting Brethren at that time, ſeems to have put an effectual Stop to the Courſe of Separation, which they were many of them, then inclined to. But, he was not alone among the Foreign Divines, who, about that time, expreſſed themſelves againſt Separation from the Communion of our Church, notwithſtanding the Rites and Ceremonies herein uſed. For Gualter, a Divine of good Reputation in the Helvetian Churches, takes an occaſion in an Epiſtle to ſeveral of our Biſhops, to talk of the Difference then about theſe things; and he extremely blames the moroſe humor of thoſe, who diſturbed the Church for the ſake of ſuch things, and gave an occaſion thereby to endleſs Separations. And in an Epiſtle to Cox Biſhop of Ely, 1572, he tells him, How much they had diſſuaded them from making ſuch a ſtir in the Church, about Matters of no moment: and he complains grievouſly of the Lies and Prejudices againſt our Church, which they had ſent Men on purpoſe to poſſeſs them with, both at Geneva and other places.

Zanchy, upon great Sollicitation, wrote an earneſt Letter to the Queen to remove the Ceremonies; but withal he ſent another to Biſhop Jewel, to perſuade the Nonconformiſts, if the Queen could not be moved, not to leave their Churches on ſuch accounts, which, for his part, he did not underſtand how any could lawfully do; as long as they had otherwiſe liberty to preach the Goſpel, and adminiſter the Sacraments, although they were forced to do ſomething therein, which did not pleaſe them; as long as the things were of that kind, which in themſelves were neither good nor evil. And the ſame Reaſon will much more hold againſt the Peoples Separation.

Sect. 7. But about this time, the diſſenting Party much increaſing, and moſt of the old and peaceable Non-conformiſts being dead or unfit for buſineſs; the management of their affairs fell into the hands of younger and fiercer Men. Who thought their Predeceſſors too cold in theſe matters; inſomuch, that honeſt John Fox complained of the factious and turbulent Spirit which had then poſſeſſed that Party, although himſelf a moderate Non-conformiſt; and he ſaith, They deſpiſed him, becauſe he could not rail againſt Biſhops, and Archbiſhops as they did; but if he could be as mad as they, they would be kinder to him. And therefore he ſoberly adviſeth the Governors of the Church to look well after this ſort of Men; for, ſaith he, if they prevail, it is not to be imagin'd, what Miſchief and Diſturbance they will bring; whoſe Hypocriſie is more ſubtle and pernicious than that of the old Monks; for under a Pretence of greater Purity, they will never give over, till they have brought Men under a Jewiſh Slavery. Theſe new Men, full of bitter zeal, deſpiſed the old trifling Controverſie about Garments and Ceremonies; they complained, That all was out of order in the Church, and nothing but a new and thorough Reformation would pleaſe them. For, in the Admonition preſented to the Parliament, 14 Eliz. they complain for want of a right Miniſtry, a right Government in the Church according to the Scriptures, without which (they ſay) there could be no right Religion. The Liturgy they deride, as culled and picked out of the Popiſh Dunghil, the Portuſe and Maſs-Book; the Government of the Church by Arch-Biſhops and Biſhops they call Deviliſh and Antichriſtian; and condemn the Vocation of the Clergy, as Popiſh and Unlawful; and add, That the Sacraments are mangled, and profaned, that Baptiſm is full of childiſh and ſuperſtitious Toys. All which, and many

ny more expreſſions of a like Nature, are extant in the Firſt and Second Admonitions. Which bold and groundleſs aſſertions, being ſo openly avowed to the World, by the Leaders of the Diſſenting Party, gave the true Occaſion to the following practice of Separation. For when theſe things were not only publiſhed in the name of the Party, being the Pleas for Peace at that time, but ſtifly maintained with greater Heat than Learning. It is eaſie to imagine, what Impreſſions ſuch things would make on the common ſort of People; who have ſtill a good Inclination to find fault with their Governors, eſpecially in the Church, and to admire thoſe that oppoſe them. And theſe they courted moſt, having their Opinions ſo ſuited to vulgar Capacities, that they apprehended their Intereſt carried on together with that of Purity of Reformation. Hence they pleaded then, as others do at this day, for the Peoples right to chooſe their Biſhops and Paſtors againſt the Uſurpations, as they accounted them, of Princes and Patrons; hence they railed againſt the Pomp and Greatneſs of the Clergy, which is always a popular Theme; and ſo would the expoſing the inequality of Mens Eſtates be, if Men durſt undertake it, with as great hopes of Impunity. Beſides, it was not a little pleaſant to the People, to think, what a ſhare they ſhould come to in the new Seigniory, as they called it, or Preſbytery, to be erected in every Pariſh; and what Authority they ſhould exerciſe over their Neighbours, and over their Miniſter too by their double Votes. By ſuch Arts as theſe, they complied with the natural Humors of the People, and ſo gained a mighty Intereſt amongſt them; as the Anabaptiſts in Germany and Switzerland at firſt did, upon the like Grounds. Which made Bullinger, in an Epiſtle to Robert Biſhop of Wincheſter, parallel the Proceedings of this Party here, with that of the Anabaptiſts with them in thoſe Countries; For, ſaith he, we had a ſort of People here, to whom nothing ſeemed pure enough in our Reformation, from whence they brake out into Separation, and had their Conventicles among us, upon which followed Sects and Schiſms, which made great entertainment to our Common Enemies, the Papiſts. Juſt thus it happened here, theſe hot Reformers deſigned no Separation at preſent; which they knew would unavoidably bring confuſion along with it; for that was laying the Reins on the Peoples necks, and they would run whither they pleaſed, without any poſſibility of being well managed by them; but ſince theſe Men would Refine upon the preſent Conſtitution of our Church, there ſoon aroſe another ſort of Men, who thought it as fit to Refine upon them. They acknowledged they had good Principles among them, but they did not practiſe according to them: If our Church were ſo bad as they ſaid, that there was neither right Miniſtery, nor right Government, nor right Sacraments, nor right Diſcipline; What follows, ſay they, from hence, but that we ought to ſeparate from the Communion of ſo corrupt a Church, and joyn together to make up new Churches for the pure adminiſtration of all Goſpel Ordinances? The Leaders of the Non-conformiſts finding this Party growing up under them, were quickly apprehenſive of the danger of them; becauſe the Conſequence ſeemed ſo natural from their own Principles; and the People were ſo ready to believe, that nothing but worldly Conſiderations of Intereſt and Safety kept them from practiſing according to them. Which was a mighty prejudice againſt them in the Minds of the Separatiſts, as appears by Robinſon's Preface to his Book of Communion.

Sect. 8, II. The Separation being now begun, the Non-conformiſts ſet themſelves againſt it, with the greateſt Vehemency. Which is the ſecond thing I am to make out. As for thoſe of the Separation, ſaith Parker a noted Non-conformiſt, who have confuted them more than we? or, Who have written more againſt them? And in a Letter of his, he expreſſeth the greateſt Deteſtation of them. Now it grieved me not a little, at this time, ſaith he, that Satan ſhould be ſo impudent, as to fling the dung of that Sect into my Face, which, with all my Power, I had ſo vehemently reſiſted, during the whole courſe of my Miniſtery in England: I think no other, but that many of them love the Lord, and fear his Name; howbeit their Error being Enemy to that Breaſt of Charity, wherewith Cyprian covered his, Qui ab Eccleſiâ nunquam receſſit, as Auguſtin ſpeaketh; they cannot ſtand before his Tribunal, but by the Interceſſion of our bleſſed Saviour. Father forgive them for they know not what they do. Think not theſe words are applied to their Sect amiſs; for, in effect, what doth it leſs than even perſecute the Lord Jeſus in his Hoſt, which it revileth; in his Ordinances, which it diſhonoureth; and in his Servants laſt of all, whoſe Graces it blaſphemeth, whoſe Footſteps it ſlandereth, and whoſe Perſons it deſpiſeth. And two Characters he gives of the Men of that way, viz, That their Spirits were bitter above meaſure, and their hearts puffed up with the Leaven of Pride. How far theſe Characters ſtill agree to the Defenders of the preſent Separation, I leave others to judge. When Brown and Harriſon openly declared for Separation, T. C. himſelf undertook to anſwer them, in a Letter to Harriſon. His example was ſoon followed by others of his Brethren, who wrote the Admonition to the Followers of Brown, and the Defence of that Admonition. When Barrow and Greenwood publiſhed their four Reaſons for Separation, three of which they took out of the Admonition to the Parliament, viz. Unlawful Miniſtry, Antichriſtian Government, and falſe Worſhip; Gifford, a Non-conformiſt at Maldon in Eſſex, undertook to anſwer them in ſeveral Treatiſes. And it is obſervable, that theſe Non-conformiſts charge the Browniſts with making a vile, notorious, and damnable Schiſm, becauſe they withdrew from the Communion of our Churches, and ſet up new Ones of their own. Gifford not only calls them Schiſmaticks, but ſaith, They make a vile Schiſm, rending themſelves from the Church of England; and condemning by their Aſſertions, the whole viſible Church in the World, even as the Donatiſts did of old time: and he adds, That the end of Browniſm, as it was then called, is infinite Schiſms, Hereſies, Atheiſm and Barbariſm. And the ſame Author, in his ſecond Book, reckoning up the ill effects of this Separation among the People, hath theſe remarkable words. Now look alſo on the People, where we may ſee very many, who not regarding the chief Chriſtian Virtues, and Godly Duties, as namely, to be Meek, to be Patient, to be Lowly, to be full of Love and Mercy, to deal uprightly and juſtly, to guide their Families in the Fear of God, with wholeſome Inſtructions, and to ſtand faſt in the Calling in which God hath ſet them, give themſelves wholly to this, even as if it were the Sum and Pith of Religion, namely, to argue and talk continually againſt Matters in the Church, againſt Biſhops and Miniſters, and one againſt another on both ſides. Some are proceeded to this, that they will come to the Aſſemblies to hear the Sermons and Prayers of the Preacher, but not to the Prayers of the Book, which I take to be a more grievous ſin than many do ſuppoſe. But yet this is not the worſt, for ſundry are gone farther, and fallen into a dammable Schiſm; and the ſame ſo much the more fearful and dangerous, in that many do not

ſee the foulneſs of it, but rather hold them as Godly Chriſtians, and but a little over-ſhot in theſe matters. But that this Man went upon the Principles of the Non-conformiſts, appears, by his ſtating the Queſtion, in the ſame Preface, For, I ſhewed, ſaith he, in expreſs words, that I do not meddle at all in theſe Queſtions, whether there be corruptions and faults in our Church, condemned by God's Word; whether they be many or few; whether they be ſmall or great; but only thus far, whether they be ſuch, or ſo great, as make our Churches Antichriſtian. Barrow ſaith, That this Gifford was one that joyned with the reſt of the Faction in the Petition to the Parliament againſt the Engliſh Hierarchy: and it appears by ſeveral paſſages of his Books that he was a Non-conformiſt; and he is joyned with Cartwright, Hilderſham, Brightman, and other Nonconformiſts, by the Prefacer to the Defence of Bradſhaw againſt Johnſon: and I find his Name in one of the Claſſes in Eſſex at that time. The Author of the ſecond Anſwer for Communicating, who defends T. C's Letter to Harriſon, Brown's Colleague againſt Separation, proves joyning with the Church a Duty neceſſarily enjoyned him of God by his Providence, through his being and placing in a particular Church, and juſtly required of him by the Church, or ſpiritual Body, through that ſame inforcing Law of the coherence, and being together of the parts and members, which is the expreſs Ordinance of God. So that, ſaith he, unleſs I hold the Congregation, whereof I am now, diſanulled, and become no Church of Chriſt, for the not ſeparating an unworthy Member, I cannot voluntarily either abſent my ſelf from their Aſſemblies to holy Exerciſes, or yet depart away being come together, without Breach of the Bond of Peace, ſundring the Cement of Love, empairing the growth of the Body of Chriſt, and incurring the guilt of Schiſm and Diviſion. To the ſame purpoſe he ſpeaks elſewhere. Richard Bernard calls it, An uncharitable and lewd Schiſm which they were guilty of. But I need not mention more particular Authors, ſince in the grave Confutation of the Errors of the Separatiſts, in the Name of the Nonconformiſts, it is ſaid, That becauſe we have a true Church, conſiſting of a lawful Miniſtry, and a faithful People, therefore they cannot ſeparate themſelves from us, but they muſt needs incur the moſt ſhameful and odious Reproach of manifeſt Schiſm. And concerning the State of the Perſons who lived in Separation, they ſay, We hold them all to be in a dangerous Eſtate, (we are loth to ſay in a damnable Eſtate) as long as they continue in this Schiſm.

Sect. 9. But, for our farther underſtanding the full State of this Controverſie, we muſt conſider, what things were agreed on both ſides, and where the main Points of Difference lay.

1. The Separatiſts did yield the Doctrine, or Faith of the Church of England true and ſound, and a Poſſibility of Salvation in the Communion of it. In their Apology preſented to King James, thus they ſpeak; We teſtifie by theſe preſents unto all Men, and deſire them to take knowledge hereof, that we have not forſaken any One Point of the true ancient Catholick and Apoſtolick Faith profeſſed in our Land; but hold the ſame Grounds of Chriſtian Religion with them ſtill. And the Publiſher of the Diſpute about Separation, between Johnſon and Jacob, ſaith, That the firſt Separatiſts never denied, that the Doctrine and Profeſſion of the Churches of England, was ſufficient to make thoſe that believed and obeyed them, to be true Chriſtians, and in the ſtate of Salvation, but always held, profeſſed, and acknowledged the contrary. Barrow ſaith, That they commended the Faith of the Engliſh Martyrs, and deemed them ſaved, notwithſtanding the falſe Offices, and great corruptions in the Worſhip exerciſed: And in the Letter to a Lady a little before his Death, he ſaith, he had reverend Eſtimation of ſundry, and good hope of many hundred thouſands in England; though he utterly diſliked the preſent Conſtitution of this Church, in the preſent Communion, Miniſtry, Worſhip, Government, and Ordinances Eccleſiaſtical of theſe Cathedral and Pariſhional Aſſemblies.

Browniſt's Apol. p. 92.

2. The Separatiſts granted, That Separation was not juſtifiable from a Church, for all Blemiſhes and Corruptions in it. Thus they expreſs themſelves in their Apology, Neither count we it lawful for any Member to forſake the Fellowſhip of the Church, for blemiſhes and imperfections, which every one, according to his Calling, ſhould ſtudiouſly ſeek to cure, and to expect and farther it, until either there follow redreſs, or the Diſeaſe be grown incurable, And in the 36 Article of the Confeſſion of their Faith, written by Johnſon and Ainſworth, they have theſe words. None is to ſeparate from a Church rightly gathered and eſtabliſhed, for faults and Corruptions, which may, and ſo long as the Church conſiſteth of mortal Men, will fall out and ariſe among them, even in true conſtituted Churches, but by due order to ſeek the redreſs thereof. But in the caſe of our Church they pleaded, that the Corruptions were ſo many and great, as to overthrow the very Conſtitution of a Church. So Barrow ſaith, They do not cut off the members of our Church from God's Election, or from Chriſt, but from being Members of a true conſtituted Church.

On the other ſide, the Non-conformiſts granted there were many and great Corruptions in our Church, but not ſuch as did overthrow the Conſtitution of it, or make Separation from our Parochial Aſſemblies to be neceſſary, or lawful. So that the force of all their Reaſonings againſt Separation lay in theſe two Suppoſitions.

1. That nothing could juſtifie Separation from our Church, but ſuch Corruptions which overthrew the being, or conſtitution of it.
2. That the Corruptions in our Church were not ſuch, as did overthrow the Conſtitution of it.

The making out of theſe two will tend very much to the clear ſtating of this preſent Controverſie.

1. That nothing could juſtifie Separation from our Church, but ſuch Corruptions which overthrow the being or conſtitution of it. Barrow and his Brethren, did not think they could ſatisfie their Conſciences in Separation, unleſs they proved our Churches to be no true Churches. For, here they aſſign the four Cauſes of their Separation to be; Want of a right gathering our Churches at firſt; Falſe Worſhip; Antichriſtian Miniſtery and Government: Theſe Reaſons, ſay they, all Men may ſee prove directly theſe Pariſh Aſſemblies not to be the true eſtabliſhed Churches of Chriſt, to which any faithful Chriſtian may joyn himſelf in this eſtate; eſpecially, when all Reformation unto the rules of Chriſt's Teſtament is not only denied, but reſiſted, blaſphemed, perſecuted. Theſe are the words of the firſt, and chiefeſt Separatiſts, who ſuffered death rather than they would foregoe theſe Principles. We condemn not, ſay they, their Aſſemblies, barely for a mixture of good and bad, which will always be, but for want of an orderly gathering, or conſtitution at firſt: we condemn them not for ſome faults in the Calling of the Miniſtry, but for having and retaining a falſe Antichriſtian Miniſtry impoſed upon them: we forſake not their Aſſemblies for ſome faults in their Government, or Diſcipline, but for ſtanding ſubject to a Popiſh and Antichriſtian Government. Neither refrain we their Worſhip for ſome light imperfections, but becauſe their Worſhip is ſuperſtitious,

ſtitious, deviſed by Men idolatrous, according to that patched Popiſh Portuiſe their Service Book; according unto which their Sacraments, and whole Adminiſtration is performed, and not by the Rules of Chriſt's Teſtament. So that theſe poor deluded Creatures ſaw very well, that nothing but ſuch a Charge, which overthrew the very being and conſtitution of our Churches (the Doctrine of Faith being allowed to be ſound) could juſtifie their Separation: not mere promiſcuous Congregations, nor mixt Communions; not defect in the Exerciſe of Diſcipline; not ſome Corruptions in the Miniſtry or Worſhip; but ſuch groſs Corruptions as took away the Life and Being of a Church; as they ſuppoſed idolatrous Worſhip, and an Antichriſtian Miniſtry to do. If Mr. Gifford, ſaith Barrow, can prove the Pariſh Aſſemblies in this eſtate true and eſtabliſhed Churches, then we would ſhew him how free we are from Schiſm. The ſame four Reaſons are inſiſted on as the Grounds of their Separation in the Browniſt's Apology to King James, by Ainſworth, Johnſon, and the reſt of them. Ainſworth frames his Argument for Separation thus. That Church which is not the true Church of Chriſt and of God, ought not, by any true Chriſtian, to be continued, or communicated with; but muſt be forſaken, and ſeparated from; and a true Church ſought, and joyned unto, &c. But the Church of England is before proved, not to be the true Church of Chriſt, and of God, therefore it ought to be ſeparated from, &c. By which we ſee, the greateſt Separatiſts that were then, never thought it lawful to ſeparate from our Churches, if they were true. On the other ſide, thoſe who oppoſed the Separation, with greateſt zeal, thought nothing more was neceſſary for them, to diſprove the Separation, then to prove our Churches to be true Churches. R. Brown (from whom the Party received their denomination) thought he had a great advantage againſt Cartwright (the Ringleader of the Non-conformiſts) to prove the Neceſſity of Separation, becauſe he ſeemed to make Diſcipline Eſſential to a Church; and therefore ſince he complained of the want of Diſcipline here, he made our Church not to be a true Church, and conſeqnently that Separation was neceſſary. T. C. Anſwers, That Church Aſſemblies are builded by Faith only on Chriſt the Foundation, the which Faith ſo being, whatſoever is wanting of that which is commanded, or remaining of that which is forbidden, is not able to put that Aſſembly from the right and title of ſo being the Church of Chriſt. For that Faith can admit no ſuch thing, as giveth an utter overthrow, and turning upſide down of the truth. His meaning is, wherever the true Doctrine of Faith is received and profeſſed, there no defects or corruptions can overthrow the being of a true Church, or juſtifie Separation from it. For, he addeth, although beſides Faith in the Son of God, there be many things neceſſary for every Aſſembly; yet be they neceſſary to the comely and ſtable being, and not ſimply to the being of the Church. And in this reſpect, ſaith he, the Lutheran Churches, (which he there calls the Dutch Aſſemblies) which beſide the maym of Diſcipline, which is common to our Churches, are groſly deceived in the matter of the Supper, are notwithſtanding holden in the Roll of the Churches of God. Was not Jeruſalem, ſaith he, after the return from Babylon, the City of the great King, until ſuch time as Nehemias came and builded on the Walls of the City? To ſay therefore it is none of the Church, becauſe it hath not received this Diſcipline, methinks is all one with this, as if a Man would ſay, It is no City, becauſe it hath no Wall: or that it is no Vineyard, becauſe it hath neither Hedge, nor Ditch. It is not, I grant, ſo ſightly a City, or Vineyard, nor yet ſo ſafe againſt the Inva-

Afterwards, as often as the Non-conformiſts ſet themſelves to diſprove the Separation, their main buſineſs was, to prove our Churches to be true Churches. As in a Book entituled, Certain Poſitions held and maintained by ſome godly Miniſters of the Goſpel, againſt thoſe of the Separation; which was part of that Book, afterwards publiſhed by W. R. and called, A grave and modeſt Confutation of the Separatiſts. The Ground-work whereof, as Mr. Ainſworth calls it, is thus laid.

That the Church of England is a true Church of Chriſt, and ſuch a one, as from which whoſoever wittingly and continually ſeparateth himſelf, cutteth himſelf off from Chriſt.

Counterpoyſon, p. 117.

If this was the Ground-work of the Non-conformiſts in thoſe days, thoſe who live in ours, ought well to conſider it, if they regard their Salvation.

And, for this Aſſertion of theirs, they bring Three Reaſons.

1. For that they enjoy, and join together in the uſe of theſe outward Means, which God in his Word hath ordained for the gathering of an inviſible Church; i. e. preaching of the Goſpel, and adminiſtration of the Sacraments.

2. For that their whole Church maketh profeſſion of the true Faith, and hold and teach, &c. all Truths fundamental. So we put their Two Reaſons into One, becauſe they both relate to the profeſſion of the true Faith; which, ſay they, is that which giveth life and being to a viſible Church; and upon this profeſſion we find many that have been incorporated into the viſible Church, and admitted to the privileges thereof, even by the Apoſtles themſelves. So the Church of Pergamus, though it did tolerate groſs Corruptions in it, yet becauſe it kept the Faith of Chriſt, was ſtill called the Church of God.

3. For that all the known Churches in the world acknowledge that Church for their Siſter, and give unto her the Right-hand of Fellowſhip.

When H. Jacob undertook Fr. Johnſon upon this Point of Separation, the Poſition he laid down was this,

That the Churches of England are the true Churches of God. Which he proved by this Argument.

Whatſoever is ſufficient to make a particular Man a true Chriſtian, and in ſtate of Salvation; that is ſufficient to make a company of Men, ſo gathered together, to be a true Church.

But the whole Doctrine, as it is publickly profeſſed, and practiſed, by Law in England, is ſufficient to make a particular Man a true Chriſtian, and in ſtate of Salvation, and our publick Aſſemblies are therein gathered together.

Therefore it is ſufficient to make the publick Aſſemblies true Churches.

And in the defence of this Argument, againſt the Reaſons and Exceptions of Johnſon, that whole Diſputation is ſpent. And, in latter times, the Diſpute between Ball and Can, about the neceſſity of Separation, runs into this, Whether our Church be a true Church or not; concerning which, Ball thus delivers his Judgment. True Doctrine, in the main Grounds and Articles of Faith, though mixt with Defects and Errors in other matters, not concerning the Life and Soul of Religion, and the right Adminiſtration

ſtration of Sacraments for ſubſtance, though in the manner of Diſpenſation, ſome things be not ſo well ordered, as they might and ought, are Notes and Marks of a true and ſound Church, though ſomewhat craſed in health and ſoundneſs, by Errors in Doctrine, Corruptions in the Worſhip of God, and Evils in Life and Manners.

The Second Suppoſition which the Non-conformiſts proceeded on, was, Sect. 11. (2.) That the Corruptions in our Church were not ſuch as did overthrow the being and conſtitution of it.

This will beſt appear, by the Anſwers they gave to the main Grounds of Separation.

Gifford's Anſwer to the Browniſts, p. 55.

I. That our Church was not rightly gathered at the time of our Reformation from Popery. To which Gifford thus anſwers, The Church of England, in the time of Popery, was a Member of the Univerſal Church, and had not the being of a Church of Chriſt from Rome, nor took not her beginning of being a Church, by ſeparating her ſelf from that Romiſh Synagogue; but having her Spirits revived, and her Eyes opened, by the light of the heavenly Word, did caſt forth that tyranny of Antichriſt, with his abominable Idolatry, Hereſies, and falſe Worſhip, and ſought to bring all her Children unto the right Faith, and true Service of God, and ſo is a purer, and more faithful Church than before. Others add, That the Laws of Chriſtian Princes have been a means to bring Men to the outward Society of the Church, and ſo to make a viſible Church: Neither were ſufficient means wanting, in our caſe, for the due conviction of Mens Minds; but then they add, That the Queſtion muſt not be, Whether the means uſed were the right means, for the calling and converting a People to the Faith; but, whether Queen Elizabeth took a lawful courſe for re-calling, and re-uniting of Her Subjects unto thoſe true Profeſſors, whoſe fellowſhip they had forſaken; which they juſtifie by the Examples of Jehoſhaphat, and Joſiah, Aſa, and Hezekiah.

Grave Confutation, &c. p. 9, 10, 11.

II. That we communicate together in a falſe and idolatrous Worſhip of God, which is polluted with reading ſtinted Prayers, uſing popiſh Ceremonies, &c.

To this they anſwer,

Grave Confutation, &c. p. 12, 13, 15.

1. That it is evident by the Word, That the Church hath uſed, and might lawfully uſe, in God's Worſhip, and Prayer, a ſtinted Form of Words; and that not only upon ordinary, but extraordinary occaſions, which requires an extraordinary and ſpecial fervency of Spirit. Nay, they ſay, They are ſo far from thinking them unlawful, that in the ordinary and general occaſions of the Church, they are many times more fit, than thoſe which are called conceived Prayers.

Ibid.

2. If Forms, thus deviſed by Men be lawful and profitable, what ſin can it be for the Governours of the Church, to command that ſuch Forms be uſed; or, for us, that are perſuaded of the lawfulneſs of them to uſe them? unleſs they will ſay, That therefore it is unlawful for us to hear the Word, receive the Sacraments, believe the Trinity, and all other Articles of Faith, becauſe we are commanded by the Magiſtrates ſo to do; whereas indeed, we ought the rather to do good things, that are agreeable unto the Word, when we know them alſo to be commanded by the Magiſtrate.

Ball againſt Can, Part 2. p. 8.

3. It is true, the Non-conformiſts ſay, The Liturgy is in great part picked and culled out of the Maſs-Book; but it followeth not thence, that either it is, or was eſteemed by them a deviſed or falſe Worſhip; for many things contained in the Maſs-Book it ſelf are good and holy. A Pearl may be found upon a Dunghil; we cannot more credit the Man of Sin, than to ſay, That every thing in the Maſs-Book is Deviliſh and Antichriſtian, for then it would be Antichriſtian to pray unto God in the mediation of Jeſus Chriſt, to read the Scriptures, to profeſs many fundamental Truths neceſſary to Salvation. Our Service might be picked and culled out of the Maſs-Book, and yet be free from all fault and tincture, from all ſhew and appearance of evil; though the Maſs-Book it ſelf was fraught with all manner of abominations——— But if it be wholly taken out of the Maſs-Book, how comes it to have thoſe things which are ſo directly contrary to the Maſs, that both cannot poſſibly ſtand together? Yea, ſo many Points, ſaith Ball, are there taught directly contrary to the foundation of Popery, that it is not poſſible Popery ſhould ſtand, if they take place. And, ſaith he, it is more proper to ſay, the Maſs was added to our Common-Prayer, than that our Common-Prayer was taken out of the Maſs-Book; for moſt things in our Common-Prayer, were to be found in the Liturgies of the Church, long before the Maſs was heard of in the world.

4. As to the Faſts, and Feaſts, and Ceremonies retained, they anſwer, That what was Antichriſtian in them, was the Doctrine upon which thoſe practices were built in the Church of Rome, which being taken away by the Reformation, the things themſelves are not Antichriſtian. As namely, ſaith Gifford, the remiſſion of Sins, and merit of eternal Life by faſting, which is the Doctrine of the Romiſh Church; the worſhip and invocation of Saints and Angels; the power of expelling Devils by the ſign of the Croſs, and ſuch like things, which the Papacy is full of, but rejected by us.

Gifford's Plain Declaration, &c. Preface. Anſwer to the Browniſts, p. 10, 11.

III. That our Miniſtry was Antichriſtian. To this they anſwer.

1. That Antichriſt is deſcribed in Scripture, not by his unlawful outward Calling, or Office, that he ſhould exerciſe in the Church; but, Firſt, by the falſe Doctrine he ſhould teach; and, Secondly, by the Authority he ſhould uſurp, to give Laws to Mens Conſciences, and to rule in the Hearts of Men as God. Which two Marks of Antichriſt, as they may evidently be diſcerned in the Papacy, ſo admit all the outward Callings and Offices in the Church of England exerciſed, were faulty, and unwarrantable by the Word, yet you in your own Conſcience know, that theſe Marks of Antichriſt cannot be found among the worſt of our Miniſters. For neither do the Laws of our Church allow any to teach falſe Doctrine; and we all profeſs Chriſt to be the only Law-giver to Conſcience; neither is any thing among us urged to be done, upon pain of damnation, but only the Word and Law of God.

Mr. Arthur Hilderſham's Letter againſt Separation, §. 2. highly commended by Mr. J. Cotton, in his Preface before his Commentaries on 4 John.

2. That the Office, which our Laws call the Office of Prieſthood, is the very ſame in ſubſtance with the Paſtor's Office deſcribed in the Word; and the manner of outward Calling unto that Office, which the Law alloweth, is the very ſame in ſubſtance which is ſet down in the Word. Doth the Word enjoin the Miniſter to teach diligently? ſo, by our Laws, he is expreſly charged at his Ordination to do, and forbidden to teach any thing, as required of neceſſity to ſalvation, but that which he is perſuaded may be concluded and proved by the Scripture; yea, it commandeth him, with all faithful diligence, to baniſh and drive away all erroneous and ſtrange Doctrines, that are contrary to God's Word. Doth the Word authoriſe him to adminiſter the Sacraments? So doth our Law. Doth the Word require that the Miniſter ſhould not only publickly teach, but alſo overſee, and look to the Peoples Converſation; exhorting, admoniſhing, reproving, comforting them as well privately as publickly? So doth our Law. Laſtly, Doth the Word authoriſe the Miniſter to execute the Cenſures and Diſcipline of Chriſt? our Law doth alſo command the ſame. So that, although many, to whom the execution of theſe things appertain, do grievouſly fail in the practice thereof, yet you ſee the Office which the Law enjoineth to the Miniſter, is the ſame in ſubſtance, with that which the Word layeth upon him. Tell us not then, That the ſame name is given to our Office, as to the Popiſh Sacrificers. Do you think the worſe of your ſelf, becauſe you are called Browniſts? And, ſhall the holy Office and Calling, which is ſo agreeable to the Word, be miſliked, becauſe it is called a Prieſthood? conſidering, that though it agree in name, yet it differeth in nature and ſubſtance, as much from the Romiſh Prieſthood, as Light doth from Darkneſs.

Id. §. 6, 7, 8. V. Bradſhaw's Anſwer to Johnſon.

IV. That Diſcipline is wanting in our Church. To which they anſwer.

Hilderſham's Letter, §. 3. 1. That the want or neglect of ſome of thoſe Ordinances of Chriſt, which concern the Diſcipline of his Church, and the outward calling of his Miniſters, is no ſuch ſin, as can make either the Miniſters, or Governours of our Church Antichriſt, or our Church an Antichriſtian and falſe Church. And Mr. H. adds, That no one place of Scripture can be found, wherein he is called an Antichriſt, or Antichriſtian, who holding the truth of Doctrine, and profeſſing thoſe Articles of Religion that are fundamental, as we do, doth ſwerve either in Judgment or Practice, from that Rule, which Chriſt hath given for the Diſcipline of his Church. Neither can you find any Antichriſt mentioned in Scripture, whoſe Doctrine is ſound. If then the Doctrine of our Church be ſound, what warrant have you to call us Antichriſts? If our Paſtors offer to lead you unto ſalvation, through no other door than Chriſt, how dare you, that ſay you are Chriſt's, refuſe to be guided by them? If our Aſſemblies be built upon that Rock, how can you deny them to be true Churches?

Grave Confutation, &c. p. 17. 2. That the Subſtance of Diſcipline is preſerved among us, in which they reckon preaching of the Word, and adminiſtration of Sacraments, as well as the Cenſures of Admonition, Suſpenſion, Excommunication, and Proviſion for the neceſſity of the Poor; which, ſay they, by Law, ought to be in all our Aſſemblies, and therefore we cannot juſtly be ſaid to be without the Diſcipline of Chriſt; but rather, that we having the Diſcipline of Chriſt, which is moſt ſubſtantial, do want the other, and ſo exerciſe it not rightly, that is to ſay, not by thoſe Officers which Chriſt hath appointed. And farther they add, That the Laws of our Land do authoriſe the Miniſter to ſtay from the Lord's-Table, all ſuch as are uncatechiſed, and out of Charity, or any otherwiſe publick offenders, as appeareth in the Rubrick before the Communion, and in that which is after Confirmation.

Gifford's Anſwer to the Brow-niſts, p. 47.

Grave Confutation, &c. p. 18. 3. That although it were granted, That we wanted both the exerciſe of the Church's Cenſures, and ſome of thoſe Officers which Chriſt hath appointed to exerciſe them by, yet might we be a true Church notwithſtanding; as there was a true Church in Judah all the days of Aſa and Jehoſaphat, yet was not the Diſcipline reformed there till the latter end of Jehoſhaphat's Reign. The Church of Corinth was a true Church, even when the Apoſtle blamed them for want of Diſcipline. The Congregation at Samaria is called a Church, before the Diſcipline was eſtabliſhed there. And even in Jeruſalem there was a famous viſible Church of Chriſt long before ſundry parts of the Diſcipline, (for want whereof they condemn us) were eſtabliſhed there; yea, it is evident, that by the Apoſtles themſelves, divers Churches were gathered, ſome good ſpace of time, before the Diſcipline was ſettled, or exerciſed; by all which it is manifeſt, that how neceſſary ſoever thoſe parts of the Diſcipline (which we want) be, to the beauty, and well-being, or preſervation of the Church, yet are they not neceſſary to the being thereof, but a true Church may be without them.

Acts 8. 12, 19, 31.

4. That it doth not belong to private Perſons to ſet up the Diſcipline of the Church, againſt the will and conſent of the Chriſtian Magiſtrate, and Governours of the Church: Nay, they declare, that in ſo doing, they ſhould highly offend God. Giffard ſaith, That the Fetters and Chains can no faſter bind the hands and feet of Browniſts, than the hands of private Men are bound with the bands of Conſcience, and the fear of God, from preſuming to take upon them publick Authority. And if all the Browniſts in the Land ſhould come together, and chuſe a Miniſter, and ordain him, it would make him no more a Miniſter before God, than if all the Apprentices in London, taking upon them to chuſe a Lord Mayor, and miniſter an Oath unto him, ſhould make him a Lord Mayor. But of this, more afterwards.

Giffard's Anſwer, p. 59, 95, 100, 101, 102.

V. That the Miniſters of our Church ſtand under (as they ſpeak) an Antichriſtian Hierarchy. To which they anſwer, Firſt, They deny that our Biſhops can be called Antichriſtian, ſince they do, and by the Laws of the Land ought to hold and teach all Doctrines that are fundamental; yea, ſome of them have learnedly and ſoundly maintained the Truth againſt Hereticks, that have gainſay'd it; ſome have not only by their Doctrine and Miniſtry converted many to the Truth, but have ſuffered perſecution for the Goſpel.

Grave Confutation, &c. p. 19.

Secondly, Suppoſing it were an Antichriſtian Yoke, which they deny; yet this doth not deſtroy the being of a true Church, or Miniſtry under it. Since both the Jewiſh and Chriſtian Churches, have frequently born ſuch a Yoke, and yet have been the true Churches of God ſtill.

Thirdly, That there is nothing unlawful, or Antichriſtian in the Office of Biſhops, if they conſider them as the King's Viſitors and Commiſſioners, to ſee that the Paſtors do their duties. And that this cannot deſtroy the nature of a viſible Church, to caſt many particular Churches, under one Provincial, or Dioceſan Government. Yea, Mr. Bradſhaw undertakes to prove this, not only lawful, but expedient, to that degree, that he thinks the Magiſtrate cannot well diſcharge his duty, as to the Overſight and Government of the Churches within his dominions, without it, as is implied in the ſeven Quæries he propounds to Fr. Johnſon about it. But ſuppoſing them to be Paſtors of the Churches under them, this, ſaith he, doth not overthrow the Office of Paſtors to particular Congregations, ſo long as under them they perform the main and ſubſtantial duties of true Paſtors, which all the Miniſters of our Church-Aſſemblies do, and by the Laws ought to do.

Theſe Particulars I have laid together with all poſſible brevity and clearneſs, from the Authors of beſt reputation on both ſides, that we might have a diſtinct view of the State of the Controverſie about Separation, between the old Non-conformiſts, and the Separatiſts of that time.

Sect. 12. But before we come to our preſent Times, we muſt conſider the alteration that was made in the State of this Controverſie, by thoſe who were called Independents, and pretended to come off from the Principles of Browniſm, or rigid Separation.

And here I ſhall give an account of the Progreſs of the Courſe of Separation, or the Steps by which it was carried on, and how it came at laſt to ſettle in the Congregational Way, and what the true State of the difference was, between the Aſſembly of Divines, and the Diſſenting Brethren, and how far the Reaſons, then uſed, will hold againſt the preſent Separation.

Stephen Offwood's Advertiſement to John Decleluſe and H. May, p. 10, 39.

When thoſe who were called Browniſts, for the freer exerciſe of their new Church way, withdrew into the Low-Countries, they immediately fell into ſtrange Factions and Diviſions among themſelves, A. D. 1582. Robert Brown, accompanied with Harriſon, a School-Maſter, and about fifty or ſixty Perſons, went over to Middleburgh, and there they choſe Harriſon Paſtor, and Brown Teacher. They had not been there three Months, but upon the falling out between Brown and Harriſon, Brown forſakes them, and returns for England, and ſubſcribes, promiſing to the Archbiſhop, to live obediently to his Commands. Concerning whom, Harriſon writes to a Friend in London, in theſe words, Indeed the Lord hath made a breach among us for our ſins, which hath made us unworthy to bear his great and worthy Cauſe. Mr. Brown hath caſt us off, and that with open, manifeſt, and notable Treacheries; and if I ſhould declare them, you could not believe me. Only this I teſtifie unto you, that I am well able to prove, that Cain dealt not ſo ill with his Brother Abel, as he hath dealt with me.

Defence of the Admon. to the Followers of Brown, p. 127.

Some of the words of Brown's Subſcription were theſe, I do humbly ſubmit my ſelf to be at my Lord of Canterbury's Commandment, whoſe Authority, under Her Majeſty, I will never reſiſt, or deprave, by the Grace of God, &c. But, being a Man of a reſtleſs and factious Temper, no Promiſes, or Subſcriptions could keep him within due bounds, as one who lived at that time hath fully diſcovered.

For, although he promiſed to frequent our Churches, and to come to Prayers and Sacraments, yet, living School-Maſter at St. Olave's in Southwark for two years, in all that time he never did it; and when he was like to have been queſtion'd for it, he withdrew into another Pariſh. Sometimes he would go to hear Sermons, but that he accounted no act of Communion; and declared to his Friends, That he thought it not unlawful to hear our Sermons, and therefore perſuaded his Followers in London ſo to do. Notwithſtanding this he preached in private Meetings, and that in the time of pubick Aſſemblies, when he thought fit; which this Author, though a Non-conformiſt, and Friend of T. C's, calls a curſed Conventicle; who ſets forth at large his ſtrange Jugglings, and Jeſuitical Equivocations in his Subſcription.

By the Biſhop's Authority, he ſaid he meant only his Civil Authority; by declaring the Church of England to be the Church of God, he underſtood the Church of his own ſetting up; by frequenting our Aſſemblies according to Law, he meant, the Law of God, and not of the Land; he declared, his Child was baptized according to Law, but then told his Followers, it was done without his conſent.

Counterpoyſon, p. 25. Cotton's Anſwer to R. Williams, p. 122.

Mr. Cotton, of New England, hath this Paſſage concerning Brown. The firſt Inventor of that way which is called Browniſm, from whom the Sect took its Name, fell back from his own way, to take a Parſonage called Achurch, God ſo, in a ſtrange (yet wiſe) Providence, ordering it, that he, who had utterly renounced all the Churches in England, as no Church, ſhould afterwards accept of one Pariſh-Church among them, and it called A Church. But upon the Diſſention at Middleburgh, between Brown and Harriſon, that Congregation ſoon broke to pieces. Ainſworth cannot deny the early Diſſentions between Brown and Harriſon, Brown and Barrow, Barrow and Fr. Johnſon; but he reckons up all the differences in Scripture, from Cain and Abel downwards to juſtifie theirs; notwithſtanding, as Dr. O. well obſerves, We are to diſtinguiſh between what falls out through the Paſſions of Men, and what follows from the nature of the thing.

Offwood's Advertiſement, p. 15.

But one of their own Party at Amſterdam takes notice of a third Cauſe of theſe Diſſentions, viz. the Judgment of God upon them. I do ſee, ſaith he, the hand of God is heavy upon them, blinding their Minds, and hardening their Hearts, that they do not ſee his Truth, ſo that they are at wars among themſelves, and they are far from that true peace of God which followeth Holineſs.

There were two great Signs of this hand of God upon them.

Firſt, Their invincible Obſtinacy.

Secondly, The ſcandalous Breaches which followed ſtill one upon the other, as long as the courſe of Separation continued, and were only ſometimes hindred from ſhewing themſelves, by their not being let looſe upon each other, for then the Firebrands ſoon appear, which at other times they endeavour to cover.

Their great Obſtinacy appears, by the execution of Barrow and Greenwood, who being condemned for ſeditious Books, could no ways be reclaimed; rather chuſing to die, than to renounce the Principles of Separation. But Penry, who ſuffered on the ſame account about that time, had more relenting in him, as to the buſineſs of Separation. For Mr. J. Cotton, of New-England, relates this Story of him, from the Mouth of Mr. Hilderſham, an eminent Non-conformiſt, that he confeſſed, He deſerved death at the Queen's hand, for that he had ſeduced many of Her loyal Subjects to a ſeparation, from hearing the word of Life in the Pariſh Churches; which though himſelf had learned to diſcover the evil of, yet he could never prevail to recover divers of Her Subjects, whom he had ſeduced, and therefore the Blood of their Souls was now juſtly required at his hands. Theſe are Mr. Cotton's own words. Concerning Barrow, he reports, from Mr. Dod's Mouth, that when he ſtood under the Gibbet, he lift up his eyes, and ſaid, Lord, if I be deceived, thou haſt deceived me. And ſo being ſtopt by the hand of God, he was not able to proceed to ſpeak any thing to purpoſe more, either to the glory of God, or edification of the People. Theſe Executions extremely ſtartled the Party, and away goes Francis Johnſon with his Company to Amſterdam; Johnſon chargeth Ainſworth and his Party with Anabaptiſm, and want of Humility and due Obedience to Government. In ſhort, they fell to pieces, ſeparating from each others Communion; ſome ſay, they formally excommunicated each other; but Mr. Cotton will not allow that, but, he ſaith, they only withdrew: Yet thoſe who were Members of the Church do ſay, that Mr. Johnſon, and his company were accurſed and avoided by Mr. Ainſworth and his company, and Mr. A. and his company, were rejected and avoided by Mr. Johnſon and his: And one Church received the Perſons excommunicated by the other, and ſo became ridiculous to Spectators, as ſome of themſelves confeſſed. Johnſon, and his Party, charged the other with Schiſm in ſeparating from them: But, as others ſaid, who returned to our Church, Is it a greater Sin in them to leave the Communion of Mr. Johnſon, than for him to refuſe and avoid the communion of all true Churches beſide? But the difference went ſo high, that Johnſon would admit none of Ainſworth's company without Re-baptizing them; Ainſworth, on the other ſide, charged them with woful Apoſtaſie: And one of his own company ſaid, That he lived and died in contentions. When Robinſon went from Leyden, on purpoſe to end theſe Differences, he complained very much of the diſorderly and tumultuous carriage of the People; which, with Mr. Ainſworth's maintenance, was an early diſcovery of the great excellency of popular Church-Government. Smith, who ſet up another ſeparate Congregation, was Johnſon's Pupil, and went over, in hopes, ſaith Mr. Cotton, to have gained his Tutor from the Errors of his rigid ſeparation;

tion; but he was ſo far from that, that he ſoon outwent him; and he charges the other ſeparate Congregations with ſome of the very ſame Faults which they had found in the Church of England, viz. (1.) Idolatrous Worſhip, for if they charged the Church of England with Idolatry, in reading of Prayers, he thought them equally guilty in looking on their Bibles, in preaching and ſinging. (2.) Antichriſtian Government, in adding the human Inventions of Doctors, and ruling Elders; which was pulling down one Antichriſt, to ſet up another; and if one was the Beaſt, the other was the Image of the Beaſt. Being therefore unſatisfied with all Churches, he began one wholly new, and therefore baptiz'd himſelf. For, he declared, There was no one true Ordinance with the other Separatiſts. But this new Church was of ſhort continuance, for, upon his death, it dwindled away, or was ſwallowed up in the common Gulf of Anabaptiſm. And now one would have thought here had been an end of Separation; and ſo in all probability there had, had not Mr. Robinſon of Leyden abated much of the Rigor of it, for he aſſerted, The lawfulneſs of communicating with the Church of England in the Word and Prayer, but not in Sacraments and Diſcipline. The former he defended in a Diſcourſe between Ainſworth and him. So that the preſent Separatiſts, who deny that, are gone beyond him, and are fallen back to the Principles of the Rigid Separation. Robinſon ſucceeded (though not immediately) Jacob, in his Congregation at Leyden, whom ſome make the Father of Independency. But from part of Mr. Robinſon's Church, it ſpread into New-England; for Mr. Cotton ſaith, They went over thither, in their Church-State to Plymouth; and that Model was followed by other Churches there; at Salem, Boſton, Watertown, &c. Yet Mr. Cotton profeſſeth, That Robinſon's denial of the Pariſhional Churches in England to be true Churches, (either by reaſon of their mixt corrupt matter, or for defect in their Covenant, or for exceſs in their Epiſcopal Government) was never received into any heart, from thence to infer a nullity of their Church-State. And in his Anſwer to Mr. Roger Williams, he hath theſe words, That upon due conſideration he cannot find, that the Principles and Grounds of Reformation do neceſſarily conclude a Separation from the Engliſh Churches, as falſe Churches; from their Miniſtry as a falſe Miniſtry; from their Worſhip as a falſe Worſhip; from all their Profeſſors as no viſible Saints: Nor can I find, that they do either neceſſarily, or probably conclude a Separation from hearing the Word preached by godly Miniſters in the Pariſh Churches in England. Mr. R. Williams urged Mr. Cotton with an apparent inconſiſtency between theſe Principles and his own Practice; for although he pretended to own the Pariſh Churches as true Churches, yet by his actual Separation from them, he ſhewed that really he did not; and he adds, that Separation did naturally follow from the old Puritan Principles, ſaying, That Mr. Can hath unanſwerably proved, That the Grounds and Principles of the Puritans againſt Biſhops and Ceremonies, and profaneneſs of People profeſſing Chriſt, and the neceſſity of Chriſt's Flock and Diſciples, muſt neceſſarily, if truly followed, lead on to, and inforce a ſeparation. Notwithſtanding all this, Mr. Cotton doth aſſert the lawfulneſs of hearing Engliſh Preachers in our Pariſh Churches; but then, he ſaith, there is no Church communion in hearing, but only in giving the Seals. Mr. Williams urgeth, That there is communion in Doctrine, and fellowſhip of the Goſpel. Upon which, Mr. Cotton grants, That though a Man may join in hearing, and prayer, before and after Sermon, yet not as in a Church-ſtate. Yet, after all, he will not deny our Churches to be true Churches.

But, if they remain true Churches, it appears from the former Diſcourſe, they can never juſtifie Separation from them, upon the Principles of either Party. So that though thoſe of the Congregational Way ſeem to be more moderate, ~~as to~~ ſome of their Principles, than the old rigid Separatiſts; yet they do not conſider, that by this means they make their Separation more inexcuſable. The Diſſenting Brethren, in their Apologetical Narration, to avoid the imputation of Browniſm, deliver this as their Judgment, concerning our Parochial Churches. And for our own Congregations, viz. of England, we have this ſincere Profeſſion to make before God, and all the World, that all that Conſcience of the Defilements, we conceived to cleave to the true Worſhip of God in them, or of the unwarranted Power in Church Governours exerciſed therein, did never work in us any other thought, much leſs opinion, but that multitudes of the Aſſemblies, and Parochial Congregations thereof, were the true Churches and Body of Chriſt, and the Miniſtery thereof a true Miniſtery; much leſs did it ever enter into our hearts, to judge them Antichriſtian; we ſaw, and cannot but ſee, that by the ſame reaſon, the Churches abroad in Scotland, Holland, &c. (though more reformed) yet for their mixture, muſt be in like manner judged no Churches alſo; which, to imagine, or conceive, is, and hath ever been an horror to our thoughts. Yea, we have always profeſſed, and that in thoſe times when the Churches of England were the moſt, either actually overſpread with defilements, or in the greateſt danger thereof; and when our ſelves had leaſt, yea no hopes of ever ſo much as viſiting our own Land again in peace and ſafety to our Perſons, that we both did and would hold communion with them as the Church of Chriſt. This is a very fair Confeſſing from the Diſſenting Brethren; but then the difficulty returns with greater force, How comes Separation from theſe Churches to be lawful? If they had gone upon the Browniſts Principles, all the Diſpute had been about the truth or falſhood of them; but their truth being ſuppoſed, the neceſſity of Separation followed; whereas now, upon altering the State of the Controverſie by the Independents, though their Principles ſeem more moderate, yet their Practice is more unreaſonable. It is therefore a vain pretence uſed at this day, to juſtifie the Separation, that they do not deny our Churches to be true Churches, and that therein they differ from the old Separatiſts: It is true, in that opinion they do, but in Separation they agree, which is the more unjuſtifiable in them, ſince they yield ſo much to our Churches. And yet herein, whatever they pretend, they do not exceed their Independent Brethren, whoſe Separation themſelves condemned. But the Presbyterians were then unſatisfied with this Declaration of the Diſſenting Brethren, and thought it did not ſufficiently clear them from the charge of Browniſm, becauſe, (1.) They agreed with the old Separatiſts in the main Principle of popular Church Government, which, they ſay, is inconſiſtent with the civil Peace, as may be ſeen, ſay they, in the Quarrels both at Amſterdam, and Rotterdam, and the Law-Suits depending before the Magiſtrates there. (2.) They overthrow the Bounds of Parochial Churches, as the Separatiſts did, and think ſuch a Confinement unlawful. (3.) They make true Saintſhip the neceſſary Qualification of Church Members, as the Separatiſts did: Whereby, ſay they, they confound the viſible and inviſible Church, and make the ſame eſſential form of both. (4.) They renounce the Ordination received in our Church, but all the allowance they make of a true Miniſtery, is, by vertue of an explicit or implicit Call, grounded on the Peoples explicit or implicit Covenant with ſuch a Man as their Paſtor.

Anatomy of Independency, p. 18, 19, 20, &c.

For when they firſt began to ſet up a Congregational Church, after the new Model, at Rotterdam, Ward was choſen Paſtor, and Bridge Teacher, but they both renounced their Ordination in England; and ſome ſay, They ordained one another; others, That they had no other Ordination, than what the Congregation gave them.

Sect. 13. And now, new Congregations began to ſet up in Holland, upon theſe Principles; but they again fell into Diviſions as great as the former. Simpſon renouncing his Ordination, was admitted a private Member of the Church at Rotterdam; but he grew ſoon unſatisfied with the Orders of that Church, and thought too great a Reſtraint was laid upon the private Members, as to the exerciſe of Propheſying; and ſo he, and thoſe who joyned with him, complaining of the Miſchief of Impoſitions, were ready for a Separation, if that reſtraint were not ſpeedily removed. Mr. Bridge yields to the thing, but not as to the time, viz. On the Lord's Day after Sermon; this gives no ſatisfaction, for they muſt have their will in every thing, or elſe they will never ceaſe complaining of the Miſchief of Impoſitions. And ſo Mr. Simpſon, and his Party, ſet up a new Church of their own: Which J. Goodwin doth not deny; for Mr. Simpſon, ſaith he, upon diſlike of ſome perſons and things in that Church, whereof Mr. Bridge was Paſtor, might ſeek and make a departure from it. But were theſe Churches quiet, after this Separation made? So far from it, that the contentions and ſlanders were no leſs grievous, ſaith Baylie, than thoſe of Amſterdam, betwixt Ainſworth and Johnſon's followers. But did not Mr. Bridge's Church continue in great quietneſs? No, but inſtead of that, they were ſo full of Bitterneſs, Reproaches, and hard Cenſures, that Mr. Bridge often declared, if he had known at firſt, what he met with afterwards, he would never have come amongſt them, nor being amongſt them, have given them ſuch ſcope and liberty, as he had. It ſeems at laſt, he came to apprehend the neceſſity of Impoſitions, and the miſchief of a ſeparating dividing humor. But the People having the Power in their hands, were reſolved to ſhew, that they held it not in vain: for Mr. Ward, had it ſeems given Offence to ſome of the Congregation, by preaching the ſame Sermons there, which he had preached before at Norwich; this, and ſome other frivolous things, were thought intolerable Impoſitions; and therefore againſt the Will of Mr. Bridge, they depoſe Mr. Ward from his Miniſtery. This being a freſh diſcovery of the great inconveniency of popular Church Government, gave a mighty alarm to the Brethren: which occaſion'd a Meeting of the Meſſengers from other Churches (as they called them) for cloſing up of this wound; but they durſt not ſearch deep into it, but only ſkinn'd it over, to prevent the great reproach and ſcandal of it. From theſe things, the Preſbyterians inferred the neceſſity of civil Authorities interpoſing, and of not leaving all to Conſcience. For, ſay they, Conſcience hath been long urging the taking away that Scandal occaſion'd at Rotterdam by that Schiſm, where divers Members left the one Church, and joyned to the other ſo diſorderly, wherein even the Rulers of one Church had a deep Charge; yet as that could not then be prevented, ſo there had been many Meetings, Sermons, and all means uſed to preſs the Conſcience of taking it off, by a Re-union of the Churches, and yet the way to do it could never be found, till the Magiſtrates Authority and Command found it. Theſe things I have more fully deduced; not as though bare Diſſentions in a Church were an Argument of it ſelf againſt it; but, to ſhew (1.) That popular Church Government naturally leads to Diviſions, and leaves them without Remedy;

dy; and (2.) That humerous and factious people will always complain of the Miſchief of Impoſitions, though the things be never ſo juſt and reaſonable; and (3.) That this Principle of Liberty of Conſcience, will unavoidably lead Men into confuſion: For when Men once break the Rules of Order and Government in a Church, they run down the Hill, and tumble down all before them. If Men complain of the Miſchief of our Impoſitions, the Members of their own Churches, may on the ſame grounds, complain of theirs; and as the Preſbyterians cannot anſwer the Independents, as to the Pretence of Conſcience; ſo it is impoſſible for either, or both of them, to anſwer the Anabaptiſts, who have as juſt a Plea for Separation from them, as they can have from the Church of England.

Sect. 14. From hence we find, that, although the Pretence of the Diſſenting Brethren ſeemed very modeſt, as to themſelves; yet they going upon a common Principle of Liberty of Conſcience, the Preſbyterians charged them with being the Occaſion of that horrible Inundation of Errors and Schiſms, which immediately overſpread this City and Nation: which I ſhall briefly repreſent in the words of the moſt eminent Preſbyterians of that time. Thence Dr. A. Stuart, a zealous Scotch Preſbyterian. ſaid, That he verily believed, Independency cannot but prove the Root of all Schiſms and Hereſies: Yea, I add, ſaith he, That by conſequence, it is much worſe than Popery.

Duply to M.S. p. 53.

Thence the Scotch Commiſſioners, in the firſt place, preſſed, Uniformity in Religion, as the only means to preſerve Peace, and to prevent many Diviſions and Troubles; a thing very becoming the King to promote, according to the practice of the good Kings of Judah; and a thing which, they ſay, all ſound Divines and Politicians are for.

Dr. Corn. Burgeſs told the Houſe of Commons, That our Church was laid waſte, and expoſed to confuſion, under the plauſible Pretence of not forcing Mens Conſciences: and that, to put all Men into a courſe of Order and Uniformity, in God's way, is not to force the Conſcience; but to ſet up God in his due place, and to bring all his People into the paths of righteouſneſs and life.

Serm.* Nov. 8. 1641.

The Errors and Innovations, under which we groaned ſo much of later years, ſaith Mr. Caſe, were but Tolerabiles ineptiæ, Tolerable Trifles, Childrens Play, compared with theſe damnable Doctrines, Doctrines of Devils, as the Apoſtle calls them: Polygamy, Arbitrary Divorce, Mortality of the Soul; no Miniſtry, no Churches, no Ordinances, no Scripture, &c. And the very foundation of all theſe laid in ſuch a Schiſm of boundleſs Liberty of Conſcience, and ſuch Lawleſs Separation of Churches, &c.

Serm. before the Com.* Feb. 19. 1645.

The famous City of London is become an Amſterdam, ſaith Mr. Calamy, Separation from our Churches is countenanced, Toleration is cried up, Authority aſleep. It would ſeem a wonder, if I ſhould reckon how many ſeparate Congregations, or rather Segregations there are in the City; what Churches againſt Churches, &c. Hereby the hearts of the People are mightily diſtracted, many are hindred from Converſion, and even the Godly themſelves have loſt much of the Power of Godlineſs in their Lives. The Lord keep us, ſaith he, from being poyſoned with ſuch an Error as that of an unlimited Toleration. A Doctrine that overthroweth all Church-Government, bringeth in Confuſion, and openeth a wide door unto all Irreligion and Atheiſm.

Serm. before the Lord Mayor,* Jan. 14. 1645.

Serm. before the Parliament, Sept. 12. 1644.

Diverſity of Religion, ſaith Mr. Matthew Newcomen, diſjoynts and diſtracts the Minds of Men, and is the Seminary of perpetual Hatreds, Jealouſies, Seditions, Wars, if any thing in the World be; and in a little time, either a Schiſm in the State begets a Schiſm in the Church, or a Schiſm in the Church begets a Schiſm in the State: i. e. either Religion in the Church is prejudiced by civil Contentions, or Church-Controverſies and Diſputes about Opinions break out into civil Wars. Men will at laſt take up Swords and Spears in ſtead of Pens; and defend that by Arms which they cannot do by Arguments.

Theſe may ſerve for a Taſte of the Senſe of ſome of the moſt eminent Preſbyterian Divines at that time, concerning the dangerous effects of that Toleration which their independent Brethren deſired.

The diſſenting Brethren finding themſelves thus loaden with ſo many reproaches, and particularly with being the Occaſion of ſo many Errors and Schiſms, publiſhed their Apologetical Narration in Vindication of themſelves, wherein (as is ſaid before) they endeavour to purge themſelves from the Imputation of Browniſm; declaring, That they looked on ſome of our Churches as true Churches, and our Miniſtery, as a true Miniſtery; but yet they earneſtly deſire liberty, as to the peaceable practice of their own way.

Obſervations and Annotations on the Apologetical Narration, p. 17.

To this the Preſbyterians anſwered,

Firſt, That they did not underſtand by them, in what Senſe they allowed our Churches to be true Churches.

Secondly, If they did, what Neceſſity there was for any Separation, or what need of Toleration.

As to the Senſe in which they owned our Churches to be true Churches; either they underſtood it of a bare Metaphyſical Verity, as many of our Divines, ſay they, grant it to the Romiſh Church; that ſhe is a true Church, as a rotten infectious Strumpet is a true Woman; and then they thank them for their Favour, that they hold our Churches in the ſame Category with Rome: or elſe they underſtand it in a moral ſenſe for ſound and pure Churches, and then, ſay they, Why do ye not joyn with us, and Communicate as Brethren? Why deſire ye a Toleration? Yes, ſay the Diſſenting Brethren, we own you to be true Churches, and Communicate with you in Doctrine. To which the others reply'd, If you own it by external Act of Communion, ye muſt Communicate with us in Sacraments: but this ye refuſe; therefore ye muſt return to the old Principles of Separation. For where there was ſuch a refuſal of Communion, as there was in them towards all Churches beſides their own, there muſt lie at the bottom the ſame Principle of Separation which was in the Browniſts. And, as Mr. Newcomen urged them, their agreeing with us in Doctrines that are fundamental, their holding one Head, and one Faith, doth not excuſe them from being guilty of breach of Unity, and downright Schiſm, as long as they hold not one Body, one Baptiſm. For when Men make different Aſſemblies, and Congregations, and draw Men into Parties, it is not their owning the ſame Doctrine doth excuſe them from Schiſm, as he proves from St. Auguſtin and Beza. Of which afterwards.

Sermon at St. Paul's, Feb. 8. 1645. p. 41.

But ſtill they denied themſelves to be Browniſts, or rigid Separatiſts, becauſe they ſeparated from our Congregations as no Churches, and from the Ordinances diſpenſed as Antichriſtians and from our People as no viſible Chriſtians.

To which the other replyed, That there was always a Difference among the Separatiſts themſelves, ſome being more rigid than others; and as to the laſt Clauſe, none ſince Barrow had owned it. But, for the reſt, only putting Unlawful for Antichriſtian; and by Ordinances, underſtanding Church-Ordinances, they own the very ſame Principles as the others did. And although in words they ſeem to own our Parochial Congregations to be true Churches; yet having the ſame Opinions with the more moderate Browniſts, touching Church-Conſtitution, Matter, Form, Power, Government, Communion, Corruptions, &c. The conſequence muſt be, ſay they, that we have no true Churches, and that our Ordinances are all unlawful. And the leſs cauſe they have to plead for their Separation, by acknowledging our Churches to be true Churches, their Separation is ſo much the more culpable, and the groſſer and more inexcuſable the Schiſm. For, it is a greater ſin, ſaith Bayly, to depart from a Church, which I profeſs to be true, and whoſe Miniſtry I acknowledge to be ſaving, than from a Church which I conceive to be falſe, and whoſe Miniſters I take to have no calling from God; nor any Bleſſing from his hand.

Narrative of New-England, &c. Poſt-ſcript, p. 52.

So that the Independents were then charged with Schiſm for theſe two things.

Firſt, For refuſing Communion with thoſe Churches, which they confeſſed to be true Churches. For, ſay the Members of the Aſſembly, Thus to depart from true Churches, is not to hold Communion with them as ſuch; but rather by departing, to declare them not to be ſuch.

Papers for Accommod. p. 47.

Secondly, For ſetting up different Congregations, where they confeſſed there was an Agreement in Doctrine.

Sect. 15. But becauſe ſome Men are ſo unwilling to underſtand the true State of this Controverſie about Separation, between the Divines of the Aſſembly, and the Independents, I ſhall here give a fuller account of it from the Debates between them.

The deſire of the Independents, as it was propoſed by themſelves at the Committee for Accommodation, Dec. 4. 1645. was this,

That they may not be forced to Communicate as Members in thoſe Pariſhes where they dwell; but may have liberty to have Congregations of ſuch Perſons who give good Teſtimonies of their Godlineſs, and yet out of tenderneſs of Conſcience, cannot Communicate in their Pariſhes, but do voluntarily offer themſelves to joyn in ſuch Congregations.

To which the Divines of the Aſſembly anſwered, Decemb. 15.

This Deſire is not to be granted them, for theſe Reaſons.

1. Becauſe it holds out a plain and total Separation from the Rule; as if in nothing it were to be complied with; nor our Churches to be communicated with in any thing, which ſhould argue Church-Communion. More could not be ſaid, or done, againſt falſe Churches.

2. It plainly holds out, The lawfulneſs of gathering Churches out of true Churches, yea out of ſuch true Churches, which are endeavouring farther to reform according to the word of God; whereof we are aſſured, there is not the leaſt hint of any Example in all the Book of God.

3. This would give Countenance to A perpetual Schiſm and Diviſion in the Church, ſtill drawing away ſome from the Churches under the Rule, which alſo would breed many irritations among the Parties going away, and thoſe whom they leave; and again, between the Church that ſhould be forſaken, and that to which they ſhould go.

To the Firſt Reaſon, they ſay, (1.) That gathering into other Congregations ſuch, who cannot, out of tenderneſs of Conſcience, partake as Members in their Churches, for the purer enjoyment (as to their Conſciences) of all Ordinances yet ſtill maintaining Communion with them as Churches, is far from Separation, much leſs a plain and total Separation. And this is not ſetting up Churches againſt Churches, but Neighbour Siſter Churches of a different Judgment. For, ſay they, if the pureſt Churches in the World (unto our Judgment, in all other reſpects) ſhould impoſe as a Condition of receiving the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, any one thing, that ſuch tender Conſciences cannot joyn in (as ſuppoſe kneeling in the Act of Receiving, which was the caſe of Scotland and England) if they remove from theſe Churches, and have Liberty from a State to gather into other Churches, to enjoy this and other Ordinances, this is no Separation.

(2.) That it is not a plain and total Separation from the Rule, unleſs they wholly in all things differ, by ſetting up altogether different Rules of Conſtitution, Worſhip and Government; but they ſhall practice the moſt of the ſame things; and theſe the moſt ſubſtantial, which are found in the Rule it ſelf.

(3.) That they would maintain Occaſional Communion with their Churches, not only in hearing and preaching, but Occaſionally, in Baptizing their Children in their Churches, and receiving the Lord's Supper there, &c.

And, would not all this clear them from the Imputation of Schiſm? Not agreeing in the main things? Not owning their Churches to be true? Not maintaining Occaſional Communion with them? Let us hear, what the Divines of the Aſſembly think of all this.

Thus they Anſwer,

Firſt, That although Tenderneſs of Conſcience may bind Men to forbear, or ſuſpend the Act of Communion in that Particular, wherein Men conceive they cannot hold Communion without ſin, yet it doth not bind to follow ſuch a poſitive Preſcript, as poſſibly may be divers from the Will and Counſel of God, of which kind we conceive this of gathering ſeparate Churches out of the true Churches, to be one.

Secondly, It is one thing to remove to a Congregation which is under the ſame Rule, another to a Congregation of a different Conſtitution from the Rule; in the former caſe a Man retains his Memberſhip; in the latter he renounceth his Memberſhip upon difference of Judgment, touching the very Conſtitution of the Churches, from and unto which he removes.

Thirdly, If a Church do require that which is evil of any Member, he muſt forbear to do it, yet without Separation. They who thought kneeling in the Act of Communion, to be unlawful, either in England, or Scotland, did not ſeparate, or renounce Memberſhip, but did, ſome of them, with Zeal and Learning, defend our Church againſt thoſe of the Separation.

Fourthly, The Notion of Separation is not to be meaſured by civil Acts of State, but by the Word of God.

Fifthly, To leave all Ordinary Communion in any Church with diſlike, when Oppoſition or Offence offers it ſelf, is to ſeparate from ſuch a Church in the Scripture Senſe.

Sixthly, A total difference from Churches is not neceſſary to make a total Separation; for the moſt rigid Separatiſts hold the ſame rule of Worſhip, and Government with our Brethren; and under this pretence, Novatians, Donatiſts, all that ever were thought to ſeparate, might ſhelter themſelves.

Seventhly, If they may occaſionally exerciſe theſe Acts of Communion with us once, a ſecond, or third time, without ſin, we know no reaſon why it may not be ordinarily without ſin; and then Separation, and Church-Gathering would have been needleſs. To Separate from thoſe Churches ordinarily and viſibly, with whom occaſionally you may joyn without ſin, ſeemeth to be a moſt unjuſt Separation.

To the Second Reaſon, The Diſſenting Brethren gave the Anſwers.

1. That it was founded upon this ſuppoſition, That nothing is to be tolerated which is unlawful in the Judgment of thoſe who are to tolerate: Which the Divines of the Aſſembly denied; and ſaid, It was upon the ſuppoſition of the unlawfulneſs, to tolerate gathering of Churches out of true Churches: which they do not once endeavour to prove lawful.

2. That if after all endeavours, Mens Conſciences are unſatisfied, as to Communion with a Church, they have no Obligation lying upon them to continue in that Communion; or on the Churches to withold them from removing to purer Churches; or if there be none ſuch to gather into Churches.

To which the Divines of the Aſſembly replied.

I. That this opened a Gap for all Sects to challenge ſuch a Liberty as their due.

II. This Liberty was denied by the Churches of New-England; and they have as juſt ground to deny it as they.

To the third Reaſon they anſwered.

Firſt, That the abuſe of the word Schiſm hath done much hurt in the Churches; that the ſignification of it was not yet agreed upon by the State, nor debated by the Aſſembly.

To which the others reply;

That if the word Schiſm had been left out, the Reaſon would have remained ſtrong, viz. That this would give countenance to perpetual Diviſion in the Church, ſtill drawing away Churches from under the Rule. And to give countenance to an unjuſt, and cauſleſs Separation from lawful Church-Communion, is not far from giving countenance to a Schiſm; eſpecially when the grounds, upon which this Separation is deſired, are ſuch, upon which all other poſſible ſcruples, which erring Conſciences may, in any other caſe, be ſubject unto, may claim the privilege of a like Indulgence, and ſo this Toleration being the firſt, ſhall indeed but lay the foundation, and open the Gap, whereat as many Diviſions in the Church, as there may be Scruples in the Minds of Men, ſhall, upon the ſelf-ſame Equity be let in.

Secondly, This will give Countenance only to Godly Peoples joyning in other Congregations for their greater Edification, who cannot otherwiſe, without ſin, enjoy all the Ordinances of Chriſt; yet ſo, as not condemning thoſe Churches, they joyn not with, as falſe; but ſtill preſerving all Chriſtian Communion with the Saints, as Members of the Body of Chriſt, of the Church Catholick; and joyn alſo with them in all duties of Worſhip, which belong to particular Churches, ſo far as they are able; and if this be called Schiſm, or Countenance of Schiſm, it is more than we have yet learned from Scriptures, or any approved Authors.

To this, the Divines of the Aſſembly replied.

1. This deſired forbearance is a perpetual Diviſion in the Church, and a perpetual drawing away from the Churches under the Rule. For, upon the ſame pretence, thoſe who ſcruple Infant-Baptiſm, may withdraw from their Churches, and ſo ſeparate into another Congregation; and ſo in that ſome practice may be ſcrupled, and they ſeparate again: Are theſe Diviſions, and Sub-diviſions, ſay they, as lawful as they may be infinite? or, muſt we give that reſpect to the Errors of Mens Conſciences, as to ſatisfie their Scruples, by allowance of this liberty to them? And, doth it not plainly ſignifie, that Errors of Conſcience is a protection againſt Schiſm?

2. The not condemning of our Churches as falſe, doth little extenuate the Separation; for divers of the Browniſts, who have totally ſeparated in former times, have not condemned theſe Churches as falſe; though they do not pronounce an affirmative Judgment againſt us, yet the very ſeparating is a tacit and practical condemning of our Churches, if not as falſe, yet as impure, eouſq; as that in ſuch Adminiſtrations, they cannot be by them, as Members communicated with, without ſin. And when they ſpeak of Communion with us, as Members of the Church Catholick, it is as full a declining of Communion with us as Churches, as if we were falſe Churches.

3. We do not think differences in Judgment, in this or that Point, to be Schiſm, or that every inconformity unto every thing uſed or enjoined is Schiſm, ſo that Communion be preſerved; or that Separation from idolatrous Communion, or Worſhip, ex ſe, unlawful, is Schiſm; but to join in ſeparate Congregations of another Communion, which ſeceſſion of our Members is a manifeſt rupture of our Societies into others, and is therefore a Schiſm in the Body; and if the Apoſtle do call thoſe Diviſions of the Church, wherein Chriſtians did not ſeparate into divers formed Congregations, of ſeveral Communion in the Sacrament of the Lord's-Supper Schiſms, much more may ſuch Separation as this deſired, be ſo called.

4. Scruple of Conſcience is no cauſe of ſeparating, nor doth it take off cauſeleſs ſeparation from being Schiſm, which may ariſe from Errors of Conſcience, as well as carnal and corrupt reaſons; therefore we conceive the Cauſes of Separation muſt be ſhewn to be ſuch ex naturâ rei, as will bear it out, and therefore we ſay, that the granting the liberty deſired will give countenance to Schiſm.

5. We cannot but take it for granted, upon evidence of Reaſon and Experience of all Ages, that this Separation will be the Mother and Nurſe of Contentions, Strifes, Envyings, Confuſions, and ſo draw with it that breach of Love, which may endanger the heightning of it into formal Schiſm, even in the ſenſe of our Brethren.

6. What is it that approved Authors do call Schiſm, but the breaking off Members from their Churches, which are lawfully conſtituted Churches, and from Communion in Ordinances, &c. without juſt and ſufficient cauſe, ex naturâ rei, to juſtifie ſuch ſeceſſion, and to join in other Congregations of ſeparate Communion, either becauſe of perſonal Failings in the Officers, or Members of the Congregation from which they ſeparate, or becauſe of cauſeleſs ſcruple of their own Conſcience, which hath been called ſetting up altare contra altare; for which they quote St. Auguſtin and Cameron.

Thus I have faithfully laid down the State of this Controverſie about Separation, as it hath been managed in former times among us. From whence there are theſe things to be conſidered by us, which may be of ſome uſe in our following Diſcourſe.

(1.) That all the old Non-conformiſts did think themſelves bound in Conſcience to communicate with the Church of England, and did look upon Separation from it to be ſin, notwithſtanding the Corruptions they ſuppoſed to be in it. This I have proved with ſo great evidence in the foregoing Diſcourſe, that thoſe who deny it, may, with the help of the ſame Metaphyſicks, deny that the Sun ſhines.

(2.) That all Men were bound in Conſcience towards preſerving the Union of the Church, to go as far as they were able. This was not only aſſerted by the Non-conformiſts, but by the moſt rigid Separatiſts of former times, and by the Diſſenting Brethren themſelves. So that the lawfulneſs of Separation, where Communion is lawful, and thought ſo to be by the Perſons who ſeparate, is one of the neweſt Inventions of this Age; but what new Reaſons they have for it, beſides noiſe and clamour, I am yet to ſeek.

(3.) That bare ſcruple of Conſcience doth not juſtifie Separation, although it may excuſe Non-communion in the particulars which are ſcrupled, provided that they have uſed the beſt means for a right information.

(4.) That where occaſional Communion is lawful, conſtant Communion is a Duty. Which follows from the Divines of the Aſſembly blaming the Diſſenting Brethren for allowing the lawfulneſs of occaſional Communion with our Churches, and yet forbearing ordinary Communion with them. For, ſay they, to ſeparate from thoſe Churches ordinarily and viſibly, with whom occaſionally you may join, ſeemeth to be a moſt unjuſt Separation.

(5.) That withdrawing from the Communion of a true Church, and ſetting up Congregations for purer Worſhip, or under another Rule, is plain and down-right Separation, as is moſt evident from the Anſwer of the Divines of the Aſſembly to the Diſſenting Brethren.

Sect. 16. From all this it appears, that the preſent practice of Separation can never be juſtified, by the old Non-conformiſts Principles; nor by the Doctrine of the Aſſembly of Divines. The former is clear from undeniable Evidence, and the latter is in effect confeſſed by all my Adverſaries. For, although they endeavour all they can, to blind the Reader's Judgment, with finding out the diſparity of ſome circumſtances, which was never denied; yet not one of them can deny, that it was their Judgment, That the holding of ſeparate Congregations for Worſhip, where there was an agreement in Doctrine, and the Subſtantials of Religion was unlawful and ſchiſmatical. And this was the point for which I produced their Teſtimony in my Sermon; and it ſtill ſtands good againſt them. For their reſolution of the caſe, doth not depend upon the particular circumſtances of that time, but upon general Reaſons drawn from the Obligations to preſerve Unity in Churches; which muſt have equal force at all times, although there happen a great variety, as to ſome circumſtances. For whether the greater purity of Worſhip be pleaded, as to one circumſtance, or another, the general caſe, as to Separation, is the ſame; whether the Scruples do relate to ſome Ceremonies required, or to other Impoſitions, as to Order and Diſcipline, if they be ſuch as they pretend to, a neceſſity of Separation on their account, it comes at laſt to the ſame point. Was it unlawful to deſire a liberty of ſeparate

Congregations, as the Diſſenting Brethren did, becauſe of ſome Scruples of Conſcience in them? and is it not equally unlawful in others, who have no more but Scruples of Conſcience to plead, although they relate to different things? I will put this caſe as plain as poſſible, to prevent all ſubterfuges and ſlight evaſions. Suppoſe five Diſſenting Brethren now, ſhould plead the neceſſity of having ſeparate Congregations, on the account of very different Scruples of Conſcience; one of them pleads, that his company ſcruple the uſe of an impoſed Liturgy; another ſaith, His People do not ſcruple that, but they cannot bear the Sign of the Croſs, or Kneeling at the Communion; a third ſaith, If all theſe were away, yet if their Church be not rightly gather'd and conſtituted, as to matter and form, they muſt have a Congregation of their own; a fourth goes yet farther, and ſaith, Let their Congregation be conſtituted how it will, if they allow Infant-Baptiſm, they can never join with them; nor, ſaith a fifth, can we, as long as you allow Preaching by ſet forms, and your Miniſters ſtint themſelves by Hour-glaſſes, and ſuch like human Inventions: Here are now very different Scruples of Conſcience; but doth the nature of the caſe vary, according to the bare difference of the Scruples? One Congregation ſcruples any kind of Order, as an unreaſonable impoſition and reſtraint of the Spirit, is Separation on that account lawful? No, ſay all other Parties againſt the Quakers; becauſe their Scruples are unreaſonable. But is it lawful for a Congregation to ſeparate on the account of Infant-Baptiſm? No, ſay the Preſbyterians and Independents, that is an unreaſonable Scruple. Is it lawful for Men to ſeparate to have greater purity in the frame and order of Churches, although they may occaſionally join in the duties of Worſhip? No, ſaith the Preſbyterians, this makes way for all manner of Schiſms and Diviſions, if mere ſcruple of Conſcience be a ſufficient ground for Separation; and if they can join occaſionally with us, they are bound to do it conſtantly; or elſe the obligation to Peace and Unity in the Church ſignifies little: No Man's erroneous Conſcience can excuſe him from Schiſm. If they alledge grounds to juſtifie themſelves, they muſt be ſuch as can do it ex naturâ rei, and not from the mere error or miſtake of Conſcience. But, at laſt, the Preſbyterians themſelves come to be required to join with their Companies in Communion with the Church of England, and if they do not, either they muſt deſire a ſeparate Congregation, on the account of their Scruples, as to the Ceremonies, and then the former Arguments unavoidably return upon them. (For the Church of England hath as much occaſion to account thoſe Scruples unreaſonable, as they do thoſe of the Independents, Anabaptiſts, and Quakers) or elſe they declare, they can join occaſionally in Communion with our Church, but yet hold it lawful to have ſeparate Congregations for greater Purity of Worſhip; and then the obligation to Peace and Unity ought to have as much force on them, with reſpect to our Church, as ever they thought it ought to have on the diſſenting Brethren, with reſpect to themſelves. For no diſparity, as to other Circumſtances, can alter the nature of this Caſe, viz. That as far as Men judge Communion lawful, it becomes a Duty, and Separation a Sin, under what denomination ſoever the Perſons paſs. For the fault doth not lie in the Circumſtances, but in the nature of the Act; becauſe then Separation appears moſt unreaſonable, when occaſional Communion is confeſſed to be lawful. As will fully appear by the following Diſcourſe. Thoſe Men therefore ſpeak moſt agreeably to their preſent practice, although leaſt for the honour of the Aſſembly, who confeſs, That

That they were tranſported with undue heats and animoſities againſt their Brethren; which deſerve to be lamented, and not to be imitated; that they are not obliged to vindicate all they ſaid, nor to be concluded by their Determinations: that it is to be hoped, the Party is become wiſer ſince. This is plain dealing, and giving up the Cauſe to the diſſenting Brethren, and that in a matter wherein they happened to have the ſtrongeſt reaſon of their ſide. But hereby we ſee, that thoſe who juſtifie the preſent Separation, have forſaken the Principles and Practices of the old Non-conformiſts, as to this Point of Separation.

Sect. 17. It remains now, that I ſhew how far they are likewiſe gone off from the peaceable Principles of their Predeceſſors, as to private Perſons undertaking to reform the Diſcipline of the Church, and ſetting up new Churches, againſt the conſent of the Magiſtrate, in a reformed Church; and particularly, as to the preaching of their Miniſters, when ſilenced by our Laws. This I am the more obliged to do, becauſe when I ſaid, That I was certain, that preaching in oppoſition to our eſtabliſhed Laws, is contrary to the Doctrine of all the Non-conformiſts of former Times, Mr. B. is pleaſed to ſay, That my Aſſertion is ſo raſh and falſe, in matters of notorious Fact, that it weakeneth his Reverence of my Judgment, in matters of Right. I ſhould deſire no better Terms from Mr. B. as to the matter of Right, in this preſent Controverſie, than that he would be determin'd by the plain evidence of the Fact; and if what I ſay be true, and notoriouſly true, I leave him to conſider on whoſe ſide the Raſhneſs lies.

Anſwer to my Sermon, p. 21.

Gifford makes this one principal part of Browniſm, That Churches are to be ſet up, and Diſcipline reformed, without the conſent of the Chriſtian Magiſtrate: Brown maketh many Arguments, ſaith he, to prove, that Princes are not to be ſtayed for, nor yet to have to do, by publick Power, to eſtabliſh Religion. Which Opinion of his, is ſuch abridging the ſacred Power of Princes, and ſuch horrible injury to the Church, contrary to the manifeſt Word of God, that if there were nothing elſe, it is enough to make him an odious and deteſtable Heretick, until he ſhew Repentance. But to clear this matter, he diſtinguiſhes, (1.) Of Princes that are enemies to Chriſtianity, as they were in the time of the Apoſtles; to what end, ſaith he, ſhould they, having authority from Chriſt, to eſtabliſh Diſcipline, ſue unto the Courts of ſuch Princes, or attend their pleaſure. (2.) Of ſuch who profeſs Chriſtianity, but are Idolaters. In this caſe, he ſaith, they are neither bound to forbear preaching, nor ſetting up Diſcipline if they do oppoſe it. (3.) Of ſuch Princes, who own the true Doctrine of Chriſtianity, but the Churches in their Dominions are corrupt in Diſcipline. In this caſe he determines, That though every Man is to take care to keep a good Conſcience, yet no private Perſons are to break the Unity and Peace of the Faithful, or to take upon them publick Authority to reform; which he there proves, and concludes it to be a wicked and dangerous Principle in the Browniſts to hold the contrary.

Gifford's Anſwer to the Browniſts, *p.*104.

In anſwer to this, Barrow ſaith, That the Servants of God ought not to be ſtayed from doing the Commandments of God, upon any reſtraint, or perſecution of any mortal Man whatſoever; and for this he quotes the example of the Apoſtles, who then had been guilty of the ſame diſobedience and rebellion, if Princes had been to be ſtayed for, or their reſtraint been a ſufficient let: And adds, That they only, according to God's Commandment, refrained from their Idolatry, and other publick Evils, and aſſembled together in all holy and peaceable manner, to worſhip the Lord our God, and to join our ſelves together in the Faith, unto mutual Duties, and to ſeek that Government which Chriſt left to his Church, and for the Church to erect the ſame.

To the Inſtance of the Apoſtles, Gifford had anſwered, That they were furniſhed with an extraordinary Authority and Commiſſion by Chriſt, to ſet up his Kingdom; but ye have no Commiſſion from God, it is the Devil that hath ſet you forward: And will ye, in ſuch vile and wretched manner, pretend the examples of the primitive Churches? Barrow replies, If the Commandment of God were ſufficient warrant to the Apoſtles to do their work, though all the Princes of the world reſiſted, then muſt the Commandment of the ſame God, be of the ſame effect to all other Inſtruments, whom it pleaſeth the Lord to uſe in their callings to his Service alſo, though all the Princes in the world ſhould withſtand and forbid the ſame. By this, we ſee, this was a great Point in controverſie between the Browniſts and Non-conformiſts. Which will more appear by the diſpute between Fr. Johnſon and Jacob. For among the Points of falſe Doctrine, which he charges the Non-conformiſts with, whom they called the forward Preachers, theſe are two. Page 70, 72.

1. That the planting, or reforming of Chriſt's Church muſt tarry for the Civil Magiſtrate, and may not otherwiſe be brought in by the Word and Spirit of God in the Mouths of his weakeſt Servants, except they have Authority from earthly Princes; which Doctrine, ſaith he, is againſt the Kingly Power of Chriſt, and three whole Lines of Scripture, which he there puts together.

2. That it is lawful for a Miniſter of Chriſt to ceaſe preaching, and to forſake his Flock, at the commandment of a Lord Biſhop: Which Doctrine, he ſaith, is contrary to two Lines of Scripture more, with the bare numbers of Chapter and Verſe. But, leſt it ſhould be ſuppoſed, that theſe two were among thoſe which Jacob ſaith, he falſly laid to their charge, we find both theſe Doctrines owned by the ſeveral Non conformiſts, who joined together in a Confutation of the Browniſts. For, ſay they, as to the Peoples power of reforming, Confut. of the Brown. p. 51.

Firſt, We cannot find any Warrant in Holy Scripture, for them that are private Members of any Church, to erect the Diſcipline, no not though the Magiſtrate and Miniſters, who ſhould deal in this work, were altogether profane and ungodly.

Secondly, We eſteem our Prince to be a moſt Lawful and Chriſtian Magiſtrate, and our Miniſters to be true Miniſters of Chriſt, and therefore we are juſtly afraid, that by enterpriſing a publick Reformation, not only without, but contrary to the direction and liking of them, who by God's word ought to have, if not the only, yet the principal hand in that work, we ſhould highly offend God.

Thirdly, That for the want of publick Reformation, the Magiſtrate is every where blamed, and no where the Church, for ought we can find: Oft are the Prieſts and People blamed for erecting and practiſing Idolatry, but never for that they plucked it not down, when their Princes had ſet it up; neither can we find, whether ever the Church, under a Chriſtian Magiſtrate, was by any Prophet, either commanded to deal (otherwiſe than by perſuaſion) in publick Reformation, when the Magiſtrate neglected it, or reproved for the contrary. Page 22.

Fourthly, To the Inſtance of the Apoſtles they anſwer two things.

I. That though they ſet up Church-Government without the Magiſtrate's leave, yet not contrary to his liking; or when he oppoſed his Authority directly, rectly, and inhibited it, they never erected the Diſcipline, when there was ſo direct an oppoſition made againſt it by the Civil Magiſtrates.

II. If it could be proved, that the Apoſtles did ſo then, yet would it not follow, that we may do ſo now; for neither was the Heathen Magiſtrate altogether ſo much to be reſpected by the Church, as the Chriſtian Magiſtrate is; neither have our Miniſters and People now ſo full and abſolute a power, to pull down, and ſet up Orders in the Church, as the Apoſtles (thoſe wiſe Maſter-builders) had.

Fifthly, As to their Miniſters preaching being ſilenced, they declare,

Page 41. 1. So long as the Biſhops ſuſpend, and deprive, according to the Law of the Land, we account of the Action herein, as of the Act of the Church, which we may and ought to reverence, and yield unto; if they do otherwiſe, we have liberty given us by the Law, to appeal from them. If it be ſaid, the Church is not to be obey'd when it ſuſpends and deprives us, for ſuch cauſes as we in our Conſciences know to be inſufficient. We anſwer, That it lieth on them to depoſe, who may ordain; and they may ſhut that may open. And as he may, with a good Conſcience execute a Miniſtery, by the Ordination and Calling of the Church, who is privy to himſelf of ſome unfitneſs, (if the Church will preſs him to it) ſo may he who is privy to himſelf, of no fault that deſerveth deprivation, ceaſe from the execution of his Miniſtery, when he is preſſed thereunto by the Church. And if a guiltleſs Perſon, put out of his charge by the Church's Authority, may yet continue in it, what proceedings can there be againſt guilty Perſons, who, in their own conceit, are always guiltleſs, or will at leaſt pretend ſo to be; ſeeing they will be ready always to object againſt the Church's Judgment, That they are called of God, and may not therefore give over the execution of their Miniſtery at the will of Biſhops? The Second Quære.

2. That the caſe of the Apoſtles was very different from theirs in three reſpects.

Firſt, They that inhibited the Apoſtles were known and profeſſed enemies to the Goſpel.

Secondly, The Apoſtles were charged not to teach in the Name of Chriſt, nor to publiſh any part of the Goſpel, which Commandment might more hardly be yielded unto, than this of our Biſhops, who, though they cannot endure them which teach that part of the Truth that concerneth the good Government, and Reformation of the Church, yet are they not only content that the Goſpel ſhould be preached, but are alſo Preachers of it themſelves.

Thirdly, The Apoſtles received not their Calling and Authority from Men, nor by the hands of Men, but immediately from God himſelf, and therefore alſo might not be reſtrain'd or depoſed by Men; whereas we, though we exerciſe a Function, whereof God is the Author, and we are alſo called of God to it, yet are we called and ordained by the hands and miniſtery of Men, and may therefore by the miniſtery of Men be alſo depoſed, and reſtrained from the exerciſe of our Miniſtery.

To this which I had referred Mr. B. to, he gives this Anſwer, If Mr. Rathband hath denied this, it had been no proof. Did I ever mention Mr. Rathband's Teſtimony as a ſufficient proof? My words are, That I was certain their Practice was contrary to the Doctrine of all the Nonconformiſts, as you may ſee in the Book publiſhed in their Name, by Mr. Rathband. Can any thing be plainer, than that the Book was written by the Non-conformiſts, and that Mr. Rathband was only the Publiſher of it? This way of anſwering is juſt as if one ſhould quote a Paſſage out of Curcellæus his Greek Teſtament, and another ſhould reply, if Cur- Anſwer to Letter, p. 22.

cellaus ſaid ſo, it had been no proof. Can Mr. B. ſatisfie his Mind with ſuch Anſwers?

When Fr. Johnſon ſaid, That our Miniſters ought not to ſuffer themſelves to be ſilenced and depoſed from their publick Miniſtery, no not by lawful Magiſtrates. Mr. Bradſhaw anſwered, This Aſſertion is falſe and ſeditious. And when Johnſon ſaith, That the Apoſtles did not make their immediate Calling from God the ground of their refuſal; but this, that they ought to obey God rather than Man; which is a Duty required of all Miniſters and Chriſtians. Bradſhaw (a Perſon formerly in great eſteem with Mr. Baxter, and highly commended by the Author of the Vindication of his Diſpute with Johnſon) gives this Anſwer.

1. Though the Apoſtles did not aſſign their immediate Calling from God, as the Ground of their refuſal, in ſo many Letters and Syllables, yet that which they do aſſign, is by implication, and in effect the ſame with it. For it is as much as if they had ſaid, God himſelf hath impoſed this Calling upon us, and not Man; and therefore except we ſhould rather obey Man than God, we may not forbear this Office which he hath impoſed upon us. For, oppoſing the Obedience of God to the obedience of Man, they therein plead a Calling from God, and not from Man; otherwiſe, if they had received a Calling from Man, there had been incongruity in the Anſwer; conſidering, that in common ſenſe and reaſon, they ought ſo far forth to obey Men, forbidding them to exerciſe a Calling, as they exerciſe the ſame by vertue of that Calling. Elſe, by this reaſon, a Miniſter ſhould not ceaſe to preach, upon the Commandment of the Church, that hath choſen him; but ſhould be bound, to give them alſo the ſame Anſwer, which the Apoſtles gave, which were abſurd. So that by this groſs conceit of Mr. Johnſon, there ſhould be no Power in any ſort of Man whoſoever, to depoſe a Miniſter from his Miniſtery; but that notwithſtanding any Commandment of Church or State, the Miniſter is to continue in his Miniſtery.

2. For the farther Anſwer of this his ignorant conceit, plainly tending to Sedition, we are to know, that though the Apoſtles, Prophets, and Evangeliſts, preached publickly, where they were not hindred by open violence; and did not, nor might not leave their Miniſtery upon any human Authority, or Commandment whatſoever, becauſe they did not enter into, or exerciſe the ſame upon the will and pleaſure of any Man whatſoever; yet they never erected and planted publick Churches and Miniſteries in the Face of the Magiſtrate, whether they would or no; or in deſpite of them; but ſuch, in reſpect of the Eye of the Magiſtrate, were as private and inviſible as might be.

3. Neither were ſome of the Apoſtles only forbidden, ſo as others ſhould be ſuffered to preach the ſame Goſpel in their places; but the utter aboliſhing of Chriſtian Religion was manifeſtly intended in ſilencing of them. But our Churches whereof we are Miniſters, are no private and ſecret Aſſemblies, ſuch as hide themſelves from the Face of a perſecuting Magiſtrate and State; but are publick, profeſſing the Worſhip, and doing their Religion in the face of the Magiſtrate and State; yea, and by his Countenance, Authority and Protection; and we are ſet over thoſe Churches, not only by a Calling of our People, but alſo by the Authority of the Magiſtrate, who hath an armed Power to hinder any publick action; who is willing alſo to permit and maintain other true Miniſters of the Goſpel, in thoſe places where he forbiddeth ſome. If therefore after our publick calling, to Miniſter to ſuch a known and publick Church, not by the Church only, but by the Magiſtrate alſo, the Magiſtrate ſhall have matter againſt us (whether juſt or unjuſt it ſkilleth not) and ſhall in that regard forbid us to Miniſter to our Church; I ſee not by what Warrant in God's Word, we ſhould think our ſelves bound notwithſtanding to exerciſe our Miniſtery ſtill; except we ſhould think ſuch a Law of Miniſtery to lie upon us, that we ſhould judge our ſelves bound to run upon the Swords point of the Magiſtrate, or to oppoſe Sword to Sword. And ſuppoſe the Magiſtrate ſhould do it unjuſtly, and againſt the will of the Church, and ſhould therein ſin; yet doth not the Church in that regard ceaſe to be a Church, nor ought ſhe therein to reſiſt the Will of the Magiſtrate; neither doth ſhe ſtand bound, in regard of her affection to her Miniſter (how great and deſerving ſoever) to deprive her ſelf of the Protection of the Magiſtrate, by leaving her publick ſtanding, to follow his Miniſtery in private, and in the dark; refuſing the benefit of all other publick Miniſtery, which with the leave and liking of the Magiſtrate ſhe may enjoy.

4. Neither do I know what warrant any ordinary Miniſter hath, by God's Word, in ſuch a caſe, ſo to draw any ſuch Church or People to his private Miniſtery, that thereby they ſhould hazard their outward ſtate and quiet in the Common-wealth where they live; when in ſome competent meaſure they may publickly, with the grace and favour of the Magiſtrate, enjoy the ordinary means of Salvation by another: and (except he have a calling to Miniſter in ſome Church) he is to be content to live as a private Member, till it ſhall pleaſe God to reconcile the Magiſtrate to him, and to call him again to his own Church; labouring mean while privately, upon particular occaſions offered, to ſtrengthen and confirm in the ways of God, thoſe People that are deprived of his publick Labour. And I take it to be the duty of the People, in ſuch a Caſe, if they will approve themſelves faithful Chriſtians, and good Subjects, ſo to ſubmit to the Miniſtery of another, as that by Prayer, and all other good, dutiful, and loyal means, they may do their beſt endeavour to obtain him, of whom, againſt their will, they have been deprived, and ſtill to affect and love him as their Paſtor: now, if the People do thus, then is that Miniſter called to be ſilent, not only by the Magiſtrate, but by them alſo, though with much grief.

To this Teſtimony of Mr. Bradſhaw, all that Mr. B. ſaith, is, That Bradſhaw thought, we ſhould ſubmit to a ſilencing Law, where our Miniſtery was unneceſſary, and ſo doth he. If Mr. B. did allow himſelf any time to conſider what he writes, he would never have given ſuch an Anſwer as this. For, Mr. Bradſhaw never puts the caſe upon the neceſſity, or no neceſſity of their preaching, but upon the allowance, or diſallowance of the Chriſtian Magiſtrate. And if it had been reſolved upon the point of neceſſity, Is it poſſible for Mr. B. to think there was leſs neceſſity of preaching at that time, than there is now, when himſelf confeſſeth ſeveral years ſince, That thirty years ago, there were many bare reading, not preaching Miniſters, for one that there is now? And what was there, which the old Non-conformiſts more complained of, than the want of a more preaching Miniſtery? This then, could not be Mr. Bradſhaw's Reaſon; and Mr. Baxter, upon ſecond thoughts, cannot be of that opinion.

Defence of the Cure of Diviſions, p. 55.

I have yet one Argument more, to prove this to have been the general ſenſe of the Non-conformiſts; which is Mr. Sprint's Argument for Conformity in the caſe of Deprivation; Which is, that where two Duties do meet, a greater, and a leſs, whereof both cannot be done at the ſame time, the leſſer duty muſt yield unto the greater; but this Doctrine of ſuffering Deprivation for not conforming, teacheth, and the practice thereof cauſeth, to neglect a greater duty for performing of a leſs; therefore it ſeemeth to be an Error in Doctrine, and a Sin in Practice. The force of which Argument doth neceſſarily ſuppoſe, That Miniſters, deprived by Law, are not to exerciſe their Miniſterial Function in oppoſition to the Laws. And to confirm this, ſeveral Non-conformiſts undertook to anſwer this Argument, and to give an account of the diſparity of the caſe as to the Apoſtles times, and ours. For Mr. Sprint had urged the inſtance of the Apoſtles to this purpoſe, ſince they ſubmitted to Jewiſh Ceremonies rather than loſe the liberty of their Miniſtery, they ought to yield to our Ceremonies on the ſame ground; to which they anſwer; Page 232. that the Apoſtles had far greater reaſon ſo to do; becauſe their Miniſtery was of far greater excellency, and uſefulneſs, and therefore the Argument was of much greater weight with the Apoſtles, than it could be with them. For, ſay they, What one Miniſter of the Goſpel is there, that dare be ſo preſumptuous, as to ſay, That his Preaching and Miniſtery can be of that neceſſity, and uſe for the Glory of God, and good of his Church; as was the Miniſtery of his Apoſtles? The work whereunto the Lord called and ſeparated the Apoſtles (viz. the planting of the Church, and the preaching the Goſpel to all Nations) was ſuch, as could not have been performed by any other, but the Apoſtles alone; but in deprivation of our Miniſters that refuſe conformity, there is no ſuch danger, and of their preaching there can be no ſuch neceſſity imagined; though they preach not, the Goſpel is preached ſtill, and that ſoundly, and fruitfully. Did theſe Men think, the Apoſtles Woe be unto me if I preach not the Goſpel, did reach to their caſe? Can Mr. B. imagine, that ſuch Men thought themſelves ſtill bound to preach, although they were ſilenced by our Laws?

And now, I hope, I have proved that to be evidently true, which Mr. B. ſaith was notoriouſly falſe. But if after all this, Mr. B. will perſiſt, in ſaying, That he knew thoſe who did otherwiſe; all that I have to ſay to it, is, That I hope Mr. B's Acquaintance, both of the one, and the other Party (if they were ſuch, as he repreſents) are not to be the Standard for all the reſt; for, it ſeems, he was not very happy in either.

PART II.

Of the Nature of the preſent Separation.

§. 1. The different Principles of Separation laid down. The things agreed on with reſpect to our Church. § 2. The largeneſs of Pariſhes a mere Colour and Pretence; ſhewed from Mr. B's own words. § 3. The Myſtery of the Preſbyterian Separation opened. § 4. The Principles of it as to the People. Of occaſional Communion, how far owned, and of what force in this matter, ſhewed from parallel Caſes. § 5. The reaſons for this occaſional Communion examined. § 6. Of the pretence of greater Edification in ſeparate Meetings, never allowed by the Separatiſts or Independents as a reaſon for Separation. No reaſon for this pretence ſhewed from Mr. B's words. § 7. The Principles of Separation as to the Miniſtry of our Churches. Of joyning with our Churches as Oratories. § 8. Of the Peoples judging of the worthineſs and competency of their Miniſters. Mr. B's Character of the People. The impertinency of this Plea as to the London Separation. § 9. The abſurdity of allowing this liberty to ſeparate from Mr. B's own words. § 10. The allowance he gives for Separation on the account of Conformity. What publick Worſhip may be forbidden. § 11. The Miniſtry of our Church charged with Uſurpation in many caſes, and Separation allowed on that account. § 12. Of Separation from Ithacian Prelatiſts. § 13. That the Schiſm doth not always lie on the Impoſers ſide, where the terms of Communion are thought ſinful. § 14. The Principles of the Independent Separation, or of thoſe who hold all Communion with our Church unlawful. § 15. The nature of Separation ſtated and explained. § 16. The charge of Separation made good againſt thoſe who hold Occaſional Communion lawful. § 17. The obligation to conſtant Communion, where Occaſional Communion is allowed to be lawful, at large proved. § 18. The Objection from our Saviour's practice anſwered. § 19. The text Phil. 3. 16. cleared from all Objections. § 20. A new Expoſition of that text ſhewed to be impertinent. § 21. The charge of Separation proved againſt thoſe who hold all Communion with us unlawful. § 22, 23. The miſchief brought upon the Cauſe of the Reformation by it. The teſtimonies of foreign Proteſtant Divines to that purpoſe. § 24. No poſſibility of Union among the Proteſtant Churches upon their grounds, which hath been much wiſhed for and deſired by the beſt Proteſtants. § 25. All the ancient Schiſms juſtifiable on the ſame pretences. § 26. There can be no end of Separation on the like grounds. Mr. A's Plea for Schiſm at large conſidered. § 27. The Obligation on Chriſtians to preſerve the Peace and Unity of the Church. The Caſes mentioned wherein Separation is allowed by the Scripture. In all others it is proved to be a great ſin.

Sect. 1. HAVING made it my buſineſs, in the foregoing Diſcourſe, to ſhew, how far the preſent Diſſenters are gone off from the Principles of the old Non-conformiſts; I come to conſider, what thoſe Principles are, which they now proceed upon;

And thoſe are of two ſorts.

Firſt, Of ſuch as hold partial, and occaſional Communion with our Churches to be lawful, but not total and conſtant, i. e. they judge it lawful at ſome times to be preſent in ſome part of our Worſhip, and upon particular occaſions to partake of ſome Acts of Communion with us; but yet, they apprehend greater purity and edification in ſeparate Congregations, and when they are to chuſe, they think themſelves bound to chuſe theſe, altho' at certain ſeaſons they may think it lawful to ſubmit to occaſional Communion with our Church, as it is now eſtabliſhed.

Secondly, Of ſuch as hold any Communion with our Church to be unlawful, becauſe they believe the Terms of its Communion unlawful, for which they inſtance, in the conſtant uſe of the Liturgy; the Aereal ſign of the Croſs; kneeling at the Communion; the obſervation of Holy-days; renouncing other Aſſemblies; want of Diſcipline in our Churches; and depriving the People of their Right in chuſing their own Paſtors.

To proceed with all poſſible clearneſs in this matter, we muſt conſider theſe three things, 1. What things are to be taken for granted by the ſeveral Parties, with reſpect to our Church. 2. Wherein they differ among themſelves, about the nature and degrees of Separation from it. 3. What the true ſtate of the preſent Controverſie about Separation is.

I. In general, they cannot deny theſe three things.

1. That there is no Reaſon of Separation, becauſe of the Doctrine of our Church.
2. That there is no other Reaſon of Separation becauſe of the Terms of our Communion, than what was from the beginning of the Reformation.
3. That Communion with our Church hath been ſtill allowed by the Reformed Churches abroad.

1. That there is no Reaſon of Separation, becauſe of the Doctrine of our Church. This was confeſſed by the Browniſts, and moſt rigid Separatiſts, as is proved already; and our preſent Adverſaries agree herein. Dr. Owen ſaith, We agree with our Brethren in the Faith of the Goſpel; and we are firmly united with the main Body of Proteſtants in this Nation, in confeſſion of the ſame Faith: And again, The Parties at difference do agree in all ſubſtantial Parts of Religion, and in a common Intereſt, as unto the preſervation and defence of the Proteſtant Religion. Mr. Baxter ſaith, That they agree with us in the Doctrine of the Thirty nine Articles, as diſtinct from the Form of Government, and impoſed Abuſes. And more fully elſewhere, Is not the Non-conformiſts Doctrine the ſame with that of the Church of England, when they ſubſcribe to it, and offer ſo to do? The Independents, as well as Preſbyterians offer to ſubſcribe to the Doctrine of the Thirty nine Articles, as diſtinct from Prelacy and Ceremony. We agree with them in the Doctrine of Faith, and the Subſtance of God's Worſhip, ſaith the Author of the laſt Anſwer. And again, we are one with the Church of England in all the neceſſary Points of Faith, and Chriſtian Practice. We are one with the Church of England, as to the Subſtance, and all neceſſary Parts of God's Worſhip. And even Mr. A. after many trifling Cavils, acknowledges, That

That the Diſſenters generally agree with that Book which is commonly called the Thirty nine Articles, which was compiled above a hundred years ago; and this Book ſome Men call the Church of England. I know not who thoſe Men are, nor by what Figure they ſpeak, who call a Book a Church; but this we all ſay, That the Doctrine of the Church of England is contained therein; and whatever the Opinions of private Perſons may be, this is the Standard by which the Senſe of our Church is to be taken: And that no objection ought to be made, againſt Communion with our Church, upon account of the Doctrine of it; but what reaches to ſuch Articles as are owned and received by this Church.

Miſchief of Impoſitions, Preface.

2. That there are, in effect, no new Terms of Communion with this Church, but the ſame, which our firſt Reformers owned, and ſuffered Martyrdom for, in Q. Mary's days. Not, but that ſome Alterations have been made ſince, but not ſuch as do, in the Judgment of our Brethren, make the Terms of Communion harder than before. Mr. Baxter grants, that the Terms of Lay-Communion are rather made eaſier by ſuch Alterations, even ſince the additional Conformity, with reſpect to the late Troubles. The ſame Reaſons then, which would now make the Terms of our Communion unlawful, muſt have held againſt Cranmer, Ridley, &c. who laid down their Lives for the Reformation of this Church. And this the old Non-conformiſts thought a conſiderable Argument againſt ſeparating from the Communion of our Church, becauſe it reflected much on the honour of our Martyrs; who not only lived and died in the Communion of this Church, and in the practice of thoſe things, which ſome are now moſt offended at, but were themſelves the great Inſtruments in ſetling the Terms of our Communion.

3. That Communion with our Church hath ſtill been owned by the Proteſtant and Reformed Churches abroad. Which they have not only manifeſted, by receiving the Apology and Articles of our Church into the Harmony of Confeſſions, but by the Teſtimony and Approbation which hath been given to it by the moſt eſteemed and learned Writers of thoſe Churches, and by the diſcountenance which they have ſtill given to Separation from the Communion of it. This Argument was often objected againſt the Separatiſts, by the Non-conformiſts; and Ainſworth attempts to anſwer it no leſs than four times in one Book; but the beſt Anſwer he gives, is, That if it prove any thing, it proves more than they would have. For, ſaith he, the Reformed Churches have diſcerned the National Church of England to be a true Church; they have diſcerned the Dioceſan Biſhops of England, as well as the Pariſh-Prieſts to be true Miniſters, and rejoice as well for their Sees, as for your Pariſhes, having joined theſe all alike in their Harmony. As to the good opinion of the Reformed Church, and Proteſtant Divines abroad, concerning the Conſtitution and Orders of our Church, ſo much hath been proved already by Dr. Durel, and ſo little or nothing hath been ſaid to diſprove his evidence, that this ought to be taken as a thing granted; but, if occaſion be given, both he and others are able to produce much more from the Teſtimony of foreign Divines, in juſtification of the Communion of our Church againſt all pretences of Separation from it.

Sect. 2. We now come to the ſeveral Hypotheſes and Principles of Separation, which are at this day among the Diſſenters from our Church.

Some do ſeem to allow ſeparate Congregations only in ſuch places where the Churches are not capable to receive the Inhabitants. For this I find inſiſted on, by almoſt all my Anſwerers: Some Pariſhes, ſaith one,

Letter out of the Country, p. 34.

cannot receive a tenth part, ſome not half the People belonging to them, few can receive all. The Parochial Teacher, ſaith another, is overlaid with a numerous throng of People. The Pariſh-Miniſters are not near ſufficient for ſo populous a City, ſaith a third. And yet not one of theſe, but aſſigns ſuch reaſons, for the neceſſity of ſeparate Congregations, as would equally hold, if there were never a Church in London, but what would hold all the Inhabitants together. This is therefore but a colour, and pretence, and no real Cauſe. Any one would think, by Mr. Baxter's inſiſting ſo very much, on the greatneſs and largeneſs of our Pariſhes, as the reaſon of his preaching in ſeparate Congregations, this were his opinion, that ſuch Congregations are only allowable in ſuch vaſt Pariſhes, where they are helps to the parochial Churches: And no Man denies, that more Places for Worſhip are deſireable, and would be very uſeful, where they may be had, and the ſame way of Worſhip and Order obſerved in them, as in our Parochial Churches, where they may be under the ſame Inſpection, and Eccleſiaſtical Government; where, upon pretence of greater purity of Worſhip, and better means of Edification, the People are not drawn into Separation. But, is it poſſible that Mr. Baxter ſhould think the caſe alike, where the Orders of our Church are conſtantly neglected, the Authority of the Biſhops is ſlighted and contemned; and ſuch Meetings are kept up in affront to them, and the Laws? Would Mr. B. have thought this a ſufficient reaſon for Mr. Tombs to have ſet up a Meeting of Anabaptiſts in Kidderminſter, becauſe it is a very large Pariſh? Or for R. Williams in New-England to have ſet up a ſeparate Congregation at Boſton, becauſe there were but three Churches there, to receive all the numerous Inhabitants? If ſuch a number of Churches could be built, as were ſuitable to the greatneſs and extent of Pariſhes, we ſhould be ſo far from oppoſing it, that we ſhould be very thankful to thoſe who would accompliſh ſo excellent a Work; but, in the mean time, is this juſt and reaſonable, to draw away the People, who come to our Churches, under the pretence of preaching to thoſe who cannot come? For, upon conſideration, we ſhall find,

Anſ. to Letter, p. 17. Anſwer to Serm. p. 57.

(1.) That this is Mr. Baxter's own caſe. For, if we obſerve him, although he ſometimes pretends only to preach to ſome of many thouſands, that cannot come into the Temples, many of which never heard a Sermon of many years; and to this purpoſe he put ſo many Quæres to me, concerning the largeneſs of Pariſhes, and the neceſſity of more Aſſiſtants, thereby to inſinuate, That what he did, was only to preach to ſuch, as could not come to our Churches; yet, when he is pinch'd with the point of Separation, then he declares, That his hearers are the ſame with ours; at leaſt ten or twenty for one; and that he knows not many, (if any) who uſe to hear him, that ſeparate from us. If this be true, as no doubt Mr. B. believes it, then what ſuch mighty help, or aſſiſtance is this to our great Pariſhes? What colour, or pretence is there from the largeneſs of them, that he ſhould preach to the very ſame Perſons, who come to our Churches? And if ſuch Meetings as theirs be only lawful in great Pariſhes, where they preach to ſome of many thouſands who cannot come into the Churches, then how come they to be lawful, where few or none of thoſe many thouſands ever come at all, but they are filled with the very ſame Perſons, who come to our Pariſh-Churches? Theſe two pretences then are inconſiſtent with each other; and one of them cannot hold. For if he doth preach to thoſe who come to our Churches, and ſcarce to any elſe (if any, as Mr. B. ſuppoſes) then all the pretence from the largeneſs of our

Pariſhes, and the many thouſands who cannot come to our Churches, is vain and impertinent; and, to ſpeak ſoftly, not becoming Mr. Baxter's ſincerity.

(2.) That if this were Mr. Baxter's own caſe, viz. That he preached only to ſuch, as could not come to our Churches, it would be no defence of the general practice of Diſſenters, who expreſs no regard at all to the greatneſs or ſmallneſs of Pariſhes. As, if it were neceſſary, might be proved by an Induction of the particular Congregations within the City; and in the adjacent Pariſhes. Either thoſe ſeparate Meetings are lawful or not; if not, why doth not Mr. Baxter diſown them? if they be, why doth he pretend the greatneſs of Pariſhes to juſtifie ſeparate Meetings; when, if they were never ſo ſmall, they would be lawful however? This therefore muſt be ſet aſide, as a mere colour and pretence, which he thought plauſible for himſelf, and invidious to us, though the bounds of our Pariſhes were neither of our own making, nor is it in our power to alter them. And we ſhall find, that Mr. B. doth juſtifie them upon other grounds, which have no relation at all to the extent of Pariſhes, or capacity of Churches. I come therefore to the real grounds which they proceed upon.

Sect. 3. Some do allow Communion with ſome Parochial Churches, in ſome Duties, at ſome Seaſons; but not with all Churches, in all Duties, or at all times. Theſe things muſt be more particularly explained, for a right underſtanding the Myſtery of the preſent Separation. Which proceeds not ſo openly and plainly, as the old Separation did, but hath ſuch artificial windings and turnings in it, that a Man thinks they are very near our Church, when they are at a great diſtance from it. If we charge them with following the Steps of the old Separatiſts, we utterly deny it, ſay they, For they ſeparated from your Churches as no true Churches; they diſowned your Miniſtery and Hierarchy as Antichriſtian, and looked on your Worſhip as idolatrous, but we do none of theſe things, and therefore you charge us unjuſtly with Separation. To which I anſwer, (1.) There are many ſtill, eſpecially of the People, who purſue the Principles of the old Separatiſts; of whom Mr. B. hath ſpoken very well in his Cure of Diviſions, and the Defence of it, and elſewhere. Where he complains, of their Violence and Cenſoriouſneſs; their Contempt of the graveſt and wiſeſt Paſtors; and forcing others to forſake their own Judgments to comply with their humours. And, he ſaith, A ſinful humouring of raſh Profeſſors, is as great a temptation to them, as a ſinful compliance with the great ones of the World. In another place he ſaith, The People will not endure any Forms of Prayers among them, but they declare they would be gone from them, if they do uſe them. And he doth not diſſemble, that they do comply with them, in theſe remarkable words, Should the Miniſters in London, that have ſuffer'd ſo long, but uſe any part of the Liturgy and Scripture-Forms, though without any motive but the pleaſing God, and the Church's good; what muttering and cenſuring would then be among them? And woe to thoſe few Teachers that make up their Deſigns by cheriſhing theſe Diſtempers. One would think, that their warning had been fair; but, Si nati ſint ad bis perdendam Angliam; The Lord have mercy upon us.

(2.) When the matter is throughly examined, the difference between their Teachers, and the old Separatiſts, will be found not near ſo great as is pretended. For what matter is it, as to the nature of Separation, whether the Terms of our Communion be called idolatrous, or unlawful; whether the Miniſtery of our Church be called a falſe Miniſtery, or inſufficient, ficient, ſcandalous, Uſurpers, and Perſecutors; whether our Hierarchy be called Antichriſtian, or repugnant to the Inſtitution of Chriſt. Now theſe are the very ſame Arguments which the old Separatiſts uſed, only they are diſguiſed under another appearance, and put into a more faſhionable dreſs, as will be manifeſt by Particulars.

(1.) As to the People.

(2.) As to the Miniſtry of our Church.

Sect. 4. (1.) Our preſent Diſſenters, who diſown the old Separation, yet make the Terms of Lay-Communion for Perſons, as Members of our Church, to be unlawful. For, Mr. B. in his late Plea for Peace, hath a whole Chapter of Reaſons againſt the Communion of Lay-men with our Church. And in the ſame Book, he ſaith, It is ſchiſmatical in a Church to deny Baptiſm, without the tranſient Sign of the Croſs, or for want of Godfathers, &c. or to deny the Communion to ſuch who ſcruple kneeling. Now if the Church be ſchiſmatical, then thoſe who ſeparate in theſe things are not. For, ſaith Mr. B. When the Laity cannot have their Children baptized without ſuch uſe of the tranſient dedicating Image of the Croſs; and ſuch uſe of entitling and covenanting Godfathers, which they take to be no ſmall ſin: Is it Separation to join with Paſtors that will otherwiſe baptize them? We ſee the Church is ſchiſmatical in requiring theſe things, and Mr. B. thinks the People bound to join with other Paſtors that will not uſe them: And what is this but formal Separation? But for all this, Mr. B. may hold, that total renouncing of Communion with our Church may be ſchiſmatical; for, he ſaith, it may be Schiſm to ſeparate from a Church that hath ſome ſchiſmatical Principles, Practices, and Perſons, if thoſe be not ſuch, and ſo great, as to neceſſitate our departure from them. But here Mr. B. ſaith, There is a neceſſity of departure, and to join with other Paſtors; and therefore he muſt hold a formal Separation: And as to the renouncing total Communion with our Church, that was never done by the greateſt Separatiſt. For they all held Communion in Faith with it: And even Brown, the Head of the old Separatiſts, thought it lawful to join with our Church in ſome Acts of Worſhip; and others thought they might join in Acts of private and Chriſtian-Communion, but not in Acts of Church Communion; others thought it lawful to join in hearing Sermons, and Pulpit-Prayers, though not in others; and yet were charged with Separation by the old Non-conformiſts. And if our preſent Diſſenters do hold the Terms of Communion with our Church to be unlawful, they muſt hold a neceſſity of Separation, or that Perſons may be good Chriſtians, and yet be no Members of any Church. For, if it be unlawful to communicate as Members of our Church, they muſt either not communicate at all, as Members of any Church, or as Members of a diſtinct and ſeparate Church from ours. If they declare themſelves Members of another Church, they own as plain a Separation, as the old Separatiſts ever did; if they do not, and yet hold it unlawful to communicate with our Churches as Members, then they are Members of no Church at all. So that, if they hold the Terms of our Communion unlawful; they muſt either be Separatiſts, or no good Chriſtians upon their own Principles. For, ſaith the Author of the Letter out of the Country; this were to exchange viſible Chriſtianity, for viſible (at leaſt negative) Paganiſm. Now that our preſent Diſſenters do hold the Terms of our Communion unlawful, they are more forward to declare, than I could have imagined. In my Sermon I mentioned ſome Paſſages, wherein it ſeemed clear to me, that ſome conſiderable Perſons among them did allow Lay-communion with our

our Church to be lawful: But they have taken a great deal of pains to undeceive me; ſome declaring in expreſs terms, That they look on the terms of our Communion as unlawful, and that there is a neceſſity of Separation from our Parochial Churches, and of joyning to other Congregations. And others ſaying, That ſuch a Conceſſion, viz. That they hold Communion with our Churches to be lawful, taken in their own ſenſe, will neither do them any harm, nor us any ſervice. For, as Mr. A. hath ſummed up the ſenſe of theſe Men. 1. Many of them declare ſo, and many declare otherwiſe,—— And it's as good an Argument to prove Communion unlawful, becauſe many declare againſt it, as 'tis to prove it lawful, becauſe many declare for it. 2. They declare Communion lawful, but, do they declare total Communion lawful? The ſame Perſons will tell us, that both theſe Propoſitions are true, Communion is lawful, and Communion is unlawful; Communion in ſome parts of Worſhip is ſo, in others not: And, 3. They will farther tell us, That Communion with ſome Pariſh Churches is lawful, with others unlawful; that there are not the ſame Doctrines preached, the ſame Ceremonies urged, the ſame rigid terms of Communion in all Churches exacted. And laſtly, that occaſional Communion is, or may be lawful, where a ſtated and fixed Communion is not ſo; and they give this Reaſon for their Judgment and Practice, becauſe to hold Communion with one Church, or ſort of Chriſtians, excluſively to all others, is contrary to their true Catholick Principles, which teach them to hold Communion, though not equally, with all tolerable Churches; and that there are ſome things tolerable, which are not eligible, wherein they can bear with much for Peace ſake, but chuſe rather to ſit down ordinarily with purer Adminiſtrations. Here we have the Principles of the new Separation laid together.

Miſchief of Impoſitions, &c. p. 36.

1. Many of them hold Communion with our Church unlawful; and that muſt be underſtood of any kind of Communion; for the ſecond ſort, from whom they are diſtinguiſhed, hold total Communion unlawful; and therefore this firſt ſort muſt hold Communion in any parts of Worſhip unlawful. And ſo they exceed the more moderate Separatiſts of Robinſon's, and the New-England way; and muſt fall into the way of the moſt rigid Separatiſts.

2. Thoſe that do hold Communion lawful, do it with ſo many reſtrictions and limitations, that in practice it amounts to little more than the other. For firſt, It is only with ſome Churches; and thoſe it ſeems muſt be ſuch, as do not hold to our Conſtitution; for he ſaith, The ſame Ceremonies are not urged in all Churches, nor the ſame rigid terms of Communion exacted, i. e. If any Churches among us comply with them, they can Communicate with them, i. e. if they break their own Rules, they can joyn with them. Is not this an admirable way of Communicating with our Churches? But, if our Churches hold to their Rule, and obſerve the Orders preſcribed, then it ſeems they renounce all Communion with them as unlawful. And what is this but to deny Communion with the Church of England? For unleſs Parochial Churches depart from the terms of Communion required by it, they will have no Communion with them.

And Mr. A. delivers this, not only as his own Opinion, but as the Senſe of the Party, That if moſt of the Preachers in the ſeparate Meetings were aſked their Judgments, about the lawfulneſs of joyning with the parochial Churches in all the parts of Worſhip, or in any excluſive to their joyning with other Aſſemblies, where the Goſpel Rule is more ſtrictly obſerved, they would flatly deny it. And he goes yet farther, when he ſaith, That the People cannot lawfully ſeparate from thoſe Churches whereof they are regu- larly Members, and from thoſe Paſtors, under whoſe Miniſterial Conduct their own free Election hath placed them, to joyn ordinarily and conſtantly with any other particular Churches. This is owning a plain and downright Separation, in as clear and diſtinct words as ever Johnſon or Ainſworth did. For, 1. He makes it to be their general ſenſe, That it is unlawful to communicate with our Churches ordinarily and conſtantly, or to be Members of our Churches: Which is the ſame thing which they ſaid, 2. He owns the ſetting up new and diſtinct Churches in plain oppoſition to ours. For he owns other Paſtors, other People, and a new Relation between theſe, by the choice of the one, and the conduct of the other. This is no mincing the matter, as Mr. B. often doth; but he ſpeaks it boldly, and with great aſſurance; and uſhers it in with, I have confidence contrary to his. I think no Man doubts of his Confidence, that ever looked into his Book; but in this matter he is ſo briſk, that he ſaith, He doth not queſtion that he ſhould carry it by the Poll. And is withal ſo indiſcreet as on this occaſion to triumph in the Poll of Non-conformiſts at Guidhall: as though all who gave their Votes there, had owned theſe Principles of Separation, for which, many of thoſe Gentlemen will give him little thanks, and is a very unſeaſonable boaſting of their Numbers.

(II.) All the difference then that ſeems to be left, is about the lawfulneſs of that which they call occaſional Communion. As to which, theſe things are to be obſerved. (1.) That it is practiſed by very few; eſpecially if Mr. A's Poll be allowed. (2.) That it ſignifies little, as to this matter, if Men be fixed Members of other Churches. For the denomination of their Communion is to be taken from thence, and not from an occaſional and accidental Preſence. For Communion with a Church, is joyning with a Church as a Member of that Church: And it is not occaſional Preſence at ſome parts of Worſhip, which makes a Man a Member of a Church. I ſuppoſe there are many occaſionally Preſent at Mr. A's, or Mr. B's Meetings, who renounce all Communion with them. A Proteſtant may be occaſionally preſent at ſome parts of Worſhip in the Roman Church, and that frequently too, to hear Sermons, &c. but, doth this make a Man to have Communion with the Church of Rome? Moſt of our Gentlemen who have travelled abroad, have been thus occaſionally preſent in ſome parts of the Romiſh Worſhip, at Rome and Paris; but they would think themſelves hardly dealt with, to be charged to have had Communion with the Church of Rome. And if they be urged with it, they will plead ſtill, They were of the Proteſtant Communion; and the Reaſon they will give, is, becauſe they did not joyn with them in all parts of their Worſhip; not in adoration of the Hoſt, or Worſhip of Images; and therefore they remained ſtill of the Proteſtant Communion, although they were occaſionally preſent at ſome parts of the Popiſh Service. And is it not the ſame caſe here, if Men only afford an occaſional Preſence, at ſome parts of our Worſhip? How comes this to make them more to have Communion with our Church, than the like preſence would make them to have Communion with the Roman Church? In the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, moſt of the Papiſts in England did offer an Occaſional Preſence at our Churches, in ſome parts of our Worſhip; and yet all that time were Members of the Roman Church, becauſe they kept their Prieſts, and had Maſs in private, and declared, That though they looked on our Service as tolerable, yet they thought the Roman more eligible; and ſo having full Communion with that, and being only occaſionally preſent at our Service, they thought themſelves good Catholicks. So, if Men do look on the ſeparate Meet- ings as more eligible, and a better way of Worſhip; with which they conſtantly joyn, and always chooſe to do it, their occaſional Preſence at our Aſſemblies, doth not make them Members of our Churches, but they ſtill remain Members of the ſeparate Congregations, if they maintain full and conſtant Communion with them. And none of the formed ſeparate Churches will look on any one as having Communion with them, for being occaſionally preſent at ſome parts of their Worſhip; for they ſay, That Heathens and Indians may have ſuch occaſional Communion with them; but they require from Perſons that are admitted to Communion with their Churches, a Submiſſion to all the Rules and Orders among them. The New-England Churches will ſuffer no Man to continue a Member of their Communion, that ſcruples Infant Baptiſm, or refuſes to be preſent at the Adminiſtration of it; although he be never ſo willing to be occaſionally preſent at all other parts of Worſhip with them. For not only openly condemning and oppoſing Infant-Baptiſm, but going about ſecretly to ſeduce others from the approbation or uſe thereof, or purpoſely departing the Congregation at the Adminiſtration of that Ordinance, is liable, by their Laws, to the Sentence of Baniſhment. And they have found it ſo neceſſary to twiſt the Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Intereſts together, that as none but Church Members are Freemen among them; ſo none that are baniſhed can retain their Church-Memberſhip. From all this, it appears, that this new Notion of Occaſional Communion, in ſome parts of Worſhip, excluſively to others, is diſowned by all ſorts of Churches; and is a late fancy taken up on purpoſe to avoid the charge of Separation.

Sect. 5. But we here meet with an excellent Reaſon for the lawfulneſs of this Occaſional Communion with our Churches; viz. becauſe to hold Communion with one Church excluſively to all others, is contrary to their true Catholick Principles, which teach them to hold Communion, though not equally, with all tolerable Churches, Or as Mr. B. expreſſes it, The benefit of Chriſtian Love and Concord may make it beſt, for certain ſeaſons, to joyn even in defective Modes of Worſhip, as Chriſt did in the Synagogues and Temple in his time: though the leaſt defective muſt be choſen, when no ſuch accidental Reaſons ſway the other way. From whence we may take notice, (1.) That no obligation to the Peace and Unity of this Church, as they are Members of it, doth bring them to this occaſional Communion with it, but a certain Romantick Fancy of Catholick Unity; by which theſe Catholick Gentlemen think themſelves no more obliged to the Communion of this Church, than of the Armenian or Abiſſine Churches. Only it happens, that our Church is ſo much nearer to them, than the others are, and therefore they can afford it more occaſional Communion. But I would ſuppoſe one of theſe Men of Catholick Principles to be at Jeruſalem, where he might have occaſional Communion with all ſorts of the Eaſtern Churches; and ſome of the Members of thoſe Churches ſhould aſk him, what Church he is Member of? If he ſhould anſwer, he could have occaſional Communion with all tolerable Churches, but was a fixed Member of none: Would they take ſuch a Man for a Chriſtian? What, a Chriſtian and a Member of no Church! That, they would all agree, was no part of Catholick Chriſtianity. And I much doubt, whether any of them would admit ſuch a one to occaſional Communion, that could not tell what Church he was Member of. For, as to the Church of England, he declares, That he holds only occaſional Communion with that, as he would do with any other tolerable Churches. But, were they not baptized in this Church, and received into Communion with it as Members of it? if ſo, then if they Commu-

Sacrileg. deſertion, p. 16

Communicate no otherwiſe with it, than as a tolerable defective Church, they muſt renounce their former Memberſhip; for that did oblige them to fixed and conſtant Communion with it. And if they do renounce their Memberſhip in this Church, their occaſional Preſence at ſome duties of Worſhip can never excuſe them from Separation. We thank them, that they are pleaſed to account our Churches tolerable, but we cannot ſee, how in any tolerable ſenſe they can be accounted Members of our Church; ſo that this great favour of occaſional Communion, which they do not chuſe but ſubmit to for ſome accidental reaſons, and ſome very good occaſions, is not worth the ſpeaking of among Friends; and ſo far from looking like Communion, that it hath hardly the face of a Civility.

(2.) That, if the leaſt defective way of Worſhip is to be choſen, as they ſay, then this occaſional Communion cannot be lawful above once or twice in a Man's Life: For that is ſufficient to ſhew their true Catholick Principles; and Mr. B. ſaith, When no ſuch accidental Reaſons do ſway, they are to chooſe the leaſt defective way of Worſhip; or as Mr. A. ſpeaks, To ſit down ordinarily with purer Adminiſtrations. If then a Man be bound, out of love to his Soul, to prefer the beſt way of Worſhip, and he judges the way of the ſeparate Congregations to be ſuch, there will ariſe a difficult caſe of Conſcience, concerning the lawfulneſs of this occaſional Communion. For the ſame Reaſons, which moved him to prefer one Communion above the other, will likewiſe induce him to think himſelf bound to adhere conſtantly to the one, and to forſake the other. And why ſhould a Man, that is acquainted with purer Adminiſtrations, give ſo much countenance to a defective way of Worſhip, and have any Communion with a Church which walks ſo diſorderly, and contrary to the Rules of the Goſpel; and not reprove her rather, by a total forbearance of her Communion? And why ſhould not thoſe general Rules of approving the things that are more excellent, and holding faſt that which is good, and not forſaking the Aſſembling themſelves together, perſuade ſuch a Man, that it is not lawful to leave the beſt Communion, merely to ſhew, what defective, and tolerable Church he can communicate with? Which is, as if a Man ſhould forſake his Muſkmelons, to let others ſee what Pumpions he can ſwallow; or to leave wholeſome Diet to feed on Muſhroms, and Traſh.

(3.) That here are no bounds ſet to the Peoples Fancies of purer Adminiſtrations, and leſs defective ways of Worſhip. So that there can be no ſtop to Separation in this way. Suppoſe ſome think our Churches tolerable, and Mr. B's or Mr. A's Meetings more eligible; but after a while, when the firſt reliſh is over, they afford occaſional Communion to the Anabaptiſts or Quakers, and then think their way more eligible, and the other only tolerable; are not theſe Men bound to forſake them, for the ſame Reaſons, by which they were firſt moved to leave our Communion, and joyn with them, unleſs they be ſecure, that the abſolute perfection of their way of Worſhip is ſo glaringly viſible to all Mankind, that it is Defence of the Cure of Diviſ. Introd. p. 50. impoſſible for them, either to find or fancy any defect in it? Mr. Baxter once very well ſaid, Separation will ruin the ſeparated Churches themſelves at laſt; it will admit of no conſiſtency. Parties will ariſe in the ſeparated Churches, and ſeparate again from them, till they are diſſolved.
Ibid. p. 170. Why might not R. Williams of New-England (mention'd by Mr. B.) proceed in his courſe of Separation from the Church of Salem, becauſe he thought he had found out a purer and leſs defective way of Worſhip than theirs; as well as they might withdraw from our Churches on the like pretence? Why might he not go on ſtill refining of Churches, till at laſt he diſſolved his Society, and declared, That every one ſhould have liberty to worſhip God according to the light of his own Conſcience? By which remarkable Inſtance, we ſee, that this Principle, when purſued, will carry Men at laſt to the diſſolution of all Churches.

Sect. 6. This I had objected to Mr. B. in my Letter, that upon his Principles the People might leave him to morrow, and go to Dr. O. and leave him next week, and go to the Anabaptiſts, and from them to the Quakers. To which Mr. B. anſwers; What harm will it do me or them, if any hearers go from me, as you ſay, to Dr. O. None, that I know. For, as Dr. O. ſaith, Since your practice is one and the ſame, your Principles muſt be ſo alſo, although you chuſe ſeveral ways of expreſſing them. But, did the whole force of my Argument lie there? Did I not mention their going from him to the Anabaptiſts and Quakers, upon the very ſame ground? And, is this a good way of anſwering, to diſſemble the main force of an Argument, that ſomething may ſeem to be ſaid to it? I ſuppoſe Mr. B's great haſte made him leave the beſt part of the Argument behind him. But I deſire him calmly to weigh and conſider it better; whether he doth think it reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that ſince the Peace and Unity of the Church is a thing of ſuch great importance, and Separation ſo miſchievous (as he hath repreſented it) that the Peoples apprehenſion of a leſs defective way of Worſhip, ſhall be ſufficient ground for them to break a Church in pieces, and to run into ways of Separation? Hath not Mr. Baxter repreſented (and no Man better) the Ignorance, Injudiciouſneſs, Pride, Conceitedneſs, and Unpeaceableneſs of the ordinary ſort of zealous Profeſſors of Religion? And after all this, muſt they, upon a conceit of purer Adminiſtrations, and leſs defective ways of worſhip, be at liberty to rend and tear a Church into pieces; and run from one ſeparate Congregation to another, till they have run themſelves out of breath, and left the beſt parts of their Religion behind them? How fully hath Mr. B. ſet forth the ungovernable and factious Humour of this ſort of People, and the pernicious conſequences of complying with them? and muſt the Reins be laid in their Necks, that they may run whither they pleaſe? Becauſe, forſooth, they know better, what is good for their Souls, than the King doth; and they love their Souls better than the King doth; and the King cannot bind them to hurt, or famiſh, or endanger their Souls. But why muſt the King bear all the blame, if Mens Souls be not provided for according to their own wiſhes? Doth the King pretend to do any thing in this matter, but according to the eſtabliſh'd Laws and Orders of this Church? Why did he not keep to the good old Phraſe of King and Parliament? And why did he not put it as it ought to have been, that they know what makes better for their own Edification, than the Wiſdom of the whole Nation in Parliament, and the Governours of this Church do? and let them make what Laws and Orders they will, if the People, even the raſh and injudicious Profeſſors, as Mr. B. calls them, do think other means of Edification better, and other ways of Worſhip leſs defective, they are bound to break through all Laws, and to run into Separation. And, how is it poſſible, upon theſe Terms, to have any Peace, or Order, or any eſtabliſh'd Church? I do not remember that any of the old Separatiſts, no not Barrow, or Johnſon, did ever lay down ſuch looſe Principles of Separation, as theſe are. The Browniſts declare, in their Apology, That none are to ſeparate for Faults and Corruptions, which may, and will fall out among Men, even in true conſtituted Churches, but by

by due order to ſeek the redreſs thereof. Where a Church is rightly conſtituted, here is no allowance of Separation for Defects and Corruptions of Men, although they might apprehend Smith or Jacob to be more edifying Preachers, than either Johnſon or Ainſworth. The ground of Separation with them, was the want of a right conſtituted Church; if that were once ſuppoſed, other Defects were never till now thought to be Chap. 13. good grounds of Separation. In the Platform of the Diſcipline of New-England, it is ſaid, That Church-Members may not depart from the Church as they pleaſe, nor without juſt and weighty cauſe, becauſe ſuch departure tends to the diſſolution of the Body.

Thoſe juſt Reaſons are,

1. If a Man cannot continue without ſin.
2. In caſe of perſecution.

Not one word of better means of Edification. For the Independents have wiſely taken care to ſecure their Members to their own Congregations, and not ſuffer them to wander abroad upon ſuch pretences, leſt ſuch liberty ſhould break them into diſorder and confuſion. So in their Declaration at the Savoy, they ſay, That Perſons joined in Church-fellowſhip, ought not lightly, or without juſt cauſe, to withdraw themſelves from the Communion of the Church, whereunto they are joined. Order of Congregational Churches, n. 28.

And they reckon up thoſe which they allow for juſt cauſes.

1. Where any Perſon cannot continue in any Church without his ſin, and that in three caſes.

First, Want of Ordinances.

Secondly, Being deprived of due Privileges.

Thirdly, Being compelled to any thing in practice, not warranted by the word.

2. In caſe of perſecution.
3. Upon the account of conveniency of habitation.

And in theſe caſes, the Church or Officers are to be conſulted, and then they may peaceably depart from the Communion of the Church. No allowance here made of forſaking a Church, merely for greater means of edification. And how juſt ſoever the reaſon were, they are civilly to take leave of the Church, and her Officers, and to tell them why they depart. Irenic. c.22. And Mr. Burroughs condemns it, as the direct way to bring in all kind of diſorder and confuſion into the Church. Yet this is now the main ſupport of the preſent Separation; and mere neceſſity hath driven them to it, for either they muſt own the Principles of the old Separatiſts, which they are unwilling to do, or find out others to ſerve their turn; but they are ſuch, as no Man, who hath any regard to the Peace and Unity of the Church, can ever think fit to maintain, ſince they apparently tend to nothing but diſorder and confuſion, as Mr. Burroughs truly obſerved. But what ground is there to ſuppoſe ſo much greater means of edification in the ſeparate Congregations? Anſwer to Letter, p. 18. ſince Mr. B. is pleaſed to give this Teſtimony to the preaching in our Pariſh-Churches; That, for his part, he hath ſeldom heard any, but very good, well ſtudied Sermons, in the Pariſh-Churches in London, where he hath been; but moſt of them are more fitted to well bred Scholars, or judicious Hearers, than to ſuch as need more practical Subjects, and a more plain, familiar, eaſie method. Is this the truth of the caſe indeed? then, for all that I can ſee, the King is excuſed from all blame in this matter, unleſs it be a fault to provide too well for them. And, is this a good ground for Separation, that the preaching is too good for the People? Some Men may want Cauſes to defend, but at this rate they can never want Arguments. Yet, methinks, the ſame Men ſhould not complain of ſtarving, and famiſhing Souls, when the only fault is, that the Meat is too good, and too well dreſſed for them. And on the other ſide, hath not Mr. B. complained publickly of the weakneſs and injudiciouſneſs of too many of the Non-conformiſt Preachers? and that he really fears, leſt mere Non-conformiſts have brought ſome into reputation as conſcientious, who, by weak preaching, will loſe the reputation of being judicious, more than their ſilence loſt it. And again, But verily the injudiciouſneſs of too many is for a lamentation. To which he adds, But the grand calamity is, that the moſt injudicious are uſually the moſt confident and ſelf-conceited, and none ſo commonly give way to their ignorant Zeal, to cenſure, backbite and reproach others, as thoſe that know not what they talk of. Let now any Reader judge, whether upon the ſtating of the caſe by Mr. B. himſelf, their having better means of edification, can be the ground of leaving our Churches, to go to ſeparate Congregations, unleſs injudiciouſneſs, and ſelf-conceited confidence and an ignorant Zeal may perhaps be more edifying to ſome capacities, and to ſome purpoſes, than judicious and well-ſtudied Sermons.

This Argument muſt therefore be quitted, and they who will defend the preſent Separation, muſt return to the old Principles of the Separatiſts, if they will juſtifie their own practices. And ſo I find Mr. B. is forced to do; for diſcerning that the pretence of greater edification would not hold of it ſelf, he adds more weight to it, and that comes home to the buſineſs, viz. That the People doubt of the Calling of the obtruded Men. This is indeed an Argument for Separation, and the very ſame, which Barrow, and Greenwood, and Johnſon, and Smith, and Can uſed. Now we are come to the old Point of defending the Calling of our Miniſtry, but we are miſtaken, if we think they now manage it after the ſame manner. We do not hear ſo much the old Terms of a Falſe and Antichriſtian Miniſtry; but if they do ſubſtitute others in their room, as effectual to make a Separation, but leſs fit to juſtifie it, the difference will not appear to be at all to their advantage.

Anſw. p. 18.

Sect. 7. 2. I come therefore to conſider the Principles of our new Separatiſts, as to the Miniſtry of our Church, and to diſcover, how little they differ from the old Separatiſts, when this matter is throughly enquired into, as to the Argument for Separation.

I. In general, they declare, That they only look on thoſe as true Churches, which have ſuch Paſtors whom they approve. How oft have I told you, ſaith Mr. B. that I diſtinguiſh, and take thoſe for true Churches, that have true Paſtors. But I take thoſe for no true Churches, that have,

Anſwer to my Sermon, p. 63.

1. Men uncapable of the Paſtoral Office.
2. Or not truly called to it.
3. Or that deny themſelves to have the power eſſential to a Paſtor.

And one or other of theſe he thinks moſt, if not all the Parochial Churches in England fall under.

You will ſay then, Mr. B. is a Rigid Separatiſt; and thinks it not lawful to join with any of our Parochial Congregations, but this is contradicted by his own practice.

There lies therefore a farther ſubtilty in this matter, for he declares in the ſame place, he can join with them notwithſtanding. But how? as true Churches, though he ſaith they are not: No, but as Chappels and Oratories, although they be not Churches, as wanting an eſſential part. This will bring the matter to a very good paſs, the Pariſh-Churches of England ſhall only be Chappels of Eaſe to thoſe of the Non-conformiſts. This, I confeſs, is a Subtilty beyond the reach of the old Browniſts, and Non-conformiſts, for they both took it for granted, that there was ſufficient ground for Separation, if our Churches were not true Churches, and the proof of that depended on the Truth of our Miniſtry. Now, ſaith Mr. B. Although our Parochial Congregations be not true Churches, becauſe they want an eſſential part, viz. a true Miniſtry, yet he can join with them occaſionally, as Chappels or Oratories. From whence it appears, that he accounts not our Parochial-Churches as true Churches, nor doth communicate with them as ſuch, but only looks on them as publick Places of Prayer, to which a Man may reſort upon occaſion, without owning any relation to the Miniſter, or looking on the Congregation as a Church, For, where he ſpeaks more fully, he declares, That he looks on none as true Churches, but ſuch as have the power of the Keys within themſelves, and hath a Biſhop or Paſtor over them with that Power, and any parochial Church that hath ſuch a one, and owns it ſelf to be independent, he allows to be a true Church, and none elſe. So that unleſs our Parochial-Churches, and Miniſters aſſume to themſelves Epiſcopal Power, in oppoſition to the preſent Conſtitution of our Church, as he apprehends, he at once diſcards them all from being true Churches: But I ſhall afterwards diſcover his miſtake as to the nature of our Parochial Churches; that which I only inſiſt on now is, That he looks on none of them as truly conſtituted Churches, or, as he calls it, of the political organized Form, as wanting an eſſential part, viz. a true Paſtor. From hence it neceſſarily follows, either that Mr. B. communicates with no true Church at all; or it muſt be a ſeparate Church; or, if he thinks himſelf bound to be a Member of a true Church, he muſt proceed to as great a Separation as the old Browniſts did, by ſetting up new Churches, in oppoſition to ours. It is no ſufficient Anſwer in this caſe, to ſay, That Mr. B. doth it not, for we are only to ſhew, what he is obliged to do by vertue of his own Principles, which tend to as much Separation, as was practiſed in former Times, and hath been ſo often condemned by Mr. B.

Sacrileg. deſert. p. 34. True way of Concord, Ch. 10.

Sect. 8. II. Suppoſe they ſhould allow our Parochial Churches in their Conſtitution to be true Churches, yet the Exceptions they make againſt the Miniſtens of our Churches are ſo many, that they ſcarce allow any, from whom they may not lawfully ſeparate.

1. If the People judge their Miniſters unworthy, or incompetent, they allow them liberty to withdraw, and to ſeparate from them. This I ſhall prove from many Paſſages in ſeveral Books of Mr. B. and others.

Firſt, They leave it in the Peoples power, notwithſtanding all legal Eſtabliſhments, to own or diſown whom they judg fit. Mr. B. ſpeaks his Mind very freely againſt the Rights and Patronage, and the Power of Magiſtrates in theſe caſes, and pleads for the unalterable Rights of the People, as the old Separatiſts did. God, ſaith Mr. B. in Nature and Scripture, hath given the People that conſenting power, antecedent to the Prince's determination, which none can take from them. Mr. A. ſaith, Every particular Church has an inherent right to chuſe its own Paſtors. D. O. makes the depriving the People of this Right, one of his grounds of Separation. So that although our Miniſters have been long in poſſeſſion of their Places, yet if the People have not owned them, they are at liberty to chuſe whom they pleaſe. How many hundred Congregations, ſaith Mr. B. have Incumbents, whom the People never conſented to, but take them for their hinderers and burden! So many hundred Congregations it ſeems are in readineſs for Separation.

Secondly, The People are made Judges of the worthineſs and competency of their Miniſters. This follows from the former. In caſe incompetent Paſtors be ſet over the People, ſaith Mr. B. though it be half the Pariſhes in a Kingdom, or only the tenth part, it is no Schiſm, ſaith he, but a Duty, for thoſe that are deſtitute, to get the beſt ſupply they can, i. e. to chuſe thoſe whom they judge more competent; and it is no Schiſm, but a Duty, for faithful Miniſters, though forbidden by Superiors, to perform their Office to ſuch People that deſire it. This is plain-dealing. But ſuppoſe the Magiſtrate ſhould caſt out ſome, and put in others; in that caſe he ſaith, If they be Men of untried and ſuſpected parts of fidelity, (of which the People are to be Judges) the Princes impoſition doth not make ſuch true Paſtors of the Church before, or without the Peoples conſent, nor doth it always bind the People to conſent, and to forſake their former Paſtors, nor prove them Schiſmaticks, becauſe they do it not.

Thirdly, They give particular Directions to the People, what ſort of Miniſters they ſhould own, and what not. Mr. B. bids the People not think that he is perſuading them to make no difference; but after he had ſet aſide the utterly inſufficient, and the heretical, (of which the People are admirable Judges) he lays down this general Rule, Any one whoſe Miniſtry is ſuch, as tendeth to deſtruction more than to edification, and to do more harm than good, is not to be owned. And if not to be owned ſo, then he is to be ſeparated from; and although he adviſeth the People to lay aſide partiality and paſſion; yet whether they will or not, they are left ſole Judges in this matter. And that we may not think all this to be only a Romantick Scheme, or Fiction, he tells us elſewhere, That they are not able to confute the People, in too many places, who tell them, that their publick Prieſts are ſo defective in their neceſſary Qualifications for their Office, as that they hold it unlawful to own ſuch for true Miniſters, and to encourage them by their preſence, or commit the care of their Souls to ſuch, i. e. in plain Terms, they are encouraged to Separation on this account, which is directly contrary to the Principles of the old Non-conformiſts, as appears at large by Mr. Ball, If, ſaith he, Can's meaning be, that it is not lawful to communicate in the Worſhip of God with Miniſters not fitly qualified, diſorderly called, or careleſly executing their Office and Function, then it is directly contrary to the word of Truth, ſound Reaſon, and conſent of all the Learned. With much more to that purpoſe. And even Mr. B. himſelf, when he takes upon him, as a Caſuiſt, to determine theſe things, doth then declare his Mind.

2. Nor all miniſterial Faults, but only thoſe that prove him or his Miniſtration utterly intolerable.

But now, if Mr. B. may be believed, the People need not be told, how great a number of Caſes there are among us, where the Miniſters are uncapable of the miniſterial Office, and therefore it is no ſin in them to judge him no Miniſter, and, conſequently, to ſeparate from him. Hath not Mr. B. fully ſet forth the Pride, Ignorance, Cenſoriouſneſs, Headineſs, Raſhneſs, of raw and injudicious Zealots? and after all this, is it fit or reaſonable, that the Opinion of ſuch Perſons be taken, concerning the Qualifications of their Miniſters? Hath not Mr. B. complained with more than ordinary reſentment, that they are ready to ſcorn, and vilifie the graveſt wiſeſt Paſtors? And, muſt ſuch Mens Judgments be taken, concerning the Abilities and Competency of their Miniſters? Either Mr. B.

hath extremely wronged them in the Characters he hath given of ſuch People; or he hath taken away all the reputation of their Judgment in ſuch Caſes: When they ſcorn and contemn the graveſt wiſeſt Paſtors, are they fit to judge of Miniſterial Abilities? But there are graver and wiſer among the People. Suppoſe that; but doth not Mr. B. ſay, That the raweſt and raſheſt Profeſſors are commonly the moſt violent and cenſorious? Theſe are the bold and forward Men, that will judge in ſpite of the reſt; theſe are the Men that need not be told, what numbers of uncapable Miniſters there are among us. And it doth not become Mr. B.'s Gravity or Wiſdom to hearken to all the Cenſures and malicious Reports of ſuch ignorant and heady Zealots, (as he calls them) about the unworthineſs or incapacity of their Miniſters. Are they only the grave and wiſe Paſtors among themſelves, which are ſcorned by ſuch Men? It is poſſible, that thoſe may be grave and wiſe among us too, whom they cenſure for incompetent Men; or muſt the ſame People which are raw and injudicious, ignorant and cenſorious, proud and ſelf-conceited, when they make their Judgment of them, be of a ſudden turned into grave and wiſe Men, when they paſs their Judgment upon the Abilities and Fitneſs of our Preachers? This doth not look like fair and equal dealing. I pray let our Miniſters have a fair hearing, and let the matter be well examined, before the People be thus encouraged to ſeparate from their Miniſters for their Diſabilities, or Unworthineſs. But ſuppoſe there be too great a number of young, raw, injudicious Preachers, as Mr. B. ſaith, no Man can deny, that knoweth England, and hath any modeſty. Is there no way, but to your Tents, O Iſrael? Will nothing but Separation ſerve your turn? Is this the way to mend the matter, and to make them grave and wiſe? Doth not Mr. B. confeſs, That they have too many ſuch among themſelves? Muſt they ſeparate from them too? What endleſs confuſions do ſuch Principles tend to? But the bottom of all is, this Separation muſt be juſtified one way or other; and ſuch Principles found out, which may ſeem to do it. Yet, after all, what is this to the preſent caſe of Separation in this City? for here the charge was laid, and to this the Anſwer muſt be given, or it is to no purpoſe. Is it any reaſon, that near half of ſome Pariſhes in London, ſhould ſeparate from their grave and wiſe Paſtors, ſuch as I know ſome to be, where this caſe is; becauſe in Cornwal, or Yorkſhire, or Northumberland, there are many raw and injudicious, beſides ſcandalous Prieſts, as Mr. B. ſpeaks? We urge you particularly with the London Separation, you tell us what the People ſay of the Inſufficiency and Unworthineſs of the Clergy in other Parts of England; ſuppoſe it true, what is all this to the buſineſs? If you perſiſt in this way, we can name the Pariſhes to you in London, where the Miniſters are Men of unexceptionable Learning and Piety; where the Churches are large enough to receive the People that ſeparate; as well as thoſe that come, and yet they forſake the Church's Communion, and adhere to the ſeparate Congregations: Tell us plainly in this caſe, is this Separation lawful or not? If it be lawful, to what purpoſe do you make uſe of ſo many ſhifts and evaſions, as to great Pariſhes, and inſufficient and ſcandalous Prieſts, in other parts of the Nation? Anſwer to the caſe propoſed, and to the place where the charge was laid, and think not to eſcape by ſuch apparent evaſions, and impertinencies as theſe. If you think ſuch a Separation unlawful, then why do you pretend to confute my Sermon, which was deſigned purpoſely againſt it?

Sect. 9. But while you plead for this liberty of the Peoples ſeparating upon their Judgment of their Miniſters Abilities and Fitneſs, you can never ſecure them from Separation from any Church or Miniſters whatſoever. And no ſetled Church in the World could ever ſubſiſt long, without infinite diſorder and confuſion, if this were allow'd. For Mr. B. thinks them uncapable of the Miniſterial Office in the Peoples Judgment.

1. Who have not tolerable Miniſterial Knowledge, or Utterance. *Anſw.p.*50.
2. Who are Heretical.
3. Who malignantly oppoſe ſerious Religion as Hypocriſie, or a needleſs thing.
4. Who by their wicked Lives do more hurt than they do good. From ſuch, ſaith he, St. Paul bids them turn away.

And of all theſe things the People are to be Judges, and ſo may ſeparate, (1.) When they are unſatiſfied about the Miniſterial Knowledge, or Utterance of their Miniſters. As for their Utterance, we may allow them to be Judges of that; but I never heard before, that St. Paul did bid People turn away from their Miniſters, if their Utterance were not thought to be tolerable. For he intimates, that ſome complained of his Utterance, and had him in contempt for it. But as to Abilities and Knowledge fit for Miniſters, are not the People admirable Judges? How few, how very few, even of thoſe of the People who pretend moſt to Knowledge in Religion, have any tolerable underſtanding of the true Principles, and right notion of it? I do not ſpeak only of Artificers and Tradeſmen, but of thoſe of better education, who either by Prejudices, or want of due application of their Minds to ſuch things, are ſubject to great Miſtakes about Religion, and yet may be very good Men: If ſuch as theſe are ſo unfit to judge of Miniſterial Knowledge, and the Doctrines of Religion, what ſhall we ſay to the common ſort of raw and injudicious Profeſſors of Religion? Mr. B.'s experience in the World is not ſo little, as not to know and be ſenſible of the truth of this, among the People moſt apt to divide and ſeparate. Is it not then a ſtrange thing he ſhould thus ſubject the Judgment of Miniſterial Knowledge to ſuch a company of Triers as theſe? But ſuppoſe they do allow their Miniſters to paſs for Men of tolerable Abilities, and reaſonable good Utterance, there is a harder Taſk yet behind, and that is, to approve themſelves to the People, to be Sound and Orthodox: For, ſaith Mr. B. (2.) If they be Heretical, they may, without ſin, ſeparate from them. But how ſhall a Man eſcape being thought Heretical by the People, if they have a mind to make him ſo, i. e. if he croſſeth their humour, and delivers ſuch Doctrine as doth not pleaſe them, for that is generally their Standard for Hereſie? And they cannot well have any other, unleſs you will ſuppoſe all the People to be learned Divines, and every Man obliged to read and underſtand Epiphanius and Binius, and then perhaps they may be competent Judges of Hereſie, and come at laſt to be even with the Divines for having been their Judges ſo long in that matter. Let us now ſuppoſe a Perſon of great value and eſteem among them for his other Miniſterial Abilities, ſhould happen to be thought unſound in the Point of Juſtification, and to draw too near to the Papiſts in it! and this not only be ſaid by the common People, but they are abetted and encouraged in it, by the greateſt part of their Teachers, who tell them, this is a fundamental Point, Articulus ſtantis & cadentis Eccleſiæ; that they had as good give up the Cauſe of Reformation, as yield in that matter, as ſome have ſaid; I would fain know in this Caſe, whether upon Mr. B.'s Principles, the People are not bound to ſeparate from ſuch a Man, notwithſtanding his other Abilities?

The like may happen as to many other Doctrines, which the People are as incompetent Judges of, as they are in this matter. Let us yet ſuppoſe that ſuch a Man may paſs for ſound in the main among the People; what ſhall we ſay to him, if under pretence of curing Diviſions he expoſes good People, and lays open with great freedom and plainneſs their factious, turbulent, cenſorious, ungovernable humor; not omitting their Injudiciouſneſs, but forgetting all the while that theſe ſame injudicious People (with all their other faults) were once his Electors, and are ſtill his Judges; ſuppoſe, that he tells the World, That for their Ignorance, Injudiciouſneſs, Pride and Self-conceitedneſs, they are their grief and their ſhame; that they are endanger'd by Diviſions, principally becauſe the ſelf-conceited part of the religious People will not be ruled by their Paſtors; that it is they that tempt the Papiſts to uſe Fire and Faggot that will not be ruled, nor kept in concord by the wiſeſt, and holieſt, and moſt ſelf-denying Miniſters upon earth. Notwithſtanding all theſe very kind words of themſelves, do not we think ſuch People would call all this reviling, and reproaching the People of God, and ſay, That ſuch Men do malignantly oppoſe ſerious Godlineſs as Hypocriſie; and let their Lives be what they will, they do more hurt than good; and therefore by Mr. B.'s own Rules, they are bound to ſeparate from the wiſeſt, the holieſt, the moſt ſelf-denying Miniſters upon earth. Which I think is ſufficient for the preſent to ſhew the miſchievous conſequence of putting ſo great a power of Judgment, and Separation upon it, into the hands of the People.

Sect. 10. But this is not all the encouragement to Separation, which is given to the People, by their power of judging, and withdrawing from their Miniſters, for,

2. They inſinuate, That the whole Body of the conforming Clergy is guilty of ſuch Faults, as the People may lawfully ſeparate from them, as will appear by theſe Particulars.

Firſt, They make Conformity it ſelf to be a very ſcandalous thing, and then tell the People over and over, It is no ſin to ſeparate from ſcandalous Prieſts; eſpecially when the Scandal is notorious, as it is in this caſe, Mr. B. goes about to prove this by many Arguments, when he writes in the Name of the Party; now let us ſee what Judgment they paſs upon Conformity. In one place he ſaith, That the love of Peace, and the fear of frightning any farther from Pariſh-Communion than I deſire, (as though ſuch Suggeſtions did not do it enough) do oblige me to forbear ſo much as to deſcribe or name the additional Conformity; and that ſin which Non-conformiſts fear, and fly from, which maketh it harder to us that deſire it to draw many good People to Communion with the Conformiſts than it was of old. No doubt of it, if you give ſuch broad intimations as theſe are, what a horrible ſcandalous ſin Conformity is. Nay, he maketh it an inexcuſable ſin, when he ſaith, in the Preface to his Plea, That more like truth hath been ſaid for the lawfulneſs of Anabaptiſtry, Poligamy, Drunkenneſs, Stealing, and Lying, in caſe of neceſſity, than any thing he ever yet read of all that he hath there deſcribed, i. e. full Conformity. He chargeth us down-right with Lying, and by conſequence, with Perjury, and tells me of thirty tremendous Aggravations of the ſin of Conformity, among which are Lying and Perjury, and not only that, but drawing on our ſelves the guilt of many thouſand Perjuries, (by declaring, claring, That the Covenant doth not oblige.) But I do not queſtion, if Mr. B. pleaſed, he could find out forty or fifty as tremendous Aggravations of the ſin of Separation. For never did any Man lay more load than he, upon whatever he oppoſes, without conſidering how it may fall upon himſelf at laſt; and how eaſie it is to return ſuch heaps of Aggravations. And it was well ſaid by one of Mr. B.'s Adverſaries concerning him, That be the Controverſie what it will, he can make his Adverſary differ with him about the exiſtence of God and Chriſt, a Heaven and Hell. Anſwer to Sacrileg. deſertion, p. 13. Which I have found too true, by my experience in this caſe, for without any colour or pretence in the World that I know of, but only by declaring againſt Separation, he tells me, That he is ſo far paſt doubt, on the other ſide, as that he thinks I overthrow all Religion, and ſet up Man in rebellion againſt God. Anſw. p. 19. But the worſt is, that he would make me ſay, which I never ſaid or thought, That all publick Worſhip is ſinful, when forbidden; and then on he runs with a mighty torrent, Daniel may go to the Lions; the Martyrs, Fathers, Counſels, the univerſal Church are all fooliſher than the meaneſt of his Auditors. I wonder he did not give me thirty tremendous Aggravations of Atheiſm and Hobbiſm. For he doth in effect charge me with them; for it follows, It's ſtrange that he can be ſure, God's Word is true, and yet be ſo ſure, that Mens Laws are above it, and may ſuſpend it. Did I ever in my Life ſay the leaſt thing tending that way? I abhor and deteſt ſuch Principles, as ſet Man's Laws above God's. And when I gave him the State of the Controverſie about Separation, I ſuppoſed an Agreement in all the Subſtantials of Religion, between the diſſenting Parties and our Church. How then could he poſſibly infer from hence, that I ſet Man's Laws above God's? The Queſtion is not, whether all publick Worſhip be ſinful, when forbidden? but whether in a Nation profeſſing true Religion, ſome publick Worſhip may not be forbidden? If not, then an univerſal, unlimited Toleration of Turks, Jews, Papiſts, Socinians, Ranters, &c. muſt follow. If ſome may be forbidden, then another Queſtion follows, viz. Whether ſuch publick Worſhip, as may have an evil in it, antecedent to that Prohibition, may not be forbidden? viz. ſuch as tends to Idolatry, Sedition, Schiſm, &c. and if this be allowed, then it comes to this at laſt, whether ſuch Meetings are guilty of any of theſe faults, and if they be, whether the Magiſtrate, ſo judging, may not juſtly forbid them? And this is the utmoſt that matter can be driven to; which I here mention, to let the Reader underſtand, what little cauſe there is to dread Mr. B.'s thirty Aggravations of the ſin of Conformity; which are built on as ſlight grounds as this heavy charge againſt me; for the ſake of which I ſhall hardly ever dread his Aggravations more. But the ſting of theſe Aggravations follows. If the People think, (though they ſhould miſtake) that all the Conformiſts are guilty of the like, can you wonder, if they prefer leſs guilty Paſtors to truſt the conduct of their Souls with? Anſw. p. 50. Now the true Reaſon of Separation is come out at laſt. Our Conformity is a horrible ſcandalous ſin with them, and therefore they muſt chuſe better Paſtors. Is not this juſt the old Browniſts Argument? The Miniſtery of the Church of England is a corrupt and ſinful Miniſtery, and therefore we muſt not communicate with them, but chuſe more honeſt and faithful Guides: But let me aſk Mr. B. ſuppoſing all this to be true, Is it lawful to communicate with Conformiſts or not? If it be not lawful, then he condemns his own practice, and takes away occaſional Communion; if it be lawful, how comes Separation to be lawful, ſince that is never lawful, but when it is neceſſary? as it will be proved afterwards.

Sect. 11. 2. They make moſt of the preſent Miniſters of the Church of England to be Uſurpers; and from ſuch they ſay, they may lawfully Anſw.p.49. ſeparate. Is it Separation, ſaith Mr. B. to refuſe Paſtors that are Uſurpers, and have no true Power over them? But who are theſe Uſurpers among us, ſince we have a legal Eſtabliſhment, and we thought Law and Uſurpation contrary to each other? But notwithſtanding Law, it is determin'd, Firſt, All that come into the places of ejected Miniſters are Uſurpers, at Anſw.p.54. leaſt to as many of the People, as do not conſent to their coming in: How prove you, ſaith Mr. B. that the relation of the ejected London-Miniſters and their Flocks, was diſſolved, and that the ſucceeders, were true Paſtors Plea for Peace, p.55. to the Non-conſenting Flock? When faithful Paſtors, ſaith he in his Plea, Anſw.p.44. (written in the name of the Party, and by conſent, as he ſaith, of many of his Acquaintance) are in poſſeſſion, if a lawful Magiſtrate caſt them out, and put others in their places, of untried or ſuſpected Parts or Fidelity.

I. The Prince's Impoſition maketh not ſuch true Paſtors of that Church, before, or without the Peoples conſent.

II. Nor will it always bind the People to conſent, and to forſake their former Paſtors, nor prove them Schiſmaticks, becauſe they do it not.

The bottom of all this, is, they are Uſurpers, to whom the People do not conſent in any particular Pariſh, although the whole Nation in Parliament conſented to the paſſing of a Law for removal of ſome Paſtors, and putting in of others. And what dangerous conſequences there may be of ſuch Principles as theſe, I leave others to judge. For upon theſe 1 Kings, 2. 35. grounds, when Salomon deprived Abiathar, and put Zadock in his room, any part of the People might have pleaded, They never conſented to Zadok*'s coming in, and therefore he was their High-Prieſt ſtill*; let Salomon do what he would; he could not diſſolve the relation between them, without their own conſent. For the Queſtion is not, whether Abiathar did not deſerve to be put out, but to whom it belonged to do it, whether to the King, or the People? And whether any part of the People might ſtill own that relation which he had before to them, without palpable diſobedience and contempt of Autority? Eſpecially if the People had given their own conſent, and the thing had been done not only by Salomon, but by the States of Iſrael, as it was in our caſe. They who diſcern not the ill conſequences of ſuch Aſſertions as to our Government, have very little inſight into Affairs. For it follows, that a ſmall part of the People may diſown the publick Acts of Parliament, and chuſe other Governours to themſelves, in oppoſition to thoſe eſtabliſhed by Law; and why they ſhould not do it, upon an equal pretence in other caſes, I do not underſtand. For there is no more colour for the Peoples reſuming their right, eſpecially a ſmall part againſt the whole, in one caſe then in the other. Which makes we wonder at thoſe who dare call them Uſurpers, who enjoy their places by the ſame Laws, that any Men do enjoy their Eſtates. And they who aſſert, That the People are bound, notwithſtanding the Miſchief of Impoſitions, Preface. Laws, to adhere to their former Paſtors, as Mr. A. doth, who ſaith, They judge it their unqueſtionable duty to abide in that relation to their ejected Paſtors, do not only aſſert a power in a handful of People to act againſt eſtabliſhed Laws, paſſed by general conſent in Parliament, but overthrow the ſettlement of our Church upon the Reformation. For, the Papiſts then had the very ſame Plea, that theſe Men have now, viz.

That the Magiſtrate could not diſſolve the relation between their former Church Guides and them; and therefore notwithſtanding Acts of Parliament, they were ſtill bound to adhere to them. For the Magiſtrate had no power in ſuch matters, and the real Schiſm was to withdraw from thoſe Guides; juſt as Mr. A. ſpeaks concerning the ejected Miniſters. So much do theſe Men, in purſuing the Intereſts of their Parties, overthrow the Principles of the Reformation. For either the Magiſtrate hath a Power to ſilence ſome Miniſters, and to put others in their places, or he hath none: if he hath none, then, what becomes of the Juſtice of the Reformation, when the Popiſh Biſhops and Prieſts were ejected, and others put into their places? If they ſay, He hath a juſt power in ſome caſes, but not in theirs. Is not this a Plea common to all? For whoever thought themſelves juſtly ejected? Or that they did any thing which deſerved ſo ſevere a puniſhment? What then is to be done in this caſe, if Men think themſelves unjuſtly caſt out? The old Non-conformiſts ſaid, They ought to ſit down quietly, with this ſatisfaction, that there were others to preach the word of God ſoundly, although they did not. They might by joining in their private Capacities in Communion with our Churches, and drawing the People to it by their example and encouragement, have done more good both to the People, and to this Church, than I fear their publick preaching in oppoſition to the Laws hath done to either. But if they go upon ſuch principles as theſe, That the Magiſtrate had no rightful power to eject them, that others are Uſurpers who come in their places, that the People are ſtill bound to own them in their former relation notwithſtanding the Laws; and that 'tis Schiſm to ſeparate from them, notwithſtanding that they confeſs the true Religion is maintained and preached in our publick Aſſemblies, I leave it to others to determine how conſiſtent ſuch Principles are with the ſubmiſſion Men owe to Government, or that peaceable behaviour which becometh Chriſtians. This I the rather inſiſt upon, becauſe I find not only Mr. B. and Mr. A. aſſerting it, but that it is made the ſtanding Plea for the neceſſity of the preſent Separation, among thoſe who do not hold all Communion with our Churches unlawful. So the lateſt of my Anſwerers makes a Queſtion, Whether they can be ſaid to erect new Churches, or proceed to the forming of ſeparate Congregations, who were true Miniſters, and had their Congregations before others came into their places? If they had done nothing worthy of ejection, or excluſion from their Miniſtry, whether they have not ſtill a right to exerciſe their Function. And conſequently, whether others may not as juſtly be ſaid to draw away their People from them, as they are charged with the ſame practice? There is not one word in all this Plea but might have equally ſerved the Papiſts in the beginning of the Reformation. For the Law ſignifies nothing with them in any caſe where themſelves are concerned, if Miniſters be ejected without or againſt Law, they who come into their places are no Uſurpers; and if they are caſt out by Law, they that ſucceed them are Uſurpers; ſo that the Law is always the leaſt thing in their conſideration.

Rector of Sutton, &c. p. 26.

Secondly, All thoſe who come into any Paſtoral Charge, whether Biſhops by virtue of the King's Nomination, or others by the Preſentation of Patrons, are Uſurpers, unleſs the People be pleaſed to give their free conſent; and if they do it not, they may lawfully withdraw from them. For, ſaith Mr. B. the People have an antecedent Right to conſent, which none can take from them. And he ſaith, he hath proved it by many Canons, that he was no Biſhop, that was not choſen by the Clergy and the the People; or came in without the Peoples conſent. Nay, if they have the conſent of ſome, and not of the greater part, thoſe who did not conſent, may proceed to chooſe another Biſhop, if Mr. B. ſay true. For theſe are his words. If a Dioceſs have a Thouſand or 600, or 300 Pariſh Plea, p. 81, 82. Paſtors, and a Hundred thouſand or a Million of People (or 50000 or 20000, as ye will ſuppoſe) and if only a dozen or 20 Preſbyters, and a thouſand People (or none) chuſe the Biſhop, this is not the Election or Conſent of the Dioceſan Church; nor is it Schiſm for twenty thouſand to go againſt the Votes of two thouſand. Therefore if they have ſo much the advantage in polling, as Mr. A. ſuggeſts, there is nothing hinders them, but that in ſpite of Laws, they may proceed to the choice of new Biſhops, and new Paſtors of Churches, wherever they think they can make the Majority. For this is an inherent and unalterable right in the People, ſay they, to chooſe their own Paſtors. Again, ſaith Mr. B. in Ibid. the name of the Party in his Plea, If Biſhops that have no better a Foundation,

i. e. that come in by the King's Nomination, and not by the Majority of the People, ſhall impoſe inferior Paſtors or Preſbyters on the Pariſh Churches, and command the Peoples acceptance and obedience, i. e. if they give them Inſtitution upon a Patron's preſentation, the People are not bound to accept and obey them by any Authority that is in that command as ſuch; nor is it Schiſm to diſobey it, no more than it is Treaſon to reject the Uſurper of a Kingdom. It is plain then, all Biſhops of the King's Nomination, all Miniſters preſented by Patrons are mere Uſurpers: the People may give them a good Title if they pleaſe; but they are not to blame Anſw. p. 49. if they do it not. For in them, Mr. B. ſaith, the chief Power is, and ſometimes he tells them, they are bound to ſeparate; however, while they Plea, p. 82. *do not conſent, they are no Churches, which they are ſet over; and it is no
Schiſm ſo to pronounce them; nor to deny them Communion proper to a Church.*
Is not this an excellent Plea for Peace; and the true and only way of Concord, which lays the foundation for all imaginable Diſorders and Confuſions, only that they might have ſome pretence for their preſent Separation?

Sect. 12. 3. Suppoſe the Biſhops and Clergy have gained the conſent (implicit at leaſt) of the People, and ſo are no Uſurpers, yet if they be Perſecutors, or Ithacian Prelatiſts, i. e. if they either act towards, or approve of the ſilencing Non-conformiſts, the People may Separate from them.
When Mr. B. wrote the Defence of his Book, called, The Cure of Diviſions, to ſatisfie the People who were much diſpleaſed with him for it; Preface to Defence of his Cure, p 9. one of the material Queſtions, he aſks about his Book, is, Is there a word to perſuade you to Communion with Perſecutors? As though that had been an unpardonable Crime. In the Plea he ſaith, If any Excommunicate perſons Plea, p. 42. for not complying with them in ſin, i. e. Conformity, *but alſo proſecute them with Mulcts, Impriſonments, Baniſhments, or other Proſecution, to force them to tranſgreſs, this were yet more heinouſly aggravated Schiſm:
and therefore it is no ſin to ſeparate from ſuch.* And how eaſily Men are drawn in to the guilt of this perſecution, appears by the example he makes of me, for although I expreſly ſet aſide the caſe of Miniſters, and declared, Anſw. p. 61. I intended only to ſpeak of Lay-communion; yet he charges me with engaging my ſelf in the ſilencing deſign. And by ſuch conſequences, all that ſpeak againſt Separation may be ſeparated from, as Proſecutors, and Ithacian Prelatiſts.

Sect. 13. 4. As long as they ſuppoſe the terms of our Communion to be ſinful, they ſay, the Schiſm doth not lye on thoſe that ſeparate, but on thoſe that do impoſe ſuch terms; and therefore they may lawfully ſeparate from ſuch impoſers. This is the moſt colourable Plea hath been yet uſed by them. But in this caſe, we muſt diſtinguiſh between terms of Communion plainly and in themſelves ſinful; and ſuch which are only fancied to be ſo through prejudice, or wilful Ignorance, or Error of Conſcience. That there is a real diſtinction between theſe two, is evident; and that it ought to be conſidered in this caſe, appears from hence, that elſe there can be no ſinful Separation under an erroneous Conſcience. As ſuppoſe ſome Men ſhould think that Preaching by an Hour-glaſs, and much more praying by one, was a ſtinting of the Spirit in point of Time, as praying by a Form was in point of words; and all Men ſhould be required to begin the publick Worſhip at ſuch an Hour, and ſo end at ſuch an Hour; time being a neceſſary circumſtance, our Brethren grant, that the Magiſtrate or Church may lawfully determine it. Here is then a lawful Impoſition; and yet the Quakers may really judge it to be ſinful; and declare they cannot communicate unleſs this ſinful Impoſition be removed; for it is againſt their Conſciences to have the Spirit limited to any certain time? on whoſe ſide doth the Schiſm lie in this caſe? Not on the Impoſers, becauſe they grant ſuch an impoſition lawful; therefore it muſt lie on thoſe that ſeparate, although they judge ſuch terms of Communion ſinful. If therefore the determination of other things not forbidden be really as much in the Magiſtrates and Churches Power, as the neceſſary circumſtances of time and place, &c. then Mens apprehending ſuch terms of Communion to be ſinful will not hinder the guilt of Separation from lying on their ſide, and not on the impoſers. Becauſe it is to be ſuppoſed, that where there is no plain prohibition, Men may with ordinary care and judgment, ſatisfie themſelves of the lawfulneſs of things required. As for inſtance, when the Church of Rome impoſeth the Worſhip of Images, we have the plain prohibition of the Second Commandment to prove that it is really a ſinful Condition of Communion; but when our Church requireth the conſtant uſe of a Liturgy, and Ceremonies, which are now pleaded as ſinful Conditions of Communion, where is the prohibition? In the ſame Second Commandment ſay ſome. I deſire them to read it over to me. They do ſo. Where, ſay I, are the words that forbid a Liturgy, or Ceremonies? I am miſtaken, they tell me, it is not in the words, but in the ſenſe. I aſk, how we ſhould come by the ſenſe, but from the words? Yes, they ſay, there are certain Rules for interpreting the Commandments. Are they divine or human? Where are they to be found? What are thoſe Rules? One, they ſay, is, that where any thing is forbidden, ſomething is commanded. So ſay I, there is here a Command to worſhip God without an Image. What is there more? Yes, ſay they, (1.) That we muſt not worſhip God with our own Inventions; now Liturgies and Ceremonies are Mens Inventions. But, I ſay, no Inventions are condemned in the Worſhip of God, but ſuch as God himſelf hath ſomewhere forbidden; but he hath no where forbidden theſe. And human Inventions are forbidden in this Commandment in the Worſhip of God; but then (1.) They are ſuch inventions which go about to repreſent God, and ſo to diſparage him; and no other inventions are to be underſtood, than the Reaſon of the Law doth extend to, i. e. not ſuch which are conſiſtent with the ſpiritual and inviſible Nature of God. (2.) They are not ſuch as do relate to the manner or form of Worſhip, ſuppoſing the Worſhip it ſelf be performed in a way agreeable to the divine Nature and

Plea, p. 42.

Law. For otherwiſe all uſe of Mens Inventions, as to preaching, or reading, or interpreting Scripture, would be forbidden. And then this Interpretation of the Second Commandment would be unlawful, becauſe it is a mere Invention of Men; as much as Liturgies, or Ceremonies.

By this we ſee, what ſtretching and forcing of Scripture there muſt be, to make Liturgies or Ceremonies unlawful terms of Communion; and that Men muſt firſt blind and fetter their Minds by certain prejudices of Education, or Reading only one ſort of Books, and taking ſome things for granted which they ought not, before they can eſteem the terms of Communion required by our Church to be ſinful: and therefore the Schiſm doth not lye on the Impoſers ſide, but upon thoſe who ſuffer themſelves firſt to be ſo eaſily deluded, and then ſeparate from our Church upon it. But there is another plain inſtance in this caſe, wherein our Brethren themſelves will not allow the Schiſm to lie on the impoſers ſide; and that is of thoſe who deny the lawfulneſs of Infant-baptiſm. Many of whom pretend to do it with as much ſincerity and impartiality, as any of our Brethren can deny the lawfulneſs of Liturgy or Ceremonies: if they break Communion rather than allow what they judge to be ſinful, on whoſe ſide doth the Schiſm lie, on theirs that require the allowance of it, as a condition of Communion, or not? If on the Impoſer's ſide, they muſt condemn themſelves, who blame the Anabaptiſts for their Separation. And ſo did Fr. Johnſon, and ſo did the New-England Churches. From whence it appears, that they do all agree, that where Men through miſtake do judge thoſe to be ſinful terms of Communion which are not, the guilt of Schiſm doth not lie on the Impoſer's ſide, but on thoſe that ſeparate. Therefore, this matter of Schiſm cannot be ended by the Plea of Conſcience judging the conditions to be ſinful, but by evident and convincing Proofs that they are ſo; but till theſe are brought forth, which never yet were, or ever will be, they muſt bear the blame of the Schiſm, if they ſeparate on theſe accounts.

Thus I have faithfully repreſented the Principles of thoſe who allow occaſional Preſence in our Churches, rather than Communion with them; which I have diſcover'd to be of that Nature, as leads Men to the greateſt Separation.

Sect. 14. There are others who deal more openly and ingenuouſly, and ſo need the leſs pains to diſcover their minds, and thoſe are,

II. Such who do in terms aſſert all Acts of Communion with our Churches to be unlawful. But there is a difference among theſe; For,

Firſt, Some allow hearing Sermons in our publick Aſſemblies, and joyning in the Pulpit Prayers; but not in the Liturgy, or any proper Act of Church-Communion. This I have ſhewed, was the Opinion of Robinſon, and the New-England Churches; and was lately owned by Mr. Ph. Nye, who wrote a Diſcourſe about it, and anſwered all Objections. Yea, he goes ſo far, as to own the publick preaching, as a great bleſſing to the Nation; and he thinks, the Diſſenters and their Families are bound to frequent, (as they have liberty and opportunity) the more publick and National Miniſtry. But towards the end of his Treatiſe he confeſſes the generality of their People, to be of another opinion; which he imputes to the activity of the Jeſuits among them; and he was a very ſagacious Man.

Secondly, Others hold it unlawful to joyn with our Churches in any Acts of publick Worſhip. And ſome are arrived to that height, that one of my Anſwerers confeſſeth, That they refuſe to hear him, becauſe he owns many many Parochial Churches to be true Churches, It ſeems then, they not only think it unlawful to hear us, but to hear thoſe who think it lawful; and the next ſtep will be to ſeparate from thoſe who do not ſeparate from them, that own many Parochial Churches to be true Churches.

Several Books have been publiſhed to prove it unlawful to hear our Miniſters preach: and theſe proceed upon the old Arguments of the former Separatiſts; as may be ſeen at large in a Book called Jerubbaal: whoſe Author goes about to prove our Worſhip Idolatry, and our Miniſters Antichriſtian; which Mr. Nye was ſo far from owning, that he grants our Miniſtry to be true and lawful, and utterly denies it to be Anti-chriſtian; becauſe the Articles of our Religion, to which our Miniſters are to conform their Inſtructions, are Orthodox, and framed for the caſting and keeping out of Popery.

Sect. 15. The ſeveral Principles of our Diſſenters being thus laid down, the State of the preſent Controverſie, as to Separation from our Communion, will ſoon appear. And any one may now diſcern,

1. That I do not mean bare local Separation. For Mr. B. puts this in the front of his Quære's; do you think, that he is a Separatiſt that meeteth not in the ſame Pariſh Church with you? No; I do aſſure him, provided that he elſewhere joyns with our Churches as a Member of them; and doth not think himſelf bound to prefer the ſeparate Meetings, as having a purer way of Worſhip, and ordinarily to frequent them for more Goſpel-adminiſtrations. And ſo much may ſatisfie Mr. A. too, who, after his trifling manner, talks of a bellum Parochiale, as though Men were ſo weak to charge one another with Separation becauſe they meet in different Pariſhes; but as to the Gird he gives about a Bellum Epiſcopale, I deſire him only to look into the Evangelium armatum for an Anſwer to it.

Miſchief of Impoſitions, p. 48.

2. I do not mean by Separation any difference in Doctrine, not determin'd by our Church, upon which Men do not proceed to divide from the Communion of it: And I wonder, who ever did. But Mr. B. is pleaſed to make another Quære about it. To this I ſhall anſwer him in Mr. Hales his words: While the Controverſies in Holland about Prædeſtination, went no farther than the Pen-combats, the Schiſm was all that while unhatcht; but aſſoon as one party ſwept an old Cloyſter, and by a pretty art made it a Church, by putting a new Pulpit in it for the ſeparating Party there to meet, that which was before a Controverſie became a formal Schiſm.

Tract of Schiſm, p.3.

3. By Separation I do not mean any difference in Modes of Worſhip allowed by the Church in whoſe Communion we live. This is to anſwer Mr. B's Quære concerning the difference between Cathedral and Parochial Churches; and publick and private adminiſtrations of Sacraments. But this ſticks much with Mr. A. who takes his hints from Mr. B. which he cooks and dreſſes after his facetious manner, that they may go off the better with the common people. And a very pleaſant repreſentation he endeavours to make of the difference of the Cathedral Service from that in Country Pariſhes. But what is all this to the purpoſe? If the ſame Man puts on finer Clothes at London, than he wears in the Country, is he not the ſame Man for all that? Are not David's Pſalms the ſame, whether they be Sung, or Said? Or whether Sung in a Cathedral Tune, or as ſet by a Pariſh Clerk? That which only looks like Argument (and my buſineſs is to mind nothing elſe; poſſibly others may call him to an account for his unbecoming way of Writing) That I ſay which looks like

Miſchief of Impoſitions, p. 48, 49.

Miſchief of Impoſ. p. 53. like Argument is, That ſome things are done without Rules in our Pariſh Churches, as the univerſal practice of ſinging Pſalms in Hopkin's and Sternhold's Metre; and therefore they may do things without Rules and yet not be guilty of Separation. This proceeds upon a miſtake, for in the firſt eſtabliſhment of the Liturgy upon the Reformation under Edward VI. allowance was made for the uſe of the Pſalms, as they were to be ſung in Churches diſtinct from the uſe of them as part of the Liturgy; and from thence that cuſtom hath been ſo univerſally practiſed. But ſuppoſe there are ſome Cuſtoms receiv'd without Rules; ſuppoſe there are ſome different Cuſtoms among us; what is this, to the denying the lawfulneſs of conſtant Communion with our Churches? To the chooſing of new Paſtors? and ſitting down, as he ſpeaks, with purer Adminiſtrations? All which this Man owns in his Book, as their avowed Principles and Practices; and yet hath the confidence to parallel their Separation from our Church, with the different Modes of Worſhip among our ſelves. He muſt have a very mean opinion of Mens underſtandings, that thinks to deceive them in ſo groſs a manner.

4. By Separation I do not underſtand a mere difference as to the way of Worſhip, which the Members of foreign Churches are here permitted to enjoy. For they do not break off from the Communion of our Churches; but have certain privileges allowed them, as acting under the Rules of thoſe Churches from whence they came. But what have we to do to judge the Members of other Reformed Churches? Our buſineſs is with thoſe who being baptized in this Church, and living under the Rules and Government of it; either renounce the Memberſhip they once had in it, or avoid Communion with it as Members, and joyn with other So- Anſw. p. 46. 60, 87. cieties ſet up in oppoſition to this Communion. Yet this matter about the Foreign Churches Mr. B. mentions again and again; as though their caſe could be thought alike, who never departed from ours, but only continue in the Communion of their own Churches.

5. I do not charge every diſobedience to the King and Laws and Canons in matters of Religion, Government and Worſhip with the Guilt of Sepa- Anſw. p. 47. ration. For although a Man may be guilty of culpable diſobedience in breaking the Commands of Authority, and the Orders of the Church he lives in; yet if he continues in all Acts of Communion with our Church, and draws not others from it upon mere pretence of greater Purity of Worſhip, and better means of Edification, I do not charge ſuch a one with Schiſm.

6. I do not charge thoſe with Separation, who under Idolatrous, or Arian Princes did keep up the Exerciſe of true Religion though againſt the Will of the Magiſtrate. But what is this to our caſe, where the true Religion is acknowledged, and the true Doctrine of Faith owned by the Diſſenters themſelves, who break off Communion with our Churches. Anſw. 15, 52, 53, 84. Wherefore then doth Mr. B. make ſo many Quæres, about the caſe of thoſe who lived under Heathen Perſecutors? or the Arian Emperors, or Idolatrous Princes? I hope, he did not mean to Parallel their own Caſe with theirs; for, what horrible reflection would this be upon our Go- Anſw. p. 21. vernment, and the Proteſtant Religion eſtabliſhed among us? To what end doth he mention Valens and Humericus that cut out the Preacher's Tongues, and ſeveral other unbecoming Inſinuations? when God be thanked, we live under a moſt merciful Prince, and have the true Doctrine of the Goſpel among us, and may have it ſtill continued, if Mens great Ingratitude, as well as other crying Sins, do not provoke

God juſtly to deprive us of it. What need was there, of letting fall any paſſages tending this way? when I told him in the very State of the Queſtion, that all our Diſpute was, Whether the upholding ſeparate Meetings for divine Worſhip, where the Doctrine eſtabliſhed, and the ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip are acknowledged to be agreeable to the Word of God, be a ſinful Separation or not? Why is this diſſembled and paſſed over? And the worſt caſes imaginable ſuppoſed, inſtead of that which is really theirs? If I could defend a Cauſe by no other means, I think common Ingenuity, the Honour of our Prince and Nation, and of the Proteſtant Religion profeſſed among us, would make me give it over.

Sect. 16. And for the ſame Reaſons, in the management of this debate, I reſolve to keep to the true State of the Queſtion, as it is laid down; and to make good the charge of Separation,

I. Againſt thoſe who hold occaſional Communion with our Church to be lawful in ſome parts of Worſhip; but deny conſtant Communion to be a Duty.

II. Againſt thoſe who deny any Communion with our Church to be lawful; although they agree with us in the Subſtantials of Religion.

I. Againſt thoſe who hold occaſional Communion to be lawful with our Church in ſome parts of Worſhip, but deny conſtant Communion to be a Duty.

To overthrow this Principle, I ſhall prove theſe two things,

1. That bare occaſional Communion doth not excuſe from the guilt of Separation.
2. That as far as occaſional Communion with our Church is allowed to be lawful, conſtant Communion is a Duty.

1. That bare occaſional Communion doth not excuſe from guilt of Separation. Which will appear by theſe things, Firſt, Bare occaſional Communion makes no Man the Member of a Church. This term of occaſional Communion, as far as I can find, was invented by the Diſſenting Brethren to give ſatisfaction to the Preſbyterians, who charged them with Browniſm: to avoid this charge, they declared, That the Browniſts held all Communion with our Parochial Churches unlawful, which they did not; for, ſaid they, we can occaſionally Communicate with you; but this gave no manner of ſatisfaction to the other Party, as long as they upheld ſeparate Congregations, with whom they would conſtantly Communicate; and accounted thoſe their Churches, with whom they did joyn as Members of the ſame Body. But notwithſtanding this lawfulneſs of occaſional Communion with our Churches, they joyned with other ſocieties in ſtrict and conſtant Communion; it was a plain Argument they apprehended ſomething ſo bad or defective in our Churches, that they could not joyn as Members with them; and becauſe they ſaw a neceſſity of joyning with ſome Churches as Members, they pleaded for ſeparate Congregations. And ſo muſt all thoſe do, who think it their duty to be members of any Churches at all; and not follow Grotius his Example, in ſuſpending Communion from all Churches. Which is a principle I do not find any of our diſſenting Brethren willing to own. Although Mr. B. declares,

That he and ſome others own themſelves to be Paſtors to no Churches; *Anſw.p.*64.
That he never gather'd a Church; that he baptized none in 20 years; and Page 24.
gave the Lord's Supper to none in 18 years. I deſire to know, what Page 62.
Church Mr. B. hath been of all this time. For as to our Churches, he Page 86.
declares, That he thinks it lawful to Communicate with us occaſionally; but

but not as Churches (for he thinks we want an eſſential part, viz. a Paſtor with Epiſcopal Power, as appears before) but as Oratories; and ſo he renounces Communion with our Churches as Churches; and for other Churches, he ſaith he hath gathered none, he hath adminiſtred Sacraments to none in 18 years; and if he hath not joyned as a Member in conſtant Communion with any ſeparate Church, he hath been ſo long a Member of no Church at all. It is true, he hath pray'd occaſionally, and receiv'd the Sacrament occaſionally in our Oratories, but not as a Member of our Churches; he hath preached occaſionally to ſeparate Congregations, but he hath gather'd no Church, he hath adminiſtred no Sacraments for 18 years together. So that he hath prayed occaſionally in one place, and preached occaſionally in another, but hath had no Communion as a Member of a Church any where. But I wonder, how any Man could think ſuch a neceſſity lay upon him to preach, that Woe was unto him if he did not; and yet apprehend none to adminiſter the Sacraments for ſo long together; none, to joyn himſelf as a Member to any Church. Is it poſſible for him to think it Sacrilege not to preach; and to think it no fault, not to give the Sacraments to others, nor to receive one of them himſelf as a Communicant with a Church? Was there not the ſame devotedneſs, in Ordination to the faithful Adminiſtration of Sacraments, as to preaching the Goſpel? Was not the ſame Authority, the ſame charge as to both of them? Was there not the ſame promiſe and engagement to give faithful diligence to Miniſter the Doctrine and Sacraments? Is there an indiſpenſable obligation to do one part of your duty, and none at all to the other? Is this poſſible, to perſuade impartial Men, that for 18 years together you thought your ſelf bound to preach againſt the Laws; and yet never thought your ſelf bound to do that, which you were as ſolemnly obliged to do as the other? Mr. B. knows very well in Church-Hiſtory, that Preſbyters were rarely allowed to preach, and not without leave from the Biſhop, and that in ſome of the Churches he moſt eſteems too, viz. the African; but they were conſtantly bound to adminiſter the Sacraments; ſo that, if one obligation were ſtricter than the other, that was ſo which Mr. B. diſpenſed with himſelf in, for 18 years together; and why he might not as well in the other, is not eaſie to underſtand. However, why all this while, no conſtant Communicant with any Church? What, no Church among us fit for him to be a Member of? No Obligation upon a Chriſtian to that, equal to the neceſſity of Preaching?

Theſe things muſt ſeem very ſtrange, to thoſe who judge of Chriſtian Obligations, by the Scripture, and the univerſal Senſe and practice of the Chriſtian Church in the beſt and pureſt Ages. To what purpoſe is it to diſpute about the true notion of an Inſtituted Church for perſonal preſential Communion; if Men can live for 18 years together without joyning in Communion with any ſuch Church? What was this Communion intended for? The antient Churches at this rate, might eaſily be capacious enough for their Members, if ſome never joyned with them in ſo long a time. But he hath communicated occaſionally with us: Yes, to ſhew, what defective and tolerable Churches he can communicate with, but not as a Member, as himſelf declares; and this occaſional Communion makes him none. Miſchief of Impoſitions, p. 85. For Mr. A. ſaith, Their occaſional Communion with us, is but like any of our occaſional Communion with them: or occaſional hearing of a weak Preacher; or occaſional going to a Popiſh Chappel; which no one imagines makes the Perſons Members of ſuch Congregations. If therefore Men uſe this occaſional Communion more than once or twice, or ten or twenty times, as long as they declare it is only occaſional Communion, it makes them no Members of our Churches; [illegible] that obliges them to fixed and conſtant Communion.

Secondly, They that have fixed and conſtant Communion in a Church gathered out of another, are in a State of Separation from the Church out of which it is gathered, although they may be occaſionally preſent in it. Now, if Men who think our conſtant Communion unlawful, do judge themſelves bound to joyn together in another Society for purer Adminiſtrations, as Mr. A. ſpeaks, and to chooſe new Paſtors; this is gathering new Churches; and conſequently is a plain Separation from thoſe Churches out of which they are gather'd. The Author of the Letter out of the Country ſpeaks plainly in this matter. Such, ſaith he, of the diſſenting Miniſters, as have moſt openly declared for communicating at ſome times with ſome of the Parochial Churches; have alſo declared their judgment of the lawfulneſs and neceſſity of Preaching and Hearing, and doing other religious Duties in other Congregations alſo. Page 33. If this be true, as no doubt that Gentleman well underſtands their Principles, then we ſee plainly a Separation owned, notwithſtanding the occaſional Communion with our Churches. For, here is not only a lawfulneſs, but a neceſſity aſſerted of joyning in ſeparate Congregations, for Preaching, Hearing, and other religious Duties. And here are all the parts neceſſary for making new Churches, Paſtors, People, and joyning together for religious Worſhip, in a way ſeparate from our Aſſemblies. For although they allow the lawfulneſs of occaſional Communicating with ſome of them; yet they are ſo far from allowing conſtant Communion, that they aſſert a neceſſity of ſeparate Congregations for divine Worſhip; and what was there more than this which the old Separatiſts held? For when they firſt publiſhed the Reaſons of their Separation, which Giffard anſwered, they laid down the grounds of their diſſatisfaction with our Aſſemblies; from whence they inferred the neceſſity of Separation; and then declare, that they only ſought the Fellowſhip and Communion of God's faithful ſervants; and by the direction of his holy Spirit to proceed to a choice of new Paſtors; with whom they might joyn, in all the Ordinances of Chriſt. And what is there in this different, from what muſt follow from the Principles of thoſe, who aſſert the neceſſity of joyning in other Congregations diſtinct and ſeparate from our Aſſemblies for the performance of religious Duties? And if there be a neceſſity of Separation, as this Gentleman tells us they generally hold, that ſeem moſt moderate, the holding the lawfulneſs of occaſional Communion, will not excuſe them from the guilt of the other. For, as long as the neceſſity of Separation was maintained, the other was always accounted a leſs material diſpute, and ſome held one way and ſome another. And for this occaſional Communion the ſame Author tells us, that he looks upon it, but as drinking a ſingle glaſs of Wine, or of Water, againſt Page 51. his own inclination, to a perſon out of Civility; when he is not for any Man's pleaſure to deſtroy his health by tying himſelf to drink nothing elſe. It ſeems then, this occaſional Communion is a mere Complement to our Churches, wherein they force themſelves to a dangerous piece of civility much againſt their own Inclinations; but they account conſtant Communion a thing pernicious to their Souls, as the other is deſtructive to their Health. So that this Salvo cannot excuſe them from the Guilt of Separation.

but not as Churches (for he thinks we want an eſſential part, viz. a Paſtor with Epiſcopal Power, as appears before) but as Oratories; and ſo he renounces Communion with our Churches as Churches; and for other Churches, he ſaith he hath gathered none, he hath adminiſtred Sacraments to none in 18 years; and if he hath not joyned as a Member in conſtant Communion with any ſeparate Church, he hath been ſo long a Member of no Church at all. It is true, he hath pray'd occaſionally, and receiv'd the Sacrament occaſionally in our Oratories, but not as a Member of our Churches; he hath preached occaſionally to ſeparate Congregations, but he hath gather'd no Church, he hath adminiſtred no Sacraments for 18 years together. To what purpoſe is it to diſpute about the true notion of an Inſtituted Church for perſonal preſential Communion; if Men can live for 18 years together without joyning in Communion with any ſuch Church? What was this Communion intended for? The antient Churches at this rate, might eaſily be capacious enough for their Members, if ſome never joyned with them in ſo long a time. But he hath communicated occaſionally with us: Yes, to ſhew, what defective and tolerable Churches he can communicate with, but not as a Member, as himſelf declares; and this occaſional Communion makes him none. For Mr. A. ſaith, Their occaſional Communion with us, is but like any of our occaſional Communion with them: or occaſional hearing of a weak Preacher; or occaſional going to a Popiſh Chappel; which no one imagines makes the Perſons Members of ſuch Congregations. If therefore Men uſe this occaſional Communion more than once or twice, or ten or twenty twenty times, as long as they declare it is only occaſional Communion, it makes them no Members of our Churches; for that obliges them to fixed and conſtant Communion.

Secondly, They that have fixed and conſtant Communion in a Church gathered out of another, are in a State of Separation from the Church out of which it is gathered, although they may be occaſionally preſent in it. Now, if Men who think our conſtant Communion unlawful, do judge themſelves bound to joyn together in another Society for purer Adminiſtrations, as Mr. A. ſpeaks, and to chooſe new Paſtors; this is gathering new Churches; and conſequently is a plain Separation from thoſe Churches out of which they are gather'd. The Author of the Letter out of the Country ſpeaks plainly in this matter. Such, ſaith he, of the diſſenting Miniſters, as have moſt openly declared for communicating at ſome times with ſome of the Parochial Churches; have alſo declared their judgment of the lawfulneſs and neceſſity of Preaching and Hearing, and doing other religious Duties in other Congregations alſo. Page 33. If this be true, as no doubt that Gentleman well underſtands their Principles, then we ſee plainly a Separation owned, notwithſtanding the occaſional Communion with our Churches. For, here is not only a lawfulneſs, but a neceſſity aſſerted of joyning in ſeparate Congregations, for Preaching, Hearing, and other religious Duties. And here are all the parts neceſſary for making new Churches, Paſtors, People, and joyning together for religious Worſhip, in a way ſeparate from our Aſſemblies. For although they allow the lawfulneſs of occaſional Communicating with ſome of them; yet they are ſo far from allowing conſtant Communion, that they aſſert a neceſſity of ſeparate Congregations for divine Worſhip; and what was there more than this which the old Separatiſts held? For when they firſt publiſhed the Reaſons of their Separation, which Giffard anſwered, they laid down the grounds of their diſſatisfaction with our Aſſemblies; from whence they inferred the neceſſity of Separation; and then declare, that they only ſought the Fellowſhip and Communion of God's faithful ſervants; and by the direction of his holy Spirit to proceed to a choice of new Paſtors; with whom they might joyn, in all the Ordinances of Chriſt. And what is there in this different, from what muſt follow from the Principles of thoſe, who aſſert the neceſſity of joyning in other Congregations diſtinct and ſeparate from our Aſſemblies for the performance of religious Duties? And if there be a neceſſity of Separation, as this Gentleman tells us they generally hold, that ſeem moſt moderate, the holding the lawfulneſs of occaſional Communion, will not excuſe them from the guilt of the other. For, as long as the neceſſity of Separation was maintained, the other was always accounted a leſs material diſpute, and ſome held one way and ſome another. And for this occaſional Communion the ſame Author tells us, that he looks upon it, but as drinking a ſingle glaſs of Wine, or of Water, againſt Page 51. his own inclination, to a perſon out of Civility; when he is not for any Man's pleaſure to deſtroy his health by tying himſelf to drink nothing elſe. It ſeems then, this occaſional Communion is a mere Complement to our Churches, wherein they force themſelves to a dangerous piece of civility much againſt their own Inclinations; but they account conſtant Communion a thing pernicious to their Souls, as the other is deſtructive to their Health. So that this Salvo cannot excuſe them from the Guilt of Separation.

Sect. 17. 2. That as far as occaſinal Communion is lawful, conſtant Communion is a Duty. This the former Gentleman wonders at me if I think a good conſequence. Mr. A. brings ſeveral inſtances to prove, that we allow occaſional Communion to be lawful, where conſtant is no duty; as with other Pariſh Churches, upon a Journey, at a Lecture; &c. but who ever queſtion'd the lawfulneſs of occaſional Communion with Churches of the ſame conſtitution; or thought a Man was bound to be always of that Church, where he goes to hear a Lecture, &c. but the queſtion is, about the lawfulneſs of Separation, where occaſional Communion is allowed to be lawful. For a Man is not ſaid to ſeparate from every Church, where he forbears or ceaſes to have Communion; but only from that Church, with which he is obliged to hold Communion, and yet withdraws from it. And it is a wonder to me, none of my Friends (my Adverſaries I am loth to call them) could diſcern this. It is lawful, ſaith Mr. B. to have Communion with the French, Dutch, or Greek Church, muſt conſtant Communion therefore with them be a duty? Yes, if he were obliged to be a Member of thoſe Churches, and thought it lawful to communicate ſome times, conſtant Communion would be a Duty. But becauſe this ſeems ſo hard to be underſtood, I will therefore undertake to prove it, by theſe two Arguments.

Firſt, From the general Obligation upon Chriſtians to uſe all lawful Means for preſerving the Peace and Unity of the Church.

Secondly, From the particular force of that Text, Philipp. 3. 16. As far as you have already attained walk by the ſame Rule, &c.

Firſt, From the general Obligation upon Chriſtians to uſe all lawful means for preſerving the Peace and Unity of the Church. If it be poſſible, ſaith St. Paul, as much as lies in you live peaceably with all Men. Now I aſk, if there be not as great an Obligation at leaſt, upon Chriſtians to preſerve Peace in the Church, as with all Men? and they are bound to that, as far as poſſible, and as much as lies in them. And is not that poſſible and lies in them to do, which they acknowledge lawful to be done, and can do at ſome times? What admirable Arguments are there to Peace and Unity among Chriſtians? What divine Enforcements of them on the Conſciences of Men in the Writings of Chriſt and his Apoſtles? And cannot theſe prevail with Men to do that, which they think in their Conſciences they may lawfully do, towards joyning in Communion with us? This I am perſuaded, is one of the provoking Sins of the Non-conformiſts, that they have been ſo backward in doing, what they were convinced they might have done, with a good Conſcience. When they were earneſtly preſſed to it by thoſe in Authority, they refuſed it; and they have been more and more backward ever ſince, till now they ſeem generally reſolved, either to break all in pieces, or to perſiſt in Separation. Mr. B. indeed very honeſtly moved them 1663. to conſider how far it was lawful, or their duty to communicate with the Pariſh Churches in the Liturgy and Sacraments; and brought many Arguments to prove it lawful; and no one of the Brethren ſeemed to diſſent: but obſerve the Anſwer Mr. A. makes to this; i.e. ſaith he, They did not enter their ſeveral Proteſtations, nor formally declare againſt the Reaſons of their Brother; like wiſe and wary perſons they would adviſe upon them. And ſo they have been adviſing and conſidering ever ſince, till with great Wiſdom and Warineſs they are dropt into Separation before they were aware of it; and the mere neceſſity of defending their own practices, makes them eſpouſe theſe Principles. Such another Meeting Mr. B. ſaith, they had after the Plague and Fire, at which

which they agreed, That Communion with our Church was in it ſelf lawful and good. Here Mr. A. charges me for being tardy, and wronging the Relator, by leaving out the moſt conſiderable words of the ſentence, viz. When it would not do more harm than good. And upon this he expatiates about the ways when it may do more harm than good; whereas if the Reader pleaſe to examine the place, he will find, I did conſider the force of thoſe words; when I put it, that they reſolved it to be lawful in it ſelf; although ſome Circumſtances might hinder their preſent doing it. For they declared, That it was in it ſelf lawful and meet; but the Circumſtances of that time, did make them think it might do more harm than good; and therefore it is ſaid, They delaid for a fitter opportunity, which makes it clear, they were then reſolved upon the lawfulneſs of the thing. But that opportunity hath never hapned ſince; and ſo they are now come to plead againſt the Practice of it; as Mr. A. plainly doth; by ſuch reaſons as theſe. Communion with our Churches will then do more harm than good,

Ibid.

1. When ſuch Communion ſhall perſuade the Pariſh Churches, that their frame is eligible and not only tolerable. As though Separation were more eligible, than a Communion that is lawful and tolerable; and Schiſm were not more intolerable, than Communion with a tolerable Church. What will not Men ſay in defence of their own practice? Was ever Schiſm made ſo light a matter of, and the Peace and Unity of Chriſtians valued at ſo low a rate; that for the prevention of the one, and the preſervation of the other, a thing that is lawful may not be done, if there be any danger that what is only tolerable ſhould be miſtaken for more eligible? As if all the Miſchiefs of Schiſm and Diviſion in the Church, were not fit to be put in the ballance, againſt ſuch a horrible and monſtrous inconvenience. Methinks, it were better ſometimes to be wiſe and conſiderate, than always thus ſubtle and witty againſt the common ſenſe, and reaſon of Mankind.

Miſchief of Impoſitions, p. 40.

2. When others ſhall thereby be thought obliged to ſeparate from purer Churches, i. e. be drawn off from their Separation.

3. When it will harden the Papiſts. As though their Diviſions did not do it ten thouſand times more.

4. When it ſhall notably prejudice the Chriſtian Religion in general. Yes, no doubt the Cure of Diviſions would do ſo.

By theſe particulars, it appears, that he thinks them not obliged to do what lawfully they can do. Yet at laſt, he ſaith, he tells us, as much is done, as their Conſciences will permit them. Say you ſo? Is it indeed come to this? Will none of your Conſciences now permit you either to come to the Liturgy, or to make uſe of any parts of it, in your own Meetings? How often hath Mr. B. told the World, That you ſtuck not at Set-Forms, nor at the Uſe of the Liturgy, provided ſome exceptionable paſſages were alter'd in it? Did not Mr. B. declare at his Meeting, publickly, in a Writing on purpoſe, That they did not meet under any colour, or pretence of any religious Exerciſe in other manner, than according to the Liturgy and Practice of the Church of England, and were he able he would accordingly read himſelf? Is this obſerved in any one Meeting in London, or through England? Then certainly, there are ſome who do not, what they think they lawfully may do towards Communion with us. And Mr. B. ſaith in the beginning of his late Plea, That they never made one Motion for Preſbytery, or againſt Liturgies; and theſe words are ſpoken in the Name of the whole Party called Preſbyterians. And ſince

Anſw. p. 64. that, Mr. B. ſaith, They did come to an Agreement, wherein the conſtant Uſe of the Liturgy, with ſome Alterations, was required. And are we now told, That all that can lawfully be done is done? Mr. B. indeed acts agreeably to his Principles, in coming to our Liturgy; but where are all the reſt? And, which of them reads what they think lawful at their own Aſſemblies? Do they not hereby diſcover, that they are more afraid of loſing their People, who force them to comply with their humours, than careful to do, what they judge lawful, towards Communion with our Church?

Sect. 18. But whence comes it to paſs, that any who think occaſional Communion with us to be lawful, ſhould not think themſelves obliged to conſtant Communion? From what grounds come they to practiſe occaſional Communion? Is it from the Love of Peace and Concord, as Mr. B. ſaith? That is a good ground ſo far, as it goes, but will it not carry a Man farther, if he purſue it, as he ought to do? What love of Concord is this to be occaſionally preſent at our Churches, and at the ſame time to declare, That there is greater purity of Worſhip, and better means of Edification in ſeparate Congregations? The one can never draw Men ſo much to the love of Concord, as the other doth encourage them in the Principles of Separation. But, if there be an Obligation upon Men to Communicate with the Church they live in, notwithſtanding the Defects and Corruptions of it, that Obligation can never be diſcharged by meer occaſional Preſence at ſome times, and in ſome Acts of Worſhip; for, ſaith Mr. Ball, To uſe one Ordinance, and not another, is to make a Schiſm in the Church.

Trial of Grounds of Separation. Chap. 10. p. 791.

The only Example produced to juſtify ſuch occaſional Communion with defective Churches, is that, our bleſſed Saviour did communicate after that manner in the Jewiſh Synagogues and Temple. But this is ſo far from being true, that the old Separatiſts granted, That our Lord Communicated with the Jewiſh Church in God's Ordinances, living and dying a Member thereof; and from thence they prove, That the Jewiſh Church had a right Conſtitution in our Saviour's time.

Robinſon's Treatiſe, p. 11.

And did not he declare, That he came not to diſſolve the Law, but to fulfil it? And that he complied with John's Baptiſm, becauſe he was to fulfil all righteouſneſs? Did he not go up to the Feaſts at Jeruſalem, as a Member of the Jewiſh Church, and frequent the Synagogues? Even at the Feaſt of Dedication, though not inſtituted by the Law, he was preſent, as other Jews were. Yea, did he not expreſs more than ordinary zeal, for purifying the outward parts of the Temple, becauſe it was to be a Houſe of Prayer for all Nations? Was not this to ſhew Mens Obligation to come and Worſhip there, as well, as that the place was to be kept ſacred for that uſe? And, doth not the Apoſtle expreſly ſay, That he was made under the Law? Where is there the leaſt ground in Scripture, to intimate, that Chriſt only kept occaſional, and not conſtant communion with the Jewiſh Church? What part of Worſhip did he ever withdraw from? Did he not command his Diſciples to go hear the Scribes and Phariſees, becauſe they ſate in Moſes's Chair? Where did he ever bid them go thither, when they could have no better; but when they could to be ſure to prefer the purer way of Worſhip, and better Means of Edification? Was not his own Doctrine incomparably beyond theirs? Is there any pretence for greater Edification now, to be mention'd with what the Diſciples had, to forſake the Jewiſh Aſſemblies, for the love of Chriſt's own Teaching? Yet he would not have them to do that, out of the regard he had to the publick Worſhip and Teaching. Our Saviour himſelf did only teach his Diſciples occaſionally, and at certain Seaſons; but their conſtant Communion was with the Jewiſh Aſſemblies. And ſo it was after his Paſſion, till the Luk. 24,53. Holy Ghoſt fell upon them, and they were then imploy'd to gather and form a new Church; which was not done before; and thence the Author of the Ordinary Gloſs obſerves; That we never read of Chriſt's Praying together, with his Diſciples (unleſs perhaps at his Transfiguration with three of his Diſciples) although we often read of his praying alone. So that no Example can be mention'd, which is more directly contrary to the Practice of Separation upon the preſent grounds, than that of our bleſſed Saviour's; which ought to be inſtead of all others to us.

Sect. 19. 2. I argue, from the particular force of that Text, Phil. 3. 16. As far, as we have already attained, let us walk by the ſame Rule, let us mind the ſame things. From whence it appears evident, that Men ought to go as far as they can, towards Uniformity; and not to forbear doing any thing, which they lawfully may do towards Peace and Unity.

To take off the force of the Argument from this place, ſeveral Anſwers have been given, which I ſhall now remove; ſo that the ſtrength of it may appear to remain, notwithſtanding all the attempts which have been made to weaken it.

Some ſay, That the Apoſtles words are to be underſtood of the different attainments Chriſtians had in knowledge, and the different Conceptions and Opinions which they had concerning the Truths of the Goſpel. Thus Dr. O. underſtands the Text; whoſe ſenſe is ſomewhat obſcurely and intricately expreſſed; but as far as I can apprehend his meaning, he makes this to be the Apoſtles: viz. Vindication of Non-con formiſts, p. 25, 30.

I. That although the beſt Chriſtians in this life cannot attain to a full meaſure and perfection in the comprehenſion of the Truths of the Goſpel, or the enjoyment of the things contained in them; yet they ought to be preſſing continually after it.

II. That in the common purſuit of this deſign, it is not to be ſuppoſed, but that Men will come to different attainments, have different meaſures of light and knowledge, yea and different conceptions, or opinions about theſe things.

III. That in this difference of opinions, thoſe who differ'd from others ſhould wait on the Teachings of God, in that uſe of the means of Inſtruction which they enjoy'd.

IV. That as to their Duty in common to each other, as far as they had attained, they ſhould walk by the ſame Rule, namely, which he had now laid down, and mind the ſame things as he had enjoyned them.

From whence he infers, That theſe words are ſo far from being a Foundation to charge them with Schiſm, who agreeing in the ſubſtance of the Doctrine of the Goſpel, do yet diſſent from others, in ſome things; that it enjoyns a mutual forbearance towards thoſe who are differently minded. And again, he ſaith, The advice St. Paul gives to both Parties, is, that whereunto they have attained, wherein they do agree, which were all thoſe Principles of Faith and Obedience which were neceſſary to their acceptance with God, they ſhould walk by the ſame Rule, and mind the ſame things, that is, forbearing one another in the things wherein they differ; which, ſaith he, is the ſubſtance of what is pleaded for by the Nonconformiſts.

For the clearing of this matter, there are Three things to be debated.

1. Whether the Apoſtle ſpeaks of different Opinions, or different Practices?
2. Whether the Rule he gives be mutual forbearance?
3. How far the Apoſtle's Rule, hath an influence on our preſent caſe?

Firſt, Whether the Apoſtle ſpeaks of different Opinions, or of different Practices? For the right underſtanding of this, we muſt ſtrictly attend to the Apoſtle's ſcope and deſign. It is moſt evident that the Apoſtle began this Diſcourſe with a Caution againſt the Teachers of the Circumciſion, Verſ. 2. Beware of Dogs, beware of evil Workers, beware of the Conciſion. But ſpeaking ſo reproachfully of them, he ſhews in the next words, that every thing that was excellent in the deſign of the Law, was accompliſhed in the Goſpel; and ſo he proceeds to declare, how juſtly he was brought to a diſeſteem of the greateſt privileges of the Law, in compariſon with the things revealed by the Goſpel, which ſhews, that the Apoſtle had ſtill an Eye to theſe falſe Teachers, who were very buſie in diſturbing the Peace of the Churches, and drawing Diſciples after them, pleading the neceſſity of obſerving the Law; and dividing the Chriſtians into different Communions on that account, as appears by their proceedings at Antioch, where they did ſeparate themſelves from the Gentile Chriſtians, and St. Peter for a time complied with them. Act. 16. 13. If ſuch as theſe had not been buſie at Philippi (where it appears that Jews inhabited) What need St. Paul give ſo much caution againſt them? What need all this diſpute concerning the Privileges of the Law? If it be allowed, that they were there carrying on the ſame deſigns, which they did in other Churches, then it follows, he had great reaſon to perſuade them to Unity ſo earneſtly, as he doth, Philip. 2. 1, 2. and to give ſo much caution againſt them; and to repreſent the great excellencies of the Goſpel above the Law; which being done, the Apoſtle after his uſual method, makes a digreſſion, concerning himſelf, viz. How far ſhort he thought himſelf of what he aimed at, and yet with what earneſtneſs he preſſed forward, toward Chriſtian perfection; making no longer any account of legal privileges. Which I take to be his meaning, when he ſaith, Forgetting the things which are behind I preſs forward, &c. So St. Hierome underſtands it, Legis obliviſcens ad perfecta Evangelii præcepta me teneo. Forgetting the Law, I keep to the Precepts of the Goſpel. This being underſtood, the Apoſtles ſence naturally follows, according to his former deſign; Let us therefore, as many as are arrived to this height of Chriſtianity (ſo the word τέλειοι is uſed, 1 Cor. 14. 20. Epheſ. 4. 13. Coloſs. 4. 12. Heb. 5. 14.) agree in purſuing our main end. But then comes the caſe of thoſe, who were not ſo fully ſatisfied in this matter of the Law; there being many and plauſible Arguments on their ſide; well, ſaith the Apoſtle, if they are doubtful, I adviſe them however, not to hearken to theſe falſe Teachers, for they make nothing but Faction and Diviſions among you, wait patiently upon God, which is the beſt means, for your Satisfaction. If any be otherwiſe minded, God ſhall reveal even this unto you, i. e. ſaith Beza in his Paraphraſe, If any yet doubt of the laying aſide of the Law, let them make no diſturbance in the Church about it. And ſo Eraſmus ſaith, It ought to be underſtood of the judaizing Chriſtians, who did not yet diſcern, that the Ceremonial Law was to be aboliſhed, however, ſaith he, they ought not to break the Peace of the Church for it. But, What ſence can Dr. O. here put upon the being otherwiſe minded: Otherwiſe than what? As many as be perfect be thus minded, to purſue your main end; but, if any be otherwiſe minded; did any think they ought not to mind chiefly their great end? that is incredible; therefore the Apoſtle muſt be underſtood of ſomewhat, about which there were then very different apprehenſions; and that is certain there were about the Law among the Chriſtians then. The Apoſtle therefore doth not ſpeak of any kind of different apprehenſions Chriſtians might fall into; but of ſuch as were at that time among them; and ſo one Copy reads it, εἴτι ἑτέρως φρονεῖτε. If hitherto ye have been otherwiſe minded; they had no difference concerning the τὰ ἔμπροσθεν, the things before them, viz. the happineſs of the Goſpel, but they had concerning the τὰ ὀπίσω, the things behind, viz. the force and obligation of the Law. And ſince this difference did not reſt barely in opinion, but was carried on ſo far, as to break the Peace of the Church about it; it appears to have been no bare difference of Opinions, but ſuch as related to the Peace and Communion of Chriſtians.

Secondly, Whether the Rule which the Apoſtle lays down, be only a Rule of mutual forbearance? Nevertheleſs, whereto we have already attained, let us walk by the ſame Rule, let us mind the ſame things. The ſence according to Dr. O. is this, That thoſe who are agreed in the Subſtantials of Religion, ſhould go on and do their duty without regarding leſſer differences. Which is a ſence very uncertain, and doth not reach to the differences then among them. It is very uncertain, becauſe it ſets no bounds to differences; and ſuppoſes the continuance of ſuch differences among them, which he deſigned to prevent, by perſuading them ſo often in this Epiſtle to be of one mind, of one ſoul; as well as to mind the Phil. i. 27. ſame things. Beſides, the difference then on foot, was none of the ſmal- 2. 2. ler differences of opinions, but that about which they differ'd was urged on one ſide, as neceſſary to Salvation, by the falſe Apoſtles; and oppoſed Act. 15. 1. on the other, as pernicious and deſtructive to it. One of my Anſwerers ſaith, That the judaizing Chriſtians were leaven'd with ſuch a corrupt Rector of Opinion, as was by no means to be born with; which would have made Sutton, Chriſt and his Death in vain, And that the Apoſtle ſets himſelf againſt p. 15, 16. it might and main, ſhewing the dreadful conſequences of it. And is it probable the Apoſtle ſhould preſcribe a Rule of mutual forbearance, in ſuch Gal. 5. 2. a caſe as this? eſpecially, when in the ſame Chapter, he gives ſo great a caution againſt them, with ſo much unuſual ſharpneſs of expreſſion; Beware of Dogs, beware of Evil Workers, beware of the Conciſion. Doth this look like a Precept of mutual forbearance, as to the differences then among them? theſe we know there were, let Dr. O. name any other ſmaller differences of Opinion, which might be an occaſion of the Apoſtles giving ſuch a Rule of mutual forbearance. But now, if we ſuppoſe the Apoſtle to ſpeak to the difference about the Law, about which the Churches were then divided, the ſence is plain, eaſie, and pertinent. For ſo, either (1.) It takes in thoſe who hitherto differ'd about the Law; and then the ſence is, although you are not come up to ſo great ſatisfaction as others have, yet go as far as you can with the Body of Chriſtians, you live with; keep within one Rule; break not the bounds of Peace and Unity which Chriſt hath ſet you; run not with the falſe Teachers into ſeparating dividing Courſes. (2.) It is directed to thoſe who have got the ſtart of others, and then it contains the Obligation that lies upon them, eſpecially to have a mighty regard to the Peace and Unity of Chriſtians; not to break the common Ties and Bonds on the account of their greater attainments, nor to ſeparate from others, as meaner and lower Chriſtians, becauſe they are not come up to that perfection, which you have attained to. And ſo either way, it contains an excellent Rule, and of admirable uſe to the Chriſtian Church, not only at that time, but in all Ages of the World, viz. That thoſe who cannot be fully ſatisfied in all things, ſhould go as far as they can towards preſerving Peace and Communion among Chriſtians; and not peeviſhly ſeparate and divide the Church, becauſe they cannot in all things think as others do; nor others on the account of greater ſanctity and perfection, deſpiſe the inferior ſort of Chriſtians, and forſake their Communion, but they ought all to do what lies poſſibly in them to preſerve the bonds of Peace, and the Unity of the Church.

Thirdly, How far this Rule hath an influence on our caſe? (1.) It follows from hence, that as far as Communion is lawful, it is a duty, ſince, as far as they have attained they are to walk by the ſame Rule. And ſo much Dr. O. doth not deny; when he ſaith, Thoſe who are agreed in the Subſtantials of Religion, or in the Principles of Faith and Obedience, ſhould walk by the ſame Rule, and mind the ſame things, forbearing one another in the things wherein they differ. Then as far as they agree, they are bound to joyn together, whether it be as to Opinion, or Communion. Becauſe the obligation to Peace and Unity muſt eſpecially reach to Acts of Chriſtian Communion, as far as that is judged to be lawful. (2.) That the beſt Chriſtians are bound to Unite with others, though of lower attainments, and to keep within the ſame Rule; which is a general expreſſion relating to the bounds of a Race, and ſo takes in all ſuch Orders which are lawful and judged neceſſary to hold the Members of a Chriſtian Society together. But, ſaith Dr. O. Let the Apoſtles Rule be produced with any probability of proof to be his, and they are all ready to ſubſcribe and conform unto it. This is the Apoſtle's Rule, to go as far as they can; and if they can go no farther, to ſit down quietly, and wait for farther inſtruction, and not to break the Peace of the Church, upon preſent diſſatisfaction, nor to gather new Churches out of others upon ſuppoſition of higher attainments. Vindication of Non-conformiſts, p. 26.

Page 27. If the Rule reach our Caſe, ſaith he again, it muſt be ſuch as requires things to be obſerved, as were never divinely appointed, as National Churches, Ceremonies and Modes of Worſhip. And ſo this Rule doth in order to Peace, require the obſervation of ſuch things, which although they be not particularly appointed by God, yet are enjoyned by lawful Authority, provided, they be not unlawful in themſelves, nor repugnant to the Word of God.

Page 28. But the Apoſtles never gave any ſuch Rules themſelves, about outward Modes of Worſhip with Ceremonies, Feaſts, Faſts, Liturgies, &c. What then? It is ſufficient that they gave this general Rule, That all lawful things are to be done for the Churches Peace: And without this no Unity, or Order can be preſerved in Churches. The Apoſtles, ſaith he, gave Rules inconſiſtent with any determining Rule, viz. of mutual forbearance, Rom. 14. And herein the Apoſtle acted not upon mere Rules of Prudence, but as a Teacher divinely inſpired. That he was divinely inſpired, I do not queſtion, but even ſuch a one may determine a caſe upon preſent Circumſtances, which reſolution may not always bind, when the Circumſtances are changed. For then, the meaning of the Apoſtle muſt be, that whatever differences happen among Chriſtians, there muſt be no determination either way. But the direct contrary to this, we find in the Decree of the Apoſtles at Jeruſalem, upon the difference that P. 28, 31.

happened in the Chriſtian Churches. And although there was a very plauſible pretence of the obligation of Conſcience one way; yet the Apoſtles made a determination in the caſe, contrary to their Judgment. Which ſhews, that the Rule of Forbearance, where Conſcience is alledged both ways, is no ſtanding Rule to the Chriſtian Church; but that the Governors of it from Parity of Reaſon may determine thoſe things which they judge to conduce moſt to the Peace and Welfare of that Church, which they are bound to preſerve. And from hence it appears how little Reaſon there is for Dr. O's Inſinuation, as though the falſe Apoſtles were the only Impoſers: whereas, it is moſt evident, that the true Apoſtles made this peremptory Decree, in a matter of great conſequence, and againſt the pretence of Conſcience on the other ſide. Act. 15. 28.

But ſaith Dr. O. farther, The Jewiſh Chriſtians were left to their own liberty, provided they did not impoſe on others; and the Diſſenters at this day, deſire no more, than the Gentile Churches did, viz. not to be impoſed upon to obſerve thoſe things which they are not ſatisfied, it is the mind of Chriſt ſhould be impoſed upon them. I Anſwer, 1. It was agreed by all the Governors of the Chriſtian Church, that the Jewiſh Chriſtians ſhould be left to their own liberty, out of reſpect to the Law of Moſes; and out of regard to the Peace of the Chriſtian Church, which might have been extremely hazarded, if the Apoſtles had preſently ſet themſelves againſt the obſerving the Jewiſh Cuſtoms among the Jews themſelves. 2. The falſe Apoſtles impoſing on the Gentile Chriſtians had two Circumſtances in it, which extremely alter their caſe from that of our preſent Diſſenters. For, (1.) They were none of their lawful Governors, but went about as Seducers drawing away the Diſciples of the Apoſtles from them. (2.) They impoſed the Jewiſh Rites as neceſſary to Salvation, and not as merely indifferent things. And therefore the caſe of our Diſſenters is very different from that of the Gentile Chriſtians, as to the Impoſitions of the falſe Apoſtles. Thus I have conſidered every thing material in Dr. O. which ſeems to take off the force of the Argument drawn from this Text. Page 7, 8.

The Author of the Letter ſaith, (1.) That I ought to have proved, that the Apoſtles meant ſome Rule ſuperadded to the Scriptures; and, (2.) That other Church-Guides had the ſame Power, as the Apoſtles had. But what need all this? If it appear (1.) That the Apoſtles did give binding Rules to particular Churches, which are not extant in Scriptures, as appears by 1 Cor. 7. 17. So that either the Scripture is an imperfect Rule, for omitting ſome Divine Rules; or elſe theſe were only Prudential Rules of Order and Government. (2.) That it is a ſtanding Rule of Scripture, that Men are bound to do all lawful things for the Peace of the Church. And this I have ſhewed, was the Apoſtles deſign in the words of this Text. Letter out of the Country, p. 24.

Sect. 20. Others pretend, that the Apoſtle means no more by theſe words, but that Chriſtians muſt live up to their knowledge, and mind that one thing. This is a very new Expoſition; and the Author of it intends to ſet up for a Critick upon the credit of it. It is pity therefore it ſhould paſs, without ſome conſideration. But, I paſs by the Childiſh triflings about Κανόνι, a Canon, viz. that is not taken in a Military notion, becauſe great Guns were not then invented; that it is an Eccleſiaſtical Canon mounted upon a platform of Moderation; which are things fit only for Boys in the Schools; unleſs, perhaps, they might have been deſigned for an Artillery-Sermon on this Text; but however, methinks they come not in very ſutably in a weighty and ſerious debate. Miſchief of Impoſit. p. 6, 7.

I come therefore to examine the New-Light that is given to this Controverted Text. Κανόνι he obſerves from Grotius, is left out in one MS. (it may be the Alexandrian) but, What is one MS. to the general conſent of Greek Copies? not only the Modern, but thoſe which St. Chryſoſtom, Theodoret, Photius, Œcumenius, and Theophylact had, who all keep it in. But ſuppoſe it be left out, the ſence is the very ſame to my purpoſe. No, ſaith he, Τῷ αὐτῷ ϛοιχεῖν, To walk by the ſame muſt be referred to the antecedent Εἰς ὅ. And what then? Then, ſaith he, the ſenſe is, What we have attained let us walk up to the ſame; Which comes to no more than this, unto whatſoever meaſure or degree of knowledge we have reached, let us walk ſuitably to it.

But the Apoſtle doth not here ſpeak of the improvement of knowledge; but of the union and conjunction of Chriſtians, as appears by the next words τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν, to mind the ſame thing. No ſuch matter, ſaith Mr. A. that phraſe implies no more than to mind that thing, viz. or that very thing, V. 14. preſſing towards the mark. But if he had pleaſed to have read on, but to Phil. 4. 2. he would have found τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν, to ſigniſie Unanimity. And St. Paul, 1 Cor. 12. 25. oppoſes the τὸ αὐτὸ to σχίσμα. That there be no Schiſm in the Body, but that all the Members ſhould take care of τὸ αὐτὸ, one for another: and therefore the τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν, minding the ſame things, is very aptly uſed againſt Schiſms and Diviſions. I ſhould think St. Chryſoſtom, Theodoret, and Theophylact, all underſtood the importance of a Greek Phraſe, as well as our Author, and they all make no ſcruple of interpreting it of the Peace and Concord of Chriſtians. Although St. Auguſtin did not underſtand much Greek, yet he knew the general ſenſe of the Chriſtian Church about this place; and he particularly De Baptiſmo, c. Donat. l. 2. c. 4, 5. applies it to the Peace of the Church, in St. Cyprian's caſe. By this taſte, let any Man judge of the depth of that Man's Learning, or rather the height of his Confidence, who dares to tell the World, That the Univerſal Current and Stream of all Expoſitors is againſt my ſenſe of this Text. And for this univerſal Stream and Current, beſides Grotius, who ſpeaks exactly to the ſame ſenſe with mine, viz. That thoſe who differ'd about the legal Ceremonies, ſhould join with other Chriſtians in what they agreed to be Divine; he mentions only Tirinus and Zanchy, and then cries, In a word, they all conſpire againſt my Interpretation. If he be no better at Polling Non-conformiſts than Expoſitors, he will have no ſuch reaſon to boaſt of his Numbers. Had it not been fairer dealing, in one word, to have referred us to Mr. Pool's Synopſis? For, if he had looked into Zanchy himſelf, he would have found, how he applyed it ſharply againſt Anſw. p. 28. Diſſentions in the Church. Mr. B. ſaith, That the Text ſpeaketh for Unity and Concord is paſt Queſtion; and that to all Chriſtians, though of different attainments; and therefore requireth all to live in Concord that are Chriſtians, notwithſtanding other differences. And if he will but allow, that by vertue of this Rule, Men are bound to do all things lawful for preſerving the Peace of the Church, we have no farther difference about this matter: For then, I am ſure, it will follow, that if occaſional Communion be lawful conſtant Communiou will be a Duty.

And ſo much for the firſt ſort of Diſſenters, who allow ſome kind of Communion with our Church to be lawful.

Sect. 21. II. I come now to conſider the charge of Schiſm, or Sinful Separation, againſt Thoſe, who, though they agree with us in the Subſtantials of Religion, yet deny any Communion with our Church to be lawful. I do not ſpeak of any improper Acts of Communion, which Dr. O. calls

Communion in Faith and Love, this they do allow to the Church of England, but no otherwiſe, than as they believe us to be Orthodox Chriſtians; Vindicat. p. 14. yet he ſeems to go farther, as to ſome at leaſt of our Parochial Churches, that they are true Churches: But in what ſenſe? Are they Churches rightly conſtituted, with whom they may join in Communion as Members? No; that he doth not ſay. But his meaning is, that they are not guilty of any ſuch heinous Errors in Doctrine, or Idolatrous Practice in Worſhip, as ſhould utterly deprive them of the Being and Nature of Churches. And doth this Kindneſs only belong to ſome of our Parochial Churches? I had thought, every Parochial Church was true, or falſe, according to its frame and conſtitution; which among us ſuppoſeth the owning the Doctrine and Worſhip received and practiſed in the Church of England, as it is eſtabliſhed by Law; and if no ſuch Errors in Doctrine, nor Idolatrous Practices be allowed by the Church of England, then every Parochial Church which is conſtituted according to it, is a true Church. But all this amounts to no more, than what they call a Metaphyſical Truth; for he doth not mean, that they are Churches with which they may lawfully have Communion. And he pleads, for the neceſſity of having Separate Congregations, from the neceſſity of Separating from our Communion: (altho' the time was, when the bare want of a right Conſtitution of Churches, was thought a ſufficient ground for ſetting up new Churches, or for withdrawing from the Communion of a Parochial Church; and I do not think the Dr. is of another mind now.) But however, I ſhall take things as I find them; and he inſiſts on, as the grounds of this neceſſity of Separation, the things enjoined by the Laws of the Land, or by the Canons and Orders of the Church; as Signing Children Baptized with the Sign of the Croſs; Kneeling at the Communion; Obſervation of Holy-days; Conſtant Uſe of the Liturgy; Renouncing other Aſſemblies, and the Peoples Right in choice of their own Paſtors; Neglect of the Duties of Church-members; ſubmitting to an Eccleſiaſtical Rule and Diſcipline, which not one of a Thouſand can apprehend to have any thing in it, of the Authority of Chriſt, or Rule of the Goſpel. This is the ſhort account of the Reaſons of Separation from our Churches Communion.

That which I am now to inquire into is, Whether ſuch Reaſons as theſe be ſufficient ground for Separation from a Church, wherein it is confeſſed there are no heinous Errors in Doctrine, or Idolatrous Practice in Worſhip; for if they be not, ſuch Separation muſt be a formal Schiſm; becauſe ſuch perſons not only withdraw from Communion with our Church, but ſet up other Churches of their own.

Now the way I ſhall take to ſhew the inſufficiency of theſe Cauſes of Separation, ſhall be, by ſhewing the great Abſurdities, that follow upon the allowance of them.

Theſe Five eſpecially, I ſhall inſiſt upon.

(1.) That it weakens the Cauſe of Reformation.

(2.) That it hinders all Union between the Proteſtant Churches.

(3.) That it juſtifies the ancient Schiſms, which have been always condemned by the Chriſtian Church.

(4.) That it makes Separation endleſs.

(5.) That it is contrary to the Obligation which lies on all Chriſtians, to preſerve the Peace and Unity of the Church.

Sect. 22. (1.) The prejudice it brings upon the Cauſe of the Reformation. Which I ſhall make appear, not from the Teſtimonies of our own Writers, who may be ſuſpected by the Diſſenters of too much kindneſs to our Church; but, from the eminent and learned Defenders of the Reformation in France, who can be the leaſt ſuſpected of partiality to our Church. Inſtit. l. 4. c. 1. n. 9. I begin with Calvin; againſt whom I hope no exceptions will be taken.

(1.) In the General, He aſſigns two marks of the Viſible Church, the Word of God truly preached, and Sacraments adminiſtred according to Chriſt's Inſtitution.

(2.) He ſaith, Wherever theſe Marks are to be found in particular Societies, thoſe are true Churches, howſoever they are diſtributed according to humane conveniencies.

(3.) That although thoſe ſtand as Members of particular Churches, (who may not be thought worthy of that Society) till they are duly caſt out; yet the Churches themſelves having theſe Marks, do ſtill retain the true Nature and Conſtitution of Churches, and ought to be ſo eſteemed.

(4.) Men ought not to Separate from, or break the Unity of ſuch Churches. Numb. 10. And he hath this notable ſaying upon it: God ſets ſuch a value upon the Communion of his Church, that he looks upon him as an Apoſtate from his Religion, who doth wilfully ſeparate himſelf from any Chriſtian Society, which hath the true Miniſtery of the Word and Sacraments. And a little after, he calls Separation a Denial of God and Chriſt, a deſtruction of his Truth, a mighty provocation of his Anger, a crime ſo great that we can hardly imagine a worſe, it being a Sacrilegious Numb. 11. and perfidious breach of the Marriage betwixt Chriſt and his People. In the next Section he makes it a very dangerous and miſchievous temptation ſo much as to think of Separation from a Church that hath theſe Marks.

(5.) That although there be many Faults and Corruptions in ſuch a Church, yet as long as it retains thoſe Marks, Separation from it, is not juſtifiable: nay, although ſome of thoſe faults be about Preaching the Word, and Adminiſtration of Sacraments: for, ſaith he, all truths are not of equal moment: but as long as the Doctrine according to Godlineſs, and the true Uſe of Sacraments is kept up, Men ought not to ſeparate upon leſſer differences; but they ought to ſeek the amending what is amiſs, continuing in the Communion of the Church; and without diſturbing the Peace and Order of it. And he at large proves, what great allowance is to be made, Numb. 13, 14, 15, 16. as to the corruption of Members from the Examples of the Apoſtolical Churches: and he ſaith, Mens moroſeneſs in this Matter, although it ſeems to flow from zeal, yet it much rather comes from Spiritual Pride, and a falſe opinion of their own holineſs above others. Although, ſaith he, there were ſuch univerſal corruptions in the Jewiſh Church, that the Pro- Numb. 18. phets compare it to Sodom and Gomorrah; yet they never ſet up new Churches, nor erected other Altars, whereat they might offer ſeparate Sacrifices: but whatever the People were, as long as God's Word and Ordinances were among them, they lifted up pure hands to God, although in ſuch an impure Society. The ſame he proves, as to Chriſt and his Apoſtles. From whence he concludes, That Separation from ſuch Churches, Numb. 19. where the true Word of God and Sacraments are, is an inexcuſable fault. But how then comes he to juſtifie the Separation from the Church of Cap. 2. n. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. Rome? Becauſe in that Church the true Doctrine of Chriſt is ſo much ſuppreſſed, and ſo many Errors obtruded on Mens Minds inſtead of it; and the Worſhip of God ſo corrupted, that the Publick Aſſemblies are Schools of Idolatry and Wickedneſs. And the truth of the Goſpel, being the Foundation of the Churches Unity, it can be no culpable Separation to withdraw from the Communion of a Church which hath ſo notoriouſly corrupted his Doctrine and Inſtitutions; eſpecially, when they anathematize thoſe who will not comply with them? But doth he mean any indifferent Rites, or Ceremonies, where the Doctrine is ſound? No; but Falſe Doctrine, and Idolatrous Worſhip; as he frequently declares. And therefore he that would go about to defend Separation from a Church, on the account of ſome Ceremonies preſcribed, and ſome Corruptions remaining in it, muſt overthrow the fundamental grounds of the Reformation, as they are explained by Calvin himſelf.

Sect. 23. Among their later Writers, no Man hath vindicated the Cauſe of the Reformation with greater ſucceſs and reputation than Mr. Daille in his Apology. And the Grounds he goes upon are theſe.

Apology, c. 3.

(1.) That we are bound to avoid the Communion of thoſe, who go about to deſtroy and ruin Chriſtianity.

Cap. 4.

(2.) If the Church of Rome hath not required any thing from us which deſtroys our Faith, offends our Conſciences, and overthrows the ſervice which we believe ~~due to~~ God; if the differences have been ſmall, and ſuch as we might ſafely have yielded unto; then he will grant, that their Separation was raſh and unjuſt, and they guilty of the Schiſm.

Cap. 5. Cap. 7. Cap. 8.

(3.) He proves, that they had weighty reaſons for their Separation; which are theſe, (1.) Impoſing new Doctrines as neceſſary Articles of Faith: and yet, not all errors in Doctrine do afford ſufficient ground for Separation; but ſuch as are pernicious and deſtructive to Salvation: for which he inſtanceth in the Lutherans opinion of Chriſt's Bodily Preſence in the Sacrament, which overthrows not the uſe of the Sacraments, nor requires the adoring it, it neither divides nor mutilates it, nor makes it an expiatory Sacrifice for Sin; all which follows from the Popiſh Doctrine. From whence he concludes, That to ſeparate from a Church for tolerable Errors, is an unjuſt Separation. (2.) Requiring ſuch Worſhip, as overthrows the Foundations of Chriſtianity; which, ſaith he, proves the neceſſity of our Separation; and for this he inſtances in Adoration of the Hoſt; which the Church of Rome ſtrictly requiring, and the Proteſtants believing it to be a mere Creature, they cannot give it without Idolatry: from whence he concludes our Separation to be juſt, becauſe it was neceſſary. Beſides this he gives inſtances in the Worſhip of Images, Invocation of Saints, &c. By which we ſee the Juſtice of the Cauſe of Reformation doth not depend on any ſuch Ceremonies, as ours are, nor on the want of Diſcipline, nor on the bare Diſſatisfaction of Conſcience, but on ſuch great and important Reaſons, as obtruding new Articles of Faith, and Idolatrous Worſhip on the partakers of the Communion of the Roman Church.

Cap. 18.

De ſeceſſ. ab Eccleſ. Rom. &c. p. 233.

Amyraldus goes ſo far, as to ſay, That if there had been no other faults in the Roman Church beſides their unprofitable Ceremonies in Baptiſm, and other things, beyond the meaſure and genius of Chriſtian Religion, they had ſtill continued in its communion; For, ſaith he, a Phyſician is to be born with that loads his Patient with ſome unuſeful Preſcriptions, if he be otherwiſe faithful and ſkilful. But if he mixes Poiſon with his Medicines, and beſides adds abundance of Preſcriptions, both needleſs and chargeable, then the Patient hath great reaſon to look out for better help, and to take care of his own ſafety and freedom. By which he plainly declares, that bare Ceremonies, although many more than ours, are no ſufficient Ground for Separation.

Prejuges legitimes contre les Calviniſtes.

Of late years, a Perſon of Reputation in France ſet forth a Book againſt the Reformation, charging it with Schiſm, becauſe of the Separation from the Roman Church; which hath been Anſwered three ſeveral ways by three learned Divines, M. Claude, M. Pajon, and Mr. Turretin.

But, Do any of theſe inſiſt upon matters of mere Ceremony where the Doctrine is ſound, the conſtant uſe of Liturgy, bare neglect of Diſcipline, &c. No, they were Men of better underſtanding, than to inſiſt on ſuch things as theſe, which they knew could never bear that weight, as to juſtifie Separation from a Church; and that they ſhould have expoſed themſelves and their Cauſe, to the contempt of all conſidering Men, if they could have alledged no more Subſtantial Reaſons than theſe.

Claude ſa Defence de la Reformation. 8. part. Pajon Examen du livre, &c. 3. partie. Turretini diſput. 1. de neceſſariâ ſeceſſione ab Eccleſiâ. Rom. Sect. 11. Le Blanc. Theſes de Reunione.

But they all agree in ſuch common reaſons, which they thought ſufficient to make a Separation juſtifiable, viz. Great corruption in Doctrine, idolatrous Worſhip, and inſupportable Tyranny over the Conſciences of Men. Turretin expreſly ſaith, No ſlight Errors, no tolerable Superſtitious Rites that do not infect the Conſcience (as they cannot where they are not forced upon it by unſound Doctrine) not any corruption of Manners, nor defect in Government or Diſcipline, are ſufficient grounds for Separation. In one word, ſaith he, the Patient is not to be forſaken, unleſs his Diſeaſe be deadly and infectious, nor then neither but with great difficulty.

Le Blanc ſhewing the impoſſibility of Re-union with the Papiſts, goes upon theſe Three Grounds.

1. That it cannot be obtained without ſubſcribing to the Decrees and Canons of the Council of Trent, and without anathematizing all thoſe who have oppoſed them. For the condition of Communion with that Church is no leſs, than receiving all its Errors for neceſſary Articles of Faith.

2. That the Publick Worſhip practiſed and allowed in that Church is idolatrous, he inſtanceth in Adoration of the Hoſt, the Worſhip of Saints and Images.

3. That they cannot return to that Church without ſubjecting their Conſciences to the tyrannical Uſurpations of the Pope.

Let our Brethren now conſider, what Triumphs the Church of Rome would make over us, if we had nothing to juſtifie our Separation from them, but only that we could not have our Children Baptized without an aerial Sign of the Croſs, nor receive the Communion without Kneeling; that we do not obſerve Holy-days, and uſe a Liturgy; and that they are not ſo good as they ſhould be, nor Doctrines ſo exact as were to be wiſhed; How ſhould we be hiſſed and laughed at all over the Chriſtian World; if we had nothing to alledge for our Separation from the Roman Church, but ſuch things as theſe? And when the Papiſts ſee the weakneſs of theſe Allegations, they are harden'd in their own ways; and cry out preſently there is no End of Schiſms and Separations on ſuch Pretences as theſe, by which unſpeakable Miſchief hath been done to the Cauſe of the Reformation.

Sect. 24. (2.) This Pretence of Separation would make Union among the Proteſtant Churches impoſſible, ſuppoſing them to remain as they are. For the Lutheran Churches have the ſame, and more Ceremonies, and Unſcriptural Impoſitions, (as they are called) than our Church hath. They uſe the Croſs in Baptiſm, Kneeling at the Communion; and the Obſervation of Holy-days and Times of Faſting, and Set-Forms of Prayer, &c. yet theſe Churches have been thought fit to be united with the moſt Reformed Churches, by the beſt and wiſeſt Proteſtants, both abroad and at home. I do not mean only to have Communion with them in Faith and Love, as Dr. O. ſpeaks, but to join together ſo as to make the ſame

Bodies of Churches. A Synod of the Reformed Churches in France, at Charenton. A.D. 1631. declared, that there was no Idolatry or Superſtition in the Lutheran Churches, and therefore the Members of their Churches might be received into Communion with them, without renouncing their own Opinions or Practices; which ſhews that they did not look on them as ſufficient grounds of Separation; for then they would not have admitted them as Members of the Lutheran Churches, but have told told them, they ought to forſake their Communion, and embrace that of the Reformed Churches. Look over all thoſe learned and peaceable Divines, who have projected or perſwaded an Union with the Lutheran Churches and others; and ſee if any of them make the Particulars mention'd, any cauſe of Separation from them. The Helvetian Churches declare, That no Separation ought to be made for different Rites and Ceremonies, where there is an Agreement in Doctrine: And the true concord of Churches lies in the Doctrine of Chriſt, and the Sacraments deliver'd by him. And this Confeſſion was firſt drawn up by Bullinger, Myconius and Grynæus, and ſubſcribed afterwards by all their Miniſters; and by thoſe of Geneva and other Places. And they take notice of the different Cuſtoms in other Churches about the Lord's Supper and other things, yet, ſay they, becauſe of our conſent in Doctrine, theſe things cauſe no Breach in our Churches. And they make no ſcruple about the indifferency of any of the Ceremonies uſed in the Lutheran Churches, except thoſe of the Maſs and Images in Churches. At Sendomir in Poland, A. D. 1570. Thoſe who followed the Helvetian, Auſpurg, Bohemian Confeſſions, came to a full Agreement, ſo as to make up one Body, notwithſtanding the different Rites and Ceremonies among them; which, they ſay, ought not to break the Communion of Churches, as long as they agree in the ſame purity of Doctrine, and the ſame foundation of Faith and Salvation; and for this they appeal to the Auſpurg and Saxon Confeſſions. The Auſpurg Confeſſion declares, That agreement in Doctrine and Sacraments is ſufficient for the Churches Unity; then Separation cannot be lawful merely on the account of Ceremonies and Human Traditions. And the Confeſſion of Straſbug ſaith, That they look on no Human Traditions as condemned in Scripture, but ſuch as are repugnant to the Law of God; and bind the Conſciences of Men; otherwiſe if they agree with Scripture, and be appointed for good Ends, although they be not expreſly mention'd in Scripture, they are rather to be looked on as Divine than Human; and the contempt of them is the contempt of God himſelf. Nay, they ſay, tho' the Laws ſeem very hard and unjuſt, a true Chriſtian will not ſtick at obeying them, if they command nothing that is wicked.

The Unity of the Church ſuppoſeth the Obſervation of the Firſt, and yet for every Omiſſion the Communion of the Church is not to be broken. The Second breaks the Churches Unity; yet its communion not to be forſaken for One or Two of theſe, if there be no Tyranny over the Conſciences of Men; but for the Third, Men ought not to break the Unity of the Church. Comment. de Aug. confeſſ. 9. c. 4. p. 33. c. 29. Pag. 435. Zanch. 1. de Red. p. 765.

ſturb the Peace of Churches for the ſake of indifferent Ceremonies; and contrary to that Charity we ought to have to our Brethren and to Churches. Amyraldus ſpeaking of the Ceremonies in the Lutheran Churches, ſaith, that thoſe which came in uſe after the Apoſtolick times, have no other Obligation on us, than that for the ſake of indifferent things, tho' at firſt appointed out of no Neceſſity, nay tho' there be Inconveniency in them, yet the Churches Peace ought not to be diſturbed.

Amyrald. de Seceſſ. ab Eccl. Rom. Deque pace cum Evangel. conſtit. p. 231.

And he very well obſerves, that the Nature of Ceremonies is to be taken from the Doctrine which goes along with them; if the Doctrine be good the Rites are ſo, or at leaſt are tolerable; if it be falſe, then they are troubleſome, and not to be born; if it be impure, and lead to Idolatry, then the Ceremonies are tainted with the Poyſon of it. But, ſaith he, the Lutheran Churces have no falſe or wicked Doctrine concerning their Rites; and therefore he adviſeth Porſons to communicate with the Lutheran Churches, as their Occaſions ſerve; and ſo do others. And Ludovicus Prince Elector Palatine, not only congratulated the mutual Communion of the ſeveral Churches in Poland, but pray'd for the ſame in Germany too, as Biſhop Davenant tells us; who proves at large, that there is no ſufficient Reaſon to hinder it; which he makes to lie only in Three things.

Hornbeek de Conſociat. Evang. Sect. 1. n. 3.

Sentent. D. Daven. p. 5.

I. Tyranny over Mens Faith and Conſciences.
II. The Practice of Idolatry.
III. The Denial of ſome Fundamental Article of Faith.

And none of theſe things being chargeable on the Lutheran Churches, the lawfulneſs of the Terms of Communion with them doth fully appear.

And now I deſire our Brethren, who juſtifie their Separation upon pretence that our Terms of Communion are unlawful, to reflect upon theſe things. Will they condemn ſo many Proteſtant Churches abroad, which have harder Terms of Communion than we? What would they think of the Exorciſm of Infants, of Auricular Confeſſion, of Images in Churches, and ſome other things, beſides what are obſerved among us? Do we want Diſcipline? Do they not in other Churches abroad?

The Tranſylvanian Divines in their Diſcourſe of the Union of Proteſtant Churches declared, That little or none was obſerv'd among them. Will they then ſeparate from all Proteſtant Churches? Will they confine the Communion of Chriſtians to their Narrow Scantlings? Will they ſhut out all the Lutheran Churches from any poſſibility of Union with them? For what Union can be juſtifiable with thoſe whoſe Terms of Communion are unlawful? They may pity them, and pray for them, and wiſh for their Reformation, but an Union doth ſuppoſe ſuch a Communion of Churches, that the Members of one may communicate in another. Do they allow this to the Lutheran Churches? If not, then they render Union among the Proteſtant Churches impoſſible, becauſe unlawful. If they do, will they be ſo unjuſt, as not to allow the ſame Favour and Kindneſs to our own Church? Can they think Separation neceſſary from our Church on thoſe Grounds, which are common to us with other Proteſtant Churches; and yet think Union deſirable and poſſible with them notwithſtanding? Do they think that the Members of the Reformed Churches could lawfully communicate with the Lutheran Churches, altho' they have the Croſs in Baptiſm, Kneeling at the Communion; the Surplice, and other Ceremonies which we have not? and yet, Is it neceſſary to ſeparate from our Churches Communion on the account of ſuch things as theſe; where there is acknowledged to be a full Agreement in the Subſtantials of Religion?

ligion? Either therefore they muſt differ from the Judgment of the Reformed Churches, and the moſt eminent Proteſtant Divines abroad, or they muſt renounce this Principle of Separation.

Sect. 25. (3.) This will juſtifie the ancient Schiſms which have been always condemn'd in the Chriſtian Church. For ſetting aſide the Ceremonies (of which already) and the uſe of the Liturgy and Holy-days (which is common to our Church with all other Chriſtian Churches, for many Hundred years before the great Degeneracy of the Roman Church; and are continued by an univerſal conſent in all parts of the Chriſtian World) the other Reaſons for Separation are ſuch, which will juſtifie the greateſt Schiſmaticks that ever were in the Chriſtian Church, viz. Want of Evangelical Church-Diſcipline, and due Means of Edification, and depriving the People of their Liberty of chuſing their own Paſtors, whereby they are deprived alſo of all uſe of their light and knowledge of the Goſpel, in providing for their own Edification. For, What gave occaſion to the Novatian Schiſm, which began ſo ſoon, and ſpread ſo far, and continued ſo long, but the Pretence of the want of Evangelical Church-Diſcipline, and better Means of Edification, and humouring the People in the choice of their own Paſtors?

Vindication of Non-conformiſts, p. 13. 36.

There were Two things the Novatians chiefly inſiſted on, as to Evangelical-diſcipline.

1. The Power of the Keys.
2. The Purity of the Church.

1. As to the Power of the Keys, they ſaid, That Chriſt had never given it abſolutely to his Church, but under certain Reſtrictions, which if Men exceeded, the Church had no Power to releaſe them; and that was eſpecially in the caſe of denial of Chriſt before Men, when Men fell in time of Perſecution.

2. The Church's Purity ought to be preſerved, by keeping ſuch who had thus fallen from ever being receiv'd into communion again. They did not deny that God might pardon ſuch upon Repentance, but, they ſaid, the Church could not. And this they pleaded would tend very much to the Edification of Chriſtians, and would make them more watchful over themſelves, when they ſaw no hopes of recovering the Church's communion, if they once fell from it. Add to this, that Novatus, or Novatianus (for the Greeks confounded their Names) in his Epiſtle to Dionyſius of Alexandria, ſaith, That he was forced to do what he did, by the importunity of the Brethren, who out of their zeal for the Purity of the Eccleſiaſtical-Diſcipline, would not comply with the looſer part, which joined with Cornelius, and therefore choſe him to be their Biſhop. And ſo much appears by Pacianus, that Novatus coming from Carthage to Rome, makes a Party there for Novatianus in oppoſition to Cornelius, which conſiſted chiefly of thoſe who had ſtood firmeſt in the Perſecution; in their Name he Writes to Novatianus, declaring, That he was choſen by the zealous Party at Rome, whereas Cornelius had admitted the lapſed to communion, and conſequently corrupted the Diſcipline of the Chriſtian Church.

Here we have a concurrence of Dr. O's Pleas, Zeal for Reformation of Diſcipline, the greater Edification of the People, and the aſſerting their right in chuſing ſuch a Paſtor as was not likely to promote their Edification. But notwithſtanding theſe fair Pretences, the making a Separation in the Church, was every where condemned as a great Sin; as appears by St. Cyprian, Dionyſius of Alexandria, Theodoret, Epiphanius, and others.

Cyprian. Epiſt. 51, 52. De unit. Eccl. de lapſis. Euſeb. l. 6. c. 45. Theod. hæret. fab. l. 3. 5. Epiph. hær. 59.

others. Dionyſius tells the Author of the Schiſm, that he had better have ſuffer'd any thing, than thus to have made a Rent in the Church: and it was as glorious a Martyrdom to die to prevent a Schiſm, as to avoid Idolatry, and he thinks it a much greater thing; the one being a Martyrdom for the Church, the other only for ones own Soul. St. Cyprian charges thoſe who were guilty of this Schiſm with Pride and Arrogance, and doing unſpeakable miſchief to the Church, by breaking the Peace of it: and will hardly allow thoſe to be Chriſtians who lived in ſuch a Schiſm: when as Cyprian. de Unit. Eccl. n.11.12,&c. Epiphanius obſerves, they ſtill pleaded they had the ſame Faith with the Catholick Church; and yet St. Cyprian will not allow that to be true Faith which hath not charity; and ſaith, That there can be no true charity, where Men do thus break in pieces the Unity of the Church.

Epiph. hær. 68. The Meletians in Ægypt agreed with the Catholick Chriſtians in the Subſtantials of Religion, holding the ſame Faith with them, as Epiphanius relates the Story; and their Schiſm began too about preſerving the Diſcipline of the Church, and the beſt means for the Edification of the People. They allowed a Reſtitution for the lapſed to the Communion of the Church, but after a very ſevere Diſcipline, and an utter incapacity of thoſe in Orders as to any parts of their Functions. But Peter Biſhop of Alexandria thought the milder way the better; whereupon a Separation followed: and the Meletians had diſtinct Churches; which they called, The Churches of the Martyrs. This Schiſm grew to that height, that they would not pray together in Priſon, nor in the Quarries whither they were ſent. Meletius being Theod. l.1.c. 9. a Biſhop was depoſed by Peter of Alexandria, but he went on ſtill to promote the courſe of Separation in Thebais, and other parts of Egypt, upon which the Council of Nice, in their Synodical Epiſtle, deprived him of all Epiſcopal Power, and the People that adhered to him, of the Power of chooſing their own Paſtors (or rather of propoſing the names of thoſe who were to be ordained.) And ſo, according to Dr. O. they had juſt cauſe to continue their Separation ſtill; although it were condemned by the Council of Nice.

Audæus began his Schiſm out of a mighty zeal for the Diſcipline of the Epiph. hær. 70. Church, and a great freedom which he uſed in reproving the faults of the Biſhops and Clergy; but meeting with ill uſage, he withdrew from the Churches Communion, with his Diſciples, although he ſtill retained the ſame Faith, and agreed in the Subſtantials of Religion with the beſt Chri-
Sect. 15. ſtians; but forbore all Communion with them; which Epiphanius accounts δεινότερον πάντων ϗ φοβερώτερον, the moſt dreadful thing in the World: and yet upon Dr. O's Principles of Separation, they did a very commendable thing as long as their deſign was to reſtore the Churches Diſcipline, and to conſult their own greater Edification.

The followers of Euſtathius Sebaſtenus are on this account likewiſe excuſed, who withdrew from the publick Congregations on a pretence of greater ſanctity and purity in Paphlagonia, and ſtand condemned in ſeveral Canons of the Council at Gangræ; ſo are thoſe mention'd and condemn'd in the Councils of Conſtantinople and Carthage; and the Separation of Feliciſſimus and his Brethren from St. Cyprian; all which are ſet down together in my Sermon, but are gently paſſed over by Dr. O. and Mr. B. and the reſt of their Adverſaries.

Rector of Sutton, &c. p.42. Only one ſaith, That the Errors of the followers of Euſtathius Sebaſtenus, both in Opinion and Practice, were very groſs, which the Council takes notice of and condemns. Yet, as groſs as they were, there was a pretence of greater Sanctity and Purity in them. For their abſtaining from Marriage, and peculiarity of Habits, and Separate Meetings, were all carried on with the ſame Pretence.

To proceed then. On the ſame accounts the Donatiſts will be vindicated in the main grounds of their Schiſm, although they were miſtaken in the matter of fact concerning Cæcilian; for their great pretence was to preſerve the purity of the Church's Diſcipline, as may at large be ſeen in Optatus, and St. Auguſtin; and yet they frequently, and deliberately call it, a moſt Damnable and Sacrilegious Schiſm.

The Luciferians pretended ſuch a zeal for the true Faith, and the Diſcipline of the Church, that the only pretence for their Schiſm was, that they could not communicate with thoſe who had ſubſcribed to Arianiſm, or received Ordination from Arian Biſhops; as may be ſeen at large in the Book of Marcellinus and Fauſtinus. And they joyned with the party of Urſinus at Rome againſt that of Damaſus, and complained, they were deprived of the liberty of chooſing their own Paſtors.

So that upon theſe grounds, there hath ſcarce been any conſiderable Schiſm in the Chriſtian Church, but may be juſtified upon Dr. Owen's Reaſons for Separation from our Church.

Sect. 26. (4.) Another Argument againſt this courſe of Separation, is, That theſe grounds will make Separation endleſs. Which is, to ſuppoſe all the Exhortations of Scripture to Peace and Unity among Chriſtians, to ſignifie nothing. For nothing being more contrary to Unity than Diviſion and Separation; if there be no bounds ſet, but what the fancies of Men dictate to them be ſufficient Grounds to juſtifie Diviſion and Separation, any People may break Communion with a Church, and ſet up a new one, when they think fit; which will leave the Chriſtian Church in a remedileſs condition againſt thoſe who break its Peace and Communion. It being a true ſaying of Mr. Cotton's of New-England, That they that ſeparate from their Brethren farther than they have juſt Cauſe, ſhall at length find cauſe (or at leaſt think they have found cauſe) juſt enough to ſeparate one from another. I never heard, ſaith he, of any inſtance to the contrary, either in England, or Holland. The ſubſtance of this I had objected before in the Preface to my Sermon; To which Mr. A. Replies after this manner; That though ſome petty and inconſiderable inconveniencies, ſome little trouble may ariſe to a Church from the levity and volubility of Mens Minds; yet this is no Reaſon why they ſhould enſlave their Judgments or Conſciences to others. And is this all the Antidote againſt the Miſchief of Separation? Is it a Sin, to break the Church's Communion, or, Is it not? If it be a Sin in ſome caſes, but not in others; Why do you not ſhew us what thoſe caſes are; and that it is a ſinful Separation in other caſes, but not in them? But to talk of ſmall inconveniencies by the levity of Peoples minds, is Childiſh trifling, and not anſwering. Is Schiſm indeed become ſuch an inconſiderable and petty inconvenience? Is this an Anſwer becoming a Chriſtian, to ſwell every ſmall Impoſition into a huge inſupportable Mountain, and to make themſelves lie groaning under the weight of a Ceremony or two, as though their very heart-ſtrings were cracking, and as if Nero had begun a freſh Perſecution; and at the ſame time to leſſen the guilt of Diviſion and Separation, as though it were nothing but a little wantonneſs in the Lambs of their Flocks, friſking up and down from one Paſture to another; ſome ſmall and inconſiderable inconveniencies may happen by it, but not worth ſpeaking of; and it is pity they ſhould be deprived of their pleaſure for it. What a rare Advocate had this Man been for the Novatians, Donatiſts, Luciferians, or what the Principles of Separation, which he lays down, after what manner he

"and Schiſmaticks. I pray Sirs have a little patience with me; if I do not fetch off my good friends the Donatiſts in this matter, we will all be content to be called Schiſmaticks, as well as they. For if our Principles do clear our ſelves, I am ſure they will do as good a turn for them. Now, the main Principles of our preſent Separation are theſe.

"(1.) That every particular Church, upon a due balance of all circumſtances, has an inherent right to chooſe its own Paſtor, and every particular Chriſtian the ſame Power to chooſe his own Church. I ſay not to miſchooſe, do you mark me, but, a power to chooſe; not to chooſe any, but one that may beſt advance their own Edification; at leaſt that no Paſtor be forced upon a Church, no Church obtruded on a ſingle Chriſtian without their own conſent. Now I pray conſider, Why might not Lucilla, and Donatus, and Botrus, and Celeuſius, with their Party among the People at Carthage, chooſe Majorinus for their Paſtor; although the reſt had choſen Cæcilian? For they were not well ſatisfied with Menſurius his Predeceſſor, whom they ſuſpected for a Traditor; but when they had their liberty to chooſe, Why ſhould they be debarred of their inherent right of chooſing their own Paſtor? Why ſhould Cæcilian be obtruded upon them? Why ſhould not they chooſe one, who would beſt advance their Edification? For Cæcilian was at leaſt under ſuſpicion of compliance in time of Perſecution, and therefore for my part, upon our Principles, I think the Donatiſts very free from the charge of Schiſm.

Miſchief of Impoſitions in the Preface.

"(2.) That it is the duty of every Chriſtian to worſhip, not only in purity of heart, but according to the purity of Goſpel-Adminiſtrations. Now obſerve, that there was nothing the Donatiſts pleaded ſo much, and ſo vehemently for, as the purity of Goſpel-Adminiſtrations. This was that which Parmenian, Petilian, and the reſt ſtill contended for, as appears by the Plea they put in for themſelves in the laſt Conference at Carthage. We are they (ſay they) that have ſuffer'd perſecution for maintaining the Purity of the Church, this hundred years, becauſe we would not comply with their corruptions, we have been turned out of our Churches, and been ſent to Priſon, and had our Goods taken from us, and ſome of our Brethren have been killed, and others hardly uſed for ſo good a Cauſe; And, Can ſuch Men as you condemn them for a horrible Schiſm? I tell you, they are as Innocent as our ſelves, for they went upon the ſame grounds.

Collat. 3. Carthag. n. 258.

"(3.) That every Chriſtian is obliged to live in the uſe of all God's Ordinances and Commandments. Now, Is not Diſcipline one of God's Ordinances? And, Do we not make want of Diſcipline, one of the Reaſons of our Separation? And therefore the Donatiſts were very honeſt Men, for they were juſt of our mind. And theſe being the chief grounds we go upon, we cannot but in Brotherly kindneſs ſpeak this in vindication of them, againſt your unreaſonable ſeverity. I know you tell them often, There will be no end of Separation upon theſe terms; for why might not Maximianus do the ſame by Primianus, that Majorinus did by Cæcilian? And ſo make fruſtum de fruſto, by which they did minutatim concidere, cut the Church into ſo many little pieces, that could never be joyned together again: But, let me tell you, that the force of your Argument comes to this, That Men may chooſe one Paſtor to day, and another to morrow, and a third the next; and ſo turn round till they are giddy, and run themſelves out of breath in a Wild-gooſe

Thus far the Advocate-General for Schiſmaticks.

Judge now, Reader, whether the cauſes of the preſent Separation, as they are laid down by my Adverſary, do not equally defend the Donatiſts in their Schiſm; and his making ſo light a matter of Schiſms doth not give Encouragement to Men to make more.

Sect. 27. But I ſhall not ſend him ſo far back as St. Cyprian, and St. Auguſtin, for better Inſtruction in this matter; but I ſhall refer him to one whoſe Writings I perceive he is better acquainted with, even Mr. Baxter. Who hath very well, in ſeveral Books, ſet forth the great Miſchief of Diviſions and Separations. He doth not look upon them as petty and inconſiderable Inconveniencies, little Troubles to the Church, the effects of levity, and volubility of Mens Minds; but he quotes above Forty Places of Scriptures againſt them, and ſaith, That the World, the Fleſh, and the Devil are the cauſes from whence they come; that they are as much the Works of the Fleſh, as Adulteries, Fornications, &c. that contentious Dividers are carnal Men, and have not the Spirit; that Dividers are the Wounding, nay the Killing of the Church, as much as lieth in the Dividers; and that to reform the Church, by dividing it, is no wiſer than to cut out the Liver, or Spleen, or Gall, to cleanſe them from the filth that both obſtruct them, and hinder them in their Office; that Diviſions are the deformities of the Church, the lamentation of Friends, and the ſcorn of Enemies; the diſhonour of Chriſt and the Goſpel; the great hinderance of the Converſion and Salvation of the World, and of the Edification of the Members of the Church; That they fill the Church with Sins of a moſt odious Nature; they cheriſh Pride and Malice, and Belying others (the Three great Sins of the Devil) as naturally as dead fleſh breedeth Worms. In a word, the Scripture telleth us, that where envying and ſtrife is, there is confuſion and every evil work, (And, is not this a lamentable way of Reformation of ſome imaginary, or leſſer evils) Yet farther, he ſaith, They are uneaſie to the perſons themſelves, and rob them of the ſweeteſt part of Religion; they lead directly to Apoſtacy from the Faith, and ſhake States and Kingdoms, having a lamentable Influence on the Civil Peace. Is all this nothing but the natural effect of the levity or volubility of Peoples Minds? This learned Author begins his Book with a very ſtarched Relation of his admirable Reading, That in his time he hath read an Elegant Oration in praiſe of a Quartan Ague; another upon the Gout, a third upon Folly; but there wants one yet in the praiſe of Schiſm; and I never met with one that doth offer fairer toward it, than he doth. For he not only excuſes it, from the natural cauſe of it, and the ſmall trouble that attends it; but he implies it to be the conſequence of Men's uſing their Reaſon, and not being made Brutes to be managed with a ſtrong Bit and Bridle. But Mr. Baxter will teach him another Leſſon; for, he ſaith, that Schiſm is a Sin againſt ſo many, and clear, and vehement words of the

the Holy Ghoſt, that it is utterly without excuſe; Whoredoms, and Treaſon, and Perjury are not oftner forbidden in the Goſpel, than this: That it is contrary to the very deſign of Chriſt in our Redemption, which was, to reconcile us all to God, and to unite and centre us all in him: That it is contrary to the deſign of the Spirit of Grace, and to the very nature of Chriſtianity it ſelf: That it is a Sin againſt the neareſt Bonds of our higheſt Relations to each other; that it is either a dividing Chriſt, or robbing him of a great part of his Inheritance: And neither of theſe is a little ſin: That it is accompanied with Self-ignorance, and Pride, and great Unthankfulneſs to God: That Church-dividers are the moſt ſucceſsful ſervants of the Devil, being enemies to Chriſt in his Family and Livery: And that they ſerve the Devil more effectually than open enemies: That Schiſm is a ſin which contradicteth all God's Ordinances and Means of Grace, which are purpoſely to procure and maintain the Unity of his Church. That it is a ſin againſt as great and lamentable Experiences, as almoſt any ſin can be: And this is a heinous aggravation of it; that it is commonly juſtified, and not repented of by thoſe that commit it; and it is yet the more heinous, that it is commonly father'd upon God: Laſtly, that it is moſt unlike the Heavenly State, and in ſome regard worſe than the Kingdom of the Devil, for he would not deſtroy it by dividing it againſt it ſelf. Remember now, ſaith he, that Schiſm, and making Parties and Diviſions in the Church, is not ſo ſmall a Sin as many take it for. I conclude this, with his Admonition to Bagſhaw, upon his leſſening the Sin of Separation. Alaſs, dear Brother, that after ſo many years Silencing and Affliction, after Flames and Plagues, and Dreadful Judgments, after Twenty years Practice of the Sin it ſelf, and when we are buried in the Ruins which it cauſed, we ſhould not yet know, that our own Uncharitable Diviſions, Alienations, and Separations are a Crying Sin! Yea, the Crying Sin; as well as the Uncharitableneſs and Hurtfulneſs of others. Alaſs! Will God leave us alſo, even us, to the Obdurateneſs of Pharaoh? Doth not Judgment begin with us? Is there not Crying Sin with us? What have we done to Chriſt's Kingdom, to this Kingdom, to our Friends (dead and alive) to our ſelves, and (alaſs) to our Enemies, by our Diviſions. And, Do we not feel it? Do we not know it? Is it to us, even to us, a Crime intolerable to call us to Repentance? Woe to us! Into what Hard-heartedneſs have we ſinned our ſelves? Yea, that we ſhould continue, and Paſſionately defend it? When will God give us Repentance unto Life?

Defence of his Cure, 2 Except. p. 6.

Let Mr. A. read theſe Paſſages over Seriouſly, and then conſider, Whether he can go on to Excuſe, and Palliate the SIN of SCHISM.

But it may be ſaid, That Mr. A. ſpeaks all this Comparatively, with enſlaving our Judgments and Conſciences to others, which he calls an Enormous and Monſtrous Principle; and he ſaith, This is a Medicine worſe than the Poyſon, even as 'tis much better to have a Rational Soul, tho' ſubject to Miſtakes, than the Soul of a Brute, which may be managed as you will, with a ſtrong Bit and Bridle. To make it plain, that he makes little or nothing of the Sin of Separation, we muſt attend to the Argument he was to anſwer; which was, That if it be lawful to ſeparate on a pretence of greater purity, where there is an Agreement in Doctrine, and the ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip, as is agreed in our Caſe, then a bare difference of Opinion, as to ſome circumſtances of Worſhip, and the beſt Conſtitution of Churches, will be ſufficient Ground to break

Communion, and to ſet up new Churches; which conſidering the great variety of Men's fancies about theſe matters, is to make an infinite Diviſibility in Churches, without any poſſible ſtop to farther Separation. Where we ſee plainly the Inconvenience urged is endleſs Separation: Doth he ſet any kind of bounds to it? No; but only talks of inconſiderable and petty Inconveniences, and ſome little trouble that may ariſe to a Church from the levity and volubility of Men's Minds, i. e. let Men ſeparate as long as they will, this is the worſt of it; and he muſt grant, that though Separation be endleſs, there is no harm in it. But he that could find out a medium between Circumſtances of Worſhip, and Subſtantials; can find out none between endleſs Separation, and the enſlaving Men's Judgments and Conſciences; for he ſuppoſes, one of the two muſt of neceſſity be: Which is plain giving up the Cauſe to the Papiſts. For this is their Argument, Either we muſt give up our Judgments and Conſciences to the Conduct of our Guides, or there will be endleſs Separation. He grants the conſequence, and cries, What then? It is nothing but the levity and volubility of Men's Minds, and this is much rather to be choſen than the other. But any ſound Proteſtant that underſtands the State of the Controverſie between us and them (as this Author apparently doth not) will preſently deny the Conſequence: Becauſe a prudent and due ſubmiſſion in lawful things lies between Tyranny over Men's Conſciences, and endleſs Separation. But he knows no Medium between being tied Neck and Heels together, and leaping over Hedge and Ditch, being kept within no Bounds. And what ignorance or malice is it to ſuppoſe, that our Church brings in that enormous and monſtrous Principle, of enſlaving Men's Judgments and Conſciences, forcing them to ſurrender their Reaſons to naked Will and Pleaſure? and if he doth not ſuppoſe it, his Diſcourſe is frivolous and impertinent. For, a due ſubmiſſion to the Rules of our eſtabliſhed Church, without any force on the Conſciences of Men, as to the Infallibility of Guides, or neceſſity of the things themſelves; will put a ſufficient ſtop to Separation; which muſt be endleſs on my Adverſaries ſuppoſitions.

Sect. 28. (5.) Laſtly, I Argue againſt this Separation, from the Obligation which lies upon all Chriſtians, to preſerve the Peace and Unity of the Church. And now I have brought the matter home to the Conſciences of Men, who it may be will little regard other Inconveniences, if the practice of Separation do not appear to be unlawful from the Word of God. Which I now undertake to prove, upon theſe Suppoſitions.

(1.) That all Chriſtians are under the ſtricteſt Obligations to preſerve the Peace and Unity of the Church. For it is not poſſible to ſuppoſe, that any Duty ſhould be bound upon the Conſciences of Men, with plainer Precepts, and ſtronger Arguments than this is. The places are ſo many, that it were endleſs to repeat them; and therefore needleſs, becauſe this is agreed on all hands. So that violation of the Unity of the Church, where there is no ſufficient reaſon to juſtifie it, is a Sin, as much as Murder is, and as plainly forbidden. But it happens here, as it doth in the other caſe, that as Murder is always a ſin; but there may be ſome circumſtances, which may make the taking away a Man's Life, not to be Murder; ſo it may happen, that though Schiſm be always a ſin, yet there may be ſuch circumſtances which may make a Separation not to be a Schiſm; but then they muſt be ſuch Reaſons, as are not fetched from our Fancies, no more than in the caſe of Murder; but ſuch as are allowed by God himſelf in his Law. For, he only that made the Law can except from it.

(2.) The Unity of the Church doth not lie in a bare communion of Faith and Love, but in a Joynt-participation of the Ordinances appointed by Chriſt to be obſerved in his Church. For although the former be a Duty, yet it doth not take in the whole Duty of a Chriſtian, which is to join together, as Members of the ſame Body. And therefore they are commanded to Aſſemble together; and upon the firſt Inſtitution of a Chriſtian Church, it is ſaid, The Diſciples continued in the Apoſtles Doctrine and Fellowſhip, and in breaking of Bread, and in Prayers. And the Apoſtle ſets forth Chriſtians as making one Body, by Communion in the Ordinances of Chriſt. We being many are one Bread, and one Body; for we are all Partakers of that one Bread. And by one Spirit, we are all Baptized into one Body; whether we be Jews or Gentiles, bond or free, and have been all made to drink into one Spirit. The Unity of the Chriſtian Church, St. Paul ſaith, is to be preſerved by the Bond of Peace; and that Unity ſuppoſeth One Body and One Spirit; and the Members of that Body as they are united to one Head, whom he calls One Lord, ſo they are joined together by One Faith, and One Baptiſm. Therefore as the Unity of the Church is founded upon ſome External Bonds, as well as Internal, that is, One Faith, and One Baptiſm, as well as One Lord, and One Spirit; ſo the manifeſtation of this Unity ought to be by External Acts; for, How can this Unity be diſcovered by Acts merely Internal and Spiritual; as inward love to the Members of the Body, being preſent in Spirit, &c? Therefore, the Obligation to preſerve the Unity of the Church, doth imply a joining together with the other Members of the Church, in common and Publick Acts of Religion.

Heb. 10. 25.
Act. 2. 42.
1 Cor. 10. 17.
1 Cor. 12. 13.
Epheſ. 4. 3, 4, 5.

(3.) Nothing can diſcharge a Chriſtian from this Obligation to Communion with his Fellow-Members, but what is allowed by Chriſt or his Apoſtles, as a ſufficient Reaſon for it. Becauſe this being a new Society of Chriſt's own Inſtitution; and the obligation to Communion being ſo ſtrictly enjoined, we are to ſuppoſe it ſtill to hold, where ſome plain declaration of his Will to the contrary doth not appear. Although God hath, with great ſeverity, forbidden Killing: Yet when himſelf appointed particular caſes, wherein Men's Lives were to be taken away; we are thereby aſſur'd, that in theſe caſes it is not that killing which is forbidden; ſo in the preſent caſe, if it appear that although Separation from the Communion of Chriſtians be a thing condemned; yet if the ſame Authority do allow particular exemptions, we are certain in thoſe caſes ſuch Separation is no ſin. But then, as in the former caſe, no Man is exempted from the guilt of ſhedding blood, who upon his own fancy takes upon him to execute Juſtice; ſo here, no Man's imagination that he doth ſeparate for a good end, will juſtifie his Separation; for the guilt of the ſin remains as great in it ſelf. And there is ſcarce any other ſin more aggravated in the New Teſtament than this; it being ſo directly contrary to that Unity of his Church, which our Saviour prayed for, and his Apoſtles with ſo much earneſtneſs recommend to all Chriſtians; and uſe ſo many Arguments to perſuade Men to perſevere. From hence Irenæus ſaith, That Chriſt will come to Judge thoſe who make Schiſms in the Church, and rather regard their own advantage, than the Churches Unity; who, for ſlight cauſes, or for any, make nothing of cutting aſunder the great and glorious Body of Chriſt, and do what in them lies to deſtroy it. They ſpeak for Peace, ſaith he, but they mean War; they ſtrain at a Gnat, and ſwallow Camels. The benefit they hope to bring to the Church, cannot make amends for the miſchief of their Schiſm. Nothing provokes God more, Chryſoſt. in Eph. 4. p. 822. ſaith St. Chryſoſtom, than to divide his Church: Nay, ſaith he, the Blood of Martyrdom will not waſh off the guilt of it. The miſchief the Church receives by it, is greater than it receives from open Enemies; for the one makes it more glorious, the other expoſes it to ſhame among its Enemies, when it is ſet upon by its own Children. This, ſaith he, I ſpeak to thoſe who make no great matter of Schiſm, and indifferently go to the Meetings of thoſe who divide the Church. If their Doctrine be contrary to ours, for that reaſon they ought to abſtain; if not, πολλῷ μᾶλλον, they ought to do it ſo much the rather. Do not you know what Corah, Dathan, and Abiram ſuffer'd? and not they only, but thoſe that were with them. But you ſay, they have the ſame Faith, and they are very Orthodox: Why then, ſaith he, do they ſeparate? One Lord, one Faith, one Baptiſm. If they do well, we do ill; if we do well they do ill. If they have the ſame Doctrines, the ſame Sacraments, for what cauſe do they ſet up another Church in oppoſition to ours? It is nothing but vain-glory, ambition, and deceit. Take away the People from them, and you cut off the diſeaſe. And after much more to that purpoſe, I ſpeak theſe things, ſaith he, that no Man might ſay, he did not know it to be ſuch a ſin: I tell you, and teſtifie this to you, that Separation from the Church, or dividing of it, is no leſs a ſin, than falling into Hereſie. If the ſin then be ſo great and dangerous, Men ought to examine with great care, what caſes thoſe are wherein Separation may be made without ſin.

And I do earneſtly deſire our Brethren, as they love their own Souls, and would avoid the guilt of ſo great a Sin, impartially, and without prejudice to conſider this paſſage of Irenæus, and how parallel it is with their own Caſe who ſeparate from us, and ſet up other Churches in oppoſition to ours, which yet they acknowledge to be very Orthodox, and to agree with them in the ſame Doctrine, and the ſame Sacraments.

4. There are Three Caſes wherein the Scripture allows of Separation.

Firſt, In the caſe of idolatrous Worſhip. For the Precepts are as plain that Chriſtians ſhould abſtain from Idolatry, as that they ſhould preſerve 1 Cor. 10. 6. 14. the unity of the Church. Neither be ye Idolaters. Flee from Idolatry. 1 St. Joh. 5. Keep your ſelves from Idols. Thou ſhalt love the Lord thy God, and him Mat. 4. 19. only ſhalt thou ſerve. And to the caſe of Idolaters, St. Paul applies the 2 Cor. 6. 17. words ſpoken of old to the Babylonians, Come out from among them, and be ſeparate, and touch not the unclean thing. Now in this caſe, where there is ſo plain a Command, there is no doubt of the lawfulneſs of Separation; if Men cannot join with a Church in their religious Worſhip, without doing that which God hath ſo ſtrictly forbidden.

Secondly, In caſe of falſe Doctrine being impoſed in ſtead of true. For Heb. 13. 7. 17. although in other things great ſubmiſſion is required to the Guides and 1 Theſſ. 5. 12, 13. Governours of the Church; yet if any Teachers offer to bring another Gal. 1. 6, 7, 8. Goſpel, or to corrupt the true one, St. Paul denounces an Anathema againſt them; and that implies that they ſhould have no communion with them, but look upon them as Perſons cut off from the Body, (like putrid Members) leſt they ſhould corrupt the reſt. St. Paul commands Titus, when Tit. 3. 10. there is no hopes of reclaiming ſuch, to exclude them from the So- ciety of Chriſtians. St. John forbids all familiar converſation with ſuch.

The Church of Epheſus is commended for hating the Nicolaitans, and 2 John 10. the Church of Pergamus reproved for tolerating their Doctrine. Rev. 2. 6. 15.

Thirdly, In caſe Men make things indifferent neceſſary to Salvation, and divide the Church upon that account. And this was the caſe of the falſe Apoſtles, who urged the Ceremonies of the Law, as neceſſary to Acts 15. 1.
Salvation; and to propagate this opinion of theirs, they went up and down, and endeavour'd to draw away the Apoſtles Diſciples, and to ſet up ſeparate Churches among the Chriſtians; and to allow none to partake with them, that did not own the Neceſſity of the Jewiſh Ceremonies to Salvation. Now although St. Paul himſelf complied ſometimes with the practice of them; and the Jewiſh Chriſtians eſpecially in Judæa, generally obſerved them; yet when theſe falſe Apoſtles came to enforce the obſervation of them, as neceſſary to Salvation, then he bid the Chriſtians at Philippi to beware of them, i. e. to fly their communion, and Phil. 3. 3. have nothing to do with them. Theſe are all the Caſes I can find in the New Teſtament, wherein Separation from publick Communion is allowed;
but there are two others, wherein St. Paul gives particular Directions, but ſuch as do not amount to Separation.

1. The different Opinions they had about Meats and Drinks; ſome were for a Pythagorean Abſtinence, from all Fleſh; ſome for a Jewiſh Rom. 14. 2.
Abſtinence, from ſome certain ſorts; others for a full Chriſtian Liberty.
Now this being a matter of Diet, and relating to their own Families, the Apoſtle adviſes them not to cenſure or judge one another; but notwithſtanding this difference, to join together as Chriſtians in the Duties common to them all. For the Kingdom of God doth not lie in Meats and —17.
Drinks; i. e. Let every one order his Family as he thinks fit; but that requires innocency, and a care not to give diſturbance to the Peace of the Church for theſe matters; which he calls peace and joy in the Holy Ghoſt, which is provoked and grieved by the diſſentions of Chriſtians. And he, ſaith he, that in theſe things ſerveth Chriſt, is acceptable to God, and ap- —18.
proved of men. Let us therefore follow after the things that make for —19.
peace, and things wherewith we may edifie one another. In ſuch Caſes then, the Apoſtle allows no Separation from the publick communion of Chriſtians. It was the ſame caſe as to the obſervation of Days then; for ſome Chriſtians went then on Jewiſh Holidays to the Synagogues; others did not; but for ſuch things they ought not to divide from each others communion in the common Acts of Chriſtian Worſhip. And the deſign of the Apoſtle is not to lay down a ſtanding Rule of mutual forbearance as to different Communions; but to ſhew that ſuch differences ought not to be an occaſion of breaking Communion among Chriſtians, and ſo the Apoſtle's diſcourſe, Rom. 14. holds ſtrongly againſt Separation, on theſe and the like accounts.

2. The corrupt Lives of many who were not under the Church's Cenſure.
When St. Paul taxes ſo many Corruptions in the Church of Corinth, no wonder if ſome of them, put the caſe to them, what they ſhould do, in caſe they knew ſome Members of the Church to be Men of bad Lives;
although the offences were not ſcandalous, by being publickly known; muſt they abſtain from the communion of the Church for theſe? To this St. Paul 1 Cor. 5. 11.
anſwers, That every private Chriſtian ought to forbear all familiar Converſation with ſuch: If any one that is a brother, be a fornicator, &c. with ſuch a one, no not to eat. Which is all the Apoſtle requires of private Chriſtians; but if the Scandal be publick, as that of the ince-

ſtuous perſon, the Church had power to vindicate its own honour, by Ver. 12, 13. caſting ſuch out; not as though the Church-Communion were defiled, if they continued in; but the reputation and honour of the Church ſuffered by it; the preſervation whereof, is the true cauſe of the Church's Diſcipline. But the Apoſtle gives not the leaſt countenance to private Mens withdrawing from the Church's Communion, though ſuch perſons ſtill continued in it. For there may be many reaſons to break off private familiarity, which will not hold as to publick Communion. For our Communion in publick is a thing which chiefly reſpects God, and a neceſſary duty of his own appointing, the benefit whereof depends upon his Promiſes, and all the communion they have with other Men, is only joining together for the performance of a common religious Duty: but private familiarity is a thing which wholly reſpects the Perſon's converſe with, and a thing of mere choice, and hardly to be imagined without approbation at leaſt, if not imitation of their wickedneſs. And therefore to argue from one to the other is very unreaſonable.

The matter of Separation being thus ſtated, according to the Scripture, there can be no way left to juſtifie the Separation from our Church, but to prove, either that our Worſhip is idolatrous; or that our Doctrine is falſe, or that our Ceremonies are made neceſſary to Salvation; which are all ſo remote from any colour of Truth, that none of my Adverſaries have yet had the hardineſs to undertake it. But however, what Pleas they do bring to juſtifie this Separation, muſt in the next place be examined.

Letter of Monſieur Le Moyn.

—— Of Monſieur Le Angle.

—— Of Monſieur Claude.

Sect. 1. ALL the conſiderable Pleas at this time made uſe of for Separation, may be reduced to theſe Heads. 1. Such as relate to the Conſtitution of our Church. 2. To the Terms of Communion with it. 3. To the Conſciences of Diſſenters. 4. To the Parity of Reaſon as to our Separation from Rome.

I. Such as relate to the Conſtitution of our Church: Which are theſe,

1. That our Parochial Churches are not of Chriſt's Inſtitution.
2. That our Dioceſan Churches are unlawful.
3. That our National Church hath no foundation.
4. That the People are deprived of their Right in the choice of their Paſtors.

1. I begin with our Parochial Churches; becauſe it is Separation from theſe, with which we principally charge our Adverſaries; for herein they moſt diſcover their Principles of Separation, ſince in former times, the Nonconformiſts thought it their duty to keep up Communion with them. But ſince the Congregational-way hath prevailed in England, the preſent Diſſenters are generally fallen into the practice of it, whatever their Principles are, at leaſt ſo far as concerns forſaking Communion with our Parochial Churches, and joining together in ſeparate Congregations for Divine Worſhip. This Principle is therefore the firſt thing to be examined. And the main foundation of that way, I ſaid, was, that Communion in Ordinances muſt be only in ſuch Churches as Chriſt himſelf inſtituted by unalterable Rules, which were only particular and Congregational Churches. Concerning which I laid down two things. (1.) That ſuppoſing Congregational Churches to be of Chriſt's Inſtitution, this was no reaſon for ſeparation from our Parochial Churches, which have all the eſſentials of ſuch true Churches in them. (2.) That there is no reaſon to believe that the Inſtitution of Churches was limited to particular Congregations.

In anſwer to this, Dr. O. ſaith theſe things, (1.) That they do not deny, at leaſt ſome of our Parochial Churches to be true Churches: But why then do they deny Communion with them? But, he ſaith, he hopes it will not be made a Rule, that Communion may not be with-held, (ſo the ſenſe muſt be although not be left out) or withdrawn from any Church in any thing, ſo long as it continues as unto the eſſence of it to be ſo.

This is ſomewhat odly and faintly expreſſed. But as long as he Ibid. grants, that our Parochial Churches are not guilty of ſuch heinous Errors in Doctrine, or idolatrous Practice in Worſhip as to deprive them of the Being and Nature of Churches, I do aſſert it to be a Sin to ſeparate from them. Not but that I think, there may be a ſeparation without ſin, from a Society retaining the eſſentials of a Church; but then I ſay, the reaſon of ſuch ſeparation is, ſome heinous Error in Doctrine, or ſome idolatrous Practice in Worſhip, or ſome tyranny over the Conſciences of men; which may not be ſuch, as to deſtroy true Baptiſm, and therefore conſiſtent with the eſſentials of a Church. And this is all that I know the Proteſtant Writers do aſſert in this matter.

(2.) He anſwers, That they do not ſay, that becauſe Communion in Ordinances muſt be only in ſuch Churches as Chriſt hath inſtituted, that therefore it is lawful and neceſſary to ſeparate from Parochial Churches, but if it be on other grounds neceſſary ſo to ſeparate or withold Communion from them, it is the duty of them who do ſo, to join themſelves in or unto ſome other particular Congregation.

To which I reply, that this is either not to the buſineſs, or it is a plain giving up the Cauſe of Independency. For, wherefore did the diſſenting Brethren ſo much inſiſt upon their ſeparate Congregations, when not one of the things, now particularly alleged againſt our Church, was required of them? But if he inſiſts on thoſe things common to our Church with other reformed Churches, then they are ſuch things, as he ſuppoſes contrary to the firſt Inſtitution of Churches; And then I intreat him to tell me, what difference there is, between ſeparating from our Churches becauſe Communion in Ordinances is only to be enjoy'd in ſuch Churches as Chriſt hath inſtituted; and ſeparating from them becauſe they have things repugnant to the firſt Inſtitution of Churches? Is not this the primary reaſon of Separation, becauſe Chriſt hath appointed unalterable Rules for the Government of his Church; which we are bound to obſerve, and which are not obſerved in Parochial Churches? Indeed, the moſt immediate reaſon of ſeparation from ſuch a Church is not obſerving Chriſt's Inſtitution; but the primary ground is, that Chriſt hath ſettled ſuch Rules for Churches which muſt be unalterably obſerved. Let us then (1.) ſuppoſe, that Chriſt hath by unalterable Rules appointed that a Church ſhall conſiſt only of ſuch a number of men as may meet in one Congregation, ſo qualified; and that theſe by entring into Covenant with each other become a Church, and chooſe their Officers, who are to Teach, and Admoniſh and Adminiſter Sacraments, and to exerciſe Diſcipline by the conſent of the Congregation; And let us (2.) ſuppoſe ſuch a Church not yet gathered, but there lies fit matter for it diſperſed up and down in ſeveral Pariſhes. (3.) Let us ſuppoſe Dr. O. about to gather ſuch a Church. (4.) Let us ſuppoſe not one thing peculiar to our Church required of theſe members; neither the aereal ſign of the Croſs, nor kneeling at the Communion, &c. I deſire then to know, whether Dr. O. be not bound by theſe unalterable Rules to draw theſe members from Communion with their Parochial Churches, on purpoſe that they might form a Congregational Church, according to Chriſt's Inſtitution? Either then he muſt quit theſe unalterable Rules, and the Inſtitution of Chriſt; or he muſt acknowledge that ſetting up a Congregational Church is the primary ground of their Separation from our Parochial Churches. If they do ſuppoſe but one of thoſe Ordinances wanting which they believe Chriſt hath inſtituted in particular Churches, do they not believe this a ſufficient ground for ſeparation? It is not therefore any Reaſon peculiar to our Church, which is the true Cauſe of their ſeparation; but ſuch Reaſons as are common to all Churches, that are not formed juſt after their own model. If there be then unalterable Rules for Congregational Churches, thoſe muſt be obſerved, and ſeparation made in order to it; and therefore ſeparation is neceſſary upon Dr. O's grounds, not from the particular Conditions of Communion with us, but becauſe our Parochial Churches, are not formed after the Congregational way. But this was a neceſſary piece of art at this time, to keep fair with the Presbyterian Party, and to make them believe (if they can be ſo forgetful) that they do not own ſeparation from their Churches, but only from ours, the contrary whereof is ſo apparent from the debates with the diſſenting Brethren, and the ſetting up Congregational Churches in thoſe days, that they muſt be forgetful indeed, who do not remember it. Have thoſe of the Congregational way ſince alter'd their judgments? Hath Dr. O. yielded, that in caſe ſome terms of Communion in our Church were not inſiſted upon, they would give over ſeparation? Were not their Churches firſt gathered out of Presbyterian Congregations? And if Presbytery had been ſetled upon the Kings Reſtauration, would they not have continued their Separation? Why then muſt our Church now be accuſed for giving the Occaſion to the Independant ſeparation, when it is notoriouſly otherwiſe; and they did ſeparate and form their Churches, upon reaſons common to our Church with all other Reformed Churches? This is more artificial than ingenuous.

Vindic. 3. p. 37. Sect. 2. As to the Second, Dr. O. anſwers, that it is ſo clear and evident in matter of fact, and ſo neceſſary from the nature of the thing, that the Churches planted by the Apoſtles were limited to Congregations, that many wiſe Men, wholly unconcerned in our Controverſies, do take it for a thing to be granted by all without diſpute. And for this two Teſtimonies are alleged, of Juſtice Hobart, and Father Paul; but neither of them ſpeaks to the point. All that Chief Juſtice Hobart ſaith is, That the Primitive Church in its greateſt Purity, was but voluntary Congregations of Believers ſubmitting themſelves to the Apoſtles, and after to the Paſtors. Methinks Dr. O. ſhould have left this Teſtimony to his Friend L. du Moulin, it ſignifies ſo very little to the purpoſe; or rather, quite overthrows his Hypotheſis; as appears by theſe two Arguments. (1.) Thoſe voluntary Congregations over which the Apoſtles were ſet, were no limited Congregations of any one particular Church; but thoſe Congregations over whom the Apoſtles were ſet, are thoſe of which Juſtice Hobart ſpeaks. And therefore it is plain he ſpake of all the Churches which were under the care of the Apoſtles, which he calls voluntatary Congregations. (2.) Thoſe voluntary Congregations over whom the Apoſtles appointed Paſtors after their deceaſe, were no particular Congregations in one City; but thoſe of whom Juſtice Hobart ſpeaks, were ſuch; for he ſaith, they firſt ſubmitted to the Apoſtles, and after to other Paſtors. But Juſtice Hobart could not be ſuch a ſtranger to Antiquity to believe that the Chriſtians in the Age after the Apoſtles amounted but to one Congregation in a City. And therefore, if he conſults Juſtice Hobart's honour or his own, I adviſe him to let it alone for the future. As to the Teſtimony of Father Paul, it only concerns the Democratical Government of the Church, and I wonder how it came into this place; I ſhall therefore conſider it in its due ſeaſon.

Sect. 3. I come therefore to conſider now, the evidence for the Inſtitution of Congregational Churches; concerning which, theſe are my words.

“ It is poſſible at firſt, there might be no more Chriſtians in one City “ than could meet in one Aſſembly for Worſhip; but where doth it ap“ pear, that when they multiplied into more Congregations, they did “ make new and diſtinct Churches under new Officers with a ſeparate “ Power of Government? Of this I am well aſſured, there is no mark “ or footſtep in the New Teſtament, or the whole Hiſtory of the Primi“ tive Church. I do not think it will appear credible to any conſiderate “ man, that the 5000 Chriſtians in the Church of Jeruſalem made one “ ſtated and fixed Congregation for Divine Worſhip; not, if we make all “ the allowances for ſtrangers which can be deſired: but if this were “ granted, where are the unalterable Rules, that as ſoon as the compa“ ny became too great for one particular Aſſembly, they muſt become a “ new Church under peculiar Officers and an independent Authority?
To this Dr. O. anſwers in four particulars.

1. That an account may e'er long be given of the inſenſible deviation of the Firſt Churches after the deceaſe of the Apoſtles from the Rule of the firſt Inſtitution: which although at firſt it began in matters of ſmall moment; yet ſtill they increaſed until they iſſued in a fatal Apoſtaſie; or as he after expreſſes it, leaving their Infant ſtate, by degrees, they at laſt brought forth the Man of Sin. But I do not underſtand how this at all anſwers the former Paragraph of my Sermon concerning the firſt Inſtitution of Churches; but being I ſuppoſe intended for a Reaſon why he doth not afterwards anſwer to the evidence out of Antiquity, I ſhall not only ſo far take notice of it, as to let him know, that when that is done, I do not queſtion, but the Primitive Church will find ſufficient Advocates in the Church of England: but I deſire that undertaker to conſider, what a blot and diſhonour it will be to Chriſtian Religion, if the Primitive Churches could not hold to their firſt Inſtitution, not for one Age after the Apoſtles. I know what abominable Hereſies there were ſoon after, if not in the Apoſtles days; but the queſtion is not concerning theſe, but the pureſt and beſt Churches; and about them, not whether ſome trifling Controverſies might not ariſe, and humane infirmities be diſcovered; but whether they did deviate from the plain Inſtitutions of Chriſt, and the unalterable Rules of Government which he had fixed in his Church? This ſeems utterly incredible to me upon this conſideration among many others: That Government is ſo nice and tender a thing, that every one is ſo much concerned for his ſhare in it, that men are not eaſily induced to part with it. Let us ſuppoſe the Government of the Church to have been Democratical at firſt, as Dr. O. ſeems to do; is it probable, that the People would have been wheadled out of the ſweetneſs of Government ſo ſoon and made no noiſe about it? Yea, Dr. O. tells us that in Cyprian's time it continued at Carthage; and others ſay, a great deal longer: there was then no ſuch change as to this part of the Government ſo ſoon after. And why ſhould we imagin it otherwiſe, as to extent of Power and Juriſdiction? Suppoſe Chriſt had limited the Power of a Church to one Congregation; the Paſtor of that Church could have no more pretence over any other Congregation, than Dr. O. by being Paſtor over one Congregation in London, could challenge a right to Govern all the Independent Congregations in London or about it; and appoint their ſeveral Teachers, and call them to an account for their proceedings. I appeal now to any man of conſideration, whether there be the leaſt probability that ſuch an alteration could be made without great noiſe and diſturbance? Would not Mr. G. Mr. B. Mr. C. and many more, think themſelves concerned to ſtand up for their own Rights? And if they could

could be drawn into the deſign, would the People ſubmit? Let us put the caſe, as to New-England. Suppoſe the Apoſtles an Age or two ſince, had planted ſuch Congregational Churches there, as have been formed within theſe laſt 50 years at Plimouth, Boſton, Hereford, New-haven, &c. and had inveſted every Congregation with the full Power of the Keys, the execution whereof they had intruſted with the ſeveral Elderſhips, within their own Congregation; but ſo, as not to have any Power or Authority, over the Elders or Members of any other Congregation: Let us then ſuppoſe, that after the deceaſe of the Apoſtles, theſe Churches gradually declined ſo far, that in this Age Mr. Cotton at Boſton ſhould take upon him the whole Power of the Keys, and not only ſo, but appoint Paſtors over other Congregations, and keep a great number of Elders under him, and challenge the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction over the whole Colony of Maſſachuſets, of which Boſton is the chief Town, and ſo three others do the ſame at the chief Places of the other Colonies; Would not this be a wonderful alteration of the Church Government? And is it poſſible to conceive, ſuch a change ſhould be brought about inſenſibly, without any complaint of the ſubordinate Elders, or the members of the Congregations, who were robbed of their inherent Right by an Inſtitution of Chriſt, and ſo late an eſtabliſhment by the Apoſtles? Doctrines may be inſenſibly changed by continuing the names and altering opinions, through the careleſneſs and unskilfulneſs of People: But in matters of Government, the meaneſt People are ſenſible, and look big with an opinion of it. If therefore it be not conceivable in this caſe, the Government ſhould be thus changed from the Inſtitution of Chriſt in ſo ſhort a time; let the ſame conſideration be applied to the Ages which really ſucceeded the Apoſtles.

Sect. 4. I ſhall, to prevent all cavils, chuſe that very Church which Dr. O. mentions, and I find Mr. Cotton and others make their Appeals to, and that is the Church of Carthage in Saint Cyprian's time. Here Dr. O. finds the Community of Members determining Church affairs; but Mr. Cotton hath farther diſcovered the judgment of the Elders, the Votes of the Congregation, and the Conſent of neighbour Miniſters; in ſhort, he hath found there, the expreſs and lively Lineaments of the very Body of Congregational Diſcipline; and the ſame for ſubſtance wherein they walk (as he calls it) at this day. Hitherto then, there was no deviation from the unalterable Rules of Chriſt. Let us therefore impartially conſider, what the Government of the Church of Carthage then was: Concerning which theſe things may be obſerved. Cotton's way of Congregational Churches cleared, p. 98, 99.

1. That there was a great number of Preſbyters belonging to the Church of Carthage, and therefore not probable to be one ſingle Congregation. This appears from Saint Cyprian's Epiſtles to them in his Retirement. In one he gives them advice how to viſit the Confeſſors in Priſon, which he would have them to do by turns, every one taking a Deacon with him becauſe the change of Perſons would be leſs invidious: And conſidering the number of Confeſſours, and the frequent attendance upon them, the number of Preſbyters and Deacons muſt be conſiderable. When he ſent Numidicus to be placed among the Preſbyters at Carthage, he gives this reaſon of it, that he might adorn the plenty of his Preſbyters with ſuch worthy Men, it being now impaired by the fall of ſome, during the perſecution. In the caſe of Philumanus, Fortunatus and Favorinus, he declares he would give no judgment, cùm multis adbuc adhuc de Clero abſentes ſint, when many of his Clergy were abſent. And in another Epiſtle he complains, that a great number of his Clergy Ep. 28. were abſent, and the few that were remaining were hardly ſufficient for their work. At one time Feliciſſimus and five Preſbyters more did L.3. Ep.22 break Communion with the Church at Carthage; and then he mentions Ep. 24. Britius, Rogatianus and Numidicus, as the chief Preſbyters remaining with them; beſides Deacons and inferiour Miniſters. About the ſame Ep. 40. time Cornelius Biſhop of Rome mentions 46 Preſbyters he had with him in that City. And in Conſtantinople of old, ſaith Juſtinian in his Novels, Euſeb. l. 6. were 60 Preſbyters (for in one he ſaith, The cuſtom was to determin c. 35. Phot. Nomo- the number, and in another, that 60 was to be the number at Conſtantinople.) Can. tit. 1. Let any one now conſider, whether theſe Churches c. 30. that had ſo many Preſbyters were ſingle Congregations; and at Carthage, we have this evidence of the great numbers of Chriſtians; that in the time of Perſecution, although very many ſtood firm, yet the numbers L. 3. Ep. 5. of the lapſed was ſo great, that Saint Cyprian ſaith, Every day thouſands Ep. 15. of Tickets were granted by the Martyrs and Confeſſors in their behalf for reconciliation to the Church: And in one of thoſe Tickets ſometimes might be comprehended twenty or thirty perſons, the form being L. 3. 15. Communicet ille cum ſuis. Is it then probable this Church at Carthage Ep. 11. ſhould conſiſt of one ſingle Congregation?

2. Theſe Preſbyters and the whole Church were under the particular care and Government of Saint Cyprian as their Biſhop. Some of the Preſbyters at Carthage took upon them to meddle in the affairs of Diſcipline, L.3. Ep.14. without conſulting their Biſhop then in his retirement. Saint Ep. 10. Cyprian tells them they neither conſidered Chriſt's Command, nor their own Place, nor the future Judgment of God, nor the Biſhop who was ſet over them, and had done that which was never done in foregoing times, to challenge thoſe things to themſelves, with the contempt and reproach of their Biſhop, which was to receive Penitents to Communion without impoſition of hands by the Biſhop and his Clergy. Wherein, L.3. Ep.15 he vindicates the Martyrs and Confeſſors in his following Epiſtle, ſaying, Ep. 11. that ſuch an affront to their Biſhop was againſt their will: For they ſent their Petitions to the Biſhop, that their Cauſes might be heard when the Perſecution was over. In another Epiſtle to the People of Carthage L.3. Ep.10. on the ſame occaſion, he complains of theſe Preſbyters, that they did Ep. 12. not Epiſcopo honorem Sacerdotii ſui & Cathedræ reſervare, reſerve to the Biſhop the honour which belonged to his Place: And therefore charges, that nothing farther be done in this matter till his return, when he might Ep. 21. conſult with his fellow-Biſhops. Celerinus ſends to Lucian a Confeſſor, to beg him for a Letter of Grace for their Siſters Numeria and Candida who had fallen. Lucian returns him anſwer, that Paulus before his Ep. 22. Martyrdom had given him Authority to grant ſuch in his Name, and that all the Martyrs had agreed to ſuch kindneſs to be ſhewed to the lapſed; but with this condition that the Cauſe was to be heard before the Biſhop, and upon ſuch Diſcipline as he ſhould impoſe, they were to be received to Communion. So that though Lucian was extreamly blamed Ep. 25. for relaxing the Diſcipline of the Church; yet neither he nor the other Martyrs would pretend to do any thing without the Biſhop. Cyprian gives an account of all that had paſſed in this matter to Moſes and Maximus two Roman Preſbyters and Confeſſors; they return him anſwer, that they were very glad he had not been wanting to his Ep. 26. Office, eſpecially in his ſevere reproving thoſe who had obtained from

Preſbyters the Communion of the Church in his abſence. In his Epiſtle Ep. 28. to the Clergy of Carthage he mightily blames thoſe who communicated with thoſe perſons who were reconciled to the Church merely by Preſbyters without him; and threatens excommunication to any Preſbyters or Deacons who ſhould preſume to do it. The Roman Clergy in the vacancy of Ep. 30. the See, take notice of the diſcretion of the Martyrs in remitting the lapſed to the Biſhop, as an argument of their great modeſty, and that they did not think the Diſcipline of the Church belonged to them: And Ep. 31. they declared their reſolution, to do nothing in this matter, till they had a new Biſhop. By which we ſee the Power of Diſcipline was not then ſuppoſed to be in the Congregation, or that they were the firſt ſubject of the Power of the Keys; but that it was in the Biſhop as ſuperiour to the Preſbyters. And that they were then far from thinking it in the Power
Ep. 33. of the People, to appoint and ordain their own Officers. Saint Cyprian ſends word to the Church of Carthage, that he had taken one Aurelius into the Clergy; although his general cuſtom was in Ordinations to conſult them before, and to weigh together the manners and deſerts of every Ep. 34. one: Which is quite another thing from an inherent Right to appoint and conſtitute their own Church-Officers: The ſame he doth ſoon after, Ep. 35. concerning Celerinus and Numidicus. When he could not go among them himſelf, by reaſon of the Perſecution, he appoints Caldonius
Ep. 38. and Fortunatus two Biſhops, and Rogatianus and Numidicus two Preſbyters, to viſit in his name; and to take care of the poor, and of the perſons fit to be promoted to the Clergy. Who give an account in the Ep. 39. next Epiſtle, that they had excommunicated Feliciſſimus and his Brethren for their ſeparation.

3. That Saint Cyprian did believe that this Authority which he had for governing the Church was not from the Power of the People, but from the Inſtitution of Chriſt. So upon the occaſion of the Martyrs invading Ep. 27. the Diſcipline of the Church, he produceth that ſaying of Chriſt to Saint Peter, Thou art Peter, &c. And whatſoever you ſhall bind, &c.
From whence, ſaith he, by a conſtant ſucceſſion of times, ſuch a courſe hath been always obſerved in the Church, that the Church hath been ſtill governed by Biſhops, and every Act of the Church hath been under their care and conduct. Since this, ſaith he, is a Divine Inſtitution, I wonder at the boldneſs of thoſe who have written at that rate to me (concerning the lapſed) ſince the Church conſiſts in the Biſhop, the Clergy and the
Ep. 52. ſtanding People. In his Epiſtle to Antonianus, he ſpeaks of the Agreement
Ep. 55. of the Biſhops throughout the whole World: And in that to Cornelius, that every Biſhop hath a part of the flock committed to him, which he is to govern and to give an account thereof to God: And Ep. 65. that a Biſhop in the Church is in the place of Chriſt; and that diſobedience to him is the cauſe of Schiſms and Diſorders. To the ſame Ep. 69. purpoſe he ſpeaks in his Epiſtle to Rogatianus, and to Papianus; where he declares a Church to be a People united to a Biſhop; and to Stephanus, Ep. 75. that they have ſucceeded the Apoſtles in a conſtant courſe.

Let the Reader now judge, whether theſe be the ſtrokes and lineaments of the Congregational way; and whether Dr. O. had any reaſon to appeal to Saint Cyprian for the Democratical Government of the Church. But we have this advantage from this appeal, that they do not ſuppoſe any deviation then from the Primitive Inſtitution, and what that was in Saint Cyprian's judgment any one may ſee, when he ſpeaks of nothing peculiar to his own Church, but what was generally ob-

ſerved over the Chriſtian world. And now let Dr. O. give an account, how a change ſo great, ſo ſudden, ſo univerſal, ſhould happen in the Chriſtian world, in the Government of the Church; that when Chriſt had placed the Power in the People, the Biſhops in ſo ſhort a time ſhould be every where ſettled, and allowed to have the chief management in Church-affairs, without any control from the People: which to me is as ſtrong an argument as a matter of this nature will bear, that the Power was at firſt lodged in them, and not in the People. For, as Mr. Noys of New-England well argues, It is not imaginable that Biſhops ſhould come by ſuch Power, as is recorded in Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, and that over all the world; and in a way of ambition, in ſuch humbling times, without all manner of oppoſition for three hundred years together, and immediately after the Apoſtles, had it been uſurpation or innovation. When and where is innovation without oppoſition? Would not Elders, ſo many ſeeing and knowing men, at leaſt ſome of them, have contended for Truth, wherein their own Liberties and Rights were ſo much intereſſed? Aërius his oppoſing of Biſhops, ſo long after their riſe and ſtanding, is inconſiderable. The force of which reaſoning, will ſway more with an impartial and ingenuous mind, than all the difficulties I ever yet ſaw on the other ſide. So much for the account Dr. O. promiſes of the deviations of the Churches after the Apoſtles deceaſe.

Sect. 5. (2.) Dr. O. anſwers as to the matter of fact concerning the Inſtitution of Congregational Churches, that it ſeems to him evidently exemplified in the Scripture. The matter of fact is, that when Churches grew too big for one ſingle Congregation in a City, then a new Congregational Church was ſet up under new Officers, with a ſeparate Power of Government. Let us now ſee Dr. O.'s proof of it. For although it may be there is not expreſs mention made that theſe or thoſe particular Churches did divide themſelves into more Congregations with new Officers, i. e. although the matter of fact be not evident in Scripture, yet, ſaith he, there are Inſtances of the erection of new particular Congregations in the ſame Province. But what is this to the proof of the Congregational way? The thing I deſired was, that when the Chriſtians in one City multiplied into more Congregations, they would prove, that they did make new and diſtinct Churches; and to exemplifie this, he mentions new Congregations in the ſame Province. Who ever denied or diſputed that? On the contrary, the proof of this, is a great advantage to our Cauſe; for ſince where the Scripture ſpeaks of the Churches of a Province, it ſpeaks of them as of different Churches; but when it mentions the Chriſtians of one City, it calls them the Church of that City, (as the Church of Jeruſalem, the Church of Epheſus; but the Churches of Judea, Galilee and Samaria) what can be more evident, than that the Chriſtians of one City, though never ſo numerous, made but one Church? If one obſerve the language of the New Teſtament, one may find this obſervation not once to fail; that where Churches are ſpoken of in the plural number, they are the Churches of a Province, as the Churches of Judæa, the Churches of Aſia; the Churches of Syria and Cilicia; the Churches of Galatia; the Churches of Macedonia; but where all the Chriſtians of one City are ſpoken of, it is ſtill called the Church of that City; as the Church at Antioch; the Church at Corinth; and when the ſeven Churches are ſpoken of together, they are the ſeven Churches; but when ſpoken to ſingle, it is the Church of Epheſus, the Church of Smyrna, &c. Which being ſpoken without any diſcrimination, as to the difference of theſe places, in greatneſs and capacity, or the number of Believers in them, doth evidently diſcover that what number ſoever they were, they were all but the Church of that City. For it is not to be ſuppoſed that the number of Chriſtians was no greater in Epheſus, Sardis, Pergamus and Laodicea, which were great and populous Cities, than in Thyatira and Philadelphia, which were much leſs; eſpecially, conſidering the time Acts 20. 19. —— 31. 1 Cor. 16. 9. Saint Paul ſtaid at Epheſus, and the mighty ſucceſs which he had in preaching there, which will amount to no great matter, if in three years time, he converted no more, than made up one ſingle Congregation. And thus men to ſerve an Hypotheſis, take off from the mighty power and prevalency of the Goſpel. I cannot but wonder, what Dr. O. means when after he hath produced the evidence of diſtinct Churches in the Vindic. p. 40. ſame Province, as Galatia, and Macedonia, he calls this plain Scripture evidence and practice for the erecting particular diſtinct Congregations; who denies that? but I ſee nothing like a proof of diſtinct Churches in the ſame City, which was the thing to be proved, but becauſe it could not be proved, was prudently let alone: whereas we have plain Scripture evidence, that all the Chriſtians of a City, though never ſo great, made but one Church; and uncontrolable evidence from Antiquity, that the neighbouring Chriſtians were laid to the Church of the City. All

p. 41. that he ſaith farther to this matter, is, that ſuch Churches had power to rule and govern themſelves, becauſe in every one of them Elders were ordained, Acts 14. 22. which is again an argument on our ſide; for if we compare Acts 14. 22. with Titus 1. 5. we ſhall find that ordaining Elders, κατ' Ἐκκλησίαν hath the ſame importance with ordaining them κατὰ πόλιν; ſo that by the Church is underſtood the Body of Chriſtians inhabiting in one City, as the Ἐκκλησία at Athens was the whole Corporation there; and particular Congregations are but like the ſeveral Companies, all which together make up but one City.

Sect. 6. (3.) Dr. O. ſaith, that the Chriſtians of one City might not exceed the bounds of a particular Church or Congregation, although they had a multiplication of Biſhops or Elders in them, and occaſional diſtinct Aſſemblies for ſome Acts of Divine Worſhip. Then, ſay I, the notion of a Church is not limited in Scripture to a ſingle Congregation: For if occaſional Aſſemblies be allowed for ſome Acts of Worſhip, why not for others? if the number of Elders be unlimited, then every one of theſe may attend the occaſional diſtinct Aſſemblies for Worſhip, and yet altogether make up the Body of one Church; to which, if he had but allowed a ſingle Biſhop over theſe, he had made up that repreſentation of a Church, which we have from the beſt and pureſt Antiquity. And ſo Orig. c. Celſ. l. 3. Origen compares the Churches of Athens, Corinth, and Alexandria with the Corporations in thoſe Cities; the number of Preſbyters with the Senates of the Cities; and at laſt the Biſhop with the Magiſtrate. But Dr. O. adds, that when they did begin to exceed in number, beyond a juſt proportion for edification, they did immediately erect other Churches among them, or near them. Name any one new Church erected in the ſame City, and I yield. And what need a new Church, when himſelf allows occaſional diſtinct Aſſemblies for greater edification? But he names the Church at Cenchrea, which was a Port to the City of Corinth; becauſe of the mighty increaſe of Believers at Corinth, Acts 18. 10. with Rom. 16. 1. I anſwer, (1.) It ſeems then there was ſuch an increaſe at Corinth, as made them plant a diſtinct Church; and yet at Epheſus, where Saint Paul uſed extraordinary diligence, and had great ſucceſs, there was no need need of any new and diſtinct Church. And at Corinth he ſtaid but a year and ſix months, but at Epheſus three years, as the time is ſet down in the Acts. Acts 18.11. Acts 20.31. Doth not this look very improbably? (2.) Stephanus Byzant. reckons Cenchrea as a City diſtinct from Corinth, and ſo doth Strabo, who placeth it in the way from Tegea to Argos, through the Parthenian Mountain; Str. l. 8. and it is ſeveral times mentioned by Thucydides as diſtinct from Corinth; Thucyd. l. 4. & l. 8. and ſo it is moſt likely was a Church originally planted there, and not formed from the too great fulneſs of the Church of Corinth.

As to the Church of Jeruſalem, he ſaith, that the five thouſand Converts were ſo diſpoſed of or ſo diſperſed, that ſome years after, there was ſuch a Church there, as did meet together in one place, as occaſion did require, even the whole multitude of the Brethren; nor was their number greater when they went unto Pella. p. 41. To which I anſwer, (1.) The force of the Argument lies in the five thouſand being ſaid to be added to the Church, Acts 4. 4. before any diſperſion or perſecution. In which time we muſt ſuppoſe a true Church to be formed, and the Chriſtians at that time performing the Acts of Church-communion: the Queſtion then is, whether it be in the leaſt probable, that five thouſand perſons ſhould at that time, make one ſtated and fixed Congregation for Divine Worſhip, and all the Acts of Church-communion? What place was there large enough to receive them, when they met for Prayer and Sacraments? Dr. O. was ſenſible of this inconvenience, and therefore only ſpeaks of the Church of Jeruſalem when theſe were diſperſed; but my queſtion was about them while they were together. Were they not a Church then? Did they not continue in the Apoſtles Doctrine and Fellowſhip, and breaking of Bread and Prayers? But how could five thouſand then do all this together? Therefore a Church according to its firſt Inſtitution, is not limited to a ſingle Congregation. (2.) A Church conſiſting of many Congregations, may, upon extraordinary occaſions, aſſemble together, as the ſeveral Companies in a common Hall, for matters of general concernment, which yet manage their particular Intereſts apart: ſo for Acts of Worſhip and Chriſtian Communion, particular Congregations may meet by themſelves; but when any thing happens of great concernment, they may occaſionally aſſemble together; as in the two debates mentioned Acts 15. 4. and 21. 22. ſo the ſeveral Tribes in Athens did, at their general Aſſemblies, which Strabo and Euſtathius ſay were 174. Str. l. 9. Euſtat. ad Il. β. (3.) There is no number mentioned of the Chriſtians that went to Pella; neither by Euſebius nor Epiphanius, who relate the ſtory, ſo that nothing can thence be concluded; Euſeb. l. 3. c. 5. Epiph. hær. 29. but if the force lies in his calling Pella a Village, I am ſure Euſebius calls it a City of Peræa, beyond Jordan; and Epiphanius adds, that they ſpread themſelves from thence to Cœleſyria, and Decapolis, and Baſanitis. So that all this put together makes no proof at all, that the Chriſtian Churches, by their firſt Inſtitution, were limited to ſingle Congregations.

Sect. 7. (4.) He anſwers, that he cannot diſcern the leaſt neceſſity of any poſitive Rule or Direction in this matter, ſince the nature of the thing, and the duty of men doth indiſpenſably require it. p. 42. But is it not Dr. O. that ſaith, that the Inſtitution of Churches, and the Rules for their diſpoſal and government throughout the world, are the ſame, ſtable and unalterable? Evangel. Love, p. 59. Are all theſe Rules now come to nothing but what follows from the nature of the thing? Is it not Dr. O. that ſaith, that no religious Union or Order among Chriſtians is of ſpiritual uſe and advantage to them, p. 65.

but what is appointed and deſigned for them by Jeſus Chriſt? Doth not this overthrow any other Order or Union among Chriſtians but what Chriſt hath inſtituted and appointed for them? The Queſtion is not about ſuch a Conſtitution of Churches as is neceſſary for performing the duties of religious Worſhip; for all Parties are agreed therein; but whether Church-power be limited to theſe excluſively to all other Unions of Chriſtians? whether every ſingle Congregation hath all Church-power wholly in it ſelf, and unaccountably, as to ſubordination to any other? How doth this appear from the nature of the thing, and the neceſſary duties of Chriſtians? I grant the Inſtitution of Churches was for Edification: And I think a great deal of that Edification lies in the orderly diſpoſal of things. Whatever tends to Peace and Unity among Chriſtians, in my judgment tends to Edification. Now I cannot apprehend how a ſole Power of Government in every Congregation tends to the preſerving this Peace and Unity among Chriſtians: much leſs how it follows ſo clearly from the nature of the thing as to take away the need of any poſitive Rule or Direction in this matter. And here the main Controverſie lies, between us and the Congregational Churches. Is there no poſitive Rule or Direction in this matter? then it follows as much from the nature of the thing, that ſince Peace and Order is to be kept up among Churches as well as Perſons, every ſingle Congregation ought not to engroſs Church-power to it ſelf, but to ſtand accountable for the management of it to thoſe who are intruſted with the immediate care of the Churches Peace. And I cannot yet ſee, by all that hath been ſaid, how thoſe that break the eſtabliſhed Order in a Church wherein all the ſubſtantials of Religion are acknowledged to be ſound, and ſet up particular Independent Churches in oppoſition to it, can acquit themſelves from the Guilt of Schiſm, how great and intolerable ſoever it be thought. p. 43.

As to what concerns the Churches in the Houſes of Priſcilla and Aquila, and Nymphas and Philemon, I ſay, that this is to be underſtood, not of a Church meeting in their Houſes, but of their own Families was pleaded by the diſſenting Brethren, who ſay, moſt of our Divines are of that Opinion: and therefore the Argument holds againſt them. And from Dr. O's Diſcourſe I leſs underſtand than I did before, what obligation of Conſcience can be upon any, when they may ſerve God in their Families, in oppoſition to Laws, to keep up ſuch publick Congregations as are forbidden by them. For (1.) he grants that a Church may be in a Family; altho' a Family as ſuch be not a Church. Then the members of a Family ſubmitting to the Government of the Maſter as their Paſtor are a true Church: for a Church, he ſaith, may conſiſt only of the Perſons that belong to a Family. Then there is no neceſſity of going out of a Family for the Acts of Church-communion; eſpecially, when the addition of four more, may provide ſufficiently for all the Officers they believe neceſſary to the making up of a Church. (2.) All that he ſaith, is, that there is no ſuch example given of Churches in private Families in Scriptures, as ſhould reſtrain the extent of Churches from Congregations of many Families. And what then? the Queſtion is not now whether they be lawful, but whether they be neceſſary; for nothing leſs than a Divine Command can juſtifie the breach of a plain Law; but where is that Command? Doth not Dr. O. appeal to the nature of the thing, and the indiſpenſible duties of men with reſpect to the end of Churches, as his great Rule in theſe caſes? But which of all theſe neceſſary duties may not be performed within the terms of the Law? ſo that no obligation can ariſe from thence to have Congregations of many Families. All that he ſaith farther, as to this matter is, that if through non-compliance any diſturbance happen, the blame will be found lying upon thoſe who would force others to forego their Primitive Conſtitution. Then it ſeems at laſt the Primitive Conſtitution is come to be the ground of non-compliance; which in this caſe amounts to ſeparation. But this primitive Conſtitution had need be far better proved, before it can be thought a good ground for breaking the Peace of the Church and the Laws of the Land: and much more before it can carry off the blame from the perſons who break Orders and Laws to the Makers of them. All men no doubt that ever broke Laws, if this Plea would be admitted, would transfer the blame upon thoſe that made them. And ſo much for the Plea of the Congregational Party.

Premonition to the true way of Concord.

Sect. 8. 2. I now come to conſider the Plea of thoſe, who hold our Dioceſan Epiſcopacy to be unlawful. In my Sermon, as it is printed, I ſet down this ſaying of Mr. Baxter, That to deviſe new ſpecies of Churches (beyond Parochial or Congregational) without God's Authority, and to impoſe them on the world (yea in his name) and to call all Diſſenters Schiſmaticks, is a far worſe uſurpation, than to make or impoſe new Ceremonies or Liturgies. Which I ſaid doth ſuppoſe Congregational Churches to be ſo much the Inſtitution of Chriſt; that any other Conſtitution above theſe is both unlawful and inſupportable: which is more than the Independent Brethren themſelves do aſſert. Now for our better underſtanding Mr. B's meaning, we muſt conſider his deſign in that place from whence thoſe words are quoted. 1. He ſaith, Chriſt hath inſtituted only Congregational or Parochial Churches. 2. That Dioceſan Epiſcopacy is a new ſpecies of Churches deviſed by men without God's Authority, and impoſed in ſuch a manner, that thoſe are called Schiſmaticks who diſſent from it. 3. That ſuch an impoſition is worſe than that of Ceremonies and Liturgies; and conſequently affords a better plea for Separation. But to prevent any miſunderſtanding of his meaning, I will ſet down his own Cautions. 1. That the Queſtion is not whether every particular Church ſhould have a Biſhop with his Presbyters and Deacons: i. e. whether every Rector of a Pariſh be not a Biſhop, if he hath Curates under him. This he calls Parochial Epiſcopacy. 2. Nor, whether theſe ſhould have Archbiſhops over them, as Succeſſors to the Apoſtolical and general Overſeers of the firſt Age, in the ordinary continued parts of their Office. 3. Nor, whether Patriarchs, Dioceſans and Lay-chancellours be lawful, as Officers of the King, exerciſing under him ſuch Government of the Church as belongeth to Kings, to which in ſuch exerciſe all Subjects muſt for conſcience ſake ſubmit. 4. Nor, if Dioceſans become the ſole Biſhops over many hundred Pariſhes, all the Parochial Biſhops and Pariſh Churches being put down and turned into Curates and Chapels, whether a Miniſter ought yet to live quietly and peaceably under them. You will ask then, where lies this horrible impoſition, and intolerable uſurpation? It is in requiring the owning the lawfulneſs of this Dioceſan Epiſcopacy; and joyning with Parochial Churches as parts of it. But wherein lies the unſufferable malignity of that? 1. It is making a new ſpecies of Churches without God's Authority. 2. It is overthrowing the ſpecies of God's making: which, according to Mr. B. requires two things. 1. Local and preſential Communion, as he calls it, i. e. That it conſiſts only of ſo many, as can well meet together for Church Society. 2. The full exerciſe of Diſcipline within it ſelf by the Paſtors; which being taken away, they are only Curates, and their Meetings Oratories and no Churches. This I think is a true and fair repreſentation of Mr. B's opinion in this matter. Which tending ſo apparently to overthrow our preſent Conſtitution as inſupportable, and to juſtifie ſeparation from our Parochial Churches as members of a Dioceſan Church; therefore to vindicate the Conſtitution of our Church, I ſhall undertake theſe three things.

1. To ſhew that our Dioceſan Epiſcopacy is the ſame for ſubſtance which was in the Primitive Church.
2. That it is not repugnant to any Inſtitution of Chriſt, nor deviſing a new ſpecies of Churches without God's Authority.
3. That the accidental alterations in Diſcipline do not overthrow the being of our Parochial Churches.

Plea for peace, p. 66. Church-Hiſtory, p. 37. p. 73. Church-Hiſtory, p. 57.

1. That our Dioceſan Epiſcopacy is the ſame for ſubſtance which was in the Primitive Church. This I begin with, becauſe Mr. B. ſo very often makes his Appeal to Antiquity in this matter. And my firſt inquiry ſhall be into the Epiſcopacy practiſed in the African Churches; becauſe Mr. B. expreſſeth an eſteem of them above others; for in St. Cyprian's time he ſaith they were the beſt ordered Churches in the world; and that the Biſhops there were the moſt godly, faithful, peaceable company of Biſhops ſince the Apoſtles times. And of the following times he thus ſpeaks, Moſt of the African Councils, ſaith he, were the beſt in all the world. Many good Canons for Church order were made by this and moſt of the African Councils, no Biſhops being faithfuller than they. Therefore concerning the Epiſcopacy there practiſed, I ſhall lay down theſe two Obſervations.

Anſw. to Sermon, p. 74.

Obſ. 1. That it was an inviolable Rule among them, That there was to be but one Biſhop in a City, though the City were never ſo large, or the Chriſtians never ſo many. This one Obſervation made good, quite overthrows Mr. B's Hypotheſis. For upon his principles, where ever the Congregation of Chriſtians became ſo great, that they could not conveniently aſſemble at one place ſo as to have perſonal Communion in preſence, as he ſpeaks; there either they muſt alter the inſtituted ſpecies of Government, or they muſt have more Biſhops than one in a City. For, he ſaith, the Church muſt be no bigger, than that the ſame Biſhop may perform the Paſtoral Office to them in preſent Communion, and for this he quotes 1 Theſſ. 5. 12, 13. Heb. 13. 7, 17. i. e. their Biſhops muſt be ſuch as they muſt hear preach, and have Converſation with. But that this was not ſo underſtood in the African Churches, appears by their ſtrict obſervance of this Rule; of having but one Biſhop in a City, how large ſoever it was. And how punctually they thought themſelves bound to obſerve it, will appear by this one Inſtance, That one of the greateſt and moſt pernicious Schiſms that ever happened, might have been prevented if they had yielded to more Biſhops than one in a City; and that was the Schiſm of the Donatiſts, upon the competition between Majorinus and Cæcilian; as the Novatian Schiſm began at Rome upon a like occaſion between Cornelius and Novatian. Now was there not all the Reaſon imaginable upon ſo important an occaſion to have made more Biſhops in the ſame City, unleſs they had thought ſome Divine Rule prohibited them? When there were 46 Presbyters at Rome, had it not been fair to have divided them? or upon Mr. B's principles made ſo many Biſhops that every one might have had three or four for his ſhare? But inſtead of this, how doth St. Cyprian, even the holy and meek St. Cyprian, as St. Auguſtin calls him, aggravate the Schiſm of Novatian for being choſen a Biſhop in the ſame City, where there was one choſen before? His words are ſo conſiderable to our purpoſe, that I ſhall ſet them down. Et cum poſt primum ſecundus eſſe non poſſit, quiſquis poſt unum qui ſolus eſſe debeat, factus eſt, non jam ſecundus ille ſed nullus eſt. Since there cannot be a ſecond after the firſt, whoſoever is made Biſhop when one is made already, who ought to be alone, he is not another Biſhop, but none at all. Let Mr. B. reconcile theſe words to his Hypotheſis if he can. What! in ſuch a City of Chriſtians, as Rome then was, where were 46 Presbyters, to pronounce it a mere nullity to have a ſecond Biſhop choſen? Mr. B. would rather have thought there had been need of 46 Biſhops; but St. Cyprian who lived ſomewhat nearer the Apoſtles times, and I am apt to think, knew as well the Conſtitution of Churches then, thought it overthrew that Conſtitution to have more Biſhops than one in a City. At Carthage it ſeems ſome turbulent Presbyters that were not ſatisfied with St. Cyprian's Government, or it may be looking on the charge as too big for one, choſe one Fortunatus to be Biſhop there: with this St. Cyprian acquaints Cornelius; and there tells him, how far they had proceeded, and what miſchief this would be to the Church, ſince the having one Biſhop was the beſt means to prevent Schiſms. After the election of Cornelius, ſome of the Confeſſors who had ſided with Novatian deſerted his Party, and were received back again at a ſolemn Aſſembly, where they confeſſed their fault, and declared, That they were not ignorant, that as there was but one God, and one Chriſt, and one Holy Ghoſt, ſo there ought to be but one Biſhop in the Catholick Church. Not according to the ſenſeleſs interpretation of Pamelius, who would have it underſtood of one Pope; but that according to the ancient and regular Diſcipline and Order of the Church, there ought to be but one Biſhop in a City. After the Martyrdom of Cornelius at Rome, St. Cyprian ſends to Rome to know who that one Biſhop was, that was choſen in his place. And the neceſſity of this Unity, he inſiſts on elſewhere; and ſaith, Our Saviour ſo appointed it, unam Cathedram conſtituit, & unitatis ejuſdem originem, ab uno incipientem ſua auctoritate diſpoſuit. Which the Papiſts fooliſhly interpret of St. Peter's Chair; for in his following words he utterly overthrows the ſupremacy, ſaying, all the Apoſtles were equal; and a little after, Epiſcopatus unus eſt, cujus à ſingulis in ſolidum pars tenetur. But this is ſufficient to my purpoſe, to ſhew that theſe holy men, theſe Martyrs and Confeſſors, men that were indeed dying daily, and that for Chriſt too, were all agreed that a Biſhop there muſt be, and that but one in a City, though never ſo large and full of Chriſtians. St. Auguſtin in his excellent Epiſtle to the Donatiſts, gives an account of the proceedings about Cæcilian after the election of Majorinus, and that Melchiades managing that matter with admirable temper, offer'd for the healing of the Schiſm to receive thoſe who had been ordained by Majorinus, with this Proviſo, that where by reaſon of the Schiſm there had been two Biſhops in a City, he that was firſt conſecrated was to remain Biſhop, and the other to have another People provided for him. For which St. Auguſtin commends him, as an excellent man, a true Son of Peace, and Father of Chriſtian People. By which we ſee the beſt, the wiſeſt, the moſt moderate Perſons of that time, never once thought that there could be more Biſhops than one in a City. In the famous Conference at Carthage between the Catholick and Donatiſt Biſhops, the Rule on both ſides was, but one Biſhop to be allowed of either ſide of a City and Dioceſe; and if there had been any new made, to increaſe their number, as it was objected on both ſides; if it were proved, they were not to be allowed: for generally then, every Dioceſe had two Biſhops of the different Parties; but in ſome places they had but one, where the People were of one mind; and nothing but this notorious Schiſm gave occaſion to ſuch a multiplication of Biſhops in Africa; both Parties ſtriving to increaſe their Numbers.

Sect. 9. Obſ. 2. In Cities and Dioceſes which were under the care of one Biſhop, there were ſeveral Congregations and Altars, and diſtant places. Carthage was a very large City, and had great numbers of Chriſtians even in S. Cyprian's time, as I have already ſhewed. And there beſides the Cathedral called Baſilica Major & Reſtituta [a] in which the Biſhops always ſate, as Victor Vitenſis ſaith; there were ſeveral other conſiderable Churches, in which S. Auguſtine often preached when he went to Carthage, as the [b] Baſilica Fauſti; the [c] Baſilica Leontiana; the [d] Baſilica Celerinæ mentioned by * Victor likewiſe, who ſaid it was otherwiſe called Scillitanorum. The [f] Baſilica Novarum. The [g] Baſilica Petri. The [h] Baſilica Pauli. And I do not queſtion there were many others, which I have not obſerved; for Victor ſaith, that when Geiſericus enter'd Carthage he found there Quodvultdeus the Biſhop, & maximam turbam Clericorum, a very great multitude of Clergy, all which he immediatly baniſhed. And without the City there were two great Churches, faith Victor; one where S. Cyprian ſuffered Martyrdom, and the other where his body was buried, at a place called Mappalia. In all he reckons about 500 of the Clergy belonging to the Church of Carthage, taking in thoſe who were trained up to it; And doth Mr. B. imagine all theſe were intended to ſerve one Congregation? or that all the Chriſtians then in Carthage could have local and preſential Communion, as he calls it, in one Church; and at one Altar? Sometimes an Altar is taken with a particular reſpect to a Biſhop; and ſo ſetting up one Altar againſt another, was ſetting up one Biſhop againſt another, as that Phraſe is commonly uſed in Saint Cyprian and Saint Auguſtin; ſometimes for the place at which the Chriſtians did communicate, and ſo there were as many Altars as Churches. So Fortunatus a Catholick Biſhop objected to Petilian the Donatiſt, that in the City where he was Biſhop, the Hereticks had broken down all the Altars: which is the thing Optatus objects ſo much againſt them. And that there were Altars in all their Churches appears from hence, that not only the Oblations were made there, and the Communion received, but all the Prayers of the Church were made at them; as not only appears from the African Code and Saint Auguſtin (which I have mentioned elſewhere) but from Optatus, who upbraiding the Donatiſts for breaking down the Altars of Churches, he tells them that hereby they did what they could to hinder the Churches Prayers, for ſaith he, illac ad aures Dei aſcendere ſolebat populi oratio. The Peoples Prayers went up to Heaven that way. And that diſtant places from the City were in the Biſhop's Dioceſe and under his care I thus prove. In the African Code, there is a Canon that no Biſhop ſhould leave his Cathedral Church, and go to any other Church in his Dioceſe there to reſide; which evidently proves, that there were not only more places, but more Churches in a Biſhop's Dioceſe. And where the Donatiſts had erected new Biſhopricks, as they often did, the African Council decrees, that after the deceaſe of ſuch a Biſhop, if the People had no mind to have another in his room, they might be in the Dioceſe of another Biſhop. Which ſhews, that they thought the Dioceſes might be ſo large, at to hold the People that were under two Biſhops. And there were many Canons made about the People of the Donatiſt Biſhops. In one it was determined, that they ſhould belong to the Biſhop that converted them, without limitation of diſtance; after that, that they ſhould belong to the ſame Dioceſe they were in before: But if the Donatiſt Biſhop were converted, then the Dioceſe was to be divided between them.

If any Biſhop neglected the converting the People of the places belonging to his Dioceſe, he that did take the pains in it, was to have thoſe places laid to his Dioceſe; unleſs ſufficient cauſe were ſhewed by the Biſhop, that he was not to blame. Let Mr. Baxter now judge, whether their Biſhopricks were like our Pariſhes; as he confidently affirms. Saint Auſtin mentions the Municipium Tullenſe not far from Hippo, where there was Preſbyter and Clerks under his care and government: And he tells this particular Story of it; that a certain poor Man who lived there fell into a Trance, in which he fancied he ſaw the Clergy thereabout, and among the reſt the Preſbyter of that place who bad him go to Hippo to be baptized of Auguſtin who was Biſhop there; the Man did accordingly, and the next Eaſter put in his name among the Competentes and was baptized, and after told Saint Auguſtin the foregoing paſſages. It ſeems the Donatiſts were very troubleſome in ſome of the remoter parts of the Dioceſe of Hippo, whereupon Saint Auguſtin ſent one of his Preſbyters to Cæcilian the Roman Preſident, to complain of their inſolence, and to crave his aſſiſtance, which, he ſaith he did, leſt he ſhould be blamed for his negligence, who was the Biſhop of that Dioceſe. And can we think all theſe perſons had præſential and local Communion with Saint Auſtin in his Church at Hippo? While he was yet but a Preſbyter at Hippo, in the abſence of the Biſhop he writes to Maximinus a Donatiſt Biſhop a ſharp Letter, for offering to rebaptize a Deacon of their Church who was placed at Mutagena, and he ſaith, he went from Hippo to the place himſelf to be ſatisfied of the truth of it. At the ſame place lived one Donatus a Preſbyter of the Donatiſts whom Saint Auguſtin would have had brought to him againſt his Will, to be better inſtructed, as being under his care, but the obſtinate Man rather endeavour'd to make away himſelf, upon which he writes a long Epiſtle to him. In another Epiſtle he gives an account, that there was a place called Fuſſala, which with the Country about it, belonged to the Dioceſe of Hippo; where there was abundance of People, but almoſt all Donatiſts; but by his great care in ſending Preſbyters among them, thoſe places were all reduced; but becauſe Fuſſala was 40 miles diſtant from Hippo, he took care to have a Biſhop placed among them; but as appears by the event he had better have kept it under his own Care. For upon the complaints made againſt their new Biſhop, he was fain to reſume it; as appears by a Preſbyter of Fuſſala, which he mentions afterwards. However it appears, that a place 40 miles diſtance was then under the care of ſo great a Saint, and ſo excellent a Biſhop as Saint Auguſtin was. And could Mr. B. have found it in his heart to have told him that he did not underſtand the right conſtitution of Churches? How many Quæres would Mr. B. have made about the numbers of Souls at Fuſſala, and how he could take upon him the care of a place ſo far diſtant from him? And it is no hard matter to gueſs what anſwer Saint Auguſtin would have given him.

But beſides this plain evidence of the extent of Dioceſes, we have as clear proof of Metropolitan Provinces in the African Churches. Quidam de Epiſcopis in Provinciâ noſtrâ, ſaith Saint Cyprian; and yet he ſpeaks of his Predeceſſors times, which ſhews the very ancient extent of that Province, In provinciâ noſtrâ per aliquot Civitates, ſaith he again; which ſhews that more Cities than Carthage were under his care. Quoniam latius fuſa eſt provincia noſtra, in his Epiſtle to Cornelius. In the African Code it appears the Biſhop of Carthage had the Primacy by his his place; in the other Provinces by Seniority of Conſecration. Victor Victor Vit. l. 1. mentions one Creſcens, who had 120 Biſhops under him as Metropolitan. And I hope at leaſt for the ſake of the African Biſhops, Mr. B. will entertain the better opinion of the Engliſh Epiſcopacy.

Sect. 10. But that he may not think this ſort of Epiſcopacy was only in theſe parts of Africa, let us enquire into the Epiſcopacy of the Church of Alexandria. And we may ſuppoſe Athanaſius did not ſpend all his zeal upon doctrinal points, but had ſome for the right Conſtitution of Churches; and yet it is moſt certain the Churches under his care could not have perſonal Communion with him. It is obſerved by Epiph. hær. 68. n. 6. Athanaſ. Ap. p. 781. 802. Epiphanius, that Athanaſius did frequently viſit the neighbour Churches, eſpecially thoſe in Maræotis; of which Athanaſius himſelf gives the beſt account. Maræotis, ſaith he, is a Region belonging to Alexandria, which never had either Biſhop or Suffragan in it; but all the Churches there are immediately ſubject to the Biſhop of Alexandria; but every Preſbyter is fixed in his particular Village; and here they had Churches erected in which theſe Preſbyters did officiate. All this we have expreſly from Athanaſius himſelf, whence we obſerve, (1.) That here were true Parochial Churches; for ſo Athanaſius calls them Churches, and not bare Oratories. (2.) That theſe had Preſbyters fixed among them, who performed divine Offices there. (3.) That theſe were under the immediate inſpection of the Biſhop of Alexandria, ſo that the whole Government belonged to him. (4.) That theſe were at that diſtance, that they could not have local Communion with their Biſhop in his Church at Alexandria. Which is directly contrary to Mr. Baxter's Epiſcopacy. Hæreſ. 68. n 4. 69. n. 1. So in Alexandria it ſelf, there were many diſtant Churches with fixed Preſbyters in them, as Epiphanius ſeveral times obſerves: And it would be a very ſtrange thing indeed, if ſo many Preſbyters ſhould have fixed Churches in Alexandria, and yet the whole Church of Alexandria be no Abridgment of Church. hiſt. p. 9. bigger than to make one Congregation for perſonal Communion with the Biſhop. But Mr. Baxter's great argument is, from the meeting of the whole multitude with Athanaſius in the great Church at Alexandria to keep the Eaſter Solemnity; whence he concludes, that the Chriſtians in Alexandria were no more than that the main body of them could meet and hear in one Aſſembly. Whereas all that Athanaſius ſaith, amounts Athanaſ. Ap. p. 682. to no more than this, that the multitude was too great to meet in one of the leſſer Churches, and therefore a great clamour was raiſed among them that they might go into the New Church; Athanaſius preſſed them to bear with the inconveniency and diſperſe themſelves into the leſſer Churches; the People grew impatient, and ſo at laſt he yielded to them. But what is there in all this to prove that all the Chriſtians in the whole City were then preſent, and that this Church would hold them all? If a great Aſſembly ſhould meet at one of the leſſer Churches in London upon ſome Solemn Occaſion, and finding themſelves too big for that place ſhould preſs the Biſhop to open St. Paul's for that day before it were quite finiſhed, becauſe of the greater capacity of the Church for receiving ſuch a number, would this prove that Saint Paul's held all the Chriſtians in London? Athanaſius ſaith not a word more, than that it was Eaſter, and there appeared a great number of People, ſuch a one as Chriſtian Princes would wiſh in a Chriſtian City. Doth he ſay, or intimate, that all the Chriſtians of the City were preſent? that none of them went to the leſſer Churches? or were abſent, though the Crou w as ſo great?

Doth he not ſay, the multitudes were ſo great in the ſmaller Churches in the Lent Aſſemblies, that not a few were ſtifled and carried home for dead? And therefore it was neceſſary to conſider the multitude at ſuch a time. In my mind Mr. Baxter might as well prove that the whole Nation of the Jews made but one Congregation; becauſe at the dedication of Solomon's Temple there was ſo great a multitude preſent, that one of the leſſer Synagogues could not hold them. But the argument is of greater force in this reſpect, that God himſelf appointed but one Temple for the whole Nation of the Jews: And therefore he intended no more than a ſingle Congregational Church. But to ſerve this Hypotheſis, Alexandria it ſelf muſt be ſhrunk into a leſs compaſs; although Dionyſius Alexandrinus, who was Biſhop there, ſaith it was ἡ μεγίστη πόλις a very great City, and the Geographer publiſhed by Gothofred ſaith it was σφόδρα μεγίστη, an exceeding great City; ſo great that it was ἀσύλληπτος paſs'd Men's comprehenſion: And Ammianus Marcellinus ſaith it was the top of all Cities. And for the number of Chriſtians there long before the time of Athanaſius, Dionyſius Alexandrinus ſaith in a time of great perſecution, when he was baniſhed, he kept up the Aſſemblies in the City; and at Cephro he had a large Church, partly of the Chriſtians of Alexandria which followed him, and partly from other places, and when he was removed thence to Colluthion, which was nearer the City, ſuch numbers of Chriſtians flocked out of the City to him, that they were forced to have diſtinct Congregations: So the words κατὰ μέρος ſignifie, and ſo Athanaſius uſeth them, κατὰ μέρος καὶ διῃρημένως, for the Chriſtians meeting in ſeveral Congregations. If there were ſuch a number of Chriſtians at Alexandria ſo long before, under the ſharpeſt perſecution, is it poſſible to imagin, in ſo great a City, after Chriſtianity had ſo long been the Religion of the Empire, that the number of Chriſtians there ſhould be no greater than to make one large Congregation? There is no hopes of convincing Men, that can build Theories upon ſuch ſtrange Improbabilities. I ſhall only add one Inſtance more from Antiquity, which is plain enough of it ſelf to ſhew the great extent of Dioceſan Power then; and that is of Theodoret, a great and learned Biſhop; and although his Biſhoprick was none of the largeſt, yet in his Epiſtle to Leo he ſaith, he had the Paſtoral charge of 800 Churches; for ſo many Pariſhes, ſaith he, are in my Dioceſs, which he had then enjoyed twenty ſix years. Doth Mr. B. believe that all the Chriſtians in theſe 800 Churches had perſonal Communion with Theodoret? And yet theſe Pariſhes did not change their ſpecies, for he ſaith, they were Churches ſtill.

Theodor. Ep. 113.

This Teſtimony of Theodoret is ſo full and peremptory, that Mr. Baxter hath no other way to avoid the force of it, but to call in queſtion the Authority of the Epiſtle. But without any conſiderable ground, unleſs it be that it contradicts his Hypotheſis. For, what if Theodoret*'s Epiſtles came out of the* Vatican Copy? Is that a ſufficient argument to reject them, unleſs ſome inconſiſtency be proved in thoſe Epiſtles, with the Hiſtory of thoſe times, or with his other Writings? Which are the Rules, Rivet gives for judging the ſincerity of them. That Epiſtle which Bellarmin and others reject as ſpurious, is contradicted by other Epiſtles of his ſtill extant; which ſhew a full reconciliation between Cyril of Alexandria and him before his death. And it is ſuppoſed, that John of Antioch was dead ſome conſiderable time before Cyril; which manifeſtly overthrows the Authority of it. But what is there like that in this Epiſtle to Leo, when the matter of fact is proved by other Epiſtles? As to the unreaſonable proceedings of Dioſcorus againſt him, (which was the occaſion of writing it) his other Epiſtles are ſo full of it, that Mr. B. never read the reſt, if he calls this into queſtion upon that account. That Hypatius, Abramius and Alypius were ſent into the Weſt upon Theodoret's account; appears by the Epiſtles to Renatus and Florentius, which follow that to Leo. What if ſeveral Epiſtles of his are loſt, which Nicephorus ſaw, doth that prove all that are remaining to be counterfeit? But he is much miſtaken, if he thinks there was no other Copy but the Vatican tranſlated by Metius; for Sirmondus tells us he met with another Copy at Naples, which he compared with the Vatican, and publiſhed the various Readings of the Epiſtles from it. What if Leontius ſaith that Hereticks feigned Epiſtles in Theodoret*'s name?* Doth that prove an Epiſtle wherein he vindicates himſelf from the imputation of Hereſie, to be ſpurious? What Mr. B. means by the printing this Epiſtle alone after Theodoret*'s Works*, I do not well underſtand, unleſs he never ſaw any other than the Latin Edition of Theodoret. But it is a very bold thing to pronounce concerning the Authority of a Man's Writings, without ſo much as looking into the lateſt and beſt Editions of them. But there are two things he objects which ſeem more material. (1.) That it ſeems incredible that a Town within two days journey of Antioch ſhould have 800 Churches in it at that time. (2.) That he proves from other places in Theodoret, that it is very improbable that Dioceſes then had ſo many Churches.

Theod. Ep. 116. Ep. 117.

1. As to the firſt, certainly no man in his wits ever undertook to prove, that one ſuch City as Cyrus then was, had 800 Churches in it. But by Cyrus, Theodoret means the Dioceſe of Cyrus; as will afterwards appear. If Cyrus were taken for the Regio Cyrrheſtica, with the bounds given it by Ptolemy, Strabo, and Pliny, then there would not appear the leaſt improbability in it, ſince many conſiderable Cities were within it, as Beræa, (now Aleppo) and Hierapolis, and extended as far as Euphrates; Zeugma being comprehended under it. The Eccleſiaſtical Province was likewiſe very large, and by the ancient Notitiæ it is ſometimes called Euphratenſis, which in Ammianus his time took in Comagena, and extended to Samoſata, (but the Regio Cyrrheſtica before was diſtinct from Comagena, as appears by Strabo, and others) in that Province there was a Metropolitan, who was called the Metropolitan of Hagiopolis, which by the ſame Notitiæ appears to have been then one of the names of Cyrus, or Cyrrhus. But notwithſtanding, I do not think the words of Theodoret are to be underſtood of the Province, but of his own peculiar Dioceſe; for Theodoret mentions the Metropolitan he was under. By Cyrus therefore we underſtand the Region about the City, which was under Theodoret's care; within which he was confined by the Emperour's Order, as he complains in ſeveral Epiſtles, and there it is called by him, ἡ Κυῤῥεστῶν χώρα, Regio Cyrrheſtica; and Theodoret himſelf ſets down the extent of it in his Epiſtle to Conſtantius, where he ſaith, it was forty miles in length, and forty in breadth. And he ſaith in another Epiſtle, that Chriſtianity was ſo much ſpread among them, that not only the Cities, but the Villages, the Fields, and utmoſt bounds were filled with Divine Grace. And that theſe Villages had Churches and Prieſts ſettled in them, under the care of the Biſhop, appears expreſly from a paſſage in the Life of Symeon, where he ſpeaks of Baſſus viſiting the Parochial Churches; Ὃς τηνικαῦτα πολλὰς περιώδευσε κώμας τοῖς κατὰ κώμην ἱερεῦσιν ἐπιστατῶν·

If there were then Parochial Churches ſetled with Preſbyters in them, and theſe under the care of the Dioceſan Biſhop, then Mr. B.'s Hypotheſis is utterly overthrown. In his Epiſtle to Nomus, he mentions eight Villages in his Dioceſe that were over-run with the Hereſie of Marcion, another with the Eunomian, another with the Arian Hereſie, which were all converted by his care: Ep. 81. and in another place he ſaith, he had brought ten thouſand Marcioniſts to Baptiſm. Ep. 145. In another he mentions the ſpreading of Marcion's Doctrine in his Dioceſe, and the great pains he took to root it out; and the ſucceſs he had therein. Vita Jacobi jun. p. 860, 861, &c. 868, 869, 876, 877, 878, 879. And we find the names of many of the Villages in his Lives, as Tillima, Targala, Nimuza, Teleda, Telaniſſus, which are ſufficient to ſhew that Theodoret had properly a Dioceſan Church, and that his Epiſcopal Care and Authority did extend to many Parochial Churches; his Dioceſe being forty miles in length, and as many in breadth. So that Mr. B. muſt reject, not only that Epiſtle to Leo, but the reſt too, and his other Works, if he hopes to make good his Parochial Epiſcopacy; which is too hard a Task to be undertaken, without better evidence than he hath hitherto brought.

2. But he offers to produce other Teſtimonies out of Theodoret, to ſhew the improbability that Dioceſes had ſo many Churches. The queſtion is not about the bare number of Churches in Dioceſes, which all men know to have been very different; but about the extent of Epiſcopal Power, whether it were limited to one Parochial Church, or was extended over many, And what is there in Theodoret which contradicts this? I extremely failed of my expectation, as to the other places of Theodoret, which he promiſed to produce; for I find five or ſix places cited out of his Hiſtory, but not one that comes near any proof of this matter. Treatiſe of Epiſcopacy, part 2. p. 49, 50. The (1.) proves, that in a time of Perſecution at Alexandria, nineteen Preſbyters and Deacons were baniſhed to Heliopolis in Phœnicia, where there were no Chriſtians. Theod. Hiſt. l. 4. c. 19. Therefore in Theodoret's time there was no Dioceſan Epiſcopacy. The (2.) ſhews, that in a ſmall City of Thebais, whither Eulogius and Protogenes were baniſhed, and there were but a few Chriſtians, yet there was a Biſhop. l. 4. c. 15. Who ever denied this, where there was a proſpect of converting more, as appears by the endeavours of Eulogius and Protogenes there? But he ought to have proved that as the Chriſtians increaſed, new Biſhops were made, which this is very far from. The (3.) proves that Lucius of Alexandria was made Biſhop by force, without any Synod of Biſhops, or choice of the Clergy, or requeſt of the People. l. 4. c. 19. I ſuppoſe by this time, Mr. B. had forgotten what he promiſed to prove from Theodoret. But I wonder how it came into his mind to ſay the Church of Alexandria at that time was like a Preſbyterian Church: which I am ſure he had not from Theodoret, nor from the Epiſtle of Peter of Alexandria. The (4.) is intended to prove, that in the time of Valens, the Patriarchal Orthodox Church of Alexandria was but one Aſſembly, which met only in one place at once. l. 4. c. 21. But it is very unhappy, that Theodoret ſhews juſt the contrary in that place, for he ſaith, that Valens expelled the orthodox Chriſtians out of their Churches, Τῶν ἱερῶν ἐξήλασεν οἴκων, are his very words: to whom, he ſaith, Jovianus had likewiſe given the new built Church. Which Mr. B. thus tranſlates, Valens found the Orthodox, even in the great Patriarchal City of Antioch in poſſeſſion but of one Church, which good Jovinian the Emperour had given them, of which he diſpoſſeſſed them. I deſire any one who relies on Mr. B.'s ſkill and fidelity in theſe matters, but to compare this Tranſlation with the Text in Theodoret, and I dare ſay he will ſee cauſe to admire it. But if any one can imagine that the Patriarchal Church of Antioch in the time of Valens could conſiſt but of one Congregation, for my part, I muſt give him over, as one uncapable of being convinced of any thing by me. I do not ſpeak what the Church in a time of great perſecution might be driven to, but of what it was in l. 4. c. 29. its ſetled ſtate. The (5.) is, from Terentius his begging one Church for the Orthodox, of Valens; which ſaith Mr. B. intimates their numbers. I am aſhamed to read, much more to confute ſuch arguments as theſe. For if the Papiſts ſhould deſire the liberty but of one Church in London, doth that prove they are no more than can make one Congregation? l. 5. c. 4. The (6.) proves that Maris was made Biſhop of Dolicha, a ſmall Town infected with Arianiſm. It is true, Theodoret ſaith, Doliche was a little City, and ſo he tells us, Cyrus was no great one; but he doth not ſet down the bounds of the Dioceſe; which for any thing we ſee in Theodoret, might be as large, as, we have evidently proved from him, the Dioceſe of Cyrrhus was. Let the Reader now judge, whether Theodoret doth not plainly overthrow Mr. B.'s notion of Parochial Epiſcopacy.

But Mr. B. inſiſts upon the Inſtitution of Chriſt; and if Chriſt hath appointed one ſort of Churches, viz. for perſonal communion, and men make another, is not this a violation of Chriſt's command, and ſetting up Man againſt God? I ſee no evidence produced for any ſuch Inſtitution of Chriſt, which limits Epiſcopal Power to a ſingle Congregation; and therefore the extending it to more, can be no violation of Chriſt's command, or ſetting up a new ſpecies of Churches, as will appear from Mr. B. himſelf under the next particular. Yet Mr. B. according to his wonted meekneſs towards his Adverſaries, charges me, for ſpeaking againſt this Anſwer to Serm. p. 73. principle of his, with pleading for preſumption, profanation, uſurpation, uncharitableneſs, ſchiſm, and what not? What is the reaſon of all this rage and bitterneſs? Why, I ſet down a ſaying of his, as going beyond the Independents in making the deviſing new ſpecies of Churches beyond Parochial or Congregational without God's Authority, and to impoſe them on the world, yea in his name, and call all Diſſenters Schiſmaticks, a far worſe uſurpation than to make or impoſe new Ceremonies or Liturgies. But is not all this true ſuppoſing that ſuch new ſpecies of Churches be ſo deviſed and ſo impoſed? That is not to the buſineſs; for that which I quoted it for, was to ſhew that Mr. B. looked upon all Churches beyond Parochial, as Churches merely of mens deviſing; and that to charge men with Schiſm for oppoſing any ſuch Conſtitution is unreaſonable; and that the impoſing it as Divine, is an intolerable uſurpation; and all this at the ſame time, when he pretends to write for Peace and Concord. My buſineſs is now to ſhew

Sect. 11. 2. That ſuch an Epiſcopacy as is practiſed here, and was ſo in the Primitive Church is no deviſing a new ſpecies of Churches, nor hath any thing repugnant to any Inſtitution of Chriſt. And to prove this, I need no more than one of Mr. B.'s own Cautions in his Premonition, viz. that he doth not diſpute the lawfulneſs of Archbiſhops, as he calls them, over Parochial Biſhops, as Succeſſors to the Apoſtolical and other general Overſeers of the firſt Age, in the ordinary continued parts of their Office. p. 263. And what he ſaith in his own name and others in his Plea for Peace: There are ſome of us, that much incline to think that Archbiſhops, that is, Biſhops that have overſight of many Churches with their Paſtors, are lawful Succeſſors of the Apoſtles in the ordinary part of their Work. But Chriſtian Directory. Eccleſ. Caſes Q. 66. p. 831. I cannot here omit Mr. Baxter's Arguments to prove, that the ordinary governing part of the Apoſtolical Office, was ſetled for all following Ages.

1. Becauſe we read of the ſetling of that form, but we never read of any abolition, diſcharge, or ceſſation of the Inſtitution. 2. Becauſe if we affirm a ceſſation without proof, we ſeem to accuſe God of mutability, as ſetling one form of Government for one Age only, and no longer. 3. We leave room for audacious Wits accordingly to queſtion other Goſpel Inſtitutions, as Paſtors, Sacraments, &c. and to ſay, they were but for an Age. 4. It was general Officers Chriſt promiſed to be with to the end of the world, Mat. 28. 20. Which being joined with the Conſent of the Chriſtian Church of the Ages ſucceeding the Apoſtles, that the Apoſtles did leave Succeſſours in the care and government of Churches, have a great deal of weight in them, and over-ballance the difficulties on the other ſide. As upon this occaſion I think fit to declare. From whence I argue thus, That which is only a continuance of the ſame kind of Churches which were in being in the Apoſtolical time, is no deviſing a new ſpecies of Churches, nor hath any thing repugnant to any Inſtitution of Chriſt. But that is the caſe as to our Epiſcopacy. We intend no quarrel about names: If it be Mr. B.'s pleaſure to call our Biſhops Archbiſhops, let him enjoy his own fancy. It already appears from Saint Cyprian, and might much more be made plain from many others if it were needful, that the Biſhops of the ſeveral Churches were looked on as Succeſſors to the Apoſtles in the care and government of Churches. Now the Office of Mr. B.'s Parochial Biſhops was only to attend to one particular Congregation; but the Apoſtolical Office was above this, while the Apoſtles held it in their own hands; and did not make a new ſpecies of Churches, nor overthrow the Conſtitution of Parochial Churches. It ſeems then a ſtrange thing to me, that the continuance of the ſame kind of Office in the Church, ſhould be called the deviſing a new ſpecies of Churches.

But Mr. B. runs upon this perpetual miſtake, that our Engliſh Epiſcopacy is not a ſucceſſion to the Ordinary part of the Apoſtolical Power in governing Churches; but a new ſort of Epiſcopacy, not heard of in the ancient Church, which ſwallows up the whole Power of Preſbyters, and leaves them only a bare name of Curates, and deſtroys the being of Parochial Churches. But if I can make the contrary to appear from the Frame and Conſtitution of this Church, I hope Mr. B. will be reconciled to our Epiſcopal Government, and endeavour to remove the prejudices he hath cauſed in Peoples minds againſt it.

Sect. 12. Now to examine this, let us conſider two things. (1.) What Power is left to Preſbyters in our Church. (2.) What Authority the Biſhops of our Church have over them.

I. What Power is left to Preſbyters in our Church: and that may be conſidered two ways. 1. With reſpect to the whole Body of this Church. 2. With reſpect to their particular Congregations or Cures.

1. With reſpect to the whole Body of this Church: and ſo, (1.) There are no Rules of Diſcpline, no Articles of Doctrine, no Form of Divine Service, are to be allowed or received in this Nation; but, by the Conſtitution of this Church, the Preſbyters of it have their Votes in paſſing them, either in Perſon, or by Proxy. For, all things of that Nature, are to paſs both Houſes of Convocation; and the lower Houſe conſiſts wholly of Preſbyters, who repreſent the whole Preſbytery of the Nation, either appearing by their own Right, as many do, or as being choſen by the reſt, from whom by Indentures they either do, or ought to receive Power to tranſact things in their names. And the cuſtom of this Church hath ſometimes been, for the Clergy of the Dioceſes to give limited Proxies in particular Caſes to their Procurators. Now I appeal to any man of underſtanding, whether the Clergy of this Church have their whole Power ſwallowed up by the Biſhops, when yet the Biſhops have no power to oblige them to any Rules or Canons but by their own conſent, and they do freely vote in all things of common concernment to the Church, and therefore the Preſbyters are not by the Conſtitution deprived of their ſhare in one of the greateſt Rights of Government, viz. in making Rules for the whole Body. And in this main part of Government the Biſhops do nothing without the counſel of their Preſbyters, and in this reſpect our Church falls behind none of the ancient Churches, which had their Councils of Preſbyters together with their Biſhops; only, there they were taken ſingly in every City, and here they are combined together in Provincial Synods; model'd according to the Laws of the Nation. And when the whole Body of Doctrine, Diſcipline, and Worſhip are thus agreed upon by a general conſent, there ſeems to be far leſs need of the particular Councils of Preſbyters to every Biſhop, ſince both Biſhops and Preſbyters are now under fixed Rules, and are accountable for the breach of them. (2.) In giving Orders; by the Rules of this Church four Preſbyters are to aſſiſt the Biſhop, and to examine the Perſons to be ordained, (or the Biſhop in their preſence) and afterwards to join in the laying on of hands upon the Perſons ordained. And is all this nothing but to be the Biſhop's Curates, and to officiate in ſome of his Chapels?

Can. 31, & 35.

2. As to their particular charges, one would think thoſe who make this objection, had never read over the Office of Ordination, for therein, (1.) For the Epiſtle is read the Charge given by Saint Paul to the Elders at Miletus, Acts 20. or the third Chapter of the firſt Epiſtle to Timothy; concerning the Office of a Biſhop. What a great impertinency had both theſe been, if the Preſbyter's Power had been quite ſwallowed up by the Biſhop's? But it hence appears, that our Church looked on the Elders at Epheſus, and the Biſhop in Timothy to be Preſbyters, as yet under the care and government of the Apoſtles, or ſuch as they deputed for that Office, ſuch as Timothy and Titus were. Which I ſuppoſe is the true meaning of Saint Jerome, and many other doubtful Paſſages of Antiquity, which relate to the community of the names of Biſhop and Preſbyter, while the Apoſtles governed the Church themſelves. And at this time Timothy being appointed to this part of the Apoſtolical Office of Government, the Biſhops mentioned in the Epiſtle to him, may well enough be the ſame with the Preſbyters in the Epiſtle to Titus, who was appointed to ordain Elders in every City, Titus 1. 5. (2.) In the Biſhop's Exhortation to them that are to be ordained, he ſaith, Now we exhort you in the name of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, to have in remembrance into how high a dignity, and to how chargeable an Office ye be called, that is to ſay, the Meſſengers and Watchmen, the Paſtors and Stewards of the Lord, to teach, to premoniſh, to feed and provide for the Lord's Family, &c. have always therefore printed in your remembrance, how great a treaſure is committed to your charge; for they be the Sheep of Chriſt, which he bought with his death, and for whom he ſhed his Blood. The Church and Congregation whom you muſt ſerve is his Spouſe and Body. And if it ſhall chance the ſame Church, or any Member thereof, to take any hurt or hindrance, by reaſon of your negligence, you know the greatneſs of the fault, and of the horrible puniſhment which will enſue, &c. Is this the language of a Church which deprives Preſbyters of the due care of their flocks, and makes Parochial Congregations to be no Churches? (3.) The perſon to be ordained doth ſolemnly promiſe to give faithful diligence to miniſter the Doctrine and Sacraments, and the Diſcipline of Chriſt, as the Lord hath commanded, and as this Realm hath received the ſame, according to the Commandments of God, ſo that he may teach the People committed to his Cure and Charge, with all diligence to keep and obſerve the ſame. Here we ſee a Cure and Charge committed to the Preſbyters; Preaching and Adminiſtration of Sacraments required of them, and the exerciſe of Diſcipline, as far as belongs to them, (of which afterwards) but now in the Conſecration of a Biſhop, this part is left out, and inſtead of that it is ſaid, That he is called to the Government of the Church; and he is required to correct and puniſh ſuch as be unquiet, diſobedient and criminous in his Dioceſe. So that the more particular charge of Souls is committed to every Paſtor over his own Flock, and the general care of Government and Diſcipline is committed to the Biſhop, as that which eſpecially belongs to his Office, as diſtinct from the other.

Sect. 13. II. Which is the next thing to be conſidered, viz. What Authority the Biſhop hath, by virtue of his Conſecration, in this Church? And that, I ſay, is what Mr. B. calls the ordinary parts of the Apoſtolical Authority; which lies in three things, Government, Ordination and Cenſures. And that our Church did believe our Biſhops to ſucceed the Apoſtles in thoſe parts of their Office, I ſhall make appear by theſe things. (1.) In the Preface before the Book of Ordination, it is ſaid, That it is evident unto all men, diligently reading Holy Scripture, and ancient Authors, that from the Apoſtles time, there have been theſe Orders of Miniſters in Chriſt's Church, Biſhops, Prieſts and Deacons. What is the reaſon that they expreſs it thus, from the Apoſtles time, rather than in the Apoſtles times, but that they believed, while the Apoſtles lived, they managed the affairs of Government themſelves; but as they withdrew, they did in ſome Churches ſooner, and in ſome later, as their own continuance, the condition of the Churches, and the qualification of Perſons were, commit the Care and Government of Churches to ſuch Perſons whom they appointed thereto? Of which, we have an uncontrolable evidence in the Inſtances of Timothy and Titus; for the care of Government was a diſtinct thing from the Office of an Evangeliſt, and all their removes do not invalidate this, becauſe while the Apoſtles lived, it is probable there were no fixed Biſhops, or but few. But as they went off, ſo they came to be ſettled in their ſeveral Churches. And as this is moſt agreeable to the ſenſe of our Church, ſo it is the faireſt Hypotheſis for reconciling the different Teſtimonies of Antiquity. For hereby the ſucceſſion of Biſhops is ſecured from the Apoſtles times, for which the Teſtimonies of Irenæus, Tertullian, Saint Cyprian, and others, are ſo plain; hereby room is left to make good all that Saint Jerome hath ſaid; and what Epiphanius delivers concerning the differing ſettlements of Churches at firſt. So that we may allow for the community of names, between Biſhop and Preſbyter, for a while in the Church, i. e. while the Apoſtles governed the Churches themſelves; but afterwards, that which was then part of the Apoſtolical Office, became the Epiſcopal, which hath continued from that time to this, by a conſtant ſucceſſion in the Church.

(2.) Archbiſhop Whitgift ſeveral times declares, that theſe parts of the Apoſtolical Office ſtill remained in the Biſhops of our Church. As for this part of the Apoſtles function, ſaith he, to viſit ſuch Churches as were before planted, and to provide that ſuch were placed in them, as were vertuous and godly Paſtors, I know it remaineth ſtill, and is one of the chief parts of the Biſhops function. And again, There is now no planting of Churches,

p. 484.

Churches, nor going through the whole world, there is no writing of new Goſpels, no propheſying of things to come, but there is governing of Churches, viſiting of them, reforming of Paſtors, and directing of them, which is a portion of the Apoſtolical function. Again, Although that this part of the Apoſtolical Office which did conſiſt in planting and founding of Churches through the whole world is ceaſed, yet the manner of Government by placing Biſhops in every City, by moderating and governing them, by viſiting the Churches, by cutting off Schiſms and contentions, by ordering Miniſters, remaineth ſtill, aud ſhall continue, and is in this Church in the Archbiſhops and Biſhops, as moſt meet men to execute the ſame. Biſhop Bilſon fully agrees, as to theſe particulars. (1.) That the Apoſtles did not at firſt commit the Churches to the government of Biſhops, but reſerved the chief power of Government in their own hands. (2.) That upon experience of the confuſion and diſorder which did ariſe through equality of Paſtors, did appoint at their departure certain approved men to be Biſhops. (3.) That theſe Biſhops did ſucceed the Apoſtles in the Care and Government of Churches, as he proves at large, and therefore he calls their function Apoſtolick. Inſtead of many others, which it were eaſie to produce, I ſhall only add the Teſtimony of King Charles I. in his Debates about Epiſcopacy, who underſtood the Conſtitution of our Church as well as any Biſhop in it, and defended it with as clear and as ſtrong a Reaſon. In his third Paper to Henderſon, he hath theſe words, Where you find a Biſhop and Preſbyter in Scripture to be one and the ſame, (which I deny to be always ſo) it is in the Apoſtles times; now I think to prove the Order of Biſhops ſucceeded that of the Apoſtles, and that the name was chiefly altered in reverence to thoſe who were immediately choſen by our Savionr. In his firſt Paper at the Treaty at Newport, he thus ſtates the caſe about Epiſcopal Government. I conceive that Epiſcopal Government is moſt conſonant to the word of God, and of an Apoſtolical Inſtitution, as it appears by the Scriptures to have been practiſed by the Apoſtles themſelves, and by them committed and derived to particular Perſons as their ſubſtitutes or ſucceſſors therein, (as for ordaining Preſbyters and Deacons, giving Rules concerning Chriſtian Diſcipline, and exerciſing Cenſures over Preſbyters and others) and hath ever ſince to theſe laſt times been exerciſed by Biſhops in all the Churches of Chriſt, and therefore I cannot in conſcience conſent to aboliſh the ſaid Government. In his Reply to the firſt Anſwer of the Divines, he ſaith, that mere Preſbyters are Epiſcopi Gregis only, they have the overſight of the Flock in the duties of Preaching, Adminiſtration of Sacraments, publick Prayer, Exhorting, Rebuking, &c, but Biſhops are Epiſcopi Gregis & Paſtorum too, having the overſight of Flock and Paſtors within their ſeveral Precincts in the Acts of external Government. And that, although the Apoſtles had no Succeſſors in eundem gradum as to thoſe things that were extraordinary in them, as namely the meaſure of their Gifts, the extent of their charge, the infallibility of their Doctrine, and the having ſeen Chriſt in the fleſh; but in thoſe things that were not extraordinary, (and ſuch thoſe things are to be judged which are neceſſary for the ſervice of the Church in all times, as the Office of Teaching and the Power of governing are) they were to have and had Succeſſors; and therefore the learned and godly Fathers and Councils of old times, did uſually ſtile Biſhops the Succeſſors of the Apoſtles without ever ſcrupling thereat. Many other Paſſages might be produced out of thoſe excellent Papers to the ſame purpoſe, but theſe are ſufficient to diſcover that our Biſhops are looked on as Succeſſors to the Apoſtles, and therefore Mr. Baxter

Sect. 14. 3. It now remains, that we conſider whether the reſtraint of Diſcipline in our Parochial Churches doth overthrow their Conſtitution? To make this clear, we muſt underſtand that the Diſcipline of the Church either reſpects the admiſſion of Church-members to the Holy Communion; or the caſting of them out for Scandal afterwards.

1. As to that part of Diſcipline which reſpects the admiſſion of Church-members. The Rubrick after Confirmation ſaith, That none ſhall be admitted to the holy Communion, until ſuch time as he be confirmed, or be ready and deſirous to be confirmed. Now to capacitate a perſon for Confirmation, it is neceſſary that he be able to give an account of the neceſſary points of the Chriſtian Faith and Practice, as they are contained in the Creed, the Lord's-Prayer, the Ten Commandments and the Church Catechiſm; and of his ſufficiency herein the Parochial Miniſter is the Judge. For he is either to bring or ſend in writing, with his hand ſubſcribed thereunto, the names of all ſuch perſons within his Pariſh, as he ſhall think fit to be preſented to the Biſhop to be confirmed. Now, if this were ſtrictly obſerved (and the Church is not reſponſible for mens neglect) were it not ſufficient for the ſatisfaction of men as to the admiſſion of Church-members to the Lord's Supper? And I do not ſee, but the Objections made againſt the Diſcipline of this Church might be removed, if the things allowed and required by the Rules of it, were duly practiſed; and might attain to as great purity, as is ever pretended to by the Separate Congregations, who now find ſo much fault for our want of Diſcipline. For, even the Churches of New-England do grant, that the Infant ſeed of Confederate viſible Believers are members of the ſame Church with their Parents, and when grown up are perſonally under the Watch, Diſcipline and Government of that Church. And, that Infants baptized have a right to farther privileges, if they appear qualified for them. And the main of theſe qualifications are, underſtanding the Doctrine of Faith, and publickly profeſſing their aſſent thereto, not ſcandalous in life, and ſolemnly owning the Covenant before the Church. Taking this for the Baptiſmal Covenant, and not their Church Covenant, our Church owns the ſame thing, only it is to be done before the Biſhop inſtead of their Congregation. But the Miniſter is to be judge of the qualifications, which Mr. Baxter himſelf allows in this caſe. Who grants the Profeſſion of Faith to be a Condition of Right before the Church; and then adds, that ſuch profeſſion is to be tried, judged and approved by the Paſtors of the Church to whoſe Office it belongs; becauſe to Miniſters as ſuch the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven are committed; and they are Stewards of God's Houſe, &c. which he there proves at large by many Arguments. But he complains of the old careleſs practice of this excellent duty of Confirmation. This is a thing indeed to be lamented, that it is too haſtily and curſorily performed: but let the fault then be laid, where it ought to be laid; not upon the Church, whoſe Rules are very good, but upon thoſe perſons in it who ſlubber over ſo important a Duty. But is it not more becoming Chriſtians in a peaceable and orderly manner to endeavour to retrieve ſo excellent a means for the Reformation of our Parochial Churches; than peeviſhly to complain of the want of Diſcipline, and to reject Communion with our Church on that account? And I ſhall deſire Mr. Baxter to conſider his own words, That the practice of ſo much Diſcipline, as we are agreed in, is a likelier way to bring us to agreement in the reſt, than all our diſputings will do without it.

Yea, Mr. Baxter grants, That the Preſbyters of our Church have by the Rubrick the Trial and Approbation of thoſe, that are ſent to the Biſhop for Confirmation; and that the Doctrine and Practice of the Church of England, is for the Power of Preſbyters herein as far as they could deſire. This is a very fair confeſſion, and ſufficient to make it appear that our Dioceſan Epiſcopacy doth not overthrow the Power of Preſbyters, as to this part of Diſcipline which concerns admiſſion of Church-members to the Communion.

Sect. 15. 2. As to that part of Church Diſcipline which reſpects the rejecting thoſe for Scandal, who have been Church-members. In caſe of open and publick Scandal, our Church doth allow if not require the Parochial Miniſter to call and advertiſe ſuch a one that is guilty of it in any wiſe not to come to the Lord's Table, until he hath openly declared himſelf to have truly repented and amended his former naughty life, that the Congregation may thereby be ſatisfied, which before was offended. And in caſe the offender continue obſtinate, he may repel him from the Communion; but ſo, that after ſuch repelling, he give an account to the Ordinary within 14 days; and the Ordinary is then to proceed according to the Canon. Here is plainly a Power granted to put back any Scandalous Offender from the Sacrament, whoſe faults are ſo notorious as to give offence to the Congregation; but it is not an abſolute and unaccountable Power, but the Miniſter is obliged to give account thereof within a limited time to the Ordinary. Now wherein is it that our Dioceſan Epiſcopacy deſtroys the being of Parochial Churches for want of the Power of Diſcipline? Is it that they have not Power to exclude men, whether their faults be Scandalous to the Congregation or not? Or is it, that they are bound to juſtifie what they do, and to proſecute the Perſon for thoſe faults for which they put him back from the Communion? Or is it, that they have not Power to proceed to the greater Excommunication, that being reſerved to the Biſhop, upon full hearing of all parties concerned? But as long as by the Conſtitution of our Church every Miniſter in his Pariſh hath power to keep back notorious Offenders, it will be impoſſible to prove from other circumſtances that the being of our Churches is deſtroyed by our Dioceſan Epiſcopacy. Mr. B. ſaith, that if it could be proved, that the leſſer excommunication out of our particular Congregations were allowed to the Pariſh Miniſters, it would half reconcile him to the Engliſh ſort of Prelacy; but if it be ſo, he hath been in a ſleep theſe 50 years, that could never hear or read of any ſuch thing. It is ſtrange, in all this time, he ſhould never read or conſider the 26 Canon, which ſaith, that no Miniſter ſhall in any wiſe admit any one of his Flock, or under his care to the Communion of the Lord's Supper, who is notoriouſly known to live impenitently in any ſcandalous Sin. This is not in the Reformatio Legum Eccleſiaſticarum, which he mentions as an abortive thing, publiſhed by John Fox, (which laſt any one that hath ſeen them, knows to be a miſtake) not in Dr. Mocket's Book which was burnt; yet not ſo deſtroyed, but with ſome diligence he might have ſeen it (but it was for nothing of this kind, that Book underwent ſo ſevere a cenſure; as Mr. B. inſinuates; but for ſeeming to incroach too much on the King's Prerogative.) But I appeal to what Mr. B. calls the Authorized Church Canons; which I think are plain in this caſe. But Mr. B. ſaith, this is not the leſſer excommunication, but a temporary ſuſpenſion of the Miniſter's own Act in delivering the Sacrament to ſuch perſons. Let Mr. B. call it by what name he pleaſeth; this is certain, the Miniſter is impowered, is required to do this; the Rubrick before Communion.

queſtion then is, whether this be not ſuch a Cenſure of the Church, as to ſuſpend notorious Offenders from the Sacrament; and that within the Power of the Parochial Miniſter? I grant, this is not the leſſer excommunication, according to the Uſe of this Church, for that ſuppoſeth the ſentence paſſed; and is ſo called by way of diſtinction from the greater pronounced by the Biſhop in Perſon, upon extraordinary occaſions. But yet it is a Church-cenſure upon Offenders, and was accounted a ſort of excommunication by the Ancient Church; for thoſe who were in the ſtate of Penitents were then ſaid to be under a kind of excommunication; as appears by ſeveral paſſages in St. Auguſtin, produced by Spalatenſis to this purpoſe, viz. to prove that there was a penitential excommunication. But Mr. B. quotes Albaſpinæus to ſhew that the old Excommunication did ſhut perſons out from all other Church-communion as well as the Sacrament. Which is very true of the greater Excommunication; but beſides this there were other Cenſures of the Church upon Offenders, whereby they were ſuſpended from full Communion; but not debarred the hopes of it upon ſatisfaction given. Theſe were ſaid to be in the ſtate of Penitents. It was a favour to the excommunicated to be brought into this ſtate; and others were never allowed to hope to be reſtored to Communion; others only on their death-beds; others according to the nature and degrees of their Repentance; of which thoſe were left to be Judges, who were particularly intruſted with the care of the Penitents. Albaſpinæus grants that as long as men remained Penitents they were actually deprived of the Privileges of Church-communion; but he ſaith, the Penitents were in a middle ſtate between the excommunicated and the faithful, being ſtill Candidates, as he calls them; ſo that all that were Penitents were ſuſpended from Communion; but not wholly caſt out of the Church; becauſe the Chriſtians might as freely converſe with theſe, as with any, but they were not allowed to participate in the Sacred Myſteries. But there was no queſtion, whereever there was a Power to ſuſpend any Perſons from Communion, there was a Power of Diſcipline; becauſe the Church's Diſcipline did not conſiſt merely in the power of Excommunication; no more than a Judge's power lies only in condemning men to be hanged; but in ſo governing the Members of the Church, that Scandalous perſons may be kept from the greateſt Acts of Communion, and by Admonition and Counſel be brought to a due preparation for it. Since then our Church doth give power to Parochial Miniſters to ſuſpend notorious Offenders from the Communion, it is thereby evident, that it doth not deprive them of all the neceſſary and eſſential parts of Church-diſcipline. But ſaith Mr. B. If a Miniſter doth publickly admoniſh another by name, not cenſured by the Ordinary, the Lawyers tell him he may have his action againſt him. I anſwer, 1. What need this publick Admonition by name? Doth the nature of Church-diſcipline lie in that? Suppoſe a man be privately and effectually dealt with to withdraw himſelf, is not this ſufficient? I am ſure St. Auguſtine took this courſe with his People at Hippo, he perſuaded them to examine their own Conſciences, and if they found themſelves guilty of ſuch Crimes as rendred them unfit for the holy Communion, he adviſed them to withdraw themſelves from it, till by Prayers and Faſting and Alms they had cleanſed their Conſciences, and then they might come to it. Here is no publick Admonition by name; and in many caſes St. Auguſtin declares the Church may juſtly forbear the exerciſe of Diſcipline towards Offenders, and yet the Church be a true Church, and Chriſtians obliged to communicate with it; as appears by all his diſputes with the Donatiſts. 2. De Tempore Serm. 252.

Law: The queſtion then comes to this, whether the obligation to admoniſh publickly an Offender, or to deny him the Sacrament, if he will come to it, be ſo great as to bear him out in the violation of a Law; made by publick Authority, with a deſign to preſerve our Religion? But my deſign is only to ſpeak to this caſe, ſo far as the Church is concerned in it.

Sect. 16. If it be ſaid, that notwithſtanding this, the neglect and abuſe of Diſcipline among us are too great to be juſtified, and too notorious to be concealed; I anſwer.

1. That is not our queſtion, but whether our Parochial Churches have loſt their being for want of the Power of Diſcipline? and whether the Species of our Churches be changed by Dioceſan Epiſcopacy? which we have ſhewed ſufficient Reaſon to deny. And what other abuſes have crept in, ought in an orderly way to be reformed, and no good Man will deny his aſſiſtance in it.

Of Confirmation, p. 174, &c.

2. It is far eaſier to ſeparate, or complain for want of Diſcipline, than to find out a due way to reſtore it. No Man hath more ſet out the almoſt inſuperable difficulties which attend it, than Mr. Baxter hath done; eſpecially in that, it will provoke and exaſperate thoſe moſt who ſtand in need of it; and be moſt likely to do good on thoſe who need it leaſt.

His Majeſty's final Anſwer to the Divines at Newport, n. 4.

3. The caſe of our Churches now, is very different from that of the Churches in the Primitive times. For, the great Reaſon of Diſcipline is not, that for want of it the Conſciences of Fellow-communicants would be defiled (for to aſſert that, were Donatiſm) but that the honour of a Chriſtian Society may be maintained. If then the Chriſtian Magiſtrates do take care to vindicate the Church's honour by due puniſhment of Scandalous Offenders, there will appear ſo much leſs neceſſity of reſtoring the ſecurity of the ancient Diſcipline. To which purpoſe theſe words of the Royal Martyr King Charles I. are very conſiderable. "But his Majeſty ſeeth no neceſſity that the Biſhops challenge to the Power of Juriſdiction ſhould be at all times as large as the exerciſe thereof at ſome times appeareth to have been; the exerciſe thereof being variable according to the various conditions of the Church in different times. And therefore his Majeſty doth not believe that the Biſhops under Chriſtian Princes do challenge ſuch an amplitude of Juriſdiction to belong unto them in reſpect of their Epiſcopal Office preciſely, as was exerciſed in the Primitive times, by Biſhops before the days of Conſtantine. The reaſon of the difference being evident, that in thoſe former times under Pagan Princes, the Church was a diſtinct body of it ſelf, divided from the Commonwealth, and ſo was to be governed by its own Rules and Rulers; the Biſhops therefore of thoſe times, though they had no outward coercive power over Mens Perſons or Eſtates, yet in as much as every Chriſtian Man when he became a Member of the Church, did ipſo facto, and by that his own voluntry Act put himſelf under their Government, they exerciſed a very large Power of Juriſdiction in ſpiritualibus, in making Eccleſiaſtical Canons, receiving accuſations, converting the accuſed, examining Witneſſes, judging of Crimes, excluding ſuch as they found guilty of Scandalous offences from the Lord's Supper, enjoyning Penances upon them, caſting them out of the Church, receiving them again upon their Repentance, &c. And all this they exerciſed as well over Preſbyters as others. But after that the Church under

“ whereupon there muſt of neceſſity follow a complication of the Civil “ and Eccleſiaſtical Power, the Juriſdiction of Biſhops (in the outward “ exerciſe of it) was ſubordinate unto, and limitable by the Supreme “ Civil Power, and hath been, and is at this day, ſo acknowledged by “ the Biſhops of this Realm.

4. The due exerciſe of Diſcipline is a work of ſo much prudence and difficulty, that the greateſt Zealots for it, have not thought it fit to be truſted in the hands of every Parochial Miniſter and his particular Congregation. Calvin declares, that he never thought it convenient that every Miniſter ſhould have the power of Excommunication: Not only becauſe of the invidiouſneſs of the thing, and the danger of the example; but becauſe of the great Abuſes and Tyranny it may ſoon fall into, and becauſe it was contrary to the Apoſtolical Practice. Calvin. Ep. 135. And to the ſame purpoſe, Beza delivers his judgment, who likewiſe gives this account of the Diſcipline of Geneva, that the Parochial Miniſters and Elders proceed no farther than Admonition; but in caſe of Contumacy they certify the Preſbytery of the City which ſits at certain times and hears all Cauſes relating to Diſcipline, and as they judge fit either give admonition, or proceed to ſuſpenſion from the Lord's Supper; or, which is a rare caſe, and when no other remedy can prevail, they go on to publick Excommunication. Bez. Ep. 20. Where we ſee, every Parochial Church is no more truſted with the Power of Diſcipline than among us; nay, the Miniſter here hath no power to repel, but all that he can do there is to admoniſh; and how come then their Parochial Churches to be true, and not ours? Beſides, why may not our Miniſters be obliged to certify the Biſhop, as well as theirs to certify the Preſbytery? ſince in the African Churches the matter of Diſcipline was ſo much reſerved to the Biſhop, that a Preſbyter had no power to receive a Penitent into the Communion of the Church without the advice and direction of the Biſhop; Codex Eccleſ. Afric. c. 6, 7, 9, 43. and Saint Auguſtin propoſed it, that whoſoever received one that declined the judgment of his own Biſhop, ſhould undergo the ſame cenſure which that perſon deſerved; and it was allowed by the Council. Alipius, Saint Auguſtin's great Friend and Legat of the Province of Numidia, c. 10. propoſed the caſe of a Preſbyter under the cenſure of his Biſhop, who out of pride and vain-glory ſets up a ſeparate Congregation in oppoſition to the Order of the Church; and he deſired to know the judgment of the Council c. 11. about it; and they unanimouſly determined that he was guilty of Schiſm, and ought to be anathematized, and to loſe his place. And this was the Judgment even of the African Biſhops, for whom Mr. Baxter profeſſeth greater reverence than for any others; and ſaith, their Councils were the beſt in the world; and commends their Canons for very good about Diſcipline. But he pretends that a Biſhop's Dioceſe there, was but like one of our Pariſhes, which I have already refuted at large, by ſhewing that there were places at a conſiderable diſtance under the care of the Biſhops. So that the bringing the full power of Diſcipline into every Parochial Church, is contrary to the practice of Antiquity, as well as of the Reformed Churches abroad, which plead moſt for Diſcipline; and would unavoidably be the occaſion of great and ſcandalous diſorders, by the ill management of the Power of Excommunication; as was moſt evident by the Separatiſts when they took this Sword into their hands, and by their fooliſh and paſſionate, and indiſcreet uſe of it, brought more diſhonour upon their Churches, than if they had never

meddled with it at all. And in ſuch a matter, where the honour of the Chriſtian Society is the chief thing concerned, it becomes wiſe Men to conſider what tends moſt to the promoting of that; and whether the good, Men promiſe themſelves by Diſcipline, will countervail the Schiſms and Contentions, the heart-burnings, and animoſities which would follow the Parochial exerciſe of it. The diſſenting Brethen in their Apologetical Narration do ſay, p. 5. That they had the fatal Miſcarriages and Shipwrecks of the Separation, as Land-marks to forewarn them of the Rocks and Shelves they ran upon; and therefore they ſay p. 9. they never exerciſed the Power of Excommunication. For they ſaw plainly, they could never hold their People together if they did; ſince the excommunicated Party would be ſure to make Friends enough, at leaſt to make breaches among them; and they holding together by mutual conſent, ſuch Ruptures would ſoon break their Churches to pieces. Beſides, this would be thought no leſs than ſetting up an Arbitrary Court of Judicature in every Pariſh; becauſe there are no certain Rules to proceed by; no ſtanding determination what thoſe ſins and faults are, which ſhould deſerve excommunication; no method of trials agreed upon; no ſecurity againſt falſe Witneſſes; no limitation of Cauſes; no liberty of Appeals, (if Parochial Churches be the only inſtituted Churches, as Mr. Baxter affirms:) beſides multitudes of other inconveniencies, which may be eaſily foreſeen; ſo that I do not queſtion, but if Mr. Baxter had the management of this Parochial Diſcipline in any one Pariſh in London, and proceeded by his own Rules, his Court of Diſcipline would be cried out upon in a ſhort time, as more arbitrary and tyrannical, than any Biſhop's Court this day in England: Let any one therefore judge, how reaſonable it is for him to overthrow the being of our Parochial Churches, for want of that, which being ſet up according to his own Principles, would deſtroy the Peace and Unity, if not the very being, of any Parochial Church whatſoever.

5. That want of Diſcipline, which is in Parochial Churches, was never thought by the moſt zealous Non-conformiſts of old, deſtructive to the Being of them. Of which I have already produced the Teſtimonies of Cartwright, Hilderſham, Giffard and many others.

Sect. 17. And ſuppoſing all perſons left to the judgment of their own Conſciences, as to their own fitneſs for the Holy Communion, we may obſerve theſe things; which may ſerve towards the vindication of our Parochial Churches.

(1.) That the greateſt Offenders do generally excommunicate themſelves; not daring to venture upon ſo hazardous a thing, as they account the Holy Communion to be, for fear of the damnation following unworthy receiving. So that, the moſt conſtant Communicants, are the moſt pious and ſober and devout Chriſtians.

(2.) That if any ſuch do voluntarily come, it is upon ſome great awakenings of Conſcience; ſome freſh Reſolutions they made of amendment of life; after ſome dangerous ſickneſs, or under ſome great affliction; when they are beſt inclined, and have ſtrong convictions, and hope for greater ſtrength of Grace againſt the power of Temptations. So that whether this Sacrament be a converting Ordinance or not, by God's Inſtitution, yet the preparation and diſpoſition of Men's Minds before it, puts them into the fitteſt capacity for Divine Grace; if they be not looked on as the effects of it.

(3.) That it is no prejudice to the benefit of this Holy Sacrament to thoſe who are well prepared, if thoſe who are not, do come to it; any more than in joining in Prayer or Thankſgiving with them. And if the preſence of ſuch perſons who deſerve excommunication and are not excommunicated, do overthrow the being of a Church; then Chriſt and his Diſciples did not make a Church, when Judas was preſent with them; as in probability he was, at his laſt Supper. At leaſt, if this kind of Diſcipline had been ſo neceſſary, it would never have been left ſo doubtful, as it is by the Evangeliſts; ſince it had been neceſſary for the information of the Chriſtian Church, to have ſet it down expreſly; not only that he was not preſent, but that he ought not to be; and therefore was caſt out before.

(4.) That ſeveral Preſbyterian Churches for many years had no Diſcipline at all among them; nor ſo much as the Lord's Supper adminiſtred. And were theſe true Churches all that while, and are not ours ſo now? Nay Mr. Baxter ſaith, That ſome Non-conformiſts have theſe ſeventeen or eighteen years forborn to baptize, or adminiſter the Lord's Supper, or to be Paſtors of any Churches. Plea for Peace, p. 243. Anſw. to Serm. Now I would fain know, what Churches theſe Men are of? Some or other they muſt own, if they be Chriſtians; New Churches they have not, they ſay; either then they muſt own our Churches to be true, notwithſtanding the defect of Diſcipline, or they muſt be of no Church at all.

(5.) That our Church is but in the ſame condition, the Church of Conſtantinople and other Churches were in, when Nectarius changed the Diſcipline of it, or rather took it quite away. For, the Pœnitentiary, whom he removed for the ſcandal given, was the Perſon whoſe buſineſs it was to look after the Diſcipline of the Church, and to ſee that all known Offenders performed the Penance enjoined them, for ſatisfaction of the Church. And, the conſequence of it Socrates ſaith was, That every one was left to the judgment of his own Conſcience, as to the participation of the Holy Myſteries. And this Socrates ſaith, he had Socr. l. 3. c. 19. from Eudæmon himſelf, who gave the Counſel to Nectarius to take that Office away; which was accordingly done; and no more reſtored, ſaith Sozomen: The conſequence whereof was, ſaith he, that every one Soz. l. 7. c. 16. went to the Lord's Table, ὡς ἂν ἑαυτῷ συνειδείη καὶ θαῤῥεῖν δύναιτο, as his Conſcience gave him leave, and as he was aſſured in his own mind. And this example of Nectarius was ſoon followed in other Churches, ſaith Sozomen; and ſo the Diſcipline of the Church decayed. But I hope all thoſe Churches did not loſe their being, by the loſs of Diſcipline. And ſo much in vindication of our Dioceſan Church Government.

Sect. 18. I now come to the National Conſtitution of our Church. By the Church of England, I ſaid, "We meant that Society of Chriſtian Serm. p. 19. "People which in this Nation are united under the ſame Profeſſion of "Faith, the ſame Laws of Government, and Rules of Divine Worſhip. "And that this was a very conſiſtent and true notion of our National "Church, I proved from the firſt notion of a Church, which is a Society of Men united together for their Order and Government according to the Rules of Chriſtian Religion. And ſince, the loweſt kind of "that Society, viz. Congregations for Worſhip, are called Churches; "ſince the largeſt Society of all Chriſtians is accounted a true Catholick "Church; and both from their union and conſent in ſome common "thing; I ſaid I did not underſtand why a National Society agreeing "together in the ſame Faith, and under the ſame Government and Diſ-

“ lar Congregations? Becauſe the narrowneſs or largeneſs of extent doth “ not alter the nature of the thing: The Kingdom of France being as “ truly a Kingdom, as the ſmall Kingdom of Ivetot: And as ſeveral “ Families make one Kingdom, ſo ſeveral leſſer Churches make one Na- “ tional. And that this notion was not diſagreeing with the impor“ tance of the word Ἐκκλησία, I ſhewed, that at Athens, from whence
“ the word was taken, it did comprehend in it all the ſeveral Tribes
“ when met together, although every one of thoſe Tribes in its parti- “ cular Aſſembly might be an Ἐκκλησία too; and from thence in the “ firſt Ages of the Chriſtian Church, the name of a Church compre“ hended in it the Eccleſiaſtical Governours and People of whole Cities, “ and therefore might by parity of Reaſon be extended to many Cities “ united together under one civil Government and the ſame Rules of “ Religion. This is the ſubſtance of what I delivered upon this ſubject; againſt which all my Adverſaries have ſomething to ſay, though not with equal ſtrength, clearneſs, or temper. Dr. Owen ſaith, Vindicat. of Non-conform. p. 16. (1.) That ſince I make National Churches to begin with the diſſolution of the Roman Empire, it fell out a great while after the firſt Inſtitution of Churches, and therefore they are not concerned in it: becauſe he ſuppoſeth Congregational Churches to be entire Churches of Chriſt's Inſtitution, and therefore to have a juſt right to govern and reform themſelves, independently as to any National Conſtitution. To which I anſwer, that if the Churches of Chriſt's Inſtitution be not limited to particular Congregations, as I have already proved, then the gradual increaſe of Churches, till they came to be National, doth not alter any Inſtitution of Chriſt; and conſequently the Power of thoſe Churches muſt limit and determin that of particular Congregations; or elſe nothing but diſorder and confuſion will follow, if every Congregation may have a ſeveral Rule of Worſhip and Doctrine of Faith, without being liable to an account to any ſuperior Church Authority. Which is all one, as to ſuppoſe that every Family may govern it ſelf, becauſe a Kingdom is made up of Families, without any reſpect to the Laws and Conſtitution of a Kingdom. p. 17. No, ſaith Dr. O. the caſe is not the ſame. For God never appointed that there ſhould be no other Government but that of Families. And where hath he appointed that there ſhould be no other Churches but particular Congregations? But God by the Light and Law of Nature, by the ends and uſe of the Creation of Man, by expreſs Revelation in his Word, hath by his own Authority, appointed and approved other ſorts of Civil Government. So ſay I, that God by the Light and Law of Reaſon, by the ends and uſe of a Chriſtian Society, by expreſs Inſtitution of the Apoſtolical Function in the care and Government of many Churches did declare, that he did appoint and approve other ſorts of Church Government beſides that of particular Congregations. For, if God upon the diſperſion of the Nations after the Flood, had appointed twelve Princes to have ruled the People in their ſeveral diſperſions, it had been a plain demonſtration he did not intend the ſeveral Families to have a diſtinct and independent Power within themſelves; but that they ought to be governed according to their appointment; ſo in the caſe of Churches; ſince Chriſt did appoint twelve Apoſtles to plant, ſettle and govern Churches, and ſet up Rulers in them, but ſtill under their Authority, Can any thing be plainer, than that theſe particular Churches were not ſettled with an entire power of governing themſelves? But as in the former

former caſe, if we ſuppoſe thoſe twelve Princes to have led out their ſeveral Diviſions, and to have placed them in convenient Seats, and given them general Rules for governing themſelves in Peace and Order under ſuch as they ſhould appoint, and as they found themſelves decaying, ſhould nominate ſo many Succeſſors as they thought fit for the ruling the ſeveral Colonies, were they not then obliged to ſubmit to ſuch Governors? Without breaking in pieces into ſo many Families, every Maſter governing his family by himſelf; which would certainly ruin and deſtroy them all; becauſe they could not have ſtrength and union to defend themſelves. So it is again in the caſe of Churches, the Apoſtles planted them, and ſetled ſuch Officers in them as were then fit to teach and govern them, ſtill reſerving the main care of Government to themſelves; but giving excellent Rules of Charity, Peace, Obedience and Submiſſion to Governours; and as they withdrew from particular Churches (within ſuch a precinct, as Crete was) they appointed ſome, whom they thought fit to take care of all thoſe Churches, and to conſtitute inferior Officers to teach and rule them; and therefore in this caſe, here is no more independency in particular Congregations, than in the other, as to private Families; which is as contrary to the general deſign of the Peace and Unity of Chriſtians, and their mutual preſervation and defence, as in the former caſe. In which, we believe the civil Government to be from God, although no Monarch can now derive his Title from ſuch Princes at the firſt diſperſion; and would it not then ſeem unreaſonable to queſtion the ſucceſſion of Biſhops from the Apoſtles, when the matter of fact is atteſted by the moſt early, knowing, honeſt and impartial Witneſſes? Laſtly, as in the former caſe, ſeveral of thoſe leſſer Princes might unite themſelves together by joint-conſent for their common intereſt and ſecurity, and become one Kingdom: ſo in the latter caſe; ſeveral Biſhops with the Churches under them, might for promoting the common ends of Chriſtianity, and the Peace and eſtabliſhment of their Churches, join together under the ſame common bonds and become one National Church: which being intended for the good of the whole ſo united, and no ways repugnant to the deſign of the Inſtitution, and not uſurping upon the Rights of others, nor aſſuming more than can be managed, as an univerſal Paſtor muſt do; will appear to be no ways repugnant to any particular command or general Rules of the Goſpel, as the Pope's challenge of univerſal Dominion over the Church is. Which I therefore mention that any one may ſee, that the force of this Reaſoning will never juſtifie the Papal Uſurpations.

But ſaith Dr. O. National Provincial Churches muſt firſt be proved of p. 17. Chriſt's Inſtitution, before they can be allowed to have their power given them by Jeſus Chriſt. And yet in the caſe of Congregational Churches, he ſaith there is no need of any poſitive Rule or direction; for the Nature p. 42. of the thing it ſelf, and the duty of men with reſpect to the end of ſuch Churches, is ſufficient for it. And this is as much as we plead in behalf of National Churches, viz. What the nature of a Chriſtian Society, and the duty of men with reſpect to the end of it doth require. For, whatever tends to the ſupport of Religion, to the preſerving Peace and Unity among Chriſtians, to the preventing dangerous Errors and endleſs confuſions, from the very nature of the thing, and the end of a Chriſtian Society becomes a Duty. For the general Rules of Government lay an obligation upon men to uſe the beſt means for advancing the ends of it. It being then taken for granted among all Chriſtians, 1. That Chriſt is the Author or founder of this Society which we call the Church; 2. That he deſigns the continuance and preſervation of it; 3. That the beſt way of its preſervation is by an Union of the members of it; provided the Union be ſuch as doth not overthrow the ends of it: We may reaſonably infer, that whatever tends to promote this Union, and to prevent any notable inconveniences or miſchiefs which may happen to it, is within the deſign of the firſt Inſtitution; although it be not contained in expreſs words.

Sect. 19. We are now therefore to conſider, whether ſingle Congregations diſperſed and diſunited over a Nation; or a combination of them together under ſome common bonds as to Faith, Government and Worſhip, be the more likely way to promote Religion, to ſecure the Peace and Tranquillity of a Church.

Let us then compare theſe two Hypotheſes together in point of Reaſon, as to theſe ends.

In the Congregational way, there may be as many Religions as Churches. I do not ſay there are, but we are arguing now upon what may be, from the nature of the thing. Suppoſing then every Congregation to have an entire and unaccountable Power within it ſelf; what hinders but of ten Congregations one may be of Socinians, another of Papiſts, another of Arians, another of Quakers, another of Anabaptiſts, &c. and it may be no two of them of the ſame mind. But if they be, it is mere chance and good hap; there being no obligation upon them to have any more than mutual forbearance towards each other. Let now any rational man judge, whether it appear probable, that ſo looſe and ſhatter'd a Government as this is, ſhould anſwer the obligation among Chriſtians, to uſe the beſt and moſt effectual means to preſerve the Faith once delivered to the Saints, and to uphold Peace and Unity among Chriſtians? But ſuppoſing all theſe ſeveral Congregations united together under ſuch common bonds, that the Preacher is accountable to ſuperiors; that none be admitted but ſuch as own the true Faith, and promiſe obedience; that publick legal Cenſures take hold upon the diſturbers of the Church's Peace: here we have a far more effectual means according to Reaſon for upholding true Religion among us. And that this is no mere Theory, appears by the ſad experience of this Nation, when upon the breaking of the bonds of our National Church-Government, there came ſuch an overpowring inundation of Errors and Schiſms among us, that this Age is like to ſmart under the ſad effects of it. And in New-England, two or three men, as Williams, Gorton and Clark diſcovered the apparent weakneſs of the Independant Government: which being very material to this buſineſs, I ſhall give a brief account of it as to one of them. Mr. Roger Williams was the Teacher of a Congregational Church at Salem, and a man in very good eſteem as appears by Mr. Cotton's Letter to him: he was a great admirer of the purity of the New-England Churches; but being a thinking man, he purſued the principles of that way farther than they thought fit, for he thought it unlawful to join with unregenerate men in prayer, or taking an Oath; and that there ought to be an unlimited toleration of Opinions, &c. Theſe Doctrines, and ſome others of his not taking, he proceeded to Separation from them, and gathered a New Church in oppoſition to theirs; this gave ſuch a diſturbance to them, that the Magiſtrates ſent for him, and the Miniſters reaſoned the caſe with him. He told them, he went upon their own grounds, and therefore they had no reaſon to blame him. Mr. Cotton told him they deſerved to be puniſhed who made Separation among them; Mr. Williams replied, this would return upon themſelves; for had not they done the ſame as to the Churches of Old-England? In ſhort,

ſhort, after their debates, and Mr. Williams continuing in his principles of Separation from their Churches a ſentence of baniſhment is decreed againſt him by the Magiſtrates, and this ſentence approved and juſtified by their Churches. For theſe are Mr. Cotton's words, That the increaſe of concourſe of People to him on the Lord's days in private, to a neglect or deſerting of publick Ordinances, and to the ſpreading of the leaven of his corrupt imaginations, provoked the Magiſtrates, rather than to breed a Winter's ſpiritual plague in the Country, to put upon him a Winter's journey out of the Country. This Mr. Williams told them, was falling into the National Church way, which they diſowned; or elſe, ſaith he, why muſt he that is baniſhed from the one, be baniſhed from the other alſo? And he charges them that they have ſuppreſſed Churches ſet up after the Parochial way; and although the Perſons were otherwiſe allowed to be godly, to live in the ſame air with them, if they ſet up any other Church or Worſhip than what themſelves practiſed. Which appears by the Laws of New-England mentioned before: and Mr. Cobbet one of the Teachers of their Churches, confeſſeth that by the Laws of the Country, none are to be free men, but ſuch as are members of Churches. I now appeal to any man, whether theſe proceedings and theſe Laws do not manifeſtly diſcover the apparent weakneſs and inſufficiency of the Congregational way for preventing thoſe diſorders, which they apprehend to be deſtructive to their Churches? why had not Mr. Williams his liberty of Separation as well as they? why are no Anabaptiſts or Quakers permitted among them? Becauſe theſe ways would diſturb their Peace, and diſtract their People, and in time overthrow their Churches. Very well: but where is the entireneſs of the power of every ſingle Congregation, the mean while? Why might not the People at Salem have the ſame liberty as thoſe at Boſton or Plymouth? The plain truth is, they found by experience, this Congregational way would not do alone, without civil Sanctions, and the interpoſing of the Paſtors of other Churches. For when Williams, and Gorton, and Clark had begun to make ſome impreſſions on their People, they beſtirred themſelves as much as poſſible to have their mouths ſtopt, and their perſons baniſhed. This I do only mention, to ſhew, that where this way hath prevailed moſt, they have found it very inſufficient to carry on thoſe ends which themſelves judged neceſſary for the preſervation of their Religion, and of Peace and Unity among themſelves. And in their Synod at Boſton, 1662. the New-England Churches are come to apprehend the neceſſity of Conſociation of Churches, in caſe of diviſions and contentions; and for the rectifying of male-adminiſtrations, and healing of errors and ſcandals, that are unhealed among themſelves: For, Chriſt's care, ſay they, is for whole Churches as well as for particular perſons. Of which Conſociation they tell us, that Mr. Cotton drew a platform before his death. Is ſuch a Conſociation of Churches a Duty or not, in ſuch caſes? If not, why do they do any thing relating to Church Government, for which they have no Command in Scripture? If there be a Command in Scripture, then there is an Inſtitution of a Power above Congregational Churches. It is but a ſlender evaſion, which they uſe, when they call theſe only voluntary Combinations, for what are all Churches elſe? Only, the antecedent obligation on men to join for the Worſhip of God makes entring into other Churches a Duty; and ſo the obligation lying upon Church Officers to uſe the beſt means to prevent or heal diviſions, will make ſuch Conſociations a Duty too. And therefore in ſuch caſes the Nature of the thing requires an union and con-

conjunction ſuperiour to that of Congregational Churches; which is then moſt agreeable to Scripture and Antiquity, when the Biſhops and Preſbyters join together. Who agreeing together upon Articles of Doctrine, and Rules of Worſhip and Diſcipline, are the National Church repreſentative; and theſe being owned and eſtabliſhed by the civil Power, and received by the Body of the Nation, and all perſons obliged to obſerve the ſame in the ſeveral Congregations for Worſhip; theſe Congregations ſo united in theſe common bonds of Religion, make up the complete National Church.

Sect 20. And now I hope I may have leave to conſider Mr. Baxter's ſubtilties about this matter; which being ſpread abroad in abundance of words to the ſame purpoſe, I ſhall reduce to theſe following heads, wherein the main difficulties lie.

1. Concerning the difference between a National Church, and a Chriſtian Kingdom. 2. Concerning the Governing Power of this National Church, which he calls the Conſtitutive Regent part. 3. Concerning the common Ties, or Rules which make this National Church.

1. Concerning the difference between a Chriſtian Kingdom, and a National Church. A Chriſtian Kingdom, he ſaith, they all own, but this is only equivocally called a Church, but, he ſaith, the Chriſtian Biſhops for 1300 years, were far from believing that a Prince, or Civil Power, was eſſential to a Chriſtian Church, or that the Church in the comon ſenſe was not conſtituted of another ſort of regent part that had the Power of the Keys. If there be any ſuch Chriſtians in the world, that hold a Prince an eſſential part of a Chriſtian Church, let Mr. Baxter confute them; but I am none of them, for I do believe there were Chriſtian Churches before Chriſtian Princes, that there are Chriſtian Churches under Chriſtian Princes, and will be ſuch, if there were none left. I do believe the Power of the Keys to be a diſtinct thing, from the Office of the Civil Magiſtrate; and if he had a mind to write againſt ſuch an opinion, he ſhould rather have ſent it to his learned, ſincere, and worthy Friend Lewis du Moulin, if he had been ſtill living. But if I only mean a Chriſtian Kingdom, who denies it? ſaith he, If all this confuſed ſtir be about a Chriſtian Kingdom, be it known to you, that we take ſuch to be of divine Command. Nay farther, if we mean all the Churches of a Kingdom aſſociated for concord as equals, we deny it not. What is it then, that is ſo denied and diſputed againſt, and ſuch a flood of words is poured out about? It ſeems at laſt it is this, that the Nation muſt be one Church as united in one Sacerdotal head, perſonal or collective, Monarchical or Ariſtocratical. Before I anſwer this Queſtion, I hope I may aſk another; whence comes this zeal now againſt a National Church? For, when the Preſbyterians were in power, they were then for National Churches, and thought they proved them out of Scriptures; and none of theſe Subtilties about the Conſtitutive Regent part did ever perplex or trouble them. Thus the Preſbyterian London Miniſters, 1654, made no difficulty of owning National Churches; and particularly the Church of England, in theſe words. And if all the Churches in the world are called one Church; let no man be offended if all the Congregations in England, be called the Church of England. But this you will ſay is by aſſociation of equal Churches. No, they ſay, it is when the particular Congregations of one Nation living under one Civil Government, agreeing in Doctrine and Worſhip, are governed by their greater and leſſer Aſſemblies, and in this ſenſe, ſay they, we aſſert a National Church. Two things, ſaith Mr. Hudſon, are are required to make a National Church, 1. National agreement in the ſame Faith and Worſhip. 2. National union in one Eccleſiaſtical body, in the ſame Community of Eccleſiaſtical Government. The old Non-conformiſts had no ſcruple about owning the Church of England, and thought they underſtood what was meant by it. Whence come all theſe difficulties now to be raiſed about this matter? Is the thing grown ſo much darker than formerly? But ſome mens Underſtandings are confounded with nice diſtinctions, and their Conſciences enſnared by needleſs Scruples.

To give therefore a plain anſwer to the Queſtion, What we mean by the National Church of England. By that is underſtood either, (1.) The Church of England diffuſive. Or, (2.) The Church of England repreſentative.

1. The National Church of England diffuſive, is, the whole Body of Chriſtians in this Nation, conſiſting of Paſtors and People, agreeing in that Faith, Government and Worſhip, which are eſtabliſhed by the Laws of this Realm. And by this deſcription any one may ſee, how eaſily the Church of England is diſtinguiſhed from the Papiſts on one ſide, and the Diſſenters on the other. Which makes me continue my wonder at thoſe who ſo confidently ſay, they cannot tell what we mean by the Church of England. For was there not a Church here ſetled upon the Reformation in the time of Edward 6. and Queen Elizabeth? Hath not the ſame Doctrine, the ſame Government, the ſame manner of Worſhip, continued in this Church? (bating only the interruption given by its Enemies.) How comes it then ſo hard for men to underſtand ſo eaſie, ſo plain, ſo intelligible a thing? If all the Queſtion be, how all the Congregations in England make up this one Church? I ſay, by unity of conſent; as all particular Churches make one Catholick Church. If they aſk, how it comes to be one National Church? I ſay, becauſe it was received by the common conſent of the whole Nation in Parliament, as other Laws of the Nation are; and is univerſally received by all that obey thoſe Laws. And this I think is ſufficient to ſcatter thoſe Miſts which ſome pretend to have before their eyes, that they cannot clearly ſee what we mean by the Church of England.

2. The repreſentative Church of England, is the Biſhops and Presbyters of this Church, meeting together according to the Laws of this Realm, to conſult and adviſe about matters of Religion. And this is determin'd by the allowed Canons of this Church. We do not ſay, that the Convocation at Weſtminſter is the repreſentative Church of England, as the Church of England is a National Church; for that is only repreſentative of this Province, there being another Convocation in the other Province; but the Conſent of both Convocations, is the repreſentative National Church of England. Can. 139.

Sect. 21. And now to anſwer Mr. Baxter's grand difficulty, concerning the Conſtitutive Regent part of this National Church. I ſay, 1. It proceeds upon a falſe ſuppoſition. 2. It is capable of a plain reſolution.

1. That it proceeds upon a falſe ſuppoſition; which is, that where-ever there is the true Notion of a Church, there muſt be a Conſtitutive Regent part, i. e. there muſt be a ſtanding governing Power, which is an eſſential part of it. Which I ſhall prove to be falſe from Mr. Baxter himſelf. He aſſerts, that there is one Catholick viſible Church; and that all particular Churches, which are headed by their particular Biſhops, or Paſtors, are parts of this univerſal Church, as a Troop is of an Army, or a City of a Kingdom.

Chriſtian Directory, Eccl. Caſes, Q. 56. p. 830.
Anſwer to my Sermon, p. 77.

Kingdom. If this Doctrine be true, and withal it be neceſſary that every Church muſt have a Conſtitutive Regent part as eſſential to it, then it unavoidably follows that there muſt be a Catholick viſible Head, to a Catholick viſible Church. And ſo Mr. Baxter's Conſtitutive Regent part of a Church, hath done the Pope a wonderful kindneſs, and made a very plauſible Plea for his Univerſal Paſtorſhip. But there are ſome Men in the World, who do not attend to the advantages they give to Popery; ſo they may vent their ſpleen againſt the Church of England. But doth not Mr. Baxter ſay, that the univerſal Church is headed by Chriſt himſelf? I grant he doth; but this doth not remove the difficulty; for the Queſtion is about that viſible Church whereof particular Churches are parts; and they being viſible parts do require a viſible Conſtitutive Regent part as eſſential to them; therefore the whole viſible Church muſt have likewiſe a viſible Conſtitutive Regent part, i. e. a viſible Head of the Church; as if a Troop hath an inferiour Officer, an Army muſt have a General; if a City hath a Mayor, a Kingdom muſt have a King, that is equally preſent and viſible as the other is. This is indeed to make a Key for Catholicks, by the help of which they may enter and take poſſeſſion.

2. The plain reſolution is, that we deny any neceſſity of any ſuch Conſtitutive Regent part, or one formal Eccleſiaſtical Head as eſſential to a National Church. For a National Conſent is as ſufficient to make a National Church; as an Univerſal Conſent to make a Catholick Church. But if the Queſtion be, by what way this National Conſent is to be declared? then we anſwer farther; that by the Conſtitution of this Church, the Arch-biſhops, Biſhops, and Preſbyters being ſummoned by the King's Writ are to adviſe and declare their Judgments in matters of Religion; which being received, allowed and enacted by the King and three Eſtates of the Kingdom; there is as great a National Conſent as is required to any Law. And all Biſhops, Miniſters, and People, taken together, who profeſs the Faith ſo eſtabliſhed, and worſhip God according to the Rules ſo appointed, make up this National Church of England: which notion of a National Church being thus explained, I ſee no manner of difficulty remaining in all Mr. Baxter's Quaries and Objections about this matter.

Sect. 22. 3. That which looks moſt like a difficulty is (3.) concerning the common ties or Rules which make this National Church. For Mr. B. would know, whether by the common Rules I mean a Divine Rule or a mere human Rule. If it be a Divine Rule, they are of the National Church as well as we; if it be a humane Rule, how comes conſent in this to make a National Church? how come they not to be of it for not conſenting? how can ſuch a conſent appear, when there are differencs among our ſelves? This is the ſubſtance of what he objects. To which I anſwer, (1.) Our Church is founded upon a Divine Rule, viz. the Holy Scriptures, which we own as the Baſis and Foundation of our Faith; and according to which, all other Rules of Order and Worſhip are to be agreeable. (2.) Our Church requires a Conformity to thoſe Rules which are appointed by it, as agreeable to the word of God. And ſo the Churches of New-England do, to the orders of Church Government among themſelves by all that are members of their Churches; and annex civil Privileges to them; and their Magiſtrates impoſe civil Puniſhments on the breakers and diſturbers of them. And although they profeſs agreement in other things, yet becauſe they do not ſubmit to the the Orders of their Churches, they do not own them as members of their Churches. Why ſhould it then be thought unreaſonable with us, not to account thoſe members of the Church of England, who contemn and diſobey the Orders of it? (3.) There is no difference among our ſelves concerning the lawfulneſs of the Orders of our Church, or the duty of ſubmiſſion to them. If there be any other differences, they are not material, as to this buſineſs: And I believe are no other than in the manner of explaining ſome things, which may happen in the beſt Society in the world, without breaking the Peace of it. As about the difference of Orders; the ſenſe of ſome paſſages in the Athanaſian Creed; the true explication of one or two Articles; which are the things he mentions. A multitude of ſuch differences will never overthrow ſuch a Conſent among us, as to make us not to be members of the ſame National Churches.

Sect. 23. Having thus cleared the main difficulties which are objected by my more weighty Adverſaries, the weaker aſſaults of the reſt in what they differ from theſe, will admit of a quicker diſpatch. Mr. A. objects, (1.) That if National Churches have Power to reform themſelves, then ſo have Congregational; and therefore I do amiſs to charge them with Separation. I grant it, if he proves that no Congregational Church hath any more Power over it, than a National Church hath: i. e. that there is as much evidence againſt both Epiſcopal and Preſbyterial Government as there is againſt the Pope's Uſurpations. When he doth prove that, he may have a farther anſwer. (2.) That National Churches deſtroy the being of other Churches under them; this I utterly deny, and there wants nothing but Proof; as Eraſmus ſaid one Andrelinus was a good Poet, only his Verſes wanted one Syllable and that was Nūs. (3.) By my deſcription the Parliament may be a National Church, for they are a Society of Men united together for their Order and Government, according to the Rules of the Chriſtian Religion. But did I not immediately before ſay, that National Churches are National Societies of Chriſtians, under the ſame Laws of Government and Rules of Worſhip? from whence it is plain that in the next words, when I went about to prove National Churches to be true Churches, I uſed ſuch a general deſcription as was common to any kind of Church and not proper to a National Church. (4.) He gives this reaſon why conſent ſhould not make National Churches as well as Congregational; becauſe it muſt be ſuch an agreement as the Goſpel warrants; and that is only for Worſhip, and not to deſtroy their own being. This is the reaſoning of a Horſe in a Mill; ſtill round about the ſame thing. And therefore the ſame anſwer may ſerve. (5.) Out come Mr. B's Objections, againſt a viſible Head of this National Church; and the manner of union, and the differences among our ſelves; as though Mr. B. could not manage his own Arguments, and therefore he takes them and ſtrips them of their heavy and ruſty Armour; and makes them appear again in the field, in another dreſs, and if they could not ſtand the field in the former habit, they can much leſs do it in this.

The Author of the Letter ſaith, I only prove a National Church a poſſible thing. He clearly miſtakes my deſign; which was to ſhew that if there be ſuch a thing as a National Church, then no ſingle Congregations have ſuch a power in themſelves to ſeparate from others in matters of order and decency where there is a conſent in the ſame Faith. To prove that there was ſuch a thing, I ſhewed that if the true Notion of a Church doth agree to it, then upon the ſame reaſon that we own particular Churches, and the Catholick Church, we are to own a National Church; ſo that the deſign of that diſcourſe was not barely to prove the poſſibility of the thing; but the truth and reality of it. But, p. 25. ſaith he, Can it be proved that Chriſt hath inveſted the Guides of this Church, not choſen by the People, with a Power to make Laws and Decrees, preſcribing not only things neceſſary for common order and decency; but new fœderal rites, and teaching ſigns and ſymbols, ſuperadded to the whole Chriſtian Inſtitution? &c. I anſwer, that ſuch a Church hath Power to appoint Rules of Order and Decency not repugnant to the word of God, which on that account others are bound to ſubmit to; and to take ſuch care of its preſervation, as to admit none to its privileges but ſuch as do ſubmit to them; and if any diſturb the Peace of this Church, the Civil Magiſtrate may juſtly inflict civil Penalties upon them for it. All which is no more than any ſettled Church in the world aſſerts, as well as ours. And I wonder this ſhould be ſo continually objected againſt our Church, which all Societies in the world think juſt and neceſſary for their own preſervation. As to the Guides of the Church not being choſen by the People, I ſhall ſpeak to that afterwards. One objection more he makes, which the others did not, viz. I had ſaid that by whole or National Churches, I underſtood the Churches of ſuch Nations which upon decay of the Roman Empire reſumed their juſt right of Governing themſelves, and upon their owning Chriſtianity incorporated into one Chriſtian Society, under the ſame common ties and rules of Order and Government. Such Churches, I ſay, have a juſt right of Reforming themſelves, and therefore are not liable to the imputation of Schiſm from the Roman Church. Would one think what unlucky Inferences he draws from hence? p. 26. (1.) Then all that remain within the Empire, were bound to continue in the Communion of the Roman Church. What, if I ſhould deny the continuance of the Roman Empire? then all would be ſafe. But do I any where ſay, that being in the Empire, they were bound to ſubmit to the Roman Church? No; but as the Nation reſumed its juſt civil Rights, the Church might as rightfully recover it ſelf from Papal Uſurpations; not laying the force of one upon the other, but paralleling them together: And the advantage of the argument is on the Churches ſide. (2.) Then where Princes have not reſumed their juſt rights as to Reformation, they are Schiſmaticks that ſeparate from Rome. Part 2. That doth not follow: for in the caſes before mentioned ſeparation is lawful; but no Reformation is ſo unexceptionable, as when there is a Concurrence of the Civil Power.

Rector of Sutton, &c. p. 27. My laſt Adverſary doth not deny a National Church from conſent in the ſame Articles of Religion, and Rules of Government and Order of Worſhip; but then he ſaith, ſuch ought to be agreeable to the eſtabliſhed Rule of Holy Scriptures. And therein we are all agreed. So that after much tugging, this point is thought fit to be given up.

Sect. 24. The next thing to be conſidered, is, the intereſt and Power of the People as to the choice of their Paſtors; for want of which great complaints are made by my Adverſaries, as a thing injurious to them, and prejudicial to the Church, and that we therein go contrary to all Vindication, &c. p. 36. Antiquity. Dr. O. puts the depriving the People of their liberty of chuſing their Paſtors among the Cauſes of Separation. Mr. Baxter is very Tragical upon this argument; and keeps not within tolerable bounds of diſcretion, in pleading the Peoples Cauſe, againſt Magiſtrates and Anſw. p. 15, 16. Patrons and Laws: And he tells me, I go againſt all the ancient Fa- thers and Churches for many hundred years, and am ſo far a Separatiſt from more than one Pariſh Prieſt; and therefore my charge of them is ſchiſmatical and unjuſt, and recoileth on my ſelf; who inſtead of God's Rule, accuſe them that walk not by our novel crooked Rules; which may make as many modiſh Religions as there are Princes. When I firſt read ſuch paſſages as theſe, I wonder'd what I had ſaid, that might give occaſion to ſo much undecent Paſſion, as every where almoſt diſcovers it ſelf in his Anſwer: And the more I conſider'd the more I wonder'd; but at laſt I reſolved as Mr. A. doth about the Aſſembly, that Mr. B. is but a Man, as other Men are; and for all that I ſee, of equal paſſions, and that upon little or no provocation. For I had not ſaid one word upon this Argument. What then? Would Mr. B. ſeek a Cauſe to expreſs his anger againſt me? as if I had allowed Princes to ſet up what Religions they pleaſe. Surely, he thought himſelf writing againſt Hobbs and Spinoſa then. No: but thus he artificially draws me into this ſnare. I ſpake much againſt Separation. How then? They would never have ſeparated, if they had not been ſilenced; and therefore my being againſt their ſeparation, ſhews I am for their ſilencing. As though theſe neceſſarily followed each other. What is this to Princes impoſing what Religion they pleaſe? Thus. Then Magiſtrates by their Laws may put out Nonconformiſts and put in Conformiſts. But have we not the ſame Religion ſtill? But, ſaith Mr. Baxter, theſe muſt be my ſuppoſed grounds; that Magiſtrates may appoint what Religion they pleaſe, and thoſe are Separatiſts who do not obey them. Is not this admirable ingenuity, to rail upon a Man, for ſuppoſitions of his own making? However Mr. Baxter will have it ſo, let me ſay what I will. The People's part he will take, and let me take that of the Magiſtrates and Laws, if I think good; and ſince they are fallen to my lot, I will defend them as well as I can, as to this matter. Mr. B. appearing very warm in this buſineſs, what doth Mr. A. coming after him, but make it the very firſt and fundamental Ground of their Separation? viz. That every particular Church upon a due balance of all circumſtances, has an inherent right to chuſe its own Paſtor, and every particular Chriſtian the ſame Power to chuſe his own Church. Nay then, I thought, we were in a very fair way of ſettlement; when the Anabaptiſts in Germany never broached a looſer principle than this; nor more contrary to the very poſſibility of having an eſtabliſh'd Church: for it leads to all manner of Schiſms and Factions in ſpight of all Laws and Authority in Church or State. The Author of the Letter goes upon the ſame principle too, and ſaith, The Guides of the Church are to be choſen by the People, according to Scripture and Primitive practice. This I perceive is a popular argument, and a fine device to draw in the common People to the diſſenting Party; whatever becomes of Laws, and Mens juſt and legal Rights of Patronage, all muſt yield to the antecedent Right of the People. But to bring this matter to a ſtrict debate, we muſt conſider theſe three things. 1. What Original, or inherent Right and Power the People had. 2. How they came to be deveſted of it. 3. Whether there be ſufficient ground to reſume it. And from thence we ſhall underſtand, whether ſome of the People's conſenting to hear the Nonconformiſts preach, notwithſtanding the Laws, can excuſe them from Separation? for this lies at the bottom of all.

Miſchief of Impoſitions Preface.

Letter out of the Country, p. 25.

1. As to the Original, inherent Right and Power of the People. Dr. O. ſuppoſeth all Church-Power to be originally in the People; for to manifeſt how favourable wiſe Men have been to the Congregational way, he Vindicat. p. 37. quotes a ſaying of F. Paul; out of a Book of his, lately tranſlated into Engliſh, That in the beginning, the Government of the Church had altogether a Democratical Form; which is an opinion ſo abſurd and unreaſonable, that I could not eaſily believe ſuch a ſaying to have come from ſo learned and judicious a Perſon. For was there not a Church to be formed in the beginning? Did not Chriſt appoint Apoſtles and give them Commiſſion and Authority for that end? Where was the Church-power then lodged? Was it not in the Apoſtles? Did not they in all places, as they planted Churches, appoint Officers to teach and govern them? And did they not give them Authority to do what they had appointed? Were not then the ſeveral Paſtors and Teachers inveſted with a Power ſuperior to that of the People and independent upon them? And if they had ſuch Power and Authority over the People, how came their Power to be derived from them, as it muſt be, if the Church Government then were Democratical? Beſides, Is it reaſonable to ſuppoſe the People ſhould aſſemble to chuſe their Officers, and convey the Power of the Keys to them; which never were in their hands? And how could they make choice of Men for their fitneſs and abilities, when their abilities depended ſo much on the Apoſtles laying on of their hands? For then the Holy Ghoſt was given unto them. But in all the Churches planted by the Apoſtles, in all the directions given about the choice of Biſhops and Deacons, no more is required, as to the People, than barely their Teſtimony; therefore it is ſaid they muſt be blameleſs and Men of good report.

1 Tim. 3. 2, But, where is it ſaid or intimated that the Congregation being the firſt
7, 10. ſubject of the Power of the Keys, muſt meet together, and chuſe their Paſtor, and then convey the Miniſterial Power over themſelves, to them? If it were true that the Church Government at firſt was Democratical, the Apoſtles have done the People a mighty injury; for they have ſaid no more of their Power in the Church, than they have done of the Pope's. It is true the Brethren were preſent at the nomination of Act. 1. 14. a new Apoſtle: But were not the Women ſo too? And is the Power of the Keys in their hands too? Suppoſe not, Doth this prove that the Church's Power was then Democratical? then the People made an Apoſtle and gave him his Power; which I do not think any Man would ſay, much leſs F. Paul. As to the election of Deacons; it was no properly Church Power which they had; but they were Stewards of the common Stock; and was there not then, all the reaſon in the world, the Community
Act. 6. 3, 5. ſhould be ſatisfied in the choice of the Men? When Saint Peter received Cornelius to the Faith, he gave an account of it to all the Church. And what then? Muſt he therefore derive his power from it?
Do not Princes and Governours give an account of their proceedings for the ſatisfaction of their Subjects Minds? But here is not all the 11. 3. Church mentioned; only thoſe of the Circumciſion at Jeruſalem had a mind to underſtand the reaſon of his receiving a Gentile Convert. And what is this to the power of the Church? But in the Council of Jeruſalem the People did intervene, and the Letters were written in the names of all the three Orders, Apoſtles, Prieſts and faithful Brethren. I grant it; but is it not expreſly ſaid, that the Queſtion was ſent up from 15. 2. the Churches, to the Apoſtles and Preſbyters? Is it not ſaid, that the Apoſtles and Preſbyters met to debate it; and that the multitude was
6. 12. ſilent? Is it not ſaid, that the Decrees were paſſed by the Apoſtles and
16. 4. Preſbyters, without any mention of the People? And here was the proper

proper occaſion to have declared their Power; but in the other place, it ſignifies no more than their general conſent to the Decrees that were then made. In ſucceſs of time, it is added, when the Church increaſed in number, the faithful retiring themſelves to the affairs of their Families, and having left thoſe of the Congregation, the Government was retained only in the Miniſters, and ſo became Ariſtocratical, ſaving the election which was Popular. Which account is neither agreeable to Reaſon, nor to Antiquity. For, was not the Government of the Church Ariſtocratical in the Apoſtles times? How came it to be changed, from that to a Democratical Form? Did not the Apoſtles appoint Rulers in the ſeveral Churches, and charged the People to obey them? And was this an argument the Power was then in the People? It was not then the Peoples withdrawing (of which there can be no evidence, if there be ſo much evidence ſtill left for the Peoples Power, in Antiquity) but the Conſtitution of the Church was Ariſtocratical by the appointment of the Apoſtles.

Sect. 25. We therefore come now to conſider the Popular Elections, as to which there is ſo fair a pretence from Antiquity; but yet not ſuch, as to fix any inherent, or unalterable Right in the People. As I ſhall make appear, by theſe following Obſervations.

1. That the main ground of the Peoples Intereſt was founded upon the Apoſtles Canon, That a Biſhop muſt be blameleſs and of good report. 1 Tim. 3. 2, 7.

2. That the People upon this aſſuming the Power of Elections, cauſed great diſturbances and diſorders in the Church.

3. That to prevent theſe, many Biſhops were appointed without their choice, and Canons made for the better regulating of them.

4. That when there were Chriſtian Magiſtrates, they did interpoſe as they thought fit, notwithſtanding the popular claim; in a matter of ſo great conſequence to the Peace of Church and State.

5. That upon the alteration of the Government of Chriſtendom the Intereſt of the People was ſecured by their conſent in Parliaments, and that by ſuch conſent the Nomination of Biſhops was reſerved to Princes, and the Patronage of Livings to particular Perſons.

6. That things being thus ſettled by eſtabliſhed Laws, there is no reaſonable Ground for the Peoples reſuming the Power of electing their own Biſhops and Miniſters in oppoſition to theſe Laws.

If I can make good theſe Obſervations, I ſhall give a full anſwer to all the Queſtions propounded, concerning the Right and Power of the People, which my Adverſaries build ſo much upon.

(1.) That the main ground of the Peoples intereſt was founded upon the Apoſtles Canon, that a Biſhop muſt be blameleſs, and of good report. For ſo the Greek Scholiaſt argues from that place in Timothy, If a Biſhop ought to have a good report of them that are without, πολλῷ μᾶλλον ἀπὸ τῶν ἀδελφῶν, How much rather of the Brethren, πολλῷ μᾶλλον τῶν ἀπὸ τῶν φίλων, ſaith Theophylact. And both have it from Saint Chryſoſtom. So it is ſaid concerning Timothy himſelf, Ὃς ἐμαρτυρεῖτο ὑπὸ τῶν ἐν Λύστροις καὶ Ἰκονίῳ ἀδελφῶν, Who had a good Teſtimony from the Brethren in Lyſtra and Iconium. Act. 16. 2. And this is mentioned before Saint Paul's taking him into the Office of an Evangeliſt. So in the choice of the Deacons, the Apoſtles bid them find out, ἄνδρας ἐξ ὑμῶν Act. 6. 3.

μαρτυρουμένους, Men of good reputation among them. And there is a very conſiderable Teſtimony in the Epiſtle of Clemens to this purpoſe; where he gives an account, how the Apoſtles preaching through Cities and Countries, did appoint their Firſt-fruits, having made a ſpiritual trial of them, to be Biſhops and Deacons of thoſe who were to believe. Here it is plain, that they were of the Apoſtles appointment, and not of the Peoples choice; and that their Authority could not be from them, whom they were appointed firſt to convert and then to govern; and although their number was but ſmall at firſt, yet as they increaſed, though into many Congregations, they were ſtill to be under the Government of thoſe, whom the Apoſtles appointed over them. And then he ſhews how thoſe who had received this Power from God came to appoint others: And he brings the Inſtance of Moſes, when there was an emulation among the Tribes, what method he took for putting an end to it, by the bloſſoming of Aaron's Rod; which, ſaith he, Moſes did on purpoſe to prevent confuſion in Iſrael, and thereby to bring Glory to God; now, ſaith he, the Apoſtles foreſaw the Contentions that would be about the name of Epiſcopacy (ἐπὶ τοῦ ὀνόματος τῆς Ἐπισκοπῆς) i. e. about the choice of Men into that Office of Ruling the Church; which the ſenſe ſhews to be his meaning: Therefore foreſeeing theſe things perfectly, they appointed the perſons before mentioned, and left the diſtribution of their Offices, with this inſtruction, that as ſome died, other approved Men ſhould be choſen into their Office. Thoſe therefore who were appointed by them, or other eminent Men, the whole Church being therewith well-pleaſed, diſcharging their Office with humility, quietneſs, readineſs, and unblameableneſs, being Men of a long time of good report, we think ſuch Men cannot juſtly be caſt out of their Office. It ſeems, ſome of the Church of Corinth were at that time factious againſt ſome Officers in their Church, and endeavoured to throw them out for the ſake of one or two more, and made ſuch a diſturbance thereby as had brought a great ſcandal, not only on themſelves, but the Chriſtian Church; which made Clemens write this Epiſtle to them; wherein he adviſeth thoſe buſie Men rather to leave the Church themſelves, than to continue making ſuch a diſturbance in it; and if they were good Chriſtians they would do ſo; and bring more glory to God by it, than by all their heat and contentions. Now by this diſcourſe of Clemens it is plain, (1.) That theſe Officers of the Church were not choſen by the People, but appointed by the Apoſtles, or other great Men, according to their Order? (2.) That they took this courſe on purpoſe to prevent the contentions that might happen in the Church, about thoſe who ſhould bear Office in it. (3.) That all that the People had to do, was to give Teſtimony, or to expreſs their approbation of thoſe, who were ſo appointed. For he could not allow their power of chuſing, ſince he ſaith, the Apoſtles appointed Officers on purpoſe to prevent the contentions that might happen about it. And it ſeems very probable to me, that this was one great reaſon of the faction among them, viz. that thoſe few Popular Men in that Church, who cauſed all the diſturbance, repreſented this, as a great grievance to them; that their Paſtors and Officers were appointed by others, and not choſen by themſelves. For they had no objection againſt the Preſbyters themſelves, being allowed to be Men of unblameable lives; yet a contention there was, and that about caſting them out; and ſuch a contention, as the Apoſtles deſigned to prevent by appointing a ſucceſſion from ſuch whom themſelves ordained; and therefore it is very likely, they challenged this power to themſelves to caſt out thoſe whom they had not choſen. But it ſeems, the Apoſtles knowing what contentions would follow in the Church, took care to prevent them, leaving to the People their Teſtimony concerning thoſe whom they ordained. And this is plain, even from Saint Cyprian where he diſcourſeth of this matter, in that very Epiſtle concerning Baſilides and Martialis, to which Mr. Baxter refers me. For, the force of what Saint Cyprian ſaith comes at laſt only to this giving Teſtimony; therefore, ſaith he, God appointed the Prieſt to be appointed before all the People, thereby ſhewing that Ordinations in the Chriſtian Church ought to be ſub Populi Aſſiſtentis Conſcientiâ, in the Preſence of the People: For what reaſon? That they might give them Power? No; that was never done under the Law; nor then imagined, when S. Cyprian wrote; but he gives the account of it himſelf; that by their preſence, either their faults might be publiſhed, or their good acts commended; that ſo it may appear to be a juſt and lawful Ordination, which hath been examined by the ſuffrages and judgment of all. The People here had a ſhare in the Election, but it was in matter of Teſtimony concerning the good or ill behaviour of the Perſon. And, therefore, he ſaith, it was almoſt a general Cuſtom among them, and he thinks came down from Divine Tradition and Apoſtolical Practice, that when any People wanted a Biſhop, the neighbour Biſhops met together in that place, and the new Biſhop was choſen, plebe præſente, the People being preſent, (not by the Votes of the People) quæ ſingulorum vitam pleniſſimè novit, which beſt underſtands every Man's Converſation: And this, he ſaith, was obſerved in the Conſecration of their Fellow-biſhop Sabinus, who was put into the place of Baſilides. Where he doth expreſs the Conſent of the People, but he requires the Judgment of the Biſhops; which being thus performed, he incourages the People to withdraw from Baſilides and to adhere to Sabinus. For, Baſilides having fallen foully into Idolatry, and joined blaſphemy with it, had of his own accord laid down his Biſhoprick, and deſired only to be received to Lay-Communion, upon this Sabinus was conſecrated Biſhop in his room; after which Baſilides goes to Rome and there engages the Biſhop to interpoſe in his behalf, that he might be reſtored; Sabinus finding this, makes his application to Saint Cyprian and the African Biſhops, who write this Epiſtle to the People to withdraw from Baſilides, ſaying that it belonged chiefly to them to chuſe the good and to refuſe the bad. Which is the ſtrongeſt Teſtimony in Antiquity for the People's Power; and yet here we are to conſider, (1.) It was in a caſe where a Biſhop had voluntarily reſigned. (2.) Another Biſhop was put into his room, not by the Power of the People, but by the Judgment and Ordination of the neighbour Biſhops. (3.) They had the judgment of a whole Council of African Biſhops for their deſerting him. (4.) For a notorious matter of fact, viz. Idolatry and Blaſphemy by his own confeſſion. (5.) All the proof which Saint Cyprian brings for this, doth amount to no more, than that the People were moſt concerned to give Teſtimony, as to the good or bad lives of their Biſhops. This farther appears by the words in Lampridius concerning Alexander Severus, who propoſed the names of his civil Officers to the People, to hear what they had to object againſt them, and ſaid it was a hard caſe, when the Chriſtians and Jews did ſo about their Prieſts, the ſame ſhould not be done about Governours of Provinces, who had Mens lives and fortunes in their hands. But no Man could ever from hence imagin, that the People had the Power to make or unmake the Governors of Roman Provinces. Origen ſaith, The Peoples preſence was neceſſary at the Conſecration of a Biſhop, that they might all know the worth of him who was made their Biſhop; it muſt be aſtante Populo, the People ſtanding by; and this is that Saint Paul meant, when he ſaid, A Biſhop ought to have a good Teſtimony from thoſe that are without.

(2.) That the People upon this aſſuming the Power of Elections cauſed great diſturbances and diſorders in the Church. Euſebius repreſents the diſorders of Antioch to have been ſo great in the City upon the choice of a new Biſhop, by the Diviſions of the People, that they were like to have ſhaken the Emperor's Kindneſs to the Chriſtians. For, ſuch a flame was kindled by it, that he ſaith, it was near deſtroying both the Church and the City: and they had certainly drawn Swords, if the Providence of God, and fear of the Emperour had not reſtrained them. Who was forced to ſend Officers and Meſſages to keep them quiet: and after much trouble to the Emperour and many meetings of Biſhops, at laſt Euſtathius was choſen. Greg. Nazianzen ſets forth the mighty unrulineſs of the People of Cæſarea in the choice of their Biſhop, ſaying it came to a dangerous ſedition, and not eaſy to be ſuppreſſed: and he ſaith, the City was very prone to it, on ſuch occaſions. And although there was one Perſon of incomparable worth above the reſt, yet through the Parties and Factions that were made, it was a hard matter to carry it for him. He complains ſo much of the inconveniencies of popular Elections, that he wiſhes them alter'd; and the Elections brought to the Clergy; and he thinks no Common wealth ſo diſorderly as this method of Election was. Evagrius ſaith, the ſedition at Alexandria was intolerable, upon the diviſion of the People between Dioſcorus and Proterius; the People riſing againſt the Magiſtrates and Soldiers who endeavoured to keep them in order: and at laſt they murthered Proterius. Such dangerous Seditions are deſcribed at Conſtantinople, upon the Election of Paulus and Macedonius, by Sozomen; and in the ſame place after the death of Eudoxius, and after the death of Atticus by Socrates; and after the deprivation of Neſtorius. And again at Antioch upon the removal of Eudoxius; and about the Election of Flavianus; at Epheſus by Saint Chryſoſtom, at Verſelles by Saint Ambroſe; at Milan by Socrates, and many other places. I ſhall only add a remarkable one at Rome on the choice of Damaſus: which came to bloodſhed for ſeveral days; and is particularly related by Ammianus Marcellinus; and the Preface to Fauſtinus his Libellus Precum. Mr. Baxter grants there are inconveniencies in the Peoples conſenting Power, and ſo there are in all humane affairs. But are theſe tolerable inconveniencies? Is this Power ſtill to be pleaded for, in oppoſition to Laws, as though Religion lay at ſtake; and only Magiſtrates were bad men, and the People always good and wiſe and vertuous? A man muſt have great ſpite againſt Men in Power, and unreaſonable fondneſs of the Common People that can repreſent great Men as wicked, debauched, and enemies to Piety, and at the ſame time diſſemble, and take no notice of the Vices of the Common People; beſides their Ignorance and incapacity of judging in ſuch matters, and their great proneneſs to fall into ſidings and parties and unreaſonable contentions on ſuch occaſions. But Saint Chryſoſtom complains much of the unfitneſs of the People to judge in ſuch caſes. Saint Hierom ſaith, they are apt to chooſe men like themſelves: and ſaith elſewhere, they are much to be feared whom the People chooſe. Origen ſaith, the People are often moved either for favour or reward.

(3.) That to prevent theſe Inconveniencies many Biſhops were appointed without the choice of the People, and Canons were made for the regulation of Elections. In the Church of Alexandria the Election of the Biſhop belonged to the 12 Preſbyters, as Saint Jerome and others ſhew. For by the Conſtitution of that Church, before the alteration made by Alexander, the Biſhop of Alexandria was not only to be choſen out of the twelve Preſbyters, but by them. So Severus, in the Life of the Alexandrian Patriarchs, ſaith, that after the death of their Patriarch. the Preſbyters met together and prayed, and proceeded to election; and the firſt Preſbyter declared it belonged to them to chuſe their Biſhop, and to the other Biſhops to conſecrate him. To which the Biſhops aſſented, only ſaying, if he were worthy they would conſecrate whom they choſe, but not otherwiſe. Elmacinus makes this a Conſtitution of Saint Mark in the firſt foundation of that Church; and ſaith, it continued to the time of the Nicene Council; and then, as Hilarius the Deacon ſaith, the cuſtom was alter'd, by a Council among themſelves, which determin'd that they might chuſe the moſt deſerving perſon, whether of that Body or not. And there could be no room for popular Elections, where-ever that Cuſtom obtained, which the counterfeit Ambroſe ſpeaks of, ut recedente uno ſequens ei ſuccederet; ſpeaking of the Biſhop dying, and the next in courſe ſucceeding. But if this be only a particular conceit of that Author, yet we find the Biſhops conſecrating others in ſeveral Churches, without any mention of choice made by the People. So, when Narciſſus retired from Jeruſalem, Euſebius ſaith, the neighbour Biſhops aſſembled, and conſecrated one Dius in his room, and after him followed Germanio, and then Gordius, in whoſe time Narciſſus returned; but being grown very old, Alexander was brought in to aſſiſt him, by Revelation, and a Voice from Heaven to ſome of the Brethren. Severus, Biſhop of Melevis, in his life-time appointed his Succeſſor, and acquainted the Clergy with it, but not the People; great diſturbance was feared hereupon; the Clergy ſent to Saint Auguſtin to come among them, and to ſettle their new Biſhop, who went, and the People received the Biſhop ſo appointed very quietly. St. Auguſtin himſelf declares, the ſad effects he had often ſeen of the Church's election of Biſhops, through the ambition of ſome, and the contention of others, and therefore he deſired to prevent any ſuch diſturbance in his City, when he was dead. And for that reaſon, he acquainted the People that he deſigned Eradius, or as ſome Copies have it, Eraclius for his Succeſſor. So Paulus the Novatian Biſhop at Conſtantinople, appointed his Succeſſor Marcianus to prevent the contentions that might happen after his death; and got his Preſbyters to conſent to it.

The Greek Canoniſts are of opinion, that the Council of Nice took away all power of election of Biſhops from the People, and gave it to the Biſhop of the Province. And it is apparent from the Council of Antioch, that Biſhops were ſometimes conſecrated in the Eaſt, without the conſent of the People; for it doth ſuppoſe a Biſhop after conſecration may not be received by his People, which were a vain ſuppoſition, if their election neceſſarily went before it. And withal, it puts the caſe of a Biſhop that refuſed to go to his People after Conſecration; which ſhews, that the conſecration was not then performed in his own Church. Gregory ſubſcribed at Antioch, as Biſhop of Alexandria, before ever he went thither. So Saint Baſil mentions his conſecration of Euphronius to be Biſhop of Nicopolis, without any conſent of the People before; it being then performed by the Metropolitan in his own See; but he perſuades the Senate and People to accept of him. If the People did agree upon a Perſon to be Biſhop, their way then was, to petition the Metropolitan and his Synod, who had the full Power either to allow or to refuſe him. And it is evident from the twelfth Canon of the Council of Laodicea, that although all the People choſe a Biſhop, if he intruded himſelf into the poſſeſſion of his See, without the conſent of a Provincial Synod, he was to be turned out or rejected by them. Which ſhews how much the buſineſs of Elections was brought into the Biſhop's Power in the Eaſtern parts. And by virtue of this Canon, Baſſianus and Stephanus were rejected in the Council of Chalcedon. By the Law of Juſtinian, the common People were excluded from Elections of Biſhops; and the Clergy, and better ſort of Citizens, were to nominate three to the Metropolitan, out of which he was to chuſe one. By the Canon of Laodicea, the common People were excluded the power of chuſing any into the Clergy: For they were wont to raiſe tumults upon ſuch occaſions; ſuch as St. Auguſtine deſcribes in the caſe of Pinianus; but ſome of the Greek and Latin Canoniſts enlarge the ſenſe of the Laodicean Canon to the election of Biſhops too. The ſecond Council of Nice reſtrained the election only to Biſhops, which was confirmed by following Councils in the Greek Church, as Can. 28. Concil. Conſtantinopol. againſt Photius; and the People are there excluded with an Anathema. So far were popular Elections grown out of requeſt in the Eaſtern Church.

(4.) That when there were Chriſtian Magiſtrates, they did interpoſe in this matter as they judged expedient. So Conſtantine did in the Church of Antioch, when there was great diſſention there, upon the depoſition of Euſtathius, he recommended to the Synod Euphronius of Cappadocia, and Georgius of Arethuſa, or whom they ſhould judge fit, without taking any notice of the intereſt of the People: and they accordingly conſecrated Euphronius. After the death of Alexander, Biſhop of Conſtantinople, the People fell into Parties, ſome were for Paulus, and others for Macedonius; the Emperour Conſtantius coming thither puts them both by, and appoints Euſebius of Nicomedia to be Biſhop there. Euſebius being dead, the Orthodox Party again chuſe Paulus; Conſtantius ſends Hermogenes to drive him out by force, and was very angry with Macedonius for being made Biſhop without his leave, although afterwards he placed him in his throne. When Athanaſius was reſtored, Conſtantius declared, it was by the decree of the Synod, and by his conſent. And he by his Authority reſtored likewiſe Paulus and Marcellus, Aſclepas and Lucius to their ſeveral Sees. When Gregory Nazianzen reſigned the Biſhoprick of Conſtantinople, Theodoſius commended to the Biſhops the care of finding out a Perſon, who recommending many to him, the Emperor himſelf pitched upon Nectarius, and would have him made Biſhop, tho' many of the Biſhops oppoſed it. When Chryſoſtom was choſen at Conſtantinople, the Royal Aſſent was given by Arcadius, the election being made, ſaith Sozomen, by the People and Clergy; but Palladius gives a more particular account of it, viz. That upon the death of Nectarius many Competitors appeared, ſome making their application to the Court, and others to the People, in ſo much that the People began to be tumultuous, (κλονεῖται, ſaith Palladius) upon which they importuned the Emperor to provide a fit man for them. Eutropius being then chief Miniſter of State, recommended Chryſoſtom to the Emperor, and immediately an Expreſs was ſent to the Comes Orientis, that he ſhould with all privacy, for fear of a tumult at Antioch, ſend him away to Conſtantinople: whither being brought, he was ſoon after conſecrated Biſhop. So that here was no antecedent election of the People, as Sozomen ſaith, but whatever there was, was ſubſequent to the Emperor's determination. After the death of Siſinnius, the Emperor declared, That to prevent diſturbance, they would have none of the Clergy of Conſtantinople choſen Biſhop there; and ſo Neſtorius was brought from Antioch. Maximianus being dead, he gave order that Proclus ſhould be made Biſhop, before the other's body was buried. Theſe Inſtances are ſufficient to ſhew, that Chriſtian Princes did from the firſt think fit, when juſt occaſion was given, to make uſe of their Authority in this matter.

(5.) Upon the alteration of the Government of Chriſtendom there was greater reaſon for the Magiſtrate's interpoſing than before. For upon the endowment of Churches by the great liberality of the Northern Princes, it was thought at firſt very reaſonable, that the Royal Aſſent ſhould be obtained, though a Biſhop was choſen by the Clergy and People: which at firſt depended only on tacit conſent; but after the ſolemn Aſſemblies of the People came to be much uſed, theſe Privileges of Princes came not only to be confirmed by the Conſent of the People, but to be enlarged. For, the Princes obtained by degrees not only the Confirmation of the elected, but the liberty of nomination; with a ſhadow of election by the Clergy, and others of the Court, as appears by the Formulæ of Marculphus. This way was not always obſerved in France, where frequently, according to the Edict of Clotharius, the Clergy and People choſe, the Metropolitan conſecrated, and the Prince gave his Royal Aſſent: but in doubtful or difficult caſes, he made uſe of his Prerogative, and nominated the Perſon, and appointed the Conſecration. Afterwards, there aroſe great conteſts between the Papal and Royal Power, which continued for ſeveral Ages, and at laſt among us, the Royal Power overthrowing the other, reſerved the Power of Nomination of Biſhops, as part of the Prerogative; which being allowed in frequent Parliaments, the Conſent of the People is ſwallowed up therein; ſince their Acts do oblige the whole Nation. For not only the Statute of 1 Ed. 6. declares, The Right of appointing Biſhops to be in the King; but 25 Ed. 3. it is likewiſe declared, That the Right of diſpoſing Biſhopricks was in the King by Right of Patronage, derived from his Anceſtors before the freedom of elections was granted. Which ſhews not only the great Antiquity of this Right, but the Conſent of the whole Nation to it. And the ſame is fully related in the Epiſtle of Ed. 3. to Clement 5. where it is ſaid, That the King did diſpoſe of them, jure ſuo Regio, by his Royal Prerogative, as his Anceſtors had done from the firſt founding of a Chriſtian Church here. This is likewiſe owned in the famous Statute of Carliſle, 25 Ed. 1. ſo that there is no Kingdom where this Right hath been more fully acknowledged by the general conſent of the People, than here in England; and that from the original planting of a Chriſtian Church here. As to the inferior Right of Patronage, it is juſtly thought to bear equal date with the firſt ſettlements of Chriſtianity in peace and quietneſs. For when it began to ſpread into remoter Villages and places diſtant from the Cathedral Churches, where the Biſhop reſided with his Preſbyters, as in a College together; a neceſſity was ſoon apprehended of having Preſbyters fixed among them. For the Council of Neocæſarea mentions the ἐπιχώριοι πρεσβύτεροι, the Country Preſbyters, c. 13. whom the Greek Canoniſts interpret to be ſuch as then were fixed in Country-Cures, and this Council was held ten years before the Council of Nice. D.* 650. and many Canons were made in ſeveral Councils about regulating the Rights of Patronage, and the Endowments of Churches, till at laſt it obtained by general Conſent, that the Patron might tranſmit the Right of Preſentation to his Heirs, and the Biſhops were to approve of the Perſons preſented, and to give Inſtitution to the Benefice. The Barons of England, in the Epiſtle to Gregory IX. plead, That their Anceſtors had the Right of Patronage, from the firſt planting of Chriſtianity here. For thoſe upon whoſe Lands the Churches were built, and at whoſe coſt and charges they were erected, and by whom the Parochial Churches were endowed, thought they had great Reaſon to reſerve the Nomination of the Clerks to themſelves. And this Joh. Sariſburienſis ſaith, was received by a general cuſtom of this whole Kingdom. So that the Right of Patronage was at firſt built upon a very reaſonable conſideration; and hath been ever ſince received by as univerſal a Conſent as any Law or Cuſtom among us. And the only Queſtions now remaining are, whether ſuch a Conſent can be made void by the Diſſent of ſome few Perſons, who plead it to be their inherent Right to chuſe their own Paſtors? and ſuppoſing, that it might be done, whether it be reaſonable ſo to do? And I conclude, that,

6. Things being thus ſetled by general Conſent, and eſtabliſh'd Laws, there is no ground for the People to reſume the liberty of Elections: (1.) Becauſe it was no unalterable Right, but might be paſſed away; and hath been by Conſent of the People, upon good conſiderations: And, (2.) Becauſe no ſuch inconveniencies can be alleged againſt the ſetled way of diſpoſal of Livings, but may be remedied by Laws; far eaſier, than thoſe which will follow upon the Peoples taking this Power to themſelves, which cannot be done in a divided Nation, without throwing all into remedileſs confuſion. (3.) Becauſe other reformed Churches have thought this an unreaſonable pretence. Beza declaims againſt it, as a thing without any ground in Scripture, or any right in Antiquity, and ſubject to infinite diſorders. In Sweden the Archbiſhop and Biſhops are appointed by the King; and ſo are the Biſhops in Denmark: In other Lutheran Churches, the Superintendents are appointed by the ſeveral Princes and Magiſtrates; and in theſe the Patrons preſent before Ordination. The Synod of Dort hath a Salvo for the Right of Patronage, Can. Eccleſ. 5. In France the Miniſters are choſen by Miniſters; at Geneva by the Council of State, which hath Power to depoſe them. And it would be very ſtrange, if this inherent and unalterable Right of the People ſhould only be diſcovered here, where it is as unfit to be practiſed, as in any part of the Chriſtian world.

Ritterſhuſ. ad Novell. p. 1. c. 7. n. 36, 37.

But Mr. B. is unſatisfied with any Laws that are made in this matter; for when the objection is put by him, That the People chuſe the Parliament who make the Laws which give the Patrons Power, and therefore they now conſent; he ſaith, this ſeemeth a Jeſt; for, he ſaith,

1. It cannot be proved that all the Churches or People gave the Patrons that Power. 2. They never conſented that Parliaments ſhould do what they liſt, and diſpoſe of their Souls, or what is neceſſary to the ſaving of their Souls. 3. They may as well ſay, that they conſent to be baptized, and to receive the Sacraments, becauſe the Parliament conſented to it. 4. Their Forefathers had no power to repreſent them by ſuch conſenting. 5. The obligation on the People was Perſonal, and they have not God's conſent for the tranſmutation.

So that one would think by Mr. B.'s Doctrine, all Laws about Patronage are void in themſelves; and all Rights of Advowſon in the King, or Noblemen and Gentlemen, or Univerſities, are mere Uſurpations, and things utterly unlawful among Chriſtians, ſince he makes ſuch a perſonal obligation to chuſe their own Paſtors to lie on the People, that they cannot transfer it by their own Act. But upon ſecond Thoughts, I ſuppoſe, he will not deny, that the freedom of publick Churches, and the Endowments of them, do lie within the Magiſtrate's Power, and ſo binding Laws may be made about them; unleſs he can prove that the Magiſtrate's Power doth not extend to thoſe things which the Magiſtrate gives. And if theſe may be juſtly ſetled by Laws, then the Rights of Patronage are as juſt and legal Rights as Men have to their Eſtates, and conſequently every Miniſter duly preſented, hath a legal Title to the Temple and Tythes, as Mr. B. calls them. But this doth not, ſaith he, make a Miniſter for their Souls, and the Parliament cannot diſpoſe of their Souls. The meaning of all which is, if the People be humourſome and factious, they may run after whom they pleaſe, and ſet up what Miniſter they pleaſe, in oppoſition to Laws. And ſo for inſtance, ſuppoſe a Pariſh be divided in their Opinions about Religion, (as we know too many are at this day) all theſe ſeveral parties, viz. Anabaptiſts, Quakers, yea and Papiſts too, as well as others, will put in for an equal ſhare in what concerns the care of their Souls, and conſequently, may chuſe a ſeveral Paſtor to themſelves, and leave the Incumbent the bare poſſeſſion of the Temple and Tythes. But if there be no other objection, this may be thought ſufficient, that he was none of their chuſing, being impoſed upon them by others, who could not diſpoſe of their Souls. By which means, this pretence of taking care for their Souls, will be ſoon made uſe of to juſtifie the greateſt diſorder and confuſion, which can happen in a Church. For, let the Perſon be never ſo worthy in himſelf, the People are ſtill to have their liberty of chuſing for themſelves. And who are theſe People? Muſt all have equal Votes? then according to Mr. B.'s opinion of our Churches, the worſt will be ſooneſt choſen; for why ſhould we not think the worſt People will chuſe their like, as well as the worſt Patrons, and the worſt Biſhops? But if the profane muſt be excluded, by what Law? Is it becauſe they have no right to the Ordinances? But have they no right to their own Souls, and to the care of them? therefore they are equally concerned with others. Yea let us ſuppoſe all theſe excluded, as no competent Judges; ſhall all the reſt be excluded too, who are incompetent Judges? then I am afraid there will not be many left. And, whatever they pretend, the People where they do chuſe, do truſt other mens Judgments, as well as where the Patrons preſent; and to prevent popular tumults, ſuch Elections are generally brought by a kind of devolution to a few Perſons who are entruſted to chuſe for the reſt. But if all the People were left to chuſe their own Paſtors, it is not to be imagined, what Parties and Factions; what mutual tual Hatreds, and perpetual Animoſities, they would naturally fall into on ſuch occaſions. Do we not daily ſee ſuch things to be the fruits of popular Elections, where men are concerned for the ſtrength and reputation of their Party? What envying and ſtrife, what evil-ſpeaking and backbiting; what tumults and diſorders; what unchriſtian behaviour in general, of men to each other, do commonly accomany ſuch Elections? Which being the natural effects of mens paſſions, ſtirred up by ſuch occaſions, and there being ſo much experience of it in all Ages of the Chriſtian Church, where ſuch things have been; I am as certain, that Chriſt never gave the People ſuch an unalterable Right of chuſing their own Miniſters, as I am that he deſigned to have the peace and unity of the Church preſerved. And of all Perſons, I do the moſt wonder at him, who pretends to diſcover the Only way of unity and concord among Chriſtians, that he ſhould ſo much, ſo frequently, ſo earneſtly inſiſt upon this; which if it be not the only, is one of the moſt effectual ways to perpetuate diſorder and confuſion in a broken and divided Church. And ſo much for the Plea for Separation, taken from the Peoples Right to chuſe their own Miniſters.

Sect. 26. Having thus diſpatched all the Pleas for Separation, which relate to the Conſtitution of our Church, I come to thoſe which concern the Terms of Communion with us, which are ſaid to be unlawful.

Dr. Falkner's Vindication of Liturgies, 1680.

One of the chief Pleas alleged for Separation, by Dr. O. and Mr. A. is, that many things in the conſtant total Communion of Parochial Churches are impoſed on the Conſciences and Practices of men, which are not according to the mind of Chriſt. Theſe are very general words; but Dr. O. reckons up the particulars, which (ſetting aſide thoſe already conſidered) are, the uſe of the Aëreal ſign of the Croſs, kneeling at the Communion, the religious obſervation of Holy-days, and the conſtant uſe of the Liturgy in all the publick Offices of the Church. As to this laſt I ſhall ſay nothing, it being lately ſo very well defended by a learned Divine of our Church. To the other, Mr. B. adds, the uſe of Godfathers and Godmothers; and now I am to examine what weight there is in theſe things, to make men ſeriouſly think Communion with our Church unlawful.

When I found our Church thus charged with preſcribing unlawful Terms of Communion, I expected a particular and diſtinct proof of ſuch a charge, becauſe the main weight of the Cauſe depended upon it. And this is the method we uſe in dealing with the Church of Rome. We do not run upon general charges of unſcriptural Impoſitions, and things impoſed on mens Conſciences, againſt the mind of Chriſt; but we cloſe with them upon the particulars of the charge, as Worſhip of Images, Invocation of Saints, Adoration of the Hoſt, and we offer to prove by plain Scripture, that theſe are forbidden, and therefore unlawful. But I find no ſuch method taken or purſued by our Brethren, only we are told, over and over, that they judge, they think, they eſteem them unlawful; and they cannot be ſatisfied about them; but for particular arguments to prove them unlawful, I find none; which makes the whole charge look very ſuſpiciouſly. For men do not uſe to remain in generals, when they have any aſſurance of the goodneſs of their Cauſe. Yet, to let the Reader ſee that I decline nothing that looks like argument in this matter, I ſhall pick up every thing I can find, which ſeems to prove theſe Terms of our Communion to be unlawful, or to juſtifie their Separation.

In the Epiſtle before my Sermon, I had uſed this Argument againſt the preſent Separation, “ that if it be lawful to ſeparate on a pretence of “ greater purity, where there is an agreement in Doctrine and the ſub-“ ſtantial parts of Worſhip, as is acknowledged in our Caſe, then a bare “ difference of opinion, as to ſome circumſtantials of Worſhip, and the “ beſt Conſtitution of Churches, will be ſufficient ground to break Com-“ munion, and to ſet up new Churches; which, conſidering the great “ variety of mens fancies about theſe matters, is to make an infinite “ Diviſibility in Churches, without any poſſible ſtop to farther Separa-“ tion.

This Argument others were willing to paſs over, but Mr. A. in his Preface, undertakes to anſwer it in all the parts of it; which being ſo material to our buſineſs, I ſhall now diſtinctly conſider; and like an able Diſputant, he allows nothing at all in this Argument; for he denies the Suppoſition, viz. that there is any ſuch agreement in Doctrine, and the ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip; he denies the firſt conſequence; and, as though that were not ſufficient, he denies the remoter conſequence too. And what Argument can ſtand before a Man of ſuch proweſs in diſputing?

1. He denies an agreement in Doctrine, which I have already ſhewed, was allowed by all Diſſenters before him, from the days of R. Brown, to Mr. A. But we muſt not miſtake him, for as fierce as he ſeems to be at firſt, yet let him but have ſcope to ſhew ſome tricks of Wit, and trials of his ſkill in fencing, and he is as tame and yielding as you would wiſh him; for at laſt he confeſſes they generally agree with the Doctrine contained in the Thirty nine Articles; and but for mere ſhame he would have ſaid all; for I never heard of one before him made any ſcruple of it. And this is the Doctrine eſtabliſhed in this Church, and if there be an agreement in this, then this Suppoſition is granted.

2. As to ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip, he denies an agreement in this too, although Dr. O. ſaith, we are agreed in the ſubſtantial parts of Religion, and I hope the parts of Worſhip are allowed to be ſome of them. Vindication, p. 22. But he pretends not to know what we mean by the difference between the parts of Worſhip, making ſome ſubſtantial, and others circumſtantial; and then he offers to prove, that our Church appoints new ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip, and therefore he muſt know one from the other; and after he hath ſpent ſome leaves in the proof of that, at laſt he fairly concludes, that there is a difference at leaſt in a circumſtantial part of Worſhip.

But becauſe this is a weighty charge againſt our Church, I ſhall take the more pains to conſider it, becauſe the main objection againſt our Ceremonies lies under it, and that which moſt ſticks with the more ſober Non-conformiſts.

Mr. A.'s charge about a ſubſtantial part of Worſhip being appointed by our Church, is thus drawn up. An outward viſible ſign of an inward inviſible grace, whereby a perſon is dedicated to the profeſſion of, and ſubjection to the Redeemer, is a ſubſtantial part of Worſhip. Now this he chargeth our Church with, but gives no inſtance; but the ſign of the Croſs after Baptiſm, is that which he means, which Mr. B. calls the tranſient dedicating Image of the Croſs. Anſw. p. 49 For the clearing of this, it will be neceſſary to ſhew, 1. What we mean by a ſubſtantial part of Worſhip. 2. How it appears that the ſign of the Croſs is made no ſubſtantial part of Worſhip by our Church.

1. What we mean by a ſubſtantial part of divine Worſhip. For I have obſerved, that the want of a clear and diſtinct notion of this, hath been one of the greateſt occaſions of the Scruples of the moſt conſcientious Non-conformiſts. For being afraid of diſpleaſing God, by uſing any other parts of Worſhip, than himſelf hath appointed; and looking on our Ceremonies, as real parts of divine Worſhip, upon this reaſon they have thought themſelves obliged in conſcience, at leaſt, to forbear the uſe of them. The great principle they went upon was this, that whatever was any ways intended or deſigned for the Worſhip of God, was a real and ſubſtantial part of his Worſhip; and when their Adverſaries told them that Divine Inſtitution was neceſſary to make a part of Worſhip, their anſwer was, that Divine Inſtitution did not make that a part of Worſhip which was none, but that to be a part of true Worſhip, which otherwiſe would be a part of falſe Worſhip. In the mean time, they did not deny the lawfulneſs of the application of common Circumſtances to Acts of Religious Worſhip, as Time and Place, &c. but the annexing any other Rites, or Ceremonies to proper Acts of Religious Worſhip, (as the ſign of the Croſs to Baptiſm) they ſuppoſed to be the making new ſubſtantial parts of Divine Worſhip; and therefore forbidden by all thoſe places of Scripture, which imply the Scripture it ſelf to be a perfect Rule of Worſhip. This, as far as I can gather, is the ſtrongeſt Plea of the Non-conformiſts ſide, which I have repreſented with its full advantage, becauſe my deſign is, if poſſible, not ſo much to confute, as to convince our Diſſenting Brethren.

Let us then ſeriouſly conſider this matter, and if we can find out a plain diſcernable difference between ſubſtantial parts of Divine Worſhip, and mere accidental Appendices, this diſcovery may tend more to diſentangle ſcrupulous minds, than the multiplying of Arguments to prove the lawfulneſs of our Ceremonies. And that we may better underſtand where the difficulty lies, theſe following things are agreed on both ſides.

1. That beſides proper Acts of Worſhip, there are ſome Circumſtances which may be differently uſed, without ſetting up new parts of Worſhip. As for inſtance, Adoration is a ſubſtantial and proper Act of Divine Worſhip; but whether that Adoration be performed by proſtration, or by bowing, or by kneeling, is in it ſelf indifferent; and no man will ſay, that he that makes his adoration kneeling, makes another new part of Worſhip, from what he doth who performs it ſtanding, or falling on his face. And ſo, if the ancient Eaſtern Church did at certain times forbid kneeling in Acts of adoration, this doth not prove that they differ'd in point of Adoration from the Weſtern Church, which requires kneeling in the ſame Offices of Divine Worſhip, becauſe they agreed in the Act of Adoration, but only differ'd in the manner of expreſſing it.

2. That Divine Inſtitution makes thoſe to be neceſſary parts of Worſhip, which of themſelves are not ſo. As is plain in the Sacraments of the New Teſtament, which of themſelves are no neceſſary ſubſtantial parts of the Worſhip of God, but only become ſo, by being appointed by Chriſt. So under the Law, many things merely ritual and ceremonial in themſelves, yet by vertue of Divine appointment, became ſubſtantial parts of Divine Worſhip.

3. That for men to make new Parts of Divine Worſhip is unlawful. For that is to ſuppoſe the Scripture an imperfect Rule of Worſhip, and that Superſtition is no fault, and conſequently, that our Saviour, without cauſe, found fault with the Scribes and Phariſees for their Traditions.

4. That there are many things which may be done in the Worſhip of God, which are not forbidden to be done, unleſs they be Parts of Divine Worſhip. For, if the ſuppoſed reaſon of their prohibition, be their being made Parts of Divine Worſhip, if it be made appear, that they are not ſo, then it follows they are not forbidden.

5. That what is neither forbidden directly, nor by conſequence, is lawful, and may be practiſed in the Worſhip of God. For although Mr. A. quarrels with me, for ſaying, they require expreſs Commands to make things lawful in the Worſhip of God; yet he allows, that what is not required either directly, or by conſequence is unlawful, and by parity of Reaſon, what is not forbidden in the ſame manner muſt be lawful. *Miſchief of Impoſ. p.*29.

Sect. 27. It remains now to find out thoſe certain Notes and Marks of diſtinction in this matter, as may give ſatisfaction to the conſciences of men, in the difference between innocent Ceremonies, and ſuperſtitious Parts of Divine Worſhip. For the difference here doth not lie in ſuppoſing ſome things of Divine Inſtitution which are not, but in making thoſe to be parts of Divine Worſhip which are not. And that may be done theſe ways.

1. By ſuppoſing them to be ſo neceſſary, that the doing them would be a thing pleaſing to God, and the omitting of them would be a thing diſpleaſing to God, although there were no humane Law which required the doing of them. For, where there is no obligation by vertue of any humane Law, and yet men ſuppoſe they ſhould pleaſe God by doing, or diſpleaſe God by not obſerving ſome particular Ceremonies, it is a ſign they eſteem thoſe to be Parts of Divine Worſhip. And this was the caſe of the Scribes and Phariſees, whom our Saviour reproved, not ſo much for their frequent waſhings, as for ſuppoſing that a man's Conſcience was defil'd, if he did not obſerve them. For they had taken up an opinion among them, (as H. Grotius obſerves) that any thing that was touched by a Perſon unclean by the Law, did communicate an uncleanneſs firſt to their Bodies, and then to their Souls; but that this ceremonial waſhing did purifie both Body and Soul: upon which ſuppoſition, they concluded this waſhing ſo neceſſary a part of God's Worſhip, that the doing of it was a thing very pleaſing to God, and the omiſſion of it muſt be diſpleaſing to him, becauſe it left an inward defilement upon their Conſciences, which might have been removed by the uſe of it. But it is lately pleaded by Mr. A. that this waſhing of hands among the Jews condemned by our Saviour, was juſt of the nature of our Ceremonies, being only obſerved as a command of their Superiors, not repugnant to the Law of God, but rather more agreeable to it than our Ceremonies are: from whence he infers, That all Traditions, Canons, Injunctions, concerning unneceſſary things are contrary to the Law of God, and conſequently invalid, and not obligatory. But I ſay, the reaſon of our Saviour's oppoſing the Phariſees about this matter, was not becauſe a thing in it ſelf unneceſſary, was determined by their Superiors, but becauſe of the ſuperſtitious opinion which the Phariſees had concerning this waſhing, with reſpect to the Conſciences of men. And that I ſhall prove, 1. From the force of our Saviour's reaſoning. 2. From the general ſenſe of the Jews concerning it.

1. From the force of our Saviour's reaſoning, which will appear, by obſerving what he proves, viz. that they ſet up their Tradition above the Law. Ver. 3. Why do you alſo tranſgreſs the Commandment of God by your Tradition? and v. 6. Thus ye have made the Commandment of God of none effect by your Tradition: v. 9. Full well ye reject the Commandment of God, that ye may keep your own Tradition. Our Saviour here proves by a plain and undeniable Inſtance about the Vow Corban, that they did believe their Traditions to have a force ſuperior to the Law; elſe it were impoſſible they ſhould ſuppoſe ſuch an arbitrary Vow ſhould ſuperſede the obligation of the Law, as to the duty which Children owe to their Parents; but from hence it appeared that they believed the keeping of this Vow to be a thing more pleaſing to God, than relieving their Parents, and ſo they eſteemed it a more neceſſary and ſubſtantial part of Divine Worſhip. The force of his Argument then extends to all things which they looked on as things pleaſing to God, on the account of the Tradition of their Elders; for he argued againſt the main ſuppoſition, the truth of which he proves by a clear inſtance, where the Tradition did contradict the Law. And ſince by this, it appeared, that they thought their Tradition to over-rule the Law, it was no wonder they ſet up others equal to it, and thought mens Conſciences ſtrictly obliged to obſerve them. But how doth the argument reach to the preſent caſe, viz. Becauſe that when their Traditions contradicted the Law, they were not to be obſerved; therefore, not, when agreeable, unleſs he rejected all kind of Traditions? I anſwer, the Phariſees did think a man's Conſcience defiled if he did not obſerve that Tradition, as appears by what follows, when he taught the People upon this occaſion, v. 11. That which entreth into the mouth defileth not a man, but that which cometh out of the mouth defileth a man. This was the Doctrine Chriſt taught the People with reſpect to this diſpute with the Phariſees; which ſignified nothing, unleſs the opinion among them was, that eating of bread with unwaſhen hands, did really defile a man's Conſcience towards God. At which the Phariſees were much offended, as the Diſciples told him, v. 12. and they were not ſo very well ſatisfied, but they deſire a farther explication of this matter from himſelf; which he gives them, v. 17, 18, 19. where he ſhews that no defilement could come to mens Conſciences merely by what they did eat; but that mens inward luſts were the things which defiled them, for theſe were the ſourſe of thoſe wicked actions, which were moſt diſpleaſing to God. And ſo he concludes his Diſcourſe, v. 20. Theſe are the things which defile a man, but to eat with unwaſhen hands defileth not a man. From whence it follows, that the main thing in diſpute was, whether this Ceremony of waſhing hands could be omitted, without defiling the Conſcience? or elſe our Saviour's concluſion doth not reach the Queſtion. But if the concluſion was contrary to the Phariſees Doctrine, then they muſt look upon this Ceremony of waſhing of hands, as a part of Worſhip equal to the Law of God, and which men pleaſed God by doing, and diſpleaſed him by omitting it; not merely with reſpect to the command of Superiors, but as they ſuppoſed ſome leſſer guilt upon the Conſcience might be expiated by it, which would remain, if they did not uſe it.

2. From the general ſenſe of the Jews. Even Mr. A. himſelf, in the very ſame diſcourſe, where he would make this waſhing of hands like our Ceremonies, quotes ſeveral paſſages of the Talmudiſts, to prove that they equalled their Traditions with the Laws of God, and ſometimes p. 17.

ſet them above them; and particularly of this Tradition he ſaith, It is a ſaying of the Talmud, that he that eats bread with unwaſhen hands, ſins as grievouſly as if he lay with a Whore. Which is a ſaying of R. Aſe in Sota; and abundantly proves, that this was not looked on as an indifferent Ceremony, but as a thing whoſe omiſſion brought a guilt on the Conſcience. And I wonder Mr. A. did not diſcern, that by this one ſaying, he overthrew all the reſt of his diſcourſe: But this opinion is not built on the ſaying of any Rabbi, but on a conſtant Tradition among them, which they derive from the days of Solomon, who, they ſay, appointed it firſt, when they did eat of Sacrifices; afterwards, the wiſe men applied it to the Terumah, and at laſt Hillel and Schammai decreed it ought to be obſerved for their greater purification, before the eating their common Meals. And the Phariſees placing the greateſt part of their Religion in the nice obſervance of ſuch Traditions, thought themſelves ſo much more holy than others, as they did more carefully avoid the defilements of common Converſation; and for that reaſon they obſerved this waſhing, eſpecially when they had been in promiſcuous company. For they thought themſelves defiled by any touch from the ordinary ſort of People; and this, Maimonides ſaith, they looked on as a peculiar part of Sanctity; and the more ſtrict and punctual they were in this, the more holy they were accounted. Therefore in the Talmud, one John, the Son of Gudged, is particularly admired for his Sanctity, becauſe he exceeded others in the niceneſs of waſhing his hands. And they have a ſaying in the Miſna to this purpoſe, The Garments of the common People, are a pollution to the Phariſees, and the Garments of the Phariſees to thoſe that eat the Terumah, and theirs to thoſe that eat of the Sacrifices, and theirs to thoſe that touched the water of cleanſing. So that they had different degrees of Sanctity about this matter of waſhing, none of which was impoſed for the ſake of cleanlineſs, but from the ſuppoſition of ſome inward purification they obtained by it, from the common filthineſs of the world. And upon this principle, even the veſſels of the Temple were to be waſhed all over, if they were but touched by the common People. In the waſhing their hands, they put a difference between that before, and that after meat; the latter they accounted a matter of liberty, or at leaſt only for health to waſh off the dangerous ſaline particles which they ſuppoſed to remain; but the former was required for inward purification; which they require ſo ſtrictly, that if water may be had within four miles, a Jew is bound not to eat till he hath waſhed, no not with a fork; and in caſe none can be had, then he is to cover his hands, and ſo eat; nor can he take meat from another in his mouth, until his mouth be firſt waſhed. If there be no more water than will ſerve for his drink, he muſt part with enough of it to waſh his hands; and therefore R. Akiba in priſon ſaid, He would rather periſh with thirſt, than want water to waſh his hands. And they ſay, Whoſoever diſeſteems this Cuſtom, deſerves not only excommunication, but death too. Since all this is evident from the moſt authentick Writers among the Jews, I cannot but admire at Mr. A.'s deſign, who would make the world believe, that this was no more than an indifferent Ceremony among the Jews, that was only required for Order and Decency, as our Ceremonies are, when thoſe very Citations he brings from Buxtorf, and Dr. Lightfoot, do manifeſtly prove the contrary. This I thought neceſſary to be cleared, becauſe this is the chief place in the New Teſtament, which they bring to prove the unlawfulneſs of our Ceremonies.

From hence it now appears that the reaſon of Chriſt's condemning that Ceremony of waſhing of hands, was not upon the account of Decency, but a ſuperſtitious Opinion they had concerning it, that it did expiate a leſſer kind of guilt and ſpiritual filthineſs which they contracted by the impure touches of Men leſs holy than themſelves. And this the Phariſees more wondred at in Chriſt's Diſciples, becauſe it was a Rule among them, that the Diſciples of the Wiſe ought to be more ſtrict in theſe caſes than others, becauſe theſe things tended to advance the Reputation of their Holineſs, among the People. And where ſuch an Opinion prevails, there ſuch Ceremonies are made parts of Divine Worſhip.

Sect. 28. And thus it is in many of the Ceremonies of the Roman Church, which their Divines aſſert to have a purifying and cleanſing faculty as to the Souls of Men; not for juſtification of Men from mortal ſins, but for other ſpiritual effects, and taking away the guilt of venial ſins. For ſay they, no doubt they are effectual for the ends to which the Church appointed them, and of this, there is no diſpute among Catholicks. And withal, they add, That it is probable that the Church hath power to appoint Ceremonies in ſuch a manner, that they may produce theſe effects, ex opere operato, as the Sacraments do juſtification, becauſe Chriſt hath left it in the power of the Church to apply his merits for leſſer effects; having appointed the Sacraments himſelf for the greater. But Bellarmin thinks this latter part diſputable concerning the opus operatum of Ceremonies; but as to the former, viz. by way of impetration, he ſaith, it is paſt all doubt among Catholicks. So, as to the ſprinkling of Holy Water, Bellarmin ſaith, it is no mere ſignificant Ceremony; but it is effectual for the blotting out of venial ſins; and he quotes Saint Thomas, and Dom. à Soto, and Gratian for it; who produceth the Canon of Alex. 1. whereby it appears it was firſt inſtituted ut eâ cuncti aſperſi ſanctificentur & purificentur; that all that were ſprinkled might be ſanctified and purified by it. In the prayer of Conſecration for the Salt to make holy Water, one expreſſion is, that it might be wholſome both to Body and Soul; and the Water is conſecrated to drive away the power of the Devil. Azorius ſaith, that holy Water cleanſeth venial ſins, ex opere operato, and drives away Devils. Greg. de Valentia agrees in the thing, but is not ſo peremptory in the manner. But Marſilius Columna hath written a whole Book of the admirable effects of this Ceremony. And ſo for the ſign of the Croſs, Bellarmin attributes wonderful effects to it, for driving away Devils and Diſeaſes, and ſanctifying the things it is applied to: And he ſaith, it hath power againſt the Devil ex opere operato. Pet. Thyræus the Jeſuit, attributes a proper efficiency to the ſign of the Croſs againſt the power of the Devil. Coccius ſaith, It is a terror to the Devils, and very beneficial to Mankind. Which makes me wonder at Dr. Ames his diſigenuity, when he would go about to make the Doctrine of our Church about Ceremonies not to differ from that of the Church of Rome. It is true, Caſſander and ſome few others, talk at another rate; and Caſſander himſelf ſaith, the beſt Men on both ſides were agreed about theſe matters. But we are not to take their general ſenſe from ſuch as Caſſander; eſpecially when their publick Offices ſpeak the ſenſe of their Church better than Caſſander. Greg. de Valentiâ indeed, ſaith, It is a lie that they attribute as much to Ceremonies as to Sacraments: And in truth they do it not; for they attribute Juſtification to the Sacraments, and the expiation of the remainder of venial ſins to the uſe of Ceremonies. However, ſince they attribute ſo ſpiritual effects to them; it is an argument they look upon them as real parts of Divine Worſhip, as much as they do on Prayer, with which they compare them in point of efficacy. But with what face can this be objected againſt our Church; which utterly rejects any ſuch ſpiritual efficacy, as to the Ceremonies that are retained among us; and declares that they are no otherwiſe received in our Church, than as they are purged from Popiſh Superſtition and Error? And therefore all opinion of merit and ſpiritual efficacy is taken from them; which do make them to be parts of Divine Worſhip; which being removed, they remain only naked Ceremonies, i. e. as Caſſander well expreſſes it, Words made viſible, or teaching Actions; whoſe deſign and intention being towards us, and not towards God, they cannot be thought to be made parts of Divine Worſhip, although they be uſed in the performance of them. As if the Chriſtians in the Eaſt did wear the badge of a Croſs upon their Arms, at ſome ſolemn days, as on good Friday at their devotions, to diſtinguiſh them from Turks and Jews; would any one ſay, that they made this badge a part of Divine Worſhip? But when they ſee the Papiſts on that day uſing the moſt ſolemn poſtures of adoration to the Crucifix, they might well charge them with making this a part of Divine Worſhip. So that the diſtinction between theſe two, is not ſo hard to find, if Men apply their Minds to the conſideration of it.

Preface to the Common-Prayer, Can. 30.

2. Men may make Ceremonies to become parts of Divine Worſhip if they ſuppoſe them unalterable, and obligatory to the Conſciences of all Chriſtians: for this ſuppoſes an equal neceſſity with that of Divine Inſtitution. If Men do aſſert ſo great a Power in the Church, as to appoint things for ſpiritual effects, and to oblige the Conſciences of all Chriſtians to obſerve them; it is all one as to ſay, the Church may make new parts of Worſhip. But this can with no colour be objected againſt a Church which declares as expreſly as it is poſſible, that it looks on the Rites and Ceremonies uſed therein, as things in their own nature indifferent and alterable; and that changes and alterations may be made, as ſeems neceſſary or expedient to thoſe in Authority: And that every Country is at liberty to uſe their own Ceremonies; and that they neither condemn others nor preſcribe to them. What can more expreſs the not making Ceremonies any parts of Divine Worſhip than theſe things do? And thus I have at once ſhewed, what we mean by ſubſtantial parts of Divine Worſhip, and that our Church doth not make any human Ceremonies to be ſo.

Preface to Common Prayer.

Second Preface.

Sect. 29. I now come particularly to examin the charge againſt our Church. For Mr. A. ſaith, An outward viſible ſign of an inward inviſible grace, whereby a perſon is dedicated to the profeſſion of and ſubjection to the Redeemer, is a ſubſtantial part of Worſhip. I anſwer,

1. An outward viſible ſign between Men repreſenting the duty or engagement of another, is no part of Divine Worſhip at all, much leſs a ſubſtantial part of it. There are ſome viſible ſigns from God to Men, repreſenting the effects of his Grace to us, and thoſe we call Sacraments; there are other ſigns from Men to God, to teſtifie their ſubjection and dependence, and theſe are acts of Worſhip; and there are ſigns from Men to Men to repreſent ſome other thing beſides the bare action; and theſe are ſignificant Ceremonies, ſuch as the Croſs in Baptiſm is. For, after the Child is baptized and received into the Church, the ſign of the Croſs is uſed in token that hereafter he ſhall not be aſhamed to confeſs the faith of Chriſt crucified. &c. To whom is this token made? Is it to God? No certainly. If it were a permanent ſign of the Croſs, would it be for a Teſtimony to God, or to Men? When the Primitive Chriſtians uſed the ſign of the Croſs in token they were not aſhamed of Chriſt crucified, was this a dedicating ſign to God, or a declarative ſign to Men? And what if it repreſents ſubjection to Chriſt as the Redeemer? Muſt it therefore be ſuch an outward viſible Sign of inward inviſible Grace, as the Sacraments are? It repreſents the Duty and not the Grace; the Duty is ours, and may be repreſented by us; but the Grace is God's, and therefore he muſt appoint the ſigns to repreſent and convey that, becauſe he alone is the Giver of it.

2. The Croſs in Baptiſm is not intended by our Church for a ſign of immediate dedication to God, but of obligation on the perſon. It is true, that in the 30 Canon it is ſaid, that this Church retains the ſign of the Croſs, following the example of the Primitive and Apoſtolical Churches; and accounteth it a lawful outward Ceremony and honourable badge, whereby the Infant is dedicated to the ſervice of him who died upon the Croſs. But for the right underſtanding thereof, we muſt conſider, That Baptiſm is declared to be compleat before; ſo that the ſign of the Croſs adds nothing to the perfection or vertue of it, nor being omitted, takes nothing from it; as it is there expreſſed as the ſenſe of this Church. This therefore, is no part of the Baptiſmal Dedication. And the Miniſter acts in a double capacity, when he doth baptize, and when he ſigns with the ſign of the Croſs: When he baptizeth, he acts by vertue of Authority derived from Chriſt, I baptize thee in the Name of the Father, &c. Which being done, and the Child thereby ſolemnly dedicated to God in Baptiſm; he then ſpeaks in the name of the Church, varying the number; We receive this Child into the Congregation of Chriſt's Flock, and do ſign him with the ſign of the Croſs, &c. i. e. We Chriſtians, that are already members of Chriſt's Flock, do receive him into our number; and in token of his being obliged to perform the duty belonging to ſuch a one, do make uſe of this ſign of the Croſs, as the Rite of Admiſſion into the Church, and of his obligation to behave himſelf, as becomes a Chriſtian. And if we conſider the ſign of the Croſs in this ſenſe, as no doubt it was ſo intended, all the difficulties about a Dedicating, Covenanting, Symbolical, Sacramental Sign, concerning which ſome have made ſo great a ſtir, will ſoon appear to be of no force. For why may not the Church appoint ſuch a Rite of Admiſſion of one of her Members declaring it to be no part of Baptiſm? Let us ſuppoſe an adult perſon to be baptized, and immediately after Baptiſm to be admitted a Member of an Independent Church; and the Ceremony of this admiſſion to be holding up of his hand, in token of his owning the Church-Government, i. e. of promiſing to live as a Church-member ought to do among them; the Paſtor of the Church then baptizes him, and immediately after, upon the holding up of his hand, in token of his owning the Church-Covenant, he ſaith in the name of the Church, we receive thee into this Congregation, and accept of thy holding up of thy hand as a token that thou wilt hereafter behave thy ſelf as a Church-member ought to do among us. What harm is there in all this? And yet is not this a Profeſſing, Dedicating, Covenanting, Symbolical, Sacramental Sign, as much as the Sign of the Croſs is among us? Doth not holding up the hand ſignify and repreſent? Is it not therefore a ſignificant and ſymbolical Ceremony? Doth it not import an obligation lying on the perſon? Is it not therefore dedicating, covenanting, and ſacramental, as much as the ſign of the Croſs? Why then ſhould this be ſcrupled more than the other?

And by this Mr. B's great miſtake appears about this matter; who ſuppoſeth that the Miniſter ſpeaketh in the name of Chriſt when he ſigns with the ſign of the Croſs; and as God's Officer from him, and ſo dedicates him by this ſign to the ſervice of him that died upon the Croſs; whereas the Miniſter in that Act ſpeaks in the name of the Church, as evidently appears by thoſe words, We receive him into the Congregation of Chriſt's Flock; and then follows, as the ſolemn rite of Admiſſion, And do ſign him with the ſign of the Croſs, &c. All publick and ſolemn Admiſſions into Societies, having ſome peculiar Ceremony belonging to them. And ſo as Baptiſm beſides its ſacramental Efficacy is a Rite of Admiſſion into Chriſt's Catholick Church; ſo the ſign of the Croſs is into our Church of England: in which this Ceremony is uſed, without any preſcription to other Churches.

Sect. 30. But ſaith Mr. B. though the ſign of the Croſs may be lawful, as a tranſient, arbitrary, profeſſing ſign; yet not as a dedicating ſign, and as the common profeſſing ſymbol of baptized Perſons. If it be lawful in the former ſenſe, I cannot underſtand how it ſhould be unlawful in the latter. Yes, ſaith he, the inſtituting of the latter belongs to God only. How doth that appear? Becauſe he hath made two Sacraments already for that end. True, but not only for that end; but to be the means and inſtruments of conveying his Grace to men; which none but God himſelf can do, and therefore none but he ought to appoint the means for that end. And we account it an unſufferable inſolency in the Roman Churches, for them to take upon them to make application of the Merits of Chriſt to Rites of their own Inſtitution; which is the only poſſible way for a Church to make new Sacraments; but if every ſignificant cuſtom in a Church muſt paſs for a new Sacrament, then ſitting at the Sacrament is a new Sacrament, becauſe we are told it betokens reſt and Communion with Chriſt; then putting off the Hat in Prayer is a new Sacrament, becauſe it is a profeſſing ſign of Reverence; then laying on the hand, and kiſſing the Book in ſwearing are new Sacraments, becauſe they are publick ſymbolical Rites. But ſaith Mr. B. it belongeth only to the King to make the common badge or ſymbol of his own Subjects. Yet I hope, every Nobleman or Gentleman may give a diſtinct Livery without Treaſon. And therefore why may not every Church appoint its own Rite of admiſſion of Members into its Body? But the obligation here is to the common duties of Chriſtians. And is not every Church-member bound to perform theſe? That which is peculiar, is the manner of admiſſion by the ſign of the Croſs; and his Rite our Church impoſes on no others but its own Members, i. e. makes it neceſſary to none elſe; and to ſhew it to be only a ſolemn Rite of Admiſſion, it allows it to be forborn in private Baptiſm. But ſaith Mr. B. Chriſt's Sacraments or Symbols are ſufficient, we need not deviſe more, and accuſe his Inſtitution of inſufficiency. If it be lawful, the Church is to judge of the expediency; and not every private perſon. And to appoint other Rites that do not encroach upon the Inſtitutions of Chriſt, by challenging any effect peculiar to them, is no charging them with inſufficiency. Well, ſaith Mr. B. but it is unlawful on another account, viz. as it is an Image uſed as a medium in God's Worſhip, and ſo forbidden in the Second Commandment. He may as well make it unlawful to uſe Words in God's Worſhip; for are not they Images and repreſent things to our minds, as well as a tranſient ſign of the Croſs? Nay, doth not Mr. B. in the ſame place make it lawful to make an Image an Object or Medium of our conſideration exciting our minds to Worſhip God? as he inſtanceth in a Crucifix or hiſtorical Image of Chriſt, or ſome holy man. If any Divine of the Church of England had ſaid any thing to this purpoſe, what out-cries of Popery had been made againſt us? How many Advances had we preſently made for letting in the groſſeſt Idolatry? How many Divines of the Church of Rome had been quoted, to ſhew, that they went no farther and deſired no more than this? Yet the tranſient ſign of the Croſs, without any reſpect to Worſhip, is condemned among us, as forbidden by the Second Commandment; and that by the ſame perſon and in the ſame page. But it is uſed as a medium in God's Worſhip. Is our Worſhip directed to it? or, do we kneel before it, as Mr. B. allows men may do before a Crucifix? Do we declare that we are excited by it to worſhip God? No; all theſe are rejected by our Church. How then is it a medium in God's Worſhip? Why forſooth, it is not a mere circumſtance but an outward act of Worſhip. What, as much as kneeling before a Crucifix? and yet that is lawful according to him, ſuppoſing the mind be only excited by it. Suppoſe then we only uſe the ſign of the Croſs to excite mens conſideration in the act of Worſhip; what harm were in it upon Mr. B's grounds? But our Church allows not ſo much, only taking it for a lawful outward Ceremony, which hath nothing of Worſhip belonging to it; how comes it then to be a medium in God's Worſhip. For Mr. B. ſaith, in the ſame place, there is a twofold medium in God's Worſhip. 1. Medium excitans, that raiſes our minds to Worſhip God, as a Crucifix, &c. 2. Medium terminans; or as he calls it terminus, in genere cauſæ finalis, a worſhipped medium or the terminus, or the thing which we worſhip mediately, an pretence of repreſenting God, and that we worſhip him in it ultimately. And this he takes to be the thing forbidden directly in the ſecond Commandmeut, viz. to worſhip a Creature (with mind or body) in the Act of Divine Worſhip, as repreſenting God, or as the mediate term of our Worſhip, by which we ſend it unto God, as if it were more acceptable to him. So that it is lawful, ſaith he, by the ſight of a Crucifix to be provoked to worſhip God, but it's unlawful to offer him that Worſhip, by offering it to the Crucifix firſt, as the ſign, way, or means of ſending it to God. Obſerve here a ſtrange piece of partiality. 1. It is allowed to be lawful to pray before a Crucifix, as a medium excitans, as an object that ſtirs up in us a worſhipping affection; and ſo all thoſe Papiſts are excuſed from Idolatry who profeſs they uſe a Crucifix for no other end, although they perform all Acts of adoration before it; and it will become a very hard queſtion whether the mind in its conſideration, uniting the Image with the Object, may not give the ſame Acts of Worſhip to one as to the other, but in different reſpects. For the Image being allowed to excite the mind to conſideration of the object to be worſhipped, the object is conſidered in the mind as repreſented by the Image, and conſequently is ſo worſhipped; and why then may not the worſhip be as well directed to the Image as repreſenting, as to the Object repreſented by the Image; provided, that the Act of the mind be ſtill fixed upon the Object as repreſented by the Image? And thus even Latria may be performed to a Crucifix. Is not this a very fair conceſſion to the Papiſts? But on the other ſide, 2. The ſign of the Croſs, even the aëreal ſign, as Dr. O. calls it, muſt be made a medium in God's Worſhip, though it be utterly denied by our Church; and there be no colour for it from his own grounds. For it is neither medium excitans, being not intended by our Church for that purpoſe, a Crucifix being much fitter for that purpoſe; and our Church calls it only a lawful ceremony and honourable badge; much leſs can it be thought to be any mediate object of our Worſhip, there being nothing like Worſhip performed towards it. But if all his meaning be, that whatever is uſed in the time of Worſhip, that is not a mere circumſtance, muſt be a medium of Worſhip, that is ſo weak a pretence, that I ſhall conſider it no farther.

Sect. 31. But ſuppoſe it be no medium of Worſhip, yet it cannot out of Mr. B's Head, but that it muſt be a new Sacrament; For, ſaith he, If Chriſt had inſtituted the Croſs as our Church doth; would you not have called this a Sacrament? And if it want but Divine Inſtitution and Benediction, it wanteth indeed a due efficient, but it is ſtill a Human Sacrament though not a Divine, and therefore an unlawful Sacrament. If Chriſt had inſtituted it with ſuch promiſes, as he hath his other Sacraments, no doubt it had been one; but then the uſe of it had been quite changed, from what it is now. For then its ſignification had been from God to us; and the Miniſter had ſigned in Chriſt's Name and not in the Church's; and then it had been in token that Chriſt will not fail of his Promiſe, if we perform our Conditions. But here it is quite contrary, as hath already appeared.

Defence of the Plea, p. 41.

There is one thing yet remaining in Mr. B. about this matter to be conſidered, viz, That according to the Rule of our Church, the Croſs in Baptiſm hath a Sacramental efficacy attributed to it; for, ſaith he, As the Water of Baptiſm worketh morally, by ſignifying the waſhing of Chriſt's Body; ſo the Croſs is to operate morally, by ſignifying Chriſt's Crucifixion, the benefits of his Croſs and our Duty. And then he adds, That it is the common Doctrine of Proteſtants that the Sacraments are not inſtituted to give Grace phyſically, but only morally; and that even the wiſeſt Papiſts themſelves do maintain only ſuch moral Cauſality in Sacraments. And ſo by this means he would make the ſign of the Croſs to have the nature of a Sacrament with us. But that he hath miſprereſented or miſapplied both the Popiſh and Proteſtant Doctrine about the efficacy of Sacraments to ſerve his purpoſe, I ſhall now make appear,

Defence of the Plea, p. 49.

1. Concerning the Popiſh Doctrine; that which overthrows the ſtrength of all that Mr. B. ſaith is, that it is unanimouſly agreed among them as a matter of faith, that the Sacraments do confer grace, ex opere operato, where there is no actual impediment; and that it is no leſs than hereſie to aſſert, that they are bare outward profeſſing ſigns, i. e. That they are mere Ceremonies. This not one of them, whom I ever ſaw, either denies, or diſputes; and it is expreſly determined in the Councils of Florence and of Trent. But then they have a very nice and ſubtle queſtion among them about the manner how the Sacraments do confer Grace, whether phyſically or morally. By phyſically, they mean, when a thing by its own immediate action hath influence on producing the effect; by morally, they mean that which doth effectually concur to the producing the effect, but after another manner, as by perſuaſions, by intreaty, &c. As he that runs the ſword into another's bowels, kills him phyſically; he that perſuades and incourages him effectually to do it, is as really the cauſe of his death as the other; but then they ſay, he is but a moral and not a phyſical cauſe of the murther. They all agree, that the Sacraments do effectually convey Grace, where there is no obſtacle put; but the only queſtion is, about the manner of producing it. And as to this they agree, that the Sacraments do work as moral Cauſes, Concil. Florent. Decret. Union. Concil. Trident. Seſſ. 7. Can. 6.

not principal but inſtrumental; the principal they ſay is the Merit of Chriſt, the Inſtrumental the Sacraments as deriving their efficacy from the former; as the Writing from the Seal, and the Seal from the Authority of the Perſon; or as Money from the Stamp, and the Stamp from the King; but beſides this, they queſtion whether there be not a proper efficiency by Divine Power in the Sacraments, to produce at leaſt the character from whence Divine Grace immediately follows. And about this indeed they are divided. Some ſay, there is no neceſſity of aſſerting more than a bare moral Cauſality; becauſe this is ſufficient for the infallible efficacy of the Sacraments, ſublato obice, as Gamachæus a late Profeſſor in the Sorbon delivers their Doctrine: and of this opinion, he reckons Bonaventure, Altiſſidore, Scotus, Durandus, Canus, Ledeſma, and many others: and with this he cloſes, becauſe this is ſufficient, and the other is to make Miracles without cauſe; as long as the effect follows, certò infallibiliter & ex opere operato, as he there ſpeaks. And for the ſame reaſon Card. de Lugo yields to it, although he there ſaith, that a Sacrament is ſignum practicum infallibile Gratiæ. So that thoſe who do aſſert only this moral Cauſality of Sacraments, do not ſuppoſe any uncertainty in the effect, any more than the others do, but only differ about the way of producing it. Yet Yſambertus, another late Profeſſor of the Sorbon, proves the Doctrine of a Phyſical efficiency to be much more agreeable to the ſenſe of their Church; and that the argument is of no force againſt it, becauſe it is ſo hard to be underſtood, for then they muſt quit many other Doctrines beſides this. Joh. Baptiſta Gonet, a late learned Thomiſt not only contends earneſtly for this opinion, but ſaith, The greater part of their Divines aſſert it, and thoſe of the greateſt reputation, as Ruardus Tapper, Vega, Sayrus, Yſambertus, Suarez, Valentia, Bellarmin, Reginaldus, Mœratius, Ripalda and many more. And Coquetius, he ſaith, reckons up Fifty three eminent Divines who hold the phyſical Cauſality of the Sacrament. So that Mr. B. is both very much miſtaken in the common Doctrine of the Roman Schools, and in applying the moral Cauſality of the Sacraments, as it is aſſerted by their Divines, to the ſignificancy of our Ceremonies.

2. As to the Proteſtant Doctrines, he repreſents that in very ambiguous terms; for, he ſaith, That Proteſtants commonly maintain that the Sacraments are not inſtituted to give Grace phyſically, but only morally. If it be their Doctrine, that the Sacraments are inſtituted for the conveying of Grace at all, which he ſeems to yield; (and if he did not, might be fully proved from the Teſtimonies of the moſt eminent Reformers abroad, as well as at home) This is ſufficient to ſhew that the ſign of the Croſs can never be advanced to the dignity of a Sacrament among us; ſince in no ſenſe it is held to be an Inſtrument appointed for the conveying of Grace.

And ſo this Phraſe of a New Sacrament is a thing only invented to amuſe and perplex tender and injudicious Perſons. There being not the leaſt ground for it, that I can diſcern; and yet ſuch pretences as theſe have ſerved to darken People's minds, and have filled them with ſtrange fears and ſcruples; yea, ſome who have conquer'd their prejudices as to other things, have not been able to get over this mighty ſtumbling-block; which I have therefore taken the more pains to remove out of their way.

And yet after all, Mr. B. declares, That if it be a ſin, it is the Miniſter's, and not the Perſon's who offers the Child to be baptized; and another man's ſinful mode will not juſtifie the neglect of our duty. And therefore Miſchief of Impoſit. Preface.

Sect. 32. But Mr. A. hath a farther blow at our Church, for allowing worſhiping towards the Altar, the Eaſt, and at the ſound of the word Jeſus; which, he ſaith, are made the Motive of Worſhip, if not ſomething elſe. The lawfulneſs of theſe things, ſo far as they are required by our Church, I had formerly defended againſt the Papiſts, and now Mr. A. borrows their Weapons from them; although he doth not manage them with that ſkill and dexterity which T. G. uſed. I had ſaid, that bowing at the name of Jeſus was no more than going to Church at the Toll of a Bell, the Worſhip being not given to the Name, but to Chriſt at the ſound of his Name. Why may not, ſaith he, an Image give warning to the Eye, when to worſhip God, as well as a Bell to the Ear? I will tell him, ſince he needs it, becauſe an Image is a mighty diſparagement to an infinite and inviſible Being; it is directly contrary to his Law to worſhip him by an Image; it is againſt the ſenſe of the Chriſtian Church in its beſt and pureſt Ages; this one would have thought I had proved ſo much againſt the Papiſts, that I had little reaſon to expect ſuch a queſtion from a Proteſtant. But ſuch men do too much diſcover, whoſe part they are willing to take againſt the Church of England. He grants the Papiſts go too far in preferring an Image higher than to be Motivum Cultûs; but the Queſtion is, whether they do not ſin in applying it to this lower uſe, to make it an ordinary ſtated Motive to Worſhip. When I read this, I began to pity the man, being in ſome fear leſt ſomething had a little diſordered his fancy. For where do we ever allow ſuch an uſe of Images in our Church? If he had written againſt Mr. B. who allows a Crucifix to be Medium excitans, he had ſome reaſon to have anſwered him, but I have none. But he brings it home to us; for, ſaith he, If men do ſin who make an Image an ordinary ſtated motive of Worſhip, then how ſhall we excuſe our own adorations? What doth the man mean? I am yet afraid, all things are not right ſomewhere. We acknowledge no adorations, but what are due to the Divine Majeſty; and do theſe need to be excuſed? And what conſequence is there from the unlawfulneſs of the Worſhip of Images, againſt our worſhipping of God? Let him firſt prove, that we give adoration to any beſides the Divine Majeſty, before we ſhall go about to excuſe our adorations. But if men do not ſin in making an Image a ſtated Motive of Worſhip (who ever ſaid they did not? I am ſure, not our Church. But let this paſs, what follows?) then, ſaith he, why do we not introduce Images into our Churches? Aſk Mr. B. that Queſtion, and not us of the Church of England. If we allowed the Worſhip of Images to be lawful, this were a pertinent Queſtion; but ſince we deny it, what makes all this againſt us? which if our Church-men ſhall venture upon; I pray ſtay till they do, before you charge us with it. Are not theſe men hugely to ſeek for Arguments againſt our Church that talk at this rate? But, he ſaith, they may do it with equal reaſon. Here is ſomething now fit to be proved. We utterly deny that we may worſhip Images on the ſame Reaſon, that we perform external adoration to God by bowing the body; or to Jeſus at the mention of his name. Hold now to this, and prove it. Inſtead of that, he ſhews the difference between going to Church at the ſound of a Bell, and bowing at the name of Jeſus; viz. That the Bell tolls out of Worſhip to bring them to it; but the ſound of the word Jeſus is in the middle of Worſhip, when mens minds ſhould be intent on devotion, and not ſit liſtening and watching, as Whittington's Cat watcht the Mouſe, (there 'tis for you, viz. what he hath laboured for all this while) for the caſual ſtarting of a word, and the dropping of two ſyllables. But the Queſtion is not about the ſeaſonableneſs of doing this when we are in other Acts of Devotion and immediate application to God, which no body contends for, that I know of, but about the lawfulneſs of doing it in the time of Divine Service, when we hear the name of Jeſus repeated in the Leſſons, or the Creed; and the Canon which requires it refers to the former Cuſtom, and in the Injunctions of Queen Elizabeth, the Leſſons and Sermons are mentioned particularly; and although it be ſaid, or otherwiſe in the Church pronounced, yet by the manner of ſhewing this Reverence, viz. with lowneſs of courteſie and uncovering of heads of mankind; it ſuppoſeth them at that time not to be imployed in any other Act of Devotion. And ſo it gives no interruption to the intention of it; nor obliges men to lie at the catch for the coming of the word, as though all our Worſhip conſiſted in it; but ſince our Church approves it as a laudable Ceremony, we ought not to refuſe it at ſeaſonable times; unleſs it can be proved unlawful in it ſelf. Which I ſay, can never be done, as long as the Worſhip is directed to a true object, viz. the Perſon of Chriſt; and the mention of his name, only expreſſes the time, as the tolling the Bell doth of going to Church. Neither doth it ſignifie any thing to this purpoſe, whether Perſons be in the Church or out of it, when the Bell rings; for in the ſame page he mentions the Maſs-bell; which ſounds to the People in the Church as well as out of it; and if the Object of their Worſhip were true, as it is falſe, that would make him better underſtand the parallel.

But, ſaith he, if it be a duty to give external Reverence to God, when ever the word Jeſus is mentioned, there is more need of it in our ordinary converſes, and the ſecular affairs of the world; and ſo, he adds, this word might do the ſervice of the Maſs-bell going about the ſtreets, at which all are bound to fall down and worſhip. Now, what a ſtrange piece of croſneſs is this, to diſpute the lawfulneſs of doing it at Church, becauſe we do it not at the Market-place? My buſineſs is to defend what our Church requires; if he will allow that, and thinks it convenient to do it likewiſe in common converſation, let him defend his own new invented ways of Reverence; as for us, we think there are proper ſeaſons for Divine Worſhip, and that it is not enough to do what is lawful, unleſs it be done at its convenient time; but there are ſome men, who know no mean between doing nothing, and over-doing. But is this becoming a Proteſtant Divine to parallel the Worſhip we give to the Eternal Son of God, as our Church declares, Can. 18. and that which the Papiſts give to the Hoſt, when it is carried up and down the ſtreets? At laſt, he commends the moderation of the Canon, 1640. about bowing towards the Eaſt or Altar, that they which uſe this Rite, deſpiſe not them who uſe it not; and they who uſe it not, condemn not thoſe that uſe it: but he would fain know why the ſame moderation ſhould not be us'd in other Rites, as the ſign of the Croſs, and kneeling at the Lord's Supper? It had been much more to his purpoſe to have proved any thing unlawful which had been required by our Church. But the caſe was not the ſame as to thoſe things which were required by our Church, ever ſince the Reformation, and as to ſome cuſtoms, which although in themſelves lawful, yet were never ſtrictly enjoyned, but left indifferent. And therefore the moderation uſed in the Canon, 1640, was very ſuitable to the principles of our Church; but how doth it follow, that becauſe ſome things are left at liberty, therefore nothing ſhall be determin'd; or being determin'd ought not to be obeyed? It was the great Wiſdom of our Church not to make more things neceſſary (as to practice) than were made ſo at the ſettlement of our Reformation; but whether there be ſufficient Reaſon to alter thoſe terms of Communion which were then ſettled, for the ſake of ſuch whoſe ſcruples are groundleſs and endleſs, I do not take upon me here to determine. But as far as I can perceive by Mr. A. he thinks the Apoſtle's Rule of forbearance, Rom. 14. to be of equal force in all ages, and as to all things, about which Chriſtians have different apprehenſions; and then the Papiſts come in for an equal ſhare in ſuch a toleration. And ſo thoſe who do not worſhip the Hoſt, or Images, or uſe Auricular Confeſſion, muſt not cenſure thoſe that do, unleſs he will ſay, that the Papiſts have no ſcruple of Conſcience, as to ſuch things; but if notwithſtanding theſe ſcruples, our Laws put a juſt reſtraint upon them, then the Rule of Forbearance, Rom. 14. is no obligatory Law to Chriſtians in all Ages; and conſequently, notwithſtanding that, our Church may juſtly require the obſervation of ſome things, tho' it leaves others undetermin'd.

But he ſaith, theſe Cuſtoms though left indifferent, are ſtill obſerved among us, and practiſed by all the leading Church-men. And what then? are they lawful, or are they not? If not, why are they not proved to be unlawful? And if that were proved, what is all this to the point of Separation, unleſs they were enjoined to all People, and made terms of Communion, i. e. that perſons were not allowed to joyn in all Acts of Communion with us, unleſs they did them. However, he thinks this will prove (What, that they differ from us in any ſubſtantial part of Worſhip? No, he dares not ſay that: But what then?) that we differ in more than a circumſtance, even at leaſt in a circumſtantial part of Worſhip, yet we muſt be ſuppoſed to be agreed. To convince the Reader, what an admirable faculty of proving this Man hath, let him but look on the thing he undertook to prove. I had ſaid, that we were agreed in the ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip; this he undertakes to diſprove, for two or three leaves together, and the concluſion is, that at leaſt we differ in a circumſtantial part of Worſhip, and his conſequence muſt be, therefore we differ in a ſubſtantial, or elſe it is idle and impertinent talk. T. G. would have been aſhamed to have argued after this faſhion: but they are to be pitied, they both do as well as their Cauſe will bear.

Yet Mr. A. cannot give over, for he hath a very good will at proving ſomething againſt our Church, although he hath very ill luck in the doing of it. My argument was, "If it be lawful to ſeparate upon "pretence of greater purity, where there is an agreement in Doctrine, "and the ſubſtantial parts in Worſhip; then a bare difference in opini- "on, as to ſome circumſtantials of Worſhip; and the beſt conſtitution of "Churches will be a ſufficient ground to break Communion and to ſet "up new Churches. Hitherto we have conſidered his denial of the Antecedent; and the charge he hath brought againſt our Church, about new ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip; we now come to his denying the Conſequence, viz. that although it be granted that there is an agreement in Doctrine and the ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip, yet he will not allow it to follow, that a bare difference in opinion as to ſome circum-

Yet Mr. A. cannot give over, for he hath a very good will at proving ſomething againſt our Church, although he hath very ill luck in the doing of it. My argument was, “If it be lawful to ſeparate upon
“ and the ſubſtantial parts in Worſhip; then a bare difference in opini“ on, as to ſome circumſtantials of Worſhip; and the beſt conſtitution of “ Churches will be a ſufficient ground to break Communion and to ſet “ up new Churches. Hitherto we have conſidered his denial of the Antecedent; and the charge he hath brought againſt our Church, about new ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip; we now come to his denying the Conſequence, viz. that although it be granted that there is an agreement in Doctrine and the ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip, yet he will not allow it to follow, that a bare difference in opinion as to ſome circum-

ſtantials will be ſufficient ground to break Communion and to ſet up new Churches. To underſtand the conſequence we muſt ſuppoſe, 1. An agreement in the ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip. 2. A Separation, for greater purity of Worſhip. And what then can juſtifie this Separation, but a difference of Opinion as to ſome circumſtantials in Worſhip? Hold, ſaith he, the conſequence is not good, for there are certain middle things, between ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip and bare circumſtances, about which it will be lawful to divide, though otherwiſe we agree in doctrine, and the ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip. So that here a Separation is juſtified (1.) on the account of ſuch things, which are confeſſed to be neither ſubſtantial nor circumſtantial parts of Worſhip, (2.) Although there be an agreement in the ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip; and conſequently, although theſe middle kind of things be not made ſubſtantial parts of worſhip. For that he charged us with in the Antecedent; and now allowing the Antecedent and denying the Conſequence, he muſt grant, that it is lawful to ſeparate on the account of Ceremonies, although they be made no parts of worſhip at all. For if they be neither ſubſtantial nor circumſtantial parts of Worſhip, they can be none at all; and yet he ſaith, it is lawful to divide about them. And which is more pleaſant, when he goes about to prove the lawfulneſs of ſeparating for the ſake of theſe things, he doth it by undertaking to ſhew, that they are made ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip. For thus he argues, The Church of England hath exalted theſe things, i. e. Ceremonies, to a high preferment in worſhip, to ſignifie the ſame things with the Sacramental Elements, to make them neceſſary to ſalvation as far as Man can make them; and therefore they conclude them ſinful. If their preferment in Worſhip makes them ſinful, then they muſt be either ſubſtantial, or circumſtantial parts of Worſhip, and their ſeparation is not upon the account of their being Ceremonies, but thoſe Ceremonies are ſuppoſed to be made Parts of Worſhip, which I have anſwer'd already.

§. 33. But after all our arguings about theſe matters, Mr. A. ſaith, the Controverſie ſtands ſtill, where it did theſe hundred years and more: I utterly deny that, for the Nonconformiſts have advanced more towards Separation theſe laſt ten years, than they did in a hundred years before; as appears by the foregoing diſcourſe. However, they are ſtill unſatisfied in Conſcience about theſe matters, and ſo long they cannot join with us, and our Church excommunicates thoſe who condemn our ceremonies; ſo that there appears from hence a neceſſity of ſeparation; and if it be neceſſary it cannot be denied to be lawful. This is the faireſt remaining Plea for Separation, which I ſhall conſider both ways. (1.) As it reſpects the Church's cenſures. (2.) As it reſpects the judgment of Conſcience.

1. Anſwer to Serm. p. 47, 48. Plea for Peace, p. 232. 233.

1. As it reſpects the Church's cenſures. This Mr. B. often inſiſts upon. The Canons, ſaith he, excommunicate ipſo facto, all that ſay the impoſed Conformity is unlawful. If this be unjuſt, is it ſeparation to be ſo excommunicated? And who is the Schiſmatick here? Would you have excommunicate Men communicate with you? And if Men be wrongfully excommunicate, are they thereby abſolved from all publick Worſhipping of God? or do they loſe their Right to all Church-communion? To this I anſwer, That the Excommunication denounced, is not againſt ſuch as modeſtly ſcruple the lawfulneſs of things impoſed, but againſt thoſe who obſtinately affirm it? The words of the Canon are not, as Mr. B. quotes them, If any one do but affirm any thing in the Liturgy, Ceremonies, &c. to be unlawful are excommunicate, ipſo facto; but whoſoever ſhall Affirm the Ceremonies of the Church of England, eſtabliſhed by Law, to be impious, Anti-Chriſtian, or Superſtitious, let him be Excommunicate ipſo facto. Mr. B.'s words bear quite another ſenſe from thoſe of the Canon; for to ſay, if any Man do but affirm, &c. it implies that a bare ſingle affirmation incurrs excommunication ipſo facto; but when the Canon ſaith, if any ſhall affirm, &c. it implies, theſe circumſtances which according to the common ſenſe of Mankind do deſerve excommunication, viz. that it be done publickly and obſtinately: (Both which the word Affirm will bear.) For, as S. Auguſtin very well ſaith, every Man's error is born with, until he either finds an accuſer, or he obſtinately defends his opinion. Tam diu ſuſtinetur peccatum aut error cujuſlibet, donec aut accuſatorem inveniat, aut pravam opinionem pertinaci animoſitate defendat. All excommunication doth ſuppoſe precedent admonition, according to the Rule, If he will not hear the Church, let him be as an Heathen, or a Publican. Therefore general excommunications although they be latæ ſententiæ, as the Canoniſts ſpeak, do not affect particular perſons, until the evidence be notorious, not only of the bare fact but of the contumacy joined with it. Beſides, ſuch excommunications which are de jure & latæ ſententiæ, are rather to be looked on as Comminations, than as formal excommunications. For Gerſon putting the queſtion, what the effect of ſuch excommunications is? he anſwers, that it is no more than this, that there needs no new judicial proceſs, but upon proof or confeſſion the Judge may pronounce the ſentence. Which, he ſaith, he learnt from his Maſter, who was Pet. de Alliaco the famous Cardinal of Cambray. And if it requires a new ſentence, then it doth not actually excommunicate. But of this the learned Arch-biſhop of Spalato hath diſcourſed at large; to whom I refer the Reader. As to the practice of Canon Law in England, Lyndwood ſaith, that a declaratory ſentence of the Judge is neceſſary, notwithſtanding the Excommunication ipſo facto. And it is a Rule in our Church, that Perſons excommunicate are to be publickly denounced excommunicate in a Cathedral or Parochial Church every ſix Months, that others may have notice of them; and until the ſentence be thus declared, I do not know how far particular perſons can think themſelves obliged to forbear Communion on the account of a general ſentence of excommunication, though it be ſaid to be ipſo facto. For although the ſentence ſeem peremptory, yet, ipſo facto, doth ſuppoſe a fact, and ſuch as deſerves excommunication in the ſenſe of the Church; of which there muſt be evident proof brought, before the ſentence can take hold of the Perſon. And to make the ſentence valid as to the perſon, there muſt be due execution of it; and the queſtion in this caſe then is, whether any perſon, knowing himſelf to be under ſuch qualifications which incur a ſentence of excommunication, be bound to execute this ſentence upon himſelf? which he muſt do, if he thinks himſelf bound to ſeparate from our Church on the account of this general excommunication. And ſo Mr. B. himſelf ſeems to reſolve this point; Although, ſaith he, we are excommunicated ipſo facto, yet we are not bound our ſelves to execute their ſentence; but may ſtay in Communion till they prove the fact, and do the execution on us themſelves by refuſing us. And ſo he hath fully anſwered his own objection. But can thoſe be called Schiſmaticks for not communicating ſtantials will be ſufficient ground to break Communion and to ſet up new Churches. To underſtand the conſequence we muſt ſuppoſe, 1. An agreement in the ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip. 2. A Separation, for greater purity of Worſhip. And what then can juſtifie this Separation, but a difference of Opinion as to ſome circumſtantials in Worſhip? Hold, ſaith he, the conſequence is not good, for there are certain middle things, between ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip and bare circumſtances, about which it will be lawful to divide, though otherwiſe we agree in doctrine, and the ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip. So that here a Separation is juſtified (1.) on the account of ſuch things, which are confeſſed to be neither ſubſtantial nor circumſtantial parts of Worſhip, (2.) Although there be an agreement in the ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip; and conſequently, although theſe middle kind of things be not made ſubſtantial parts of worſhip. For that he charged us with in the Antecedent; and now allowing the Antecedent and denying the Conſequence, he muſt grant, that it is lawful to ſeparate on the account of Ceremonies, although they be made no parts of worſhip at all. For if they be neither ſubſtantial nor circumſtantial parts of Worſhip, they can be none at all; and yet he ſaith, it is lawful to divide about them. And which is more pleaſant, when he goes about to prove the lawfulneſs of ſeparating for the ſake of theſe things, he doth it by undertaking to ſhew, that they are made ſubſtantial parts of Worſhip. For thus he argues, The Church of England hath exalted theſe things, i. e. Ceremonies, to a high preferment in worſhip, to ſanctifie the ſame things with the Sacramental Elements, to make them neceſſary to ſalvation as far as Man can make them; and therefore they conclude them ſinful. If their preferment in Worſhip makes them ſinful, then they muſt be either ſubſtantial, or circumſtantial parts of Worſhip, and their ſeparation is not upon the account of their being Ceremonies, but thoſe Ceremonies are ſuppoſed to be made Parts of Worſhip, which I have anſwer'd already.

§. 33. But after all our arguings about theſe matters, Mr. A. ſaith, the Controverſie ſtands ſtill, where it did theſe hundred years and more: I utterly deny that, for the Nonconformiſts have advanced more towards Separation theſe laſt ten years, than they did in a hundred years before; as appears by the foregoing diſcourſe. However, they are ſtill unſatisfied in Conſcience about theſe matters, and ſo long they cannot join with us, and our Church excommunicates thoſe who condemn our ceremonies; ſo that there appears from hence a neceſſity of ſeparation; and if it be neceſſary it cannot be denied to be lawful. This is the faireſt remaining Plea for Separation, which I ſhall conſider both ways. (1.) As it reſpects the Church's cenſures. (2.) As it reſpects the judgment of Conſcience.

1. 1. As it reſpects the Church's cenſures. This Mr. B. often inſiſts upon. The Canons, ſaith he, excommunicate ipſo facto, all that ſay the impoſed Conformity is unlawful. If this be unjuſt, is it ſeparation to be ſo excommunicated? And who is the Schiſmatick here? Would you have excommunicate Men communicate with you? And if Men be wrongfully excommunicate, are they thereby abſolved from all publick Worſhipping of God? or do they loſe their Right to all Church-communion? To this I anſwer, That the Excommunication denounced, is not againſt ſuch as modeſtly ſcruple the lawfulneſs of things impoſed, but againſt thoſe who obſtinately affirm it? The words of the Canon are not, as Mr. B. quotes them, them, If any one do but affirm any thing in the Liturgy, Ceremonies, &c. to be unlawful are excommunicate, ipſo facto; but whoſoever ſhall Affirm the Ceremonies of the Church of England, eſtabliſhed by Law, to be impious, Anti-Chriſtian, or Superſtitious, let him be Excommunicate ipſo facto. Mr. B.'s words bear quite another ſenſe from thoſe of the Canon; for to ſay, if any Man do but affirm, &c. it implies that a bare ſingle affirmation incurrs excommunication ipſo facto; but when the Canon ſaith, if any ſhall affirm, &c. it implies, theſe circumſtances which according to the common ſenſe of Mankind do deſerve excommunication, viz. that it be done publickly and obſtinately: (Both which the word Affirm will bear.) For, as S. Auguſtin very well ſaith, every Man's error is born with, until he either finds an accuſer, or he obſtinately defends his opinion. Tam diu ſuſtinetur peccatum aut error cujuſlibet, donec aut accuſatorem inveniat, aut pravam opinionem pertinaci animoſitate defendat. All excommunication doth ſuppoſe precedent admonition, according to the Rule, If he will not hear the Church, let him be as an Heathen, or a Publican. Therefore general excommunications although they be latæ ſententiæ, as the Canoniſts ſpeak, do not affect particular perſons, until the evidence be notorious, not only of the bare fact but of the contumacy joined with it. Beſides, ſuch excommunications which are de jure & latæ ſententiæ, are rather to be looked on as Comminations, than as formal excommunications. For Gerſon putting the queſtion, what the effect of ſuch excommunications is? he anſwers, that it is no more than this, that there needs no new judicial proceſs, but upon proof or confeſſion the Judge may pronounce the ſentence. Which, he ſaith, he learnt from his Maſter, who was Pet. de Alliaco the famous Cardinal of Cambray. And if it requires a new ſentence, then it doth not actually excommunicate. But of this the learned Arch-biſhop of Spalato hath diſcourſed at large; to whom I refer the Reader. As to the practice of Canon Law in England, Lyndwood ſaith, that a declaratory ſentence of the Judge is neceſſary, notwithſtanding the Excommunication ipſo facto. And it is a Rule in our Church, that Perſons excommunicate are to be publickly denounced excommunicate in a Cathedral or Parochial Church every ſix Months, that others may have notice of them; and until the ſentence be thus declared, I do not know how far particular perſons can think themſelves obliged to forbear Communion on the account of a general ſentence of excommunication, though it be ſaid to be ipſo facto. For although the ſentence ſeem peremptory, yet, ipſo facto, doth ſuppoſe a fact, and ſuch as deſerves excommunication in the ſenſe of the Church; of which there muſt be evident proof brought, before the ſentence can take hold of the Perſon. And to make the ſentence valid as to the perſon, there muſt be due execution of it; and the queſtion in this caſe then is, whether any perſon, knowing himſelf to be under ſuch qualifications which incur a ſentence of excommunication, be bound to execute this ſentence upon himſelf? which he muſt do, if he thinks himſelf bound to ſeparate from our Church on the account of this general excommunication. And ſo Mr. B. himſelf ſeems to reſolve this point; Although, ſaith he, we are excommunicated ipſo facto, yet we are not bound our ſelves to execute their ſentence; but may ſtay in Communion till they prove the fact, and do the execution on us themſelves by refuſing us. And ſo he hath fully anſwered his own objection. But can thoſe be called Schiſmaticks for not communicating with a Church, who are firſt excommunicated by that Church? Yes, in theſe caſes they may (1.) when there is a juſt and ſufficient Cauſe for that ſentence. For, otherwiſe, no Church could condemn any excommunicated Perſons for Schiſm; if it declared before hand, that all thoſe who held ſuch Doctrines, or condemned ſuch Practices, ſhould be excommunicated. To make this plain by Inſtances: Suppoſe the Churches of New England declared the ſentence of excommunication ipſo facto againſt all that oppoſe Infant-baptiſm; R. Williams and his Company oppoſe it; they upon this are actually excommunicated; may the Churches of New England call theſe Men Schiſmaticks or not? If they are Schiſmaticks notwithſtanding the ſentence of excommunication; then the denouncing this ſentence before hand doth not excuſe them from the guilt of Schiſm. By the Conſtitution of the Churches of France, every Miniſter that refuſes to ſubſcribe to the Orders among them is to be declared a Schiſmatick; Would this make ſuch a one not to be a Schiſmatick, becauſe this amounts to an excommunication ipſo facto? So in Scotland, 1641. Subſcription to the Preſbyterian diſcipline was required under pain of excommunication; if any had been excommunicated on this account, would this excuſe them from the charge of Schiſm, in the judgment of the Covenanters? By the Conſtitutions of Geneva, any one that oppoſes, or contemns the Authority of that Church for a year together, is liable to the ſentence of baniſhment for a whole year; as Calvin himſelf relates it. Suppoſe this were merely excommunication for ſo long; would not Calvin have thought them Schiſmaticks for all that? For he fully declares his mind in this caſe, on occaſion of a certain Non-conformiſt in an Epiſtle to Farell; where he adviſes that he ſhould be firſt ſummoned before the Magiſtrate; if that did not prevail, they ſhould proceed to excommunication of a perſon who by his obſtinacy diſturbed the order of the Church; which, ſaith he, is agreable to ancient Councils and the mind of God in Scripture; therefore let him that will not ſubmit to the Orders of a Society be caſt out of it. Here we ſee excommunication juſtified againſt ſuch as refuſe to obey the Orders of a Church; and much more certainly, if they publickly affirm them to be Impious, Antichriſtian or Superſtitious, as 8. Canon expreſſeth: And no Church in the world, but will think excommunication reaſonable upon the like grounds; and therefore if there be ſuch a thing as Schiſm, they may be guilty of it ſtill, although excommunication be denounced againſt them on ſuch accounts. (2.) If they proceed to form new Churches; as will appear evident to any one that reflects on the former inſtances; and let him judge, whether all perſons ſo excommunicated, would not have been condemned much more for Schiſmaticks, if they had ſet up new Churches in oppoſition to theirs. S. Auguſtin puts the caſe of good Men unjuſtly excommunicated; and he ſaith, they are to bear it with patience, for the peace of the Church, and ſuch will ſtill maintain the true faith, ſine ullâ Conventiculorum ſegregatione, without running into ſeparate Meetings; although they do believe themſelves unjuſtly excommunicated. Such as theſe, ſaith he, the Father which ſeeth in ſecret, will reward and crown in ſecret. This kind ſeems very rare, but there want not inſtances, yea, there are more than can be believed.

Letter out of the Country, p. 5, 6, &c.

2. As to the judgment of Conſcience. The Author of the Letter out of the Country lays the Foundation of the Separation upon the force of Scruples, mighty Scruples, Scruples of a long ſtanding, and of a large extent; Scruples that there is no hopes to remove, without ſome very over-poweriug impreſſion on mens minds. I am ſo much of another mind, that I think a little impartiality, and due conſideration would do the buſineſs; but as long as men read and hear and judge only of one ſide, and think it a temptation to examine things as they ought to do, and cry out they are ſatisfied already, there is not much hopes of doing good upon ſuch, but I think they can have no great comfort in ſuch Scruples. Men that really ſcruple things out of tenderneſs of Conſcience, are ſincerely willing to be better informed, and glad of any light that brings them ſatisfaction, and do not fly out into rage, and violent paſſion againſt thoſe who offer to remove their Scruples. Hath this been the temper of our ſcrupulous Brethren of late? Let their Scruples be touched never ſo tenderly, they cannot bear it, and take it extremely ill of thoſe who would better inform them. Mr. B. freely tells me, that he that thinks his own, or others reaſonings will ever change all the truly honeſt Chriſtians in the Land, (as to the unlawfulneſs of the things impoſed) knoweth ſo little of matters, or of men, or of Conſcience, as that he is unmeet to be a Biſhop or a Prieſt. What is the reaſon of ſuch a ſevere ſaying? Where lies the ſtrength and evidence of theſe Scruples? Why may not honeſt men be cured of their errors and miſtakes, as I am perſuaded theſe are ſuch which they call Scruples? Is there no hopes to bring the People to a better temper, and more judgment? For I know nothing more is neceſſary for the cure of them. Here is no depth of learning, no ſubtilty of reaſoning, no endleſs quotation of Fathers neceſſary about theſe matters. The diſpute lies in a narrow compaſs, and men may ſee light if they will. But what if they will not? Then we are to conſider, how far a wilful miſtake, or error of Conſcience, will juſtifie men? I ſay it doth not, cannot juſtifie them in doing evil; and that I am ſure breaking the Peace of the Church for the ſake of ſuch Scruples is. And this I had ſaid in my Sermon, which I take to be very material for our ſcrupulous Perſons to conſider. For ſuppoſe they ſhould be miſtaken, doth this error of Conſcience juſtifie their Separation, or not? If not, they may be in an ill condition, for all their Scruples, or their confidence. And ſo Mr. Baxter hath long ſince declared, that if we do, through weakneſs, or perverſeneſs, take lawful things to be unlawful, that will not excuſe us in our diſobedience. Our error is, our ſin, and one ſin will not excuſe another ſin. But Mr. A. ſaith, (1.) That I do ill to put together wilful Error and miſtake of Conſcience, when I ſay they do not excuſe from ſin, ſince there is ſo great a difference between a wilful Error, and a miſtake of ſimple ignorance. What ſtrange cavilling is this? when any one may ſee that I join wilful both to Error and Miſtake. And is not a Miſtake, or Error of Conſcience all one? If I had ſaid a Miſtake of ſimple Ignorance doth not excuſe from ſin, I had contradicted the whole deſign of that diſcourſe, which is to ſhew that there muſt be wilfulneſs in the Error or Miſtake, which doth not excuſe. For I ſay expreſly, if the Error be wholly involuntary, it doth excuſe. This is but a bad beginning in a Diſcourſe about Conſcience.

Miſchief of Impoſ. p. 72.

2. If no error will excuſe from ſin, why is the queſtion afterwards put by me, What error will excuſe? I anſwer, (1.) It is an exerciſe of patience, to be troubled with a cavilling Adverſary. (2.) Do not I ſay, as plainly as words can expreſs it, that a wilful error doth not excuſe from ſin? And the queſtion afterwards put, concerns the ſame thing; and the Anſwer I give to it is, if the error be wholly involuntary, it doth excuſe, but if it be wilful it doth not. Is this man's Conſcience full of Scruples that writes at this rate, with ſo little regard to the plain meaning and words of him whom he pretends to confute?

P.73. 3. He ſaith, I put one of the wildeſt Caſes that ever was put, viz. If a man think himſelf bound to divide the Church by ſinful Separation, that ſeparation is never the leſs a ſin for his thinking himſelf bound to do it. For (1.) It may be juſtly queſtioned, whether it be poſſible for a man in his wits, to think himſelf bound to divide the Church by ſinful Separation. What Sophiſters Arguments are theſe? As though we did not commonly ſpeak of the thing as it is, and not as the Perſon apprehends it. S. Paul did think himſelf bound to a ſinful perſecution, although he did not think it ſo when he did it. The Jews thought themſelves bound to kill the Apoſtles, which was wilful murder, and yet they were men in their wits. The falſe Apoſtles thought themſelves bound to divide the Church by a ſinful ſeparation. How then comes this to be thought ſo impoſſible a caſe as to the thing it ſelf? for I was not ſo fooliſh to put the caſe concerning men, who thought themſelves bound to commit a ſin, knowing it to be a ſin. (2.) He much queſtions, whether ever any did think himſelf bound to divide a Church, he may poſſibly think himſelf bound to avoid it. If he may think himſelf bound to do that which makes diviſions in a Church, it is ſufficient to my purpoſe. And did not the falſe Apoſtles do ſo, and have not others followed their examples? And thus, after other trifling Cavils to the ſame purpoſe, after his manner, he yields all that I ſay, and ſaith, It is freely granted by all the world, that wilful P.77. Error doth not excuſe from ſin. And after many words about the caſe of an erroneous Conſcience, he concludes, that I deliver nothing but the common Doctrine of all Caſuiſts; only he thinks it not pertinent to the matter in hand. Why ſo? was not the matter in hand about the duty of complying with an eſtabliſhed Rule? And was it not very pertinent to this, to ſhew how far an erroneous Conſcience may, or may not excuſe from ſin? But Mr. A. ſaith, it ſhould have been about the Power of Conſcience, concerning an eſtabliſhed Rule of man's making; and ſuch for which they have neither general nor particular warrant from God ſo to make. Is not this indeed to the purpoſe? Firſt to ſuppoſe an unlawful Rule impoſed, and then to enquire what Conſcience is to do about it. My buſineſs was to ſhew, that men were not in doubtful caſes to ſatisfie themſelves with this, that they followed their Conſciences; becauſe their Conſciences might err, and if that Error happened to be wilful, being contracted for want of due care what they did, might not only be ſinful in it ſelf, but imputed to them as ſins. Which all men who pretended any regard to Conſcience, ought to have an eye to: For why do they pretend Conſcience, but to avoid ſin? And if under a wilful error of Conſcience, they may ſtill be guilty of great ſins, as the Jews, and St. Paul were, then men ought not to ſatisfie themſelves barely with this pretence, that they do as their Conſciences direct them. This was the plain deſign of that part of my Sermon; and I leave any one to judge, whether it were not pertinent.

P.78. But he ſaith, the Errors of the Diſſenters, if they be ſuch, are wholly involuntary, and cauſed by invincible Ignorance. If they prove ſo, it will be the better for them. I hope they have better Arguments in their own breaſts for it than what appears in ſeme of their late Books; for neither a peeviſh, angry, ſcornful, provoking way of writing about theſe matters; nor a light, ſcurrilous, cavilling ſophiſtical Anſwer to a ſerious diſcourſe, are any great ſigns of ſuch an impartial endeavour after ſatisfaction, as Mr. A. boaſts of. I cannot tell how much they have read the Scriptures, and ſtudied this Controverſie; nor how earneſtly they have prayed for direction, but I have ſeen enough of their unfriendly debates, which give me no great ſatisfaction in this matter. But I leave this to God and their own Conſciences to judge, being very willing to hope and believe the beſt.

To return to the Author of the Letter. The main force of what he ſaith, lies in this, that thoſe who cannot conquer their Scruples as to communion with our Church, muſt either return to the ſtate of Paganiſm, or ſet up new Churches, by joining with the ejected Miniſters. This is new Doctrine, and never heard of in the days of the old Puritans, for they ſuppoſed men obliged to continue in the Communion of this Church, although there were ſome things they ſcrupled, and could not conquer thoſe Scruples. And this they ſuppoſed to be far enough from a State of Paganiſm.

But they ſcruple the uſe of the Sacraments with us; and much more living under ſome of our Miniſters. I never heard this laſt alleged for a ground of ſeparation till very lately, and it hath been conſidered already. And it is a very hard caſe with a Church, if People muſt fly into Separation, becauſe all their Mineſters are not ſuch as they ought to be. But if they do ſcruple joining in communion with our Church, I would fain know, whether as often as men do ſcruple joining with others, their Separation be lawful? If it be, it is a vain thing to talk of any ſetled Conſtitution of a Church, whether Epiſcopal, Presbyterian, or Independent; for this Principle overthrows them all. I will inſtance particularly in the laſt, as moſt favourable to ſuch kind of Liberty. And I need not ſuppoſe a caſe, ſince ſuch hath already happened ſeveral times in New-England. R. Williams is one remarkable inſtance, who ſcrupled many things in their Churches, and therefore could join no longer with them; and thought himſelf bound to ſet up a ſeparate Congregation among them; and the People who ſcrupled as well as he, choſe him for their Paſtor. What is there in this caſe, but is every whit as juſtifiable, as the preſent ſeparation? But did the Churches of New-England allow this for a juſt Cauſe? ſo far from it, that R. Williams publiſhed grievous complaints to the world, of the perſecution he underwent for it. Mr. Baxter mentions another inſtance ſince this, from the mouth of Mr. Norton, an eminent Miniſter of New-England, viz. of a Church that ſeparated from a Church, on the account of their Preachers having human learning; and upon all the applications and endeavours that could be uſed towards them, their anſwer was, That is your Judgment, and this is ours, i. e. they could not conquer their Scruples, and therefore muſt perſiſt in ſeparation, or return to Paganiſm. Mr. Cobbet of New-England mentions a third inſtance; one Obadiah Holmes being unſatisfied with the proceedings of the Church of Rehoboth, withdraws from their Communion, and ſets up another Aſſembly in the Town, and upon his obſtinate continuance therein, was ſolemnly excommunicated by them. And what the late differences among them concerning the Subject of Baptiſm and Conſociation of Churches may come to, time will diſcover. I would only know, whether if Mr. Davenport and the diſſenting party

And it is a very hard caſe with a Church, if People muſt fly into Separation, becauſe all their Mineſters are not ſuch as they ought to be. But if they do ſcruple joining in communion with our Church, I would fain know, whether as often as men do ſcruple joining with others, their Separation be lawful? If it be, it is a vain thing to talk of any ſetled Conſtitution of a Church, whether Epiſcopal, Preſbyterian, or Independent; for this Principle overthrows them all. I will inſtance particularly in the laſt, as moſt favourable to ſuch kind of Liberty. And I need not ſuppoſe a caſe, ſince ſuch hath already happened ſeveral times in New-England. R. Williams is one remarkable inſtance, who ſcrupled many things in their Churches, and therefore could join no longer with them; and thought himſelf bound to ſet up a ſeparate Congregation among them; and the People who ſcrupled as well as he, choſe him for their Paſtor. What is there in this caſe, but is every whit as juſtifiable, as the preſent ſeparation? But did the Churches of New-England allow this for a juſt Cauſe? ſo far from it, that R. Williams publiſhed grievous complaints to the world, of the perſecution he underwent for it. Mr. Baxter mentions another inſtance ſince this, from the mouth of Mr. Norton, an eminent Miniſter of New-England, viz. of a Church that ſeparated from a Church, on the account of their Preachers having human learning; and upon all the applications and endeavours that could be uſed towards them, their anſwer was, That is your Judgment, and this is ours, i. e. they could not conquer their Scruples, and therefore muſt perſiſt in ſeparation, or return to Paganiſm. Mr. Cobbet of New-England mentions a third inſtance; one Obadiah Holmes being unſatisfied with the proceedings of the Church of Rehoboth, withdraws from their Communion, and ſets up another Aſſembly in the Town; and upon his obſtinate continuance therein, was ſolemnly excommunicated by them. And what the late differences among them concerning the Subject of Baptiſm and Conſociation of Churches may come to, time will diſcover. I would only know, whether if Mr. Davenport and the diſſenting party party there, from the determination of their Synod, ſhould proceed to Separation, this Separation be juſtifiable or not? This is certain, that the Diſſenters there do charge their Brethren with Innovation and Apoſtaſie from their firſt principles; and ſay, their conſciences cannot comply with their Decrees: and if they proceed, thoſe Churches may be broken in pieces, by theſe principles of Separation. As the Separate Congregations in the Low Countries, moſt of them were by new Scruples, which the People could not conquer; for the Anabaptiſts commonly raiſed Scruples among their members, and carried away many of them. And ſo they had done in New-England, and diſſolved thoſe Churches before this time, if this principle had been allowed there, viz. that where People cannot conquer their ſcruples, they may proceed to Separation. No, they tell them, they muſt preſerve the Peace of their Churches, and if they cannot be quiet among them, the world is wide enough for them. So they ſent R. Williams and others out of their Colonies; notwithſtanding the far greater danger of Paganiſm among the Indians. This I only mention, to ſhew that no ſettled Church doth allow this liberty of Separation, becauſe men cannot conquer their Scruples. And upon the ſame ground, not only Anabaptiſts and Quakers, but the Papiſts themſelves muſt be allowed the liberty of ſetting up ſeparate Congregations. For, I ſuppoſe this Gentleman will not deny, but they may have Scruples too, many Scruples, and of long ſtanding, and among great numbers, and they have Prieſts enough at liberty to attend them. And by that time all theſe have ſet up among us, ſhall we not be in a very hopeful way to preſerve the Proteſtant Religion?

Theſe conſequences do flow ſo naturally from ſuch principles, that I wonder that none of thoſe who have undertaken to defend the Cauſe of Separation, have taken any care to put any ſtop to it, or to let us know, where we may fix and ſee an end of it; what ſcruples are to be allowed, and what not: and whether it be lawful to ſeparate as long as men can go on in ſcrupling, and ſay they cannot conquer their Scruples. Are there no Scruples among us, but only againſt the ſign of the Croſs, and God-fathers and God-mothers in Baptiſm, and kneeling at the Lord's Supper? Are there none that ſcruple the lawfulneſs of Infant-baptiſm among us? Are there none that ſcruple the very uſe of Baptiſm and the Lord's Supper, ſaying they are not to be literally underſtood? Are there none that ſcruple giving common reſpect to others as a ſort of Idolatry? Are there none that ſcruple the validity of our Ordinations, and ſay, we can have no true Churches, becauſe we renounce Communion with the Pope? What is to be done with all theſe, and many more Scruplers, who profeſs they cannot conquer their Scruples no more than others can do theirs about our ceremonies, and ſuch weighty things as the uſe of God-fathers and God-mothers.

T. C.'s firſt Anſwer to Whitg. p. 157.

§ 36. This I mention, becauſe this Gentleman ſeems to look on it, as a more dreadful thing than the ſign of the Croſs. For, having ſpoken of that, he adds, Nor is it in it ſelf of leſs weight (perhaps 'tis of much greater) that in Baptiſm the Parents are not ſuffered to be Sponſors for their Children, but others muſt appear and undertake for them: which he repeats ſoon after. And yet T. C. who ſaw as much into theſe matters, as any that have come after him, in the Admonitions declared, that this was a thing arbitrary, and left to the diſcretion of the Church. And in his firſt Anſwer he ſaith, For the thing it ſelf, conſidering that it is ſo generally received of all the Churches, they do not miſlike of it. So that, on the ſame ground it ſeems, all other Proteſtant Churches may be ſcrupled at, as well as ours; and yet not only this Gentleman, but Mr. B. ſeveral times mentions this, as one of the grounds of the unlawfulneſs of the Peoples joyning in Communion with us: nay, he calls this, his greateſt objection; and yet he confeſſeth, that if the Sponſors do but repreſent the Parents, our Baptiſm is valid and lawful. Now where is it, that our Church excludes ſuch a repreſentation? Indeed by Canon 29. the Parents are not to be compelled to be preſent, nor ſuffered to anſwer, as Suſceptors for their Children; but the Parents are to provide ſuch as are fit to undertake that Office. In the Bohemian Churches, there ſeems to be an expreſs compact between the Parents and the Sponſors; but there is no declaration of our Church againſt ſuch an implicit one, as may be reaſonably inferred from the conſent of the parties. For the Parents deſire of the Sponſors undertaking ſuch an Office for his Child is in effect transferring his own Right to them; and ſo they may be ſaid to repreſent the Parents. If our Church had appointed the Sponſors without or againſt the conſent of the Parents; then none could in reaſon ſuppoſe, that there was any implicit compact between them. But ſince they are of the Parents chooſing, what they do in that office, is ſuppoſed to be with their full conſent. If Baptiſm were ſolemnly celebrated as of old, at ſome certain ſeaſons only, and indiſpenſable occaſions required the Parents abſence, might not they appoint others to be Sponſors for their Children upon mutual conſent and agreement among themſelves? Our Churches not permitting the Parents themſelves to be Sponſors is but like ſuch an occaſion of abſence; and the intention of our Church is not to ſuperſede the obligation of Parents, but to ſuperinduce a farther obligation upon other Perſons for greater ſecurity of performance. If men be negligent in doing their duty, muſt the Church bear the blame, and this be pleaded for a ground of Separation from her Communion?

Ratio Diſcip. Fratr. c. 3. *Sect.*2.

But there is ſomething beyond this, which lies at the bottom of this ſcruple; viz. that the Child's Right to Baptiſm depends on the Right of the Parents, and therefore if the Parents be excluded, and only Sponſors admitted, the Children ſo baptized have no right to Baptiſm. For Mr. B's firſt Queſtion is, which way the Child cometh to have right to Baptiſm, any more than all the Infidels Children in the world? And his next is, whether the Church of England require any ground of title in the Infant, beſides the Sponſion of the fore-deſcribed God-fathers, and God's general promiſe?

Defect. of the Plea. p. 26.

I anſwer, (1.) The Church by requiring Sponſors doth not exclude any Title to Baptiſm, which the Child hath by the Right of the Parents. For the Sponſors may be ſuppoſed to appear in a threefold Capacity. 1. As repreſenting the Parents in offering up the Child to Baptiſm; and ſo whatever right the Parents have, that is challenged, when the Child is brought to be baptized. 2. As repreſenting the Child in the Anſwers that are made in Baptiſm; which is a very ancient and univerſal practice of the Chriſtian Church; for it was not only obſerved in the Latin Churches in S. Auguſtin's time, and in the Greek Churches in S. Chryſoſtom's, and hath ſo continued ever ſince, but the Æthiopick and Armenian Churches do ſtill obſerve it. 3. In their own capacity; when they promiſe to take care of the good education of the Child in the principles of the Chriſtian faith, in the charge given to them after Baptiſm. So that ſince one of theſe capacities doth not deſtroy another, they all ſucceeding each other, there there is no reaſon to ſay that the Church doth exclude the right which comes by the Parents.

Aug. ep. 23. Chryſoſt. in Pſal. 14.

(2.) If the Parents be ſuppoſed to have no right, yet upon the Sponſion of God-fathers, the Church may have right to adminiſter Baptiſm to Children. Not as though their Sponſion gave the right, but was only intended to make them parties to the Covenant in the Child's name and Sureties for performance. To make this clear, we muſt conſider, that adminiſtration of Baptiſm, is one conſiderable part of the Power of the Keys, which Chriſt firſt gave to the Apoſtles, and is ever ſince continued in the Officers of the Church. By vertue of this Power, they have Authority to give admiſſion into the Church to capable Subjects. The Church of Chriſt, as far as we can trace any records of Antiquity, hath always allowed Children to be capable Subjects of Admiſſion into the Chriſtian Church; but leſt the Church ſhould fail of its end, and theſe Children not be afterwards well inſtructed in their Duty, it required Sponſors for them, who were not only to take care of them for the future, but to ſtand as their ſureties to ratifie their part of the Covenant which Baptiſm implies. And the ancient Church went no farther as to the right of Baptiſm than this, for ſince the Power of the Keys was in the Church to give admiſſion to capable Subjects; ſince the Catholick Church did always judge Infants capable, there ſeemed to be no more neceſſary for their admiſſion than the undertaking of Sponſors in their name. All this appears from S. Auguſtine's Epiſtle ad Bonifacium; where he ſaith (1.) That the Child's benefit by Baptiſm doth not depend upon the intention of thoſe that offer him. For Boniface put the queſtion to S. Auguſtin about ſome who offered Children to Baptiſm, not for any ſpiritual benefit, but for corporal health; notwithſtanding this, ſaith S. Auguſtine, if the due form of Baptiſm be obſerved, the ſpiritual effect of it is obtained. (2.) That the Church's right is chiefly concerned in the baptiſm of Infants. For, ſaith he, the Children are offered to Baptiſm and the Spiritual Grace to be received thereby, not ſo much by thoſe in whoſe arms they are carried (for ſo the Sponſors uſed to carry them in their right arms) as by the whole Society of the Faithful. Tota ergo mater Eccleſia quæ in ſanctis eſt facit, quia tota omnes, tota ſingulos parit: ſo that it is by the Church's right, that he ſuppoſeth them to receive baptiſm and the benefits by it. (3.) That there is no neceſſity, that the Parents themſelves offer their Children. For he calls it a miſtake to think that Children receive the benefit in Baptiſm, as to the remiſſion of Original Guilt, on the account of their Parents offering them. For many are offered to Baptiſm by ſtrangers, and ſlaves ſometimes by their Maſters. And when Parents are dead, Children are offered by ſuch as take pity upon them; and ſometimes Children expoſed by Parents, and ſometimes as they are taken up by holy Virgins, which neither have Children, nor intend to have any. (4.) That the Anſwers made by the Sponſors in Baptiſm in the name of the Child, are a part of the ſolemnity of Baptiſm. Not as though the Child did really believe, yet it is ſaid to believe on the account of the Sacrament which ſuppoſeth faith. For the Sacraments becauſe of the reſemblance between them and the things repreſented by them, do carry the name of the things repreſented; as, ſaith he, the Sacrament of Chriſt's body after a certain manner is called his Body; and the Sacrament of his blood is called his blood, ſo the Sacrament of faith is called faith, i. e. the Baptiſmal Covenant ſuppoſing believing on one part, the Church ſupplies that part by the Sponſors, which cannot be performed by the Children. Thence he ſaith, ipſa reſponſio ad celebrationem pertinet Sacramenti, ſo that then the Church looked upon the Sponſors anſwering, as a neceſſary part of the ſolemnity of Baptiſm. Thence S. Auguſtine elſewhere ſaith, that the fide juſſores or Sureties did in the name of the Children renounce the Devil and all his Pomp and Works; and in another place he declares, that he would not baptize a Child without the Sponſors anſwering for the Child, that he would renounce the Devil, and turn to God, and that they believed he was baptized for the remiſſion of ſins.

(3.) Thoſe who think themſelves bound to baptize Children only by vertue of the Parents right, muſt run into many perplexing Scruples about baptizing Children, and be forced to exclude the far greater number of thoſe that are offered. For, (1.) They are not well agreed, what it is which gives Parents a right to have their Children baptized; whether a dogmatical Faith be ſufficient, or a juſtifying Faith be neceſſary? If ſaving Faith be neceſſary, whether the outward profeſſion of it be ſufficient? Whether that ought to be taken for a true profeſſion which is only pretended to be a true ſign of the mind, or that only which is really ſo? Whether profeſſion be required for it ſelf, or as a diſcovery of ſomething farther? Whether ſeeming ſeriouſneſs in profeſſion be ſufficient, or real ſeriouſneſs be required? What we muſt judge real ſeriouſneſs in profeſſion, as diſtinct from inward ſincerity? What contradiction may be allowed to make a profeſſion not ſerious? Whether beſides a ſerious profeſſion it be not neceſſary to be a practical profeſſion? and what is neceſſary for the judging a profeſſion to be practical? Whether beſides mere practical profeſſion the poſitive ſigns of inward Grace be not neceſſary? And whether beſides all theſe, actual confederation and joyning in Church Covenant be not neceſſary? And if it be, whether the Children of confederated Parents not being confederated themſelves, can convey a right to their Children? About theſe, and other ſuch like Queſtions, thoſe who go upon the Parents Right are in perpetual diſputes, and can neither give others, nor hardly themſelves ſatisfaction about them. (2.) The conſequence of this is, that they muſt baptize many with a doubting mind; and muſt exclude many more, than they can baptize. For Mr. B. ſaith, if he took a dogmatical faith it ſelf, or any ſhort of juſtifying for the Title and neceſſary qualifications of them I muſt admit, I would baptize none, becauſe I cannot know who hath that dogmatical faith, and who not. The like others are as ready to ſay, of his ſerious, voluntary, not prevalently contradicted, practical profeſſion; or at leaſt, that no man can baptize with a good Conſcience, till he hath upon good evidence throughly weighed the lives of the Parents, and is able to pronounce that the actions of their lives do not prevalently contradict their profeſſion. Others muſt reject all thoſe in whoſe Parents they do not ſee poſitive ſigns of Grace; or are not actually confederated with them. And upon all theſe ſeveral bars to the Parents Right, how few Children will be left, that a man can baptize with a ſafe Conſcience? Is not this now a more likely way to reduce the far greateſt part of Chriſtianity to Paganiſm than denying the lawfulneſs of Separation? Thus I have conſidered this main Scruple againſt the Uſe of entitling and Covenanting Godfathers, as Mr. B. calls them; and have ſhewed how little reaſon there is to make uſe of this as ſo great an objection againſt our Church's Communion.

Preface to Right to Sacraments

Conferences First Part. As to kneeling at the Communion, I find nothing particularly objected againſt that deſerving conſideration, which I have not anſwered in another place.

Miſchief of Impoſ. p. 85, 86, 87. Sect. 37. Mr. A. hath one thing yet more to ſay againſt the terms of our Church's Communion, viz. that upon the ſame Reaſon theſe are impoſed, the Church may impoſe ſome uſe of Images, Circumciſion, and the Paſchal Lamb. To which I anſwer,

(1.) That our Queſtion is about Separation from the Communion of our Church on the account of the terms that are impoſed; and is this a reaſonable pretence for men not to do what is required, becauſe they do not know what may be required on the ſame grounds? A Father charges his Son to ſtand with his Hat off before him, or elſe he ſhall not ſtay in his Houſe; at firſt the Son demurs upon putting off his Hat to his Father, becauſe he hath ſome ſcruples, whether putting off the Hat be a lawful Ceremony or not; not merely on the account of its ſignificancy, but becauſe it ſeems to him to be giving worſhip to a Creature. This he thinks ſo weighty a ſcruple, that he charges his Father with Tyranny over his Conſcience for impoſing ſuch a condition, on his continuing in his houſe, and thinks himſelf ſufficiently juſtified by it in his diſobedience and forſaking his Father's Houſe, and drawing away as many of his ſervants from him, as he can infuſe this ſcruple into. But let us ſuppoſe him brought to underſtand the difference between Civil and Religious Worſhip, yet he may upon Mr. A's grounds ſtill juſtifie his diſobedience. For ſaith he to his Father, “Why do you require me to put off my Hat in your Preſence, and to make this the condition of my ſtaying in your Houſe? Is it not enough that I own my ſelf to be your Son, and aſk you bleſſing Morning and Evening, and am very willing to ſit at your Table, and depend upon you for my ſubſiſtence? Are not theſe ſufficient Teſtimonies that I am your Son, but you muſt expect my obedience in ſuch a trifling Ceremony as putting off my Hat? You ſay, it is a token of reſpect; I ſay for that reaſon I ought not to do it. For, how do I know when you will have done with your tokens of reſpect? It is true, you require no more now, but I conſider what you may do, and for all that I know, the next thing you may require me will be to put off my Shoes before you, for that is a token of reſpect in ſome Countries; next you may require me to kiſs your Toe, for that is a token of reſpect uſed ſome where; and who knows what you may come to at laſt; and therefore I am reſolved to ſtop at firſt, and will rather leave your Houſe, than be bound to put off my Hat in your Preſence. Let any one judge whether this be a reaſonable ground for ſuch an obſtinate diſobedience to the Command of his Father. Or ſuppoſe a Law were made to diſtinguiſh the ſeveral Companies in London from each other, that they ſhould have ſome Badge upon their Livery Gowns, that may repreſent the Trade and Company they are of; would this be thought a juſt excuſe for any man's refuſing it, to ſay, “What do I know how far this impoſing Power may go at laſt? it is true, the matter is ſmall at preſent, but I conſider it as a Badge, it is a moral ſignificant Ceremony, a dangerous teeming thing, no man knows what it may bring forth at laſt; for how can I or any man living tell, but at laſt I may be required to wear a Fool's Coat. Would ſuch an unreaſonable jealouſie as this juſtifie ſuch a man's refractorineſs, in rather chooſing to loſe the privilege of his Company, than ſubmitting to wear the Badge of it? So that the fears of what may be required is no ground for actual diſobedience to what is required. (2.) There can be no reaſonable ſuſpicion that our Church ſhould impoſe any other Ceremonies, than what it hath already done, ſuppoſing that it might do it, on the ſame ground: Becauſe the Church hath rather retrenched than increaſed Ceremonies; as will appear to any one that compares the firſt and ſecond Liturgies of Edw. 6. And ſince that time no one new Ceremony hath been required, as a condition of Communion. But beſides, our Church gives a particular reaſon againſt the multiplying of Ceremonies: becauſe the very number of them, ſuppoſing them lawful, is a burden; of which St. Auguſtin complained in his time, and others had much more cauſe ſince; and therefore for that cauſe many were taken away, And withal, it is declared that Chriſt's Goſpel was not to be a Ceremonial Law. So that for theſe reaſons there can be no juſt fears that our Church ſhould contradict her own doctrine, which it muſt do, if it increaſed our Ceremonies, ſo as to make a new argument againſt them, from the number of them. (3.) There is not the ſame Reaſon for introducing the things mentioned by Mr. A. as for the Ceremonies in Uſe among us. For, (1.) As to the Uſe of Images, our Church hath fully declared againſt any Religious Uſe of them, in the Homilies about the Peril of Idolatry; and that from ſuch reaſon, as cannot extend to our Ceremonies: viz. from the expreſs Law of God, and the general ſenſe of the Primitive Church; which allowed and practiſed the ſign of the Croſs, at the ſame time when it diſputed moſt vehemently againſt Images. (2.) For Circumciſion, which he tells us, may be uſed as ſignifying the circumciſion of the Heart. He knows very well that our Church joins ſignificancy and decency together in the matter of Ceremonies; and no man can imagine that ſuch a kind of ſignificancy as that he mentions, ſhould be ſufficient to introduce ſuch a practice which is ſo repugnant to Decency among us. Beſides that St. Paul makes it ſo great a badge of the obligation to the Law, that he ſaith, If ye be circumciſed Chriſt profiteth you nothing: which was never ſaid of any of our Ceremonies. And whereas he ſaith, it is obſerved in Abaſſia as a myſtical Ceremony; he is much miſtaken, if their Emperor Claudius ſay true; for he ſaith, it is only a National Cuſtom without any reſpect to Religion, like the cutting of the face in ſome parts of Æthiopia and Nubia, and boring the ear among the Indians. And Ludolphus proves it to be no other, becauſe it is done by a woman in private, without any witneſſes. (3.) As to his Paſchal Lamb in memory of Chriſt our Paſſover that is ſacrificed for us; We owe greater Reverence to God's own Inſtitutions that were intended to typifie Chriſt to come, than to preſume to turn them quite another way to repreſent what is paſt. Eſpecially ſince Chriſt is become the great Sacrifice for the ſins of mankind. And he might as well have mentioned the Scape-Goat and the Red Heifer as the Paſchal Lamb; ſince they were all Types of the great Sacrifice of Propitiation. But why are things never uſed by the Primitive Church (for as to his ſtory of Innocent 2. be it true or falſe, it is nothing to us) brought to parallel our Ceremonies, when the great Reaſon of our Churches retaining any Ceremonies was declared from the beginning of the Reformation to be out of Reverence to the Ancient Church, which obſerved the ſame kind of Ceremonies?

Preface to the Common-Prayer.

Confeſſio Fidei Claudii Regis Æthiopiæ.

The only remaining pretence for the preſent Separation, is, that there is a parity of reaſon, as to their Separating from us, and our Separating from the Church of Rome. For ſo Mr. A. urgeth the argument, we Se- parate from them becauſe they impoſe doubtful things for certain, falſe for true, new for old, abſurd for reaſonable; then this will hold for themſelves becauſe they think ſo; and that was all I oppoſed to T. G. But is it poſſible for any man that pretends to be a Proteſtant Divine to think the caſe alike? When (1.) They confeſs our Doctrine in the 39 Articles to be true, we reject all their additional Articles, in Pius 4. his Creed, not only as falſe, but ſome of them as abſurd and unreaſonable, as men can invent, viz. that of Tranſubſtantiation; which is made by them the great trying and burning point. But what is there, which the moſt inveterate enemies of our Church can charge in her doctrine, as new, as falſe, as abſurd? nay, they all yield to the Antiquity, to the Truth, to the Reaſonableneſs of our Doctrine; and yet is not Mr. A. aſhamed to make the caſe ſeem parallel. But what new and ſtrong Reaſon doth he bring for it? You may be ſure it is ſome mighty thing; for he ſaith, preſently after it, that my Importunity hath drawn them out of their reſervedneſs, and they have hitherto been modeſt to their prejudice. Alas for him, that his modeſty ſhould ever hurt him! But what is this dangerous Secret, that they have hitherto kept in, out of mere veneration to the Church of England? Let us prepare our ſelves for this unuſual, this killing charge. Why, ſaith Mr. A. In the Catechiſm of the Church, this Doctrine is contained (It is matter of Doctrine then, I ſee; although we are confeſſed to be agreed in the 39 Articles, as far as they concern Doctrine. But what is this notorious Doctrine?) It is, ſaith he, that Infants perform Faith and Repentance by their Sureties. Did I not fear it was ſome dreadful thing; ſome notorious hereſie, condemned by one or two at leaſt of the four General Councils? But is it ſaid ſo, in plain words? or is it wire-drawn by far-fetched Conſequences? No, it is plain enough; for the Queſtion is, What is required of Perſons to be baptized. Anſw. Repentance whereby they forſake ſin; and faith, whereby they ſtedfaſtly believe the promiſes of God made to them in that Sacrament. Queſt. Why then are Infants baptized, when by reaſon of their tender age, they cannot perform them? Anſw. Becauſe they promiſe them both by their Sureties; which promiſe when they come to age themſelves are bound to perform. But I pray doth it hence follow, that Infants do perform Faith and Repentance, by their Sureties? Are not the words expreſs, that they promiſe both by their Sureties? And is promiſing and performance all one? I do not find it ſo by this Inſtance. For here was a greater matter promiſed, and nothing performed. It is true the Catechiſm ſaith, Faith and Repentance are required of them that are to be baptized: which ſuppoſeth the perſons to be baptized capable of performing theſe things themſelves. And then comes a Queſtion, by way of objection; why then are Infants baptized, &c. to which the ſenſe of the Anſwer is, that although by reaſon of their Age they are uncapable of performing the Acts of Repentance and Believing; yet the Church doth allow Sureties to enter into Covenant for them; which doth imply a Promiſe on their parts for the Children, and an obligation lying on them to perform what was then promiſed. And now let the Reader judge, ſince this horrible Secret is come out, whether this ought to be ranked in an equal degree as to the juſtifying Separation with the monſtrous, abſurd and unreaſonable doctrines of the Roman Church. And I know nothing can do them greater Service, than ſuch Parallels as theſe.

(2.) We charge them with thoſe Reaſons for Separation, which the Scripture allows; ſuch as Idolatry, perverting the Goſpel and Inſtitutions of Chriſt, and Tyranny over the Conſciences of men, in making thoſe things neceſſary to ſalvation, which Chriſt never made ſo: But none of theſe, can with any appearance of Reaſon be charged on the Church of England, ſince we profeſs to give Religious Worſhip only to God; we worſhip no Images; we invocate no Saints; we adore no Hoſt; we creep to no Crucifix; we kiſs no Relicks. We equal no traditions with the Goſpel; we lock it not up from the People in an unknown language; we preach no other terms of ſalvation than Chriſt and his Apoſtles did; we ſet up no Monarchy in the Church to undermine Chriſt's, and to diſpence with his Laws and Inſtitutions. We mangle no Sacraments, nor pretend to know what makes more for the honour of his Blood than he did himſelf. We pretend to no ſkill in expiating mens ſins when they are dead; nor in turning the bottomleſs pit into the Pains of Purgatory by a charm of words and a quick motion of the hand. We do not cheat mens ſouls with falſe bills of exchange, called Indulgences; nor give out that we have the Treaſure of the Church in our keeping, which we can apply as we ſee occaſion. We uſe no pious frauds to delude the People, nor pretend to be infallible, as they do when they have a mind to deceive. Theſe are things which the Divines of our Church have with great clearneſs and ſtrength of Reaſon made good againſt the Church of Rome; and ſince they cannot be objected againſt our Church, with what face can men ſuppoſe the caſes of thoſe who ſeparate from each of them to be parallel?

(3.) As to the Ceremonies in the Roman Church and ours, there are theſe conſiderable differences,

(1.) They have a mighty number, as appears by their Rituals and Ceremonials, and the great volums, written in explication of them; we, very few, and thoſe ſo very eaſie and plain, that it requires as great ſkill not to underſtand ours, as it doth to underſtand theirs. (2.) They place great holineſs in theirs, as appears by the Forms of conſecration of their Water, Oyle, Salt, Wax, Veſtments, &c. but we allow none of theſe, but only the uſe of certain ceremonies, without any preceding Act of the Church importing any peculiar holineſs attributed to them. (3.) They ſuppoſe great vertue and efficacy to be in them, for the purging away ſome ſorts of ſins; we utterly deny any ſuch thing to belong to our ceremonies, but declare, that they are appointed only for Order and Decency. (4.) They make their ceremonies being appointed by the Church to become neceſſary parts of Divine Worſhip; as I have already proved; but our Church looks upon them, even when determined as things in their own nature indifferent, but only required by vertue of that general obedience which we owe to lawful Authority. So that as to ceremonies themſelves there is a vaſt diſparity between the Roman Church and ours; and no man can pretend otherwiſe, that is not either groſly ignorant, or doth not wilfully miſunderſtand the ſtate of the Controverſie between them and us.

Thus I have gone through all the Pleas for the preſent Separation I could meet with, in the Books of my Anſwerers: and I have not concealed the force or ſtrength I ſaw in any of them. And however Mr. A. reproaches me with having a notable talent of miſrepreſenting my Adverſaries, (a thing which I have always abhorred, and never did it wilfully in my life, it appearing to me an act of injuſtice as well as diſingenuity) yet I do aſſure him, I have endeavoured to underſtand them truly, and Miſchief of Impoſ. p. 51.

to repreſent them fairly, and to judge impartially. And although I make no ſuch appeals to the day of Judgment as others do; yet I cannot but declare to the world, as one that believes a day of Judgment to come, that upon the moſt diligent ſearch, and careful inquiry I could make into this matter, I cannot find any Plea ſufficient to juſtifie in point of conſcience, the preſent Separation from the Church of England.

Monſeigneur,

DEux voyages que j'ay été obligé de faire, m'ont empéché de répondre auſſi toſt que je l'aurois ſouhaité a la Lettre dont Vôtre Grandeur m'a fait la grace de m'honorer. Comme j'étois ſur le point de vous en faire des excuſes, Monſieur de L'Angle eſt arrivé en ceſte Ville, qui me les a fait encore differer, dans l'eſperance, qu'il voudroit bien ſe charger de ma reponſe, & qu'elle pourroit par ce moien vous étre plus fidellement rendue. Il eſt vray, Monſieur, que ſi j'en croyois mon déplaiſir, je la remettrois encore a une autre fois; car je ne peux vous ecrire ſans un extreme douleur, quand je ſonge à la matiere ſur laquelle vous me commandés de vous dire mon ſentiment. Je croy que vous les ſçavés deja bien, & que vous ne me faites pas l'honneur de me le demander comme en ayant quelque ſorte de doute; vous me faites plus de juſtice que cela; & vous ne me comprenez pas au nombre de ceux, qui ont touchant l'Egliſe d'Angleterre une ſi mechante opinion. Pour moy, je n'en avois pas une ſi mechante d'aucun veritable Anglois, & je ne pouvois pas me perſuader qu'il y en eut un ſeul, qui crût qu'on ne peut éſtre dans ſa communion ſans haſarder ſon propre ſalut. Pour ceux qui ſont engagés dans le parti de l'Egliſe Romaine, j'en jugeois tout autrement. Ils ont des maximes particuliers, & agiſſent par d'autres intereſts. Mais pour ceux qui n'ont aucune liaiſon avec Rome, c'eſt une choſe bien ſinguliere de les voir paſſer juſqu' a cette extremité que de croir que dans l'Egliſe Anglicane on ne peut faire ſon ſalut. C'eſt n'avoir gueres de conoiſſance de la Confeſſion de foy, que tout le monde Proteſtant a ſi hautement approuvée, & qui merite en effect les loüanges de tout ce qu'il y a de bons Chreſtiens. Car on ne pouvoit rien faire de plus ſage que cette Confeſſion, & jamais les articles de foy n'ont été recueillis avec un diſcernment plus juſte, & plus raiſonable que dans cette excellente piece. On a raiſon de la garder avec tant de veneration dans la Bibliothequé d'Oxford, & le grand Juellus pour l'avoir ſi dignement defendüe, eſt digne d'une loüange immortelle. C'eſt d'elle dont Dieu ſe ſervit dans le commencement de la Reformation d'Angleterre, & ſi elle n'avoit pas étè comme ſon ouvrage, il ne l'auroit pas benit d'une façon ſi avantageuſe. Le ſucces qu'elle out, devroit fermer la bouche a ceux qui ſont les plus animés, & l'avoir veue trionpher de tant d'Obſtacles devroit faire reconnoitre a tout le monde, que Dieu s'eſt declaré en ſa faveur, qu'il eſt viſiblement mêlé de ſon établiſſement, & qu'elle a la verité & la fermeté de ſa parole, a qui elle doibt en effect ſa naiſſance, & ſon origine. Elle eſt aujourdhuy ce qu'elle étoit quand elle étoit formée, & on ne peut pas reprocher a Meſſieurs les Evêques qu'ils y ayent depuis cette terme lá, apporté quelque changement. Et comment donc s'imaginer qu'elle ayt changé d'uſage? & peut on rien voir de plus inique, que de dire, qu'un

Inſtrument que Dieu employa autrefois pour l'inſtruction de tant de gens de bien, pour le ſalut de tant de peuples, pour la conſolation tant de fidelles ſoit aujourdhuy devenüe quelque choſe de funeſte, & pernicieuſe. Si vôtre Confeſſion de foy eſt pure, & innocente, vôtre ſervice divin l'eſt auſſi. Car on n'y voit rien de tout qui tend a l'idolatrie; vous n'adorès que Deu ſeul; dans vôtre culte il n'y a rien qui ſe termine a la creature, & ſi l'on y trouve quelques ceremonies qui ne ſe rencontrent pas ailleurs, c'eſt faire profeſſion d'un terrible Theologie, avoir depouillé toute charité, ne ſçavoir guere ce que valent les ames, ne connoitre point la nature de choſes indifferentes, que decroire qu'elles ſont capables de perdre eternellement ceux qui s'y veulent aſſujettir. C'eſt avoir une même dureté que de croire que vôtre diſcipline eccleſiaſtique eſt capable de damner les hommes. Car ou a t'on jamais vû que pour des articles de diſcipline le ſalut des hommes ſe trouve intereſſê, & de choſes qui ne regardent que le dehors, & l'ordre de l'egliſe, & qui ne ſont que comme l'ecorce, & les envelopes de la verité, peuvent elles cauſer la mort, & gliſſer du poiſon dans une ame? Certes on ne les comprend jamais au nombre de verités eſſentielles, & comme il n'y a que celles cy qui ſauvent, il n'y a qu'elles auſſi qui peuvent exclurre du ſalut. Pour le gouvernement Epiſcopal, qu'a t'il qui ſoit dangereux, & qui puiſſe raiſonnablement alarmer des conſciences? & s'il eſt capable de priver de la gloire eternelle, & de boucher les avenües du ciel, qui eſt ce qui y eſt entré l'eſpace de plus de quinze cents ans? Puiſque pendant tout ce temps la, toutes les Egliſes du monde n'ont point eu d'autre governement. S'il étoit contraire a la verité & a l'aquiſition du bonheur eternel, eſt il croyable que Dieu l'eut ſi hautement approuvé, & qu'il eut permis que pendant tant de ſiecles ſon Egliſe en euſt été tyranniſé? Car qui eſt ce qui l'a gouverné, qui eſt ce qui a compoſé ſes conciles tant generaux que particuliers, qui eſt ce qui a combatu les Hereſies dont elle a eſté de tout temps attaqué? ont ce pas été les Evéques, & n'eſt ce pas a leur ſage conduite, que la parole de Dieu eſt redevable, apres Dieu, de ſes victoires & de ſes triomphes. Et ſans remonter juſqu'au berceau, & la naiſſance de l'Egliſe, qui eſt ce qui dans le ſiecle precedent delivra l'Angleterre, de l'Erreur dont elle étoit envelopée? Qui eſt ce qui y fit reſveiller ſi miraculuſement la verité? fut ce pas le zele, & la fermeté des evêques, & leur miniſtere? degagea t'il pas les Anglois de l'oppreſſion ſous laquelle ils gemiſſoient de puis ſi long temps; & leur exemple aida't y pas puiſſamment a la Reformation de toute l'Europe? En verité je croy qui'ls en pouvroient uſer comme fiſt autrefois Gregoire de Nazianze au milieu de Conſtantinople. Quand il y arriva, il trouva que l'Arianiſme y avoit fait de fort grand progres, cependant, ſon courage, ſon zele, ſon ſçavoir affoblioent ſi forte le parti des Heretiques, qu'en peu de temps la verité y apparut plus belle que jamais, & il volut que le Temple ou il l'avoit ſi fortement appuiée portoit le nom d'Anaſtaſie, parce qu'il l'y avoit comme deterrée, & degagée de deſſous l'erreur, & par ſes ſoins continuels, il y avoit comme fait ſortir du tombeau, & glorieuſement reſuſcitée, c'eſt ce qu'ont fait auſſi les Eveſques d'Angleterre. Ils voyoient non une verité ſeulement, mais quaſi toutes les verités fondamentales enſevelies ſous un nombre eſpouvantables d'Erreurs. Ils voyoient le joug de Rome plus peſant au milieu d'eux qu'il n'étoit nulle part ailleurs. La difficulté qu'il y avoit a reüſſir dans la Reformation étoit capable de décourager des perſonnes d'une capacité, & d'une zele mediocre, & neantmoins rien ne les detourne d'un ſi genereux deſſein. Les ennemis de dehors, ceux de dedans, tous terribles qu'ils paruſſent, ne les intimident point; ils entreprenent ce grand ouvrage, & ne l'abandonnent point qu'ils n'en ſoient venus au bout, & qu'ils n'ayent remis ſur le throne la verité reſuſcitée. En ſorte qu'ils pouvoient laiſſer par tout des monuments de ce miracle & nommer juſtement toutes leur Egliſes du nom d'Anaſtaſie & de reſurrection. Mais ſi ce Tiltre manque a leur Temples, la choſe en ſoy leur convient, & l'on n'entend reſſonner au milieu d'eux que les Leſſons, & les Loüanges de la pure Verité. Ce que doit obliger tous les gens de bien à ne s'en ecarter pas, & a regarder l'Egliſe Anglicane comme une Egliſe tres Orthodox. C'eſt ce qui font les Proteſtants de France, ceux de Geneva: ceux de Suiſſe, & d'Allemagne, & ceux d'Hollande auſſi. Car ils ſe firent un fort grand honneur, d'avoir dans leur Concile de Dordrecht des Theologiens d'Angleterre, & monſtrerent bien qu'ils avoient pour l'Egliſe Anglicane une profonde veneration. Et d'ou vient donc, que des Anglois mêmes en ont aujourdhuy ſi mechante opinion, & rompre ſi temerairement comme ils font, avec Elle? eſt ce pas rompre avec toute l'Egliſe Ancienne, avec toutes les Egliſes Oriéntales, avec toutes les Egliſes Proteſtantes qui ont toujours fort conſideré la pureté de celle d'Angleterre? eſt ce pas une horrible dureté que de l'excommunier ſans miſericorde, & s'en faire etrangement a croire que de s'imaginer qu'ils ſoient le ſeuls en Angleterre & même au milieu de tout le monde chriſtien, qui ſoient deſtinés au bonheur eternel & a ſouſtenir, comme il faut, le verites neceſſaires au ſalut. Certes on pourroit faire un parallele fort odieux entre ces Docteurs, & le Pape Victor, qui volut excommunier les Egliſes d'Aſie par ce qu'elles ne celebroient le feſte de Paſque au même jour que Rome le faiſoit; entre eux & les Audiens, qui rompoient avec les Chriſtiens, & ne vouloient point ſuffrir d'Evêques riches. Entre eux & le Donatiſtes, qui ne vouloient point de communion avec ceux qui avoient eſté ordines par des Evêques laches, & qui s'imaginoient que leur ſocieté étoit la veritable Egliſe, & lépouſe bien aimée qui paiſſoit ſon troupeau vers le midi. Entre eux & ceux de la communion Romaine, qui ont ſi bonne opinion de leur Egliſe, que hors d'elle ils ne s'imaginent pas qu'un puiſſe jamais acquirer le Salut. Pour moy quelque enclin que je ſois a la tolerance, je ne pourois pourtant me perſuader qu'il en faille avoir pour ceux qui en ont ſi peu pour les autres, & que s'ils étoient les maitres feroient aſſurement un mauvais quartiér a ceux qui dependroient d'eux. Je regarde ces gens là, comme de perturbateurs de l'Eſtat, & de l'Egliſe, & qui ſont infalliblement animès d'un eſprit de ſedition. J'ay même de la paine a croire qu'ils ſoient juſtement ce qu'ils diſent eſtre, & je craindrois bien que ſous ces Docteurs il n'y euſt des ennemis tres dangereux qui fuſſent cachés. Des Societés compoſées de telles perſonnes ſeroient extremement perilleuſes, & on ne les pourroit ſoufrir ſans ouvrir la porte au diſordre, & travailler a ſa propre ruine. Il y en a de compoſêes de perſonnes plus raiſonnables. Mais j'y voudrois qu'elles le fuſſent aſſez, pour ne ſe point ſeparer de celles qui compoſent l'Egliſe Anglicane; particulierement au terme ou nous ſommes elles devroient tout faire pour une bonne Reconciliation; & dans le conjuncture des affaires preſentes ils devroient bien s'aperçevoir qu'il n'y a qu'une bonne reunion qui puiſſe prevenir les maux dont l'Angleterre eſt menacée. Car pour dire la verité, je ne voi pas que leur Meetings ſoient de fort grand utilité, & qu'on puiſſe s'y conſoler davantage, que dans les Egliſes Epiſcopales. Quand j'eſtois a Londres, il y a bien toſt cinq ans, je me trouvay en pluſieurs aſſemblées particulieres pour voir comme on l'y pre- noit pour l'inſtruction du peuple, & la predication de la parole de Dieu. Mais j'avoüe que je n'en receus aucune edification. J'entendis un de plus fameux Non-conformiſtes. Il prechoit en un lieu ou il y avoit trois hommes, & ſoiſſante, ou quatre vingt femmes. Il avoit choiſi un texte touchant le reſtabliſſement des ruines de Jeruſalem, & pour l'expliquer, il cita cent fois Plinie & Vitruve, & n'oublia pas de dire en Italien ce proverbe, duro con duro non fa muro. Tout cela me parut hors de propos, fort peu a propos pour des femmelettes, & tres éloigné d'un eſprit qui ne cherche que la conſolation & l'edification de ſes auditeurs. Se Cantoner & faire un ſchiſme pour avoir la liberté de debiter de telles vanités eſt une fort mauvaiſe conduite; & les peuples paroiſſent bien foibles de quitter leur mutuelles aſſemblées pour de choſes qui meritent ſi peu leur eſtime, & leur preference. Je n'eſtime pas, qu'on ſoit en obligation de ſouffrir ce dereglement. Il eſt vray qu'autrefois on ſouffroit les Aſſemblées de Novatiens à Rome & à Conſtantinople, & que le Donatiſtes a voient en la premiere place quelque ſorte de liberté. Mais c'eſtoit les Eſtrangers, & cela même ne dura pas long temps & comme il y en avoit peu, cela ne tiroit pas en conſequence. Mais c'eſt un autre fait en Angleterre, & comme le bien de l'Eſtat, & de l'Egliſe depend abſolument de l'union du peuple ſur le poinct de la Religion, on n'y pourroit trop preſſer une union univerſelle. Mais il la faut procurer par les bonnes voyes, & comme Meſſieurs les Evêques ſont de perſonnes d'une grande experience, d'un ſçavoir extraordinaire, d'un zele, & d'une bonté, envers leur peuples veritablement paternelle, jeſpere qu'ils s'employeront a ce grand Ouvrage avec toute la prudence & la charité qui ſont neceſſaires pour faire reüſſir une ſi louable entrepriſe. Vous particulierement, Monſeigneur, dont la moderation & la capacité ſont reconnües de tout le monde, il ſemble que ce ſoit un deſſein reſervé pour vôtre grande Sageſſe, & ſi vous n'y reuſciſtes pas, apparemment que tous les autres y travailleront inutilement. Pour moy, je ne puis contribuer d'icy que de voeus, & que de prieres; auſſi vous puis bien proteſter que j'en fais tous les jours de fort ſinceres pour la proſperité de l'Egliſe Anglicane, & pour qu'il plaiſe a Dieu faire en ſorte, que tous les Proteſtants d'Angleterre ne ſoyent a l'avenir qu'un cœur, & qu'une ame. Je prie Voſtre Grandeur d'en eſtre bien perſuadé, & de croire qu'il n'eſt pas poſſible d'eſtre avec plus de reſpect que je le ſuis,

Monſeigneur,

Obeiſſant Serviteur,

Firſt Letter.

A Letter from Monſieur le Moyne, Profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden, to my Lord Biſhop of London, concerning the nature of our preſent Differences, and the unlawfulneſs of Separation from the Church of England.

MY LORD,

TWO Journeys that I have been obliged to take, have hindred me from anſwering the Letter, with which your Lordſhip did me the favour to honour me, ſo ſoon as I could have wiſhed. Juſt as I was about to excuſe my ſelf to you for it, Monſieur de l'Angle came to this Town, which made me defer it longer yet, in hopes that he would charge himſelf with my anſwer, and that by that means it might be brought unto you more ſafely. It is true, my Lord, that if I ſhould hearken to my own unwillingneſs, I ſhould put it off ſtill to another time; for I cannot write unto you without being extreamly grieved, when I think upon the matter, of which you command me to tell you my opinion. I believe that you know it already, and that you do not do me the honour to ask it of me, as if you had any kind of doubt of it. You do me more right than ſo; and you do not account me of the number of thoſe that have ſo ill an opinion of the Church of England. For my part I had not ſo bad a one of any true Engliſh-man, and I could not have perſwaded my ſelf that there had been ſo much as one, which had believed that a man could not be of her Communion, without hazarding his own Salvation. For thoſe that are engaged in the party of the Church of Rome, I judged quite otherwiſe of them; they have particular Maxims, and act by other intereſts. But for thoſe that have no tye to Rome, it is a very ſtrange thing to ſee them come to that extream, as to believe that a man cannot be ſaved in the Church of England. This is not to have much knowledge of that Confeſſion of Faith, which all the Proteſtant World has ſo highly approved, and which does really deſerve the praiſes of all good Chriſtians that are, For there cannot be any thing made more wiſe than that Confeſſion, and the Articles of Faith were never collected with a more juſt and reaſonable diſcretion than in that excellent piece. There is great reaſon to keep it with ſo much veneration in the Library of Oxford; and the great Jewell deſerves immortal praiſe for having ſo worthily defended it. It was this that God made uſe of in the beginning of the Reformation of England. And if it had not been as it were his work, he had never bleſſed it in ſo advantagious a manner. The ſucceſs that it has had, ought to ſtop the mouth of thoſe that are the moſt paſſionate, and its having triumphed over ſo many obſtacles, ſhould make all the World acknowledge that God has declared himſelf in favour of it, and that he has been viſibly concerned in its eſtabliſhment; and that it has the truth and confirmation of his word, to which in effect it owes its birth and original. It is the ſame at preſent as it was when it was made, and no one can reproach the Biſhops for having made any change in it ſince that time. And how then can it be imagined, that it has changed its uſe? And can there be any thing more unjuſt, than to ſay, that an inſtrument which God has heretofore employed for the inſtruction of ſo many people, for the conſolation of ſo many good men, for the ſalvation of ſo many Believers, is now become a deſtructive and pernicious thing? if your Confeſſion of Faith be pure and innocent, your Divine Service is ſo too: for no one can diſcover any thing at all in it that tends to Idolatry: You adore nothing but God alone; in your Worſhip there is nothing that is terminated on the Creature: And if there be ſome Ceremonies there, which one ſhall not meet with in ſome other places; this were to make profeſſion of a terrible kind of Divinity, to put off all Charity, not to know much what ſouls are worth; not to underſtand the nature of things indifferent, to believe that they are able to deſtroy thoſe eternally, that are willing to ſubmit themſelves unto them. It is to have the ſame hardneſs to believe that your Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline can damn any. For where has it been ever ſeen, that the ſalvation of men was concerned for Articles of Diſcipline, and things that regard but the out-ſide, and order of the Church, and are but as it were the bark and covering of the truth? Can theſe things cauſe death, and diſtil poyſon into a Soul? Truly theſe are never accounted in the number of eſſential truths; and as there is nothing but theſe that can ſave, ſo there is nothing but theſe that can exclude men from Salvation. For the Epiſcopal Government, what is there in it that is dangerous, and may reaſonably alarm mens conſciences? And if this be capable of depriving us of eternal Glory, and ſhutting the Gates of Heaven, who was there that entred there for the ſpace of fifteen hundred years, ſince that for all that time all the Churches of the World had no other kind of Government? If it were contrary to the truth, and the attainment of eternal happineſs, is it credible that God had ſo highly approved it, and permitted his Church to be tyrannized over by it for ſo many Ages? For who was it that did govern it? Who was it that did make up its Councils, as well general, as particular? Who was it that combated the Hereſies with which it has been at all times aſſaulted? Was it not the Biſhops? And is it not to their wiſe conduct, to which next under God, his Word is beholden for its Victories and Triumphs? And not to go back ſo far as the birth and infancy of the Church; who was it that in the laſt Age delivered England from the error in which ſhe was inveloped? Who was it that made the truth to riſe ſo miraculouſly there again? Was it not the zeal and conſtancy of the Biſhops, and their Miniſtry, that diſengaged the Engliſh from that oppreſſion under which they had groaned ſo long? And did not their Example powerfully help forward the Reformation of all Europe? In truth I think they might make the ſame uſe of this, as Gregory Nazianzen did heretofore at Conſtantinople. When he arrived there, he found that Arianiſm had made a very great progreſs in that place; but then his courage, his zeal, his learning did ſo mightily weaken the party of the Hereticks, that in a little time the truth appeared there again more beautiful than ever; and the Church where he had ſo ſtoutly upheld it, he would have to bear the name of Anaſtaſia; becauſe he had brought the truth as it were out of the earth and cleared it from the error that lay upon it; and by his continual cares had cauſed it, as it were, to come out of the Grave to a glorious Reſurrection. It is this too that the Biſhops of England have done; they ſaw not only one truth, but almoſt all the fundamental truths buried under a formidable number of errors; they ſaw the yoke of Rome heavier among them, than it was any where elſe: The difficulty that there was of ſucceeding in the Reformation, was enough to diſcourage Perſons of an ordinary capacity and zeal. Nevertheleſs nothing turns them from ſo generous a deſign; the enemies without, and thoſe within as terrible as they ſeem, do not fright them; they undertake this great work, and do not leave it till they had brought it about, and raiſed up the truth, and placed it again upon the Throne; in ſuch a manner that they might every where have monuments of this Miracle, and juſtly have called all their Churches by the name of Anaſtaſia, or Reſurrection. But if their Churches have not that title, the thing it ſelf belongs unto them; and you ſhall hear nothing diſcourſed of in theſe, but lectures and praiſes of the pure truth. Which ought to oblige all good men not to ſeparate from it; but to look upon the Church of England, as a very Orthodox Church. Thus all the Proteſtants of France do, thoſe of Geneva, thoſe of Switzerland and Germany, and thoſe of Holland too; for they did themſelves a very great honour in having ſome Divines of England in their Synod of Dort, and ſhewed plainly that they had a profound veneration for the Church of England. And from whence does it then come, that ſome Engliſhmen themſelves have ſo ill an opinion of her at preſent, and divide raſhly from her, as they do? Is not this to divide from all the ancient Churches, from all the Churches of the Eaſt, from all the Proteſtant Churches, which have always had a very great reſpect for the purity of that of England? Is it not horrible impudence to excommunicate her without mercy, and to make themſelves believe ſtrangely of her, for them to imagine that they are the only men in England, nay, in the Chriſtian World, that are predeſtinated to eternal Happineſs, and to hold the truths neceſſary to ſalvation, as they ought to be held? Indeed one might make a very odious Parallel betwixt theſe Teachers and Pope Victor, that would needs excommunicate the Churches of Aſia, becauſe they did not celebrate the Feaſt of Eaſter the ſame day that they did at Rome. Betwixt them and the Audeans that divided from the Chriſtians, and would not endure rich Biſhops. Betwixt them and the Donatiſts, that would have no communion with them that had been ordained by lapſed Biſhops, and imagined that their Society was the true Church, and the well-beloved Spouſe, that fed her flock in the South. Betwixt them and thoſe of the Roman Communion, who have ſo good an opinion of their own Church, that out of her they do not imagine that any one can ever be ſaved. For my part, as much inclined to Toleration as I am, I cannot for all this perſwade my ſelf, that it ought to be allowed to thoſe that have ſo little of it for other men: and who, if they were Maſters, would certainly give but bad quarter to thoſe that depended upon them. I look upon theſe Men as diſturbers of the State and Church, and who are doubtleſly animated by a Spirit of Sedition. Nay, I can ſcarce believe, that they are juſt ſuch as they ſay they are; and I ſhould be ſomething afraid, that very dangerous enemies might be hid under colour of theſe Teachers. Societies compoſed of ſuch perſons, would be extreme dangerous; and they could not be ſuffered without opening the Gate to diſorder, and advancing towards ones own ruine. There are ſome of theſe that are compoſed of more reaſonable Men, but I could wiſh they were reaſonable enough not to ſeparate from thoſe of which the Church of England is compoſed. Eſpecially in the caſe we are in, they ſhould do all for a good agreement; and in the preſent conjuncture of affairs, they ſhould underſtand that there is nothing but a good reunion, that can prevent the evils with which England is threatned. For to ſpeak the truth, I do not ſee that their Meetings are of any great uſe, or that one may be more comforted there, than in the Epiſcopal Churches. When I was at London almoſt Five years ago, I went to ſeveral of their private aſſemblies, to ſee what way they took for the inſtruction of the People, and the preaching of the Word of God. But I profeſs I was not at all edified by it. I heard one of the moſt famous Non-Conformiſts, he preached in a place where there were three Men and three or fourſcore Women? he had choſen a Text about the building up the Ruins of Jeruſalem, and for the explication of it, he cited Pliny and Vitruvius a hundred times, and did not forget to mention a Proverb in Italian, Duro con duro non fa muro. All this ſeem'd to me nothing to the purpoſe, and very improper for the poor Women, and very far from a Spirit that ſought nothing but the comfort and edification of his hearers. To cantonize themſelves, and make a Schiſm, to have the liberty to vent ſuch vanities, is very ill conduct, and the People ſeem very weak to quit their mutual Aſſemblies for things that ſo little deſerve their eſteem and preference. I do not think that any one is obliged to ſuffer this irregularity. It is true, that the Aſſemblies of the Novatians were ſometimes ſuffered at Rome and Conſtantinople, and that even the Donatiſts had ſome kind of liberty in the firſt of theſe places. But they were only ſtrangers; and that neither did not indure any long time; and as there were but few of them, that is not to be drawn into example. But it is another caſe in England; and ſeeing the good of the State and Church depends abſolutely upon the union of the People in the point of Religion, one cannot there preſs an univerſal union too much. But it ought to be procured by good means; and ſince the Biſhops are perſons of great experience, of an extraordinary knowledge, of a true fatherly zeal and goodneſs towards their people, I hope that they will employ themſelves in this great work with all the prudence and charity that are neceſſary to the ſucceeding of ſuch a commendable undertaking. You particularly, My Lord, whoſe moderation and capacity are acknowledged by all the World; it looks as if it were a deſign reſerved for your great Wiſdom; and if you do not ſucceed, it is clear, that all others will labour in it but in vain. For my part, I can contribute nothing to it where I am, but Vows and Prayers; and of theſe I can proteſt that I make very ſincere ones every day for the proſperity of the Engliſh Church; and that it would pleaſe God to order things in ſuch manner, that all the Proteſtants of England for the future, might be of one heart and of one ſoul. I beg your Lordſhip to be well aſſured of this and to believe that it is impoſſible to be with more reſpect than I am,

My Lord,

Your moſt Humble and moſt Obedient ſervant,

Le Moyne.

A Paris l' 32. d'Octob.

Monſeigneur,

Rien ne vous a due paroiſtre ſi eſtrange ny ſi incivil que mon ſilence ſur la lettre que vous me fiſtes l'honneur de m'eſcrire il y a environ trois mois; Il eſt pourtant vray que je n'ay rien a me reprocher ſur cela, & a fin que vous le croyiez comme moy, vous voulez bien me permettre de vous dire comment la choſe s'eſt paſſée. Quand on m'apporta voſtre lettre, j'eſtois retombé dans une grande & violente fiebure dont Dieu m'a effligé durant quatre ou cinq mois, & qui m'a mené juſqu' a deux doits de la mort. Je priay un de mes amis, qui eſtoit alors dans ma chambre, de l'ouvrir & de me dire le nom de celuy qui me l'eſcrivoit, mais il ſe trouva que vous aviez oublié de la ſigner, ſur quoy je me l'a fis apporter, pour voir ſi je n'en connoiſtrois point le caractére; Et ce fut encore inutilement, par ce que juſqu'alors je n' avois rien veu de voſtre main: Cela me fit croire qu'elle avoit eſté eſcrite par celuy lá meſme qui l'avoit apportée, pour m'attrapper dix ou douze ſous de port; car ce petit ſtratageme eſt aſſez commun en cette ville: & aprez cela, je ne me mis pas fort en peine de ce qu'elle deviendroit. Elle ſe conſerva pourtant dans mon cabinet par le plus grand hazard du monde, & m'eſtant heureuſement tombée ſous la main, il y a deux ou trois jours, je la relus; & l'aiant trouvêe trop ſage & trop grave pour avoir eſté eſcrite par un homme tel que je me l'eſtois imaginé, je la monſtray à Monſieur Claude qui y reconnut d' abord voſtre eſcriture, & qui me dit que vous en eſtiez l'Auteur. Je penſe Monſeigneur que cela ſuffit pour me juſtifier auprez de vous d'un ſilence, qui bien que je n'en ſois aucunement coupable, ne laiſſe pas de me donner quelque eſpece de confuſion. Mais pour venir au contenu de voſtre lettre, je ne vous puis exprimer avec quelle douleur j'apprens que vos diviſions continuent, en un temps auquel il y a des raiſons ſi preſſantes de ce réünir; Ce que vous me dites ſur tout des eſcrits que l'on publie a cette heure, pour faire croire que la communion avec l'Egliſe Anglicane eſt illégitime, & que les Miniſtres ne la peuvent permettre aux particuliers ſans crime, me paroiſt une choſe ſi deraiſonnable en elle meſme, & ſi fort à contre-temps, que j'aurois peine a la croire ſi elle ne m'eſtoit atteſtée par une perſonne de voſtre mérite & de voſtre poids. Vous ſavez bien Monſeigneur quels ſont & quels ont toujours eſté mes ſentimens ſur cela, & la maniére dont j'en uzay il y a deux ans dans mon voiage d'Angleterre, en fréquentant vos aſſemblées, & en preſchant meſme dans un troupeau qui eſt ſous la Juriſdiction de l'Egliſe Anglicane, monſtre aſſez que je ſuis bien éloigné de croire que ſa communion ſoit illégitime; Et cela meſme prouve d'une maniére bien évidente, que mon ſentiment a cet égard eſt celuy de nos Egliſes, parce qu'il n'eſt pas imaginable que j'euſſe voulu faire, ſans néceſſité, une choſe qui m'euſt attiré l'indignation de mes fréres, & qui, a mon retour, m'euſt expoſe à leures reproches ou a leurs cenſures. Pleuſt a Dieu, Monſeigneur, que tout ce qu'il y a de Chreſtiens êgarez dans le monde vouluſſent recevoir voſtre Reformation, que je répandrois de bon cœur tout ce que j'ay de ſang pour leur procurer un ſi grand bien. Et que je ſuis aſſeuré de la joye extreſme avec laquelle nos Egliſes entreroient dans leur Communion, Si en eſtant dans la pureté de vos ſentimens pour les dogmes, ils ne differoient plus d'avec nous que par des Surplis, par des Cérémonies innocentes, & per quelque diverſité d'Ordres dans le gouvernement de l'Egliſe. Et cela, Monſeigneur, vous fait aſſez comprendre, ce que j'ay a reſpondre a voſtre ſeconde queſtion. Car puis que l'Egliſe Anglicane eſt une véritable Egliſe de noſtre Seigneur, Puis que ſon Culte & ſes Dogmes ſont purs, & n'ont rien de contraire a la parole de Dieu, Et puis que quand la Reformation y a eſté receüe, elle y a eſté receüe, avec l'Epiſcopat. Et en y eſtabliſſant la Liturgie & les Cérémonies qui y ſont aujourdhuy en uzage, il eſt ſans doute du devoir de tous les Réformez de Voſtre Royaume de ſe tenir inſéparablement unis a Cette Egliſe; Et ceux qui ne le font pas, ſous ombre qu'ils deſireroient, plus de ſimplicité dans les Cérémonies, & moins d'inegálité entre les Miniſtres commettent aſſeurément un tres grand péché. Car le ſchiſme eſt le plus redoutable mal qui puiſſe arriver á l'Egliſe; Et pour l'éviter la charité Chreſtienne oblige tous les gens de bien a ſupporter en leurs fréres des choſes bien moins ſupportables que ne le doivent paroiſtre celles dont il s'agit, aux yeux de ceux lá meſmes qui les ont le plus en averſion: Et c'eſtoit lá ſi bien le ſentiment de noſtre Grand & Excellent Calvin, que dans ſon traitté de la neceſſité de la Réformation, il ne fait point de difficulté de dire: Que s'il ſe trouvoit des gens aſsez deraiſonnables pour refuſer la Communion d'une Egliſe pure dans ſon culte & dans ſes Dogmes, & pour ne pas ſe ſoumettré avec reſpect a ſon Gouvernement, ſous ombre qu'elle auroit retenu l'Epiſcopat conditionné comme le voſtre, il n'y auroit point de cenſure ny de rigueur de diſcipline qu'on ne deuſt exercer contre eux. * Talem nobis Hierarchiam ſi exhibeant, in qua ſic emineant Epiſcopi ut Chriſto ſubeſſe non recuſent, ut ab illo tanquam ab unico capite pendeant & ad ipſum referantur, in qua ſic inter ſe fraternam ſocietatem colant ut non alio modo quam ejus veritate ſint colligati, tum vero nullo non anathemate dignos fatear, ſi qui erunt qui non eam revereantur, ſummaque obedientia obſervent. Et Beze meſme, qui n'approuvoit pas en général le gouvernement Epiſcopal, fait une telle diſtinction du voſtre, et eſt ſi éloigne de croire que l'on puiſſe, ou que l'on doive en prendre ſujet de ſe ſéparer de voſtre Egliſe, qu'il prie Dieu ardenment qu'elle puiſſe toujours de meurer dans l'heureux eſtat ou elle avoit eſte miſe et conſervée, par le ſang, par la pureté de lay foy, et par la ſage conduite de ſes Excellens Eveſques. * Quod ſi nunc Anglicana Eccleſia inſtaurata ſuorum Epiſcoporum & Archiepiſcoporum authoritate perſiſtat, quemadmodum hoc noſtra memoria contigit, ut ejus ordinis homines non tantum inſignes Dei Martyres, ſed etiam præſtantiſſimos Paſtores & Doctores habuerit, fruatur ſane iſta ſingulari Dei beneficentia, quæ utinam illi ſit perpetua. Mais, Monſeigneur, quoy que les premiers Auteurs de la ſéparation qui vout trouble ſoient extraordinairement coupables, et que ceux qui la continuent et qui la fortifient par leurs eſcrits dé raiſonnables et emportez le ſoient auſſy extrémement, il eſt neanmoins certain que dans la multitude qui les ſuit, il y a une infinité de bonnes gens dont la foy eſt pure et la pieté ſincére; et qui ne demeurent eloignez de vous que parce que leur ſimplicité eſt ſurpriſe, et qu'on les a effrayez par ces grands mots de Tyrannie, d'Oppreſſion, de ſuppoſts de l'Antechriſt dont on leur bat perpetuellement les oreilles: Je les mets au rang de ces foibles qui diſoient qu'ils n'eſtoient point du corps et dont St. Paul dit qu'ils eſtoient du corps pourtant; Et il me ſemble que les bons et charitables Eveſques comme vous, en doivent dire, quoy qu'en un ſens un peu différent, ce qu'Optat de Miléve diſoit des Donatiſtes de ſon temps, Si collegium

Second Letter.

My Lord,

NOthing may ſeem ſo ſtrange and ſo uncivil to you, as my ſilence upon your Letter you did me the honour to write me about three months ago. But yet it is true that in this caſe I have nothing to blame my ſelf for; and that you may believe it as well as I, you will give me leave to tell you how the matter happen'd. When your Letter was brought me, I was relapſed into a great and violent Fever, with which God has afflicted me for the ſpace of four or five months, and which has brought me very near the grave; I prayed one of my friends, which was then in my Chamber, to open the Letter, and to tell me the name of him that wrote it; but it chanced that you had forgotten to ſubſcribe it, upon which I made it be brought to me, to ſee if I did not know the Character; but it was to no purpoſe, becauſe till then I had not ſeen any thing of your hand. This made me believe that it had been written by the ſame man that brought it, to get ten or twelve Sous for the carriage; for that little ſtratagem is common enough in this Town. After this, I did not much trouble my ſelf what became of it; but yet it was preſerved in my Cabinet by the greateſt chance in the world; and being happily fallen into my hands two or three days ſince, I read it over again; and having found it too prudent and grave to have been written by ſuch a one as I had imagined, I ſhewed it to Monſieur Claude, who preſently knew your hand, and told me that you were the Author of it. I think, my Lord, this is enough to excuſe me to you, for a ſilence, for which though I am not any way faulty, yet I cannot chooſe but be ſomething aſhamed.

But to come to the contents of your Letter; I cannot expreſs to you with how much grief I underſtand that your diviſions continue, at a time in which there are ſuch preſſing reaſons for being Re-united. Above all, that which you tell me of writings that are at this time publiſhed, to make men believe that Communion with the Church of England is unlawful, and that the Miniſters cannot permit it to private perſons without ſinning, ſeems to me a thing ſo unreaſonable in it ſelf, and ſo very unſeaſonable now, that I ſhould ſcarce believe it, if it were not atteſted by a perſon of your merit and conſideration. My Lord, you know well what my ſentiments are, and always have been in this matter: and the way which I uſed two years ago, when I was in England, in frequenting your aſſemblies, and preaching too in a Congregation that is under the juriſdiction of the Church of England, ſufficiently ſhews that I am very far from believing that her Communion is unlawful. And this alſo proves very evidently that my opinion in this matter is the ſame that is holden by our Churches; becauſe it is not imaginable that I would without any neceſſity, have done a thing which would have drawn the diſpleaſure of my Brethren upon me, and which at my return would have expoſed my ſelf to be blamed, if not to be cenſured by them. My Lord, I would to God that all the miſtaken Chriſtians that are in the world would receive your Reformation; I would with all my heart ſpend all the blood I have to procure them ſo great a good. And I am ſure with what an exceeding Joy our Churches would enter into their Communion, if being pure in their Opinions for Doctrine, they differed no more from us, than by Surplices, and innocent Ceremonies; and ſome diverſity of Orders in the Government of the Church.

And by this, my Lord, you may perceive what I have to anſwer to your ſecond queſtion. For ſince the Church of England is a true Church of our Lord; ſince her Worſhip and Doctrines are pure, and have nothing in them contrary to the word of God; and ſince that when the Reformation was there received, it was received together with Epiſcopacy, and with the eſtabliſhment of the Liturgy, and Ceremonies, which are there in uſe at this day; it is without doubt the duty of all the Reformed in your Realm, to keep themſelves inſeparably united to the Church. And thoſe that do not do this, upon pretence that they ſhould deſire more ſimplicity in the Ceremonies, and leſs of inequality among the Miniſters, do certainly commit a very great ſin. For Schiſm is the moſt formidable evil that can befal the Church: and for the avoiding of this, Chriſtian charity obliges all good men to bear with their Brethren in ſome things much leſs tolerable than thoſe, of which the diſpute is, ought to ſeem, even in the eyes of thoſe that have the moſt averſion for them. And this was ſo much the opinion of our great and excellent Calvin, that in his Treatiſe of the neceſſity of the Reformation, he makes no difficulty to ſay; That if there ſhould be any ſo unreaſonable as to refuſe the Communion of a Church that was pure in its Worſhip and Doctrine, and not to ſubmit himſelf with reſpect to its Government, under pretence that it had retained an Epiſcopacy qualified as yours is; there would be no Cenſure nor rigour of Diſcipline that ought not to be exerciſed upon them. Talem nobis Hierarchiam ſi exhibeant, in qua ſic emineant Epiſcopi ut Chriſto ſubeſſe non recuſent, ut ab illo tanquam ab unico Capite pendeant, & ad ipſum referantur; in qua ſic inter ſe fraternam ſocietatem colant, ut non alio modo quam ejus veritate ſint colligati; tum vero nullo non Anathemate dignos fatear, ſi qui erunt qui non eum revereantur, ſummaq; obedientiâ obſervent. And Beza himſelf, who did not in the general approve of the Epiſcopal Government, makes ſuch a diſtinction of yours, and is ſo far from believing, that one may, or that one ought to take occaſion from thence to ſeparate from your Church, that he prays earneſtly to God that ſhe may always remain in that happy eſtate in which ſhe had been put and preſerved, by the blood, by the purity of the Faith, and by the wiſe conduct of her excellent Biſhops. Quod ſi nunc Anglicana Eccleſia inſtaurata ſuorum Epiſcoporum & Archiepiſcoporum authoritate perſiſtat, quemadmodum hoc noſtrâ memoriâ contigit, ut ejus ordinis homines, non tantum inſignos Dei Martyres, ſed etiam præſtantiſſimos Paſtores & Doctores habuerit, fruatur ſane iſtâ ſingulari Dei beneficentiâ, quæ utinam illi ſit perpetua.

Beza contra Sarrav. ad cap. 8. art. 3. pag. 270. Edit. Francof. anno 1601.

But, my Lord, although the firſt Authors of the Separation, which troubles you, be extraordinarily to blame, and though thoſe that continue it, and ſtrengthen it, by their unreaſonable and paſſionate Writings, tings, be extreamly ſo too; it is certain yet that among the multitude that follows them, there is a very great number of good men, whoſe faith is pure and whoſe piety is ſincere, and who remain ſeparate from you only becauſe their ſimplicity is ſurprized, and becauſe they have been frighted with the bugbear words of Tyranny, Oppreſſion, Limbs of Antichriſt which are continually beaten into their ears. I rank theſe with thoſe weak ones who ſaid they were not of the Body; and of whom St. Paul ſaid they were of the Body for all that. And it ſeems to me that the good and charitable Biſhops, ſuch as you, ought to ſay of them, though in ſomething a different ſenſe, as Optatus Milevitanus ſaid of the Donatiſts of his time, Si Collegium Epiſcopale nolunt nobiſcum habere, tamen Fratres ſunt. In the name of God then, my Lord, do all that poſſibly you can to bring them back to their duty by ſweetneſs and charity, which is only able to do great things on theſe occaſions. For men, who have always ſomething of Pride, do commonly oppoſe every thing that ſeems to them to act by bare Authority only: but they ſcarce ever fail to yield themſelves up to forbearance and condeſcenſion. Manſuetus homo, cordis eſt medicus.

I do not pretend, my Lord, to thruſt my ſelf in to give you any particular advice in this caſe; you that ſee things near at hand, and that have a heart deeply affected with Chriſtian Charity, will judge better than any man, what remedies are the moſt proper for ſo great an evil; and I am ſure that if there were nothing wanting to cure it, but the abſtaining from ſome expreſſions, the quitting ſome Ceremonies, and the changing the colour of ſome habits, you would reſolve to do that, and ſomething more difficult than that, with great pleaſure. And I think I have read in ſome part of the Vindiciæ of Mr. Dean of Windſor, that theſe were the charitable ſentiments which the Church of England declared by the mouth of three or four of her Biſhops, in a Conference that was held concerning the means of re-union, the firſt year that his Majeſty was reſtored; and that nothing hindred the matter from going farther, but ſome of thoſe Miniſters they call Preſbyterians. However it be, I pray God with all my heart, that he would open the eyes of the one to make them ſee the weakneſs of the reaſons upon which they ground ſuch an afflicting Separation; and that he would preſerve, and increaſe more and more in the other, that piety, that zeal, and that charity which they have need of for the happy proceeding to a re-union, which will rejoice men and Angels, and bring down a thouſand bleſſings of Heaven and Earth upon thoſe that ſhall contribute the moſt unto it. And I aſſure you, My Lord, I ſhould be paſt all Comfort if I ſhould ſee that ſome new attempt at leaſt were not made for the ſucceſs of a work ſo holy, and of ſuch conſequence, in a time that ſeems to me ſo proper for it. For beſides that the intereſt of your State, and Church do require it in ſuch an extraordinary manner; I hear that by a wonderful bleſſing of Heaven, all your Epiſcopal Sees are filled at this time with excellent ſervants of God, who love Jeſus Chriſt and his Church, and who have all the qualities of the head and the heart, which are neceſſary to make them able, and willing to contribute to this good work. And to judge of it by you, My Lord, and My Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and My Lord Biſhop of Oxford, whom I had the honour to ſee during my ſtay in England, I am eaſily perſuaded of it.

But I am afraid I have tired you with this long Letter; I humbly beg your pardon for it; and I beſeech you to be very well aſſured that I always preſerve a very grateful acknowledgement of the Friendſhip with which you honour me, and that I am with all the reſpect that I owe

vant,

De L'Angle.

Monſ. Claude my excellent Collegue, to whom I have ſhewed this Letter, has prayed me to tell you, with aſſurance of his moſt humble ſervice, that he would ſubſcribe this with all his heart, and that he is abſolutely of my Opinion.

The Third Letter, from Monſieur Claude, on the ſame Subject.

A Paris 29 Novemb. Stilo Novo.

Monſeigneur,

*Monſieur de l'*Angle m'ayant rendu la Lettre qu'il vous a plû m'écrire, j'ay eſté ſurpris d'y voir que vous m'aviez fait l'honneur de m'en écrire une autre que je n'ay point receüe, & à laquelle je n'euſſe pas manquè de faire réponſe. Vous me faites beaucop d'honneur de vouloir bien que je vous diſe ma penſée ſur le different qui vous trouble depuis longtems, entre ceux qu'on appelle Epiſcopaux, & ceux qu'on nomme Preſbyteriens. Quoy que je m'en ſois deja diverſes fois expliquè & par des Lettres que j'ay faites ſur ce ſujet à pluſieurs perſonnes, & dans mon livre meſme de la Defenſe de la Reformation, où parlant de la diſtinction de l'Eveſque & du Preſtre, j'ay dit formellement que je ne blame pas ceux qui l'obſervent comme une choſe fort ancienne, & que je ne voudrois pas qu'on s'en fiſt un ſujet de querelle dans les lieux où elle ſe trouve établie, pag. 366. & quoy que d'ailleurs je me connoiſſe aſſez pour ne pas croire que mon ſentiment doive eſtre fort conſiderè, je ne laiſſeray pas de vous temoigner dans cette occaſion, comme je feray toujours en toute autre, mon eſtime Chretienne, mon reſpect, & mon obeiſſance. C'eſt ce que je feray d'autant plus que je ne vous diray pas ſimplement ma penſée particuliere, mais le ſentiment du general de nos Egliſes.

Premierement donc, Monſeigneur, nous ſommes ſi fort éloignez de croire qu'on ne puiſſe en bonne conſcience vivre ſous voſtre diſcipline, & ſous voſtre Gouvernement Epiſcopal, que dans noſtre pratique ordinaire nous ne

faiſons nulle difficultè, ni de donner nos chaires, ni de commettre le ſoin de nos troupeaux à des Miniſtres receus & ordinez par Meſſieurs vos Eveſques, comme il ſe pourroit juſtifier par un aſſez grand nombre d'exemples & anciens, & recens, & depuis peu Mr. Dupleſſis ordinè par Monſieur l'Eveſque de Lincoln à eſté eſtabli, & appellè dans une Egliſe de cette Province, & Monſieur Wicart, que vous, Monſeigneur, avez receu au S. Miniſtere nous fit l'honneur il-n'y-a que quelques mois de Preſcher à Charenton à l'edification univerſelle de tout noſtre troupeau. Ainſi ceux qui nous imputent à cet égard des ſentimens éloignez de la paix & de la concorde Chretienne, nous font aſſurement injuſtice.

Je dis la paix & la concorde Chretienne, car, Monſeigneur, nous croyons que l'obligation à conſerver cette paix & cette concorde fraternelle, qui fait l'unité exterieure de l'egliſe, eſt d'une neceſſitè ſi indiſpenſable que S. Paul n'a pas fait difficultè de la joindre avec l'unite interieure d'une meſme foy, & d'une meſme regeneration, non ſeulement comme deux choſes qui ne doivent jamais eſtre ſeparées, mais auſſi comme deux choſes dependantes l'une de l'autre, parce que ſi l'unité exterieure eſt comme la fille de l'interieure, elle en eſt auſſi la conſervatrice. Cheminez, dit il Epheſ. 4. comme il eſt convenable à la vocation dont vous eſtes appellez, avec toute humilité, & douceur, avec un eſprit patient, ſupportant l'un l'autre en charité. Eſtant ſoigneux de garder l'unitè de l'eſprit par la lien de la paix. D'un cotè il fait dependre cette charitè fraternelle, qui nous joint les uns avec les autres, de noſtre commune vocation, & de l'autre il nous enſeigne qu'un des principaux moyens de conſerver en ſon entier cette commune vocation qu'il appelle l'unitè de l'eſprit, eſt de garder entre nous la paix. Selon la premiere de ces maximes nous ne pouvons avoir de paix, ni de Communion Eccleſiaſtique avec ceux qui ont tellement degenerè de la vocation Chretienne qu'on ne peut plus reconnoitre en eux une veritable & ſalutaire foy, principalement lors qu'à des erreurs mortelles ils ajoutent la tyrannie de l'ame, & qu'ils voulent contraindre la conſcience, en impoſant la neceſſitè de croire ce qu'ils croyent & de pratiquer ce qu'ils pratiquent. Car en ce cas le fondement & la veritable cauſe de la communion exterieure n'eſtant plus, la communion exterieure ceſſe auſſi de droit, & il-n'y-en peut plus avoir de legitime. Selon la ſeconde maxime nous ne croyons pas qu'une ſimple difference de governement, ou de diſcipline, ni meſme un difference de ceremonies innocentes de leur nature, ſoient un ſujet ſuffiſant pour rompre le ſacrè lien de la communion. C'eſt pourquoy nos Egliſes ont toûjours regardè & conſiderè la voſtre, non ſeulement comme une ſoeur, mais comme une ſoeur aiſnée pour qui nous devons avoir des tendreſſes accompagnées de reſpect & de veneration, & pour qui nous preſentons ſans ceſſe à Dieu des voeux treſardens. Nous n'entrons point dans la comparaiſon de voſtre ordre, avec celuy ſous lequel nous vivons. Nous ſavons qu'il-n'y-en a, ni n'y-en peut avoir aucun entre les hommes, qui par noſtre corruption naturelle, ne ſoit ſujet à des inconveniens, le noſtre à les ſiens comme le voſtre, & l'un & l'autre ſans doute ayant leurs avantages & leurs deſavantages à divers égards, alternis vincunt & vincuntur. Il nous ſuffit de ſavoir que la meſme Providence Divine qui par une neceſſitè indiſpenſable, & par la conjoncture des choſes, mit au commencement de la Reformation nos Egliſes ſous celuy du Preſbyterat, à mis la voſtre ſous celuy de l'Epiſcopat, & que comme nous ſommes aſſures que vous ne mepriſez point noſtre ſimplicitè, nous ne devons pas auſſi nous élever contre voſtre dignitè. Ainſi, Monſeigneur, nous deſapprouvons entierement, & voyons avec douleur, de certeines extremitez où ſe jettent quelques uns de une part & d'autre, les uns regardant l'Epiſcopat comme un ordre ſi abſolument neceſſaire que ſans luy il-n'y peut avoir ni de ſocietè Eccleſiaſtique, ni de legitime vocation ni d'eſperance de ſalut, & les autres le regardant avec indignation comme un reſte d'Antichriſtianiſme. Ce ſont également des chaleurs & des excés qui ne viennent point de celuy qui nous appelle, & qui pechent contre les loix de la ſageſſe & de la charité.

Voylà, Monſeigneur, nos veritables & ſinceres ſentimens communs, pour ce qui vous regarde, & puiſque vous deſirez que je deſcende un peu plus particulierement à l'état où ſe trouve voſtre propre Egliſe, par les diviſions inteſtines qui la travaillent, Permettez moy que je ne vous diſe mes penſées qu'en vous expliquant mes ſouhaits, & les deſirs de mon coeur, ſur une choſe auſſi importante que l'eſt celle là. Je ſouhaiterois donc de toute mon ame que ceux qui ſont allez juſqu'à ce point que de ſonger à rompre les liens exterieurs, & la dependance mutuelle de vos troupeaux, pour donner à chaque Egliſe particuliere une eſpece de ſouveraigntè de gouvernement, conſideraſſent bien ſi ce qu'ils prétendent faire n'eſt pas directement contraire à l'eſprit du Chriſtianiſme qui eſt un eſprit d'union, & de ſocietè, & non de diviſion. Qu'ils conſideraſſent que ſous prétexte que le principe des Reformez eſt d'avoir en horreur la domination humaine ſur la foy, & ſur la conſcience, comme une choſe deſtructive de la Religion, il ne faut pourtant pas ni rejetter tout frein de diſcipline, ni ſecoüer tout joug de Gouvernement, ni ſe priver des ſecours que nous pouvons tirer de l'union generale pour nous affermir dans la vraye foy, & dans la vraye pietè. Qu'ils conſideraſſent enfin que la meſme raiſon qui leur fait deſirer l'Independence des troupeaux, peut eſtre auſſi employée pour établir l'Independance des perſonnes dans chaque troupeau. Car un troupeau n'a pas plus de droit de vouloir eſtre Independant des autres troupeaux, qu'une perſonne en auroit de vouloir eſtre Independante des autres perſonnes. Or ce ſeroit aneantir toute diſcipline, jetter l'Egliſe entant qu'en nous ſeroit dans une horrible confuſion; & expoſer l'heritage du Seigneur à l'opprobre de ſes adverſaires.

Pour ce qui regarde ceux qu'on appelle parmy vous Preſbyteriens, comme je ſuis perſuadè qu'ils ont de la lumiere, de la ſageſſe, & du Zele, je ſouhaiterois auſſi de tout mon coeur qu'ils gardaſſent plus de meſure dans le ſcandale qu'ils croyent avoir autrefois receu de l'ordre Epiſcopal, & qu'ils diſtinguaſſent les perſonnes d'avec le Miniſtere. Les perſonnes qui occupent les charges non ſeulement ont leurs defauts, mais il peut meſme quelquefois arriver que les plus ſaintes, & les plus eminentes charges ſoient poſſedées par des méchans, & en ce cas la raiſon & la pieté voulent également qu'on ne confonde pas le Miniſtere avec le Miniſtre. A preſent que Dieu par ſa grace a ote ce ſcandale de devant leurs yeux, & qu'il leur a fait voir dans les perſonnes de Meſſieurs les Eveſques de la Piete, du Zele, & de la Fermete, pour la conſervation de la Religion, j'eſpere que cela meſme ne contribuera pas peu à l'adouciſſement des eſprits. D'ailleurs je ſouhaiterois qu'il leur pluſt de conſiderer que ſi dans le Gouvernment Epiſcopal il-y-a des inconveniens facheux, comme je ne doute pas qu'il-n'y-en-ayt, il-y-en-à auſſi & de tres-facheuz dans le Presbyterien, comme je l'ay deja dit. Nul ordre dont l'exercice eſt entre les mains des hommes n'en eſt exempt, l'egalite a ſes vices, & ſes exces à craindre, de meſme que la ſuperiorite. Le plus ſur & le plus ſage n'eſt donc pas de voltiger de l'une à l'autre, ni de riſquer de faire un ébranlement general, ſur l'eſperance d'eſtre mieux, quand meſme on ſeroit en autoritè & en pouvoir de le faire.

Je ne craindray pas d'appeller de ce nom celuy de faire des aſſemblées à part, de ſe ſeparer des aſſemblées communes, & de ſe ſouſtraire de voſtre gouvernement. Il-n'y-a perſonne qui ne voye que ce ſeroit un veritable ſchiſme, qui en luy-meſme & de ſa nature ne peut jamais eſtre qu'odieux à Dieu, & aux hommes, & dont les auteurs, & les protecteurs ne ſauroient eviter quils ne rendent conte devant le Tribunal de noſtre commun Maitre. Quand S. Paul nous a defendu de delaiſſer noſtre commune aſſemblée, il a non ſeulement condamnè ceux qui ne s'y trouvent point en demeurant dans leur particulier, mais ceux auſſi ſans doute qui en font d'autres oppoſées aux communes, car c'eſt rompre le lien de la charitè Chretienne qui ne nous joint pas ſeulement avec quelques uns de nos freres, mais avec tous nos freres, pour recevoir d'eux de l'edification, & pour leur en donner de noſtre part, en vivant enſemble dans une meſme ſocietè. Et il ne ſerviroit de rien de pretextur que la conſcience reſiſt à ſe trouver dans des aſſemblées qui ſe font ſous un Gouvernement qu'on n'approuve pas, & que ce ſeroit approuver exterieurement, ce que l'on condamne interieurement. Car outre qu'il faudroit bien examiner la queſtion ſi ces reſiſtances ne viennent pas d'une conſcience trompée, par un jugement precipitè, puiſque les plus gens de bien ſont ſouvent ſujets à ſe former de tels ſcrupules qui au fond ne ſont pas tout à fait legitimes. Outre cela, il faut diſtinguer trois ſortes de choſes, les unes que la conſcience approuve, & recoit, & auſquelles elle acquieſce pleinement, les autres qu'elle regarde comme inſupportables, & comme deſtructives de la gloire de Dieu, de la vraye foy, ou de la vraye Pieté, & de l'eſperance du ſalut, & les autres enfin qui tiennent le milieu, c'eſt-adire qu'on n'approuve pas à la veritè pleinement, mais qu'on ne croit pourtant pas mortelles à la vraye piete, & au ſalut, en un mot qu'on regarde comme des taches & des infirmetez ſupportables. J'avoüe que quand on trouve dans des aſſemblées des choſes de ce ſecond ordre, ou que la conſcience les juge telles, on ne peut y aſſiſter, & toute la queſtion ce reduit à ſavoir, ſi l'on ne ſe trompe pas, ſur quoy il fait bien prendre garde de ne pas faire de jugemens temeraires. Mas de s'imaginer qu'on ne puiſſe en bonne conſcience aſſiſter à des aſſemblées, que lors qu'on y approve plenement & generalement toutes choſes, c'eſt aſſurement ne pas connoitre ni l'uſage de la charitè, ni les loix de la ſocietè Chretienne. Ce principe renverſeroit toutes les Egliſes, car je ne ſay s'il-y-en a aucune dont le Gouvernement, la Diſcipline, la forme exterieure, les uſages, & les pratiques ſoient dans une telle perfection, qu'il-n'y-ayt abſolument rien à redire, & quoy q'uil en ſoit comme les jugemens des hommes ſont fort differens, ce ſeroit ouvrir la porte à des ſeparations continuelles, & abolir les aſſemblées. Il eſt donc conſtant que la conſcience n'oblige point à ſe ſouſtraire des aſſemblées, mais qu'au contraire elle nous oblige de nous y choquent ſont ſupportables, & qu'elles n'empechent pas l'efficace ſalutaire de la parole, du culte divin, & des Sacremens. Et c'eſt à la faveur de ce ſupport de la charitè qu'eſt couverte l' aſſiſtance que nous donnons à des choſes que nous n'approuvons pas entierement. Voyez ce que S. Paul dit à ſes Philippiens, chap. 3. Si vous ſentez quelque choſe autrement, Dieu vous le revelera auſſi. Toutefois cheminons en ce à quoy nous ſommes pervenus d'une même regle, & ſentons une même choſe. Cela eſt bien éloigné de dire, des que vous aurez le moindre ſentiment contraire ſeparez vous, la conſcience ne vous permet pas de demeurer enſemble. Conſilia ſeparationis, dit St. Auguſtin contre Parmenian, Inania ſunt & pernicioſa, & plus perturbant infirmos bonos quàm corrigant animoſos malos. *Quels funeſtes effets ne produiroit pas une telle ſeparation ſi elle s'établiſſoit au milieu de vous? De la maniere que les eſprits des hommes ſont faits, on verroit bientôt naitre de là la difference des interets, celle des partys, celle des Sentimens à l'égard même de la ſocieté civile, la hayne mutuelle, & toutes les autres triſtes ſuites que la diviſion, qui n'eſt plus temperée par la charité, produit naturellement. Je laiſſe à part le ſcandale qu'en reçevroient toutes les Egliſes reformées de l'Europe, la joye qu'en auroient leurs adverſaires, & les avantages qu'ils en retireroient, qui ſelon toutes les apparences ne ſeroient pas petits. J'ay trop bonne opinion de ces Meſſieurs qui croyent que la Gouvernement Preſbyterien eſt preferable à l'Epiſcopal, pour n'eſtre pas perſuadé qu'ils ſont de ſages & de ſerieuſes reflexions ſur toutes ces choſes, & ſur tant d'autres que leurs lumieres leur fourniſſent, & que la conſcience, & l'amour de la Religion Proteſtante les empechera toujours de rien faire, qui puiſſe eſtre blamé devant Dieu, & devant les hommes. Car enfin je ne ſaurois croire qu'il-y-en-ayt aucun parmy eux, qui regarde ni voſtre Epiſcopat, ni voſtre Diſcipline, ni quelques Ceremonies que vous obſervez, comme des taches & des erreurs capitales, qui empechent qu'on ne puiſſe faire ſon ſalut, & même avec facilité dans vos Aſſemblées & ſous voſtre Gouvernement. Il ne s'agit icy ni de l'eſſe, ni du* bene eſſe*, mais ſeulement du* melius eſſe*, qu'ils diſputent avec vous, & cela eſtant ainſi la juſtice, la charité, l'amour de la paix, la prudence, & le zele pour le general de la Religion ne conſentiront jamais qu'ils ſe détachent de vous.*

Mais, Monſigneur, puiſque vous m'avez mis la plume à la main ſur ce ſujet, Pardonnez je vous ſupplie à ma liberté ſi elle và juſqu'à vous dire ce que je croy que vous auſſi devez faire de voſtre part. J'eſpere donc que dans ces occaſions que Dieu vous preſente vous ferez voir à toute la terre, & en convaincrez les plus incredulez que vous aves de la pieté, du zele, & de la crainte de Dieu, & que vous eſtez de dignes ouvriers, & de dignes ſerviteurs de Jeſus Chriſt. C'eſt deja le temoignage que vous rendent les gens de bien, & que nul quelque mal intentionné qu'il ſoit, n'oſe contredire, & je ne doute pas que vous ne pouſſiez voſtre vocation juſqu'au bout. Mais outre cela, Monſeigneur, j'eſpere que vous ne defaudrez point aux devoirs de la charité, & de l'eſprit de paix, & que quand il ne s'agira que de quelques temperamens, ou de quelques Ceremonies qui ſervent d'achoppement, & qui en elles mêmes ne ſont rien en comperaiſon d'une entiere reünion de voſtre Egliſe ſous voſtre ſaint Miniſtere, vous ferez voir que vous aimez l'Epouſe de voſtre Maître plus que vous mêmes, & que ce n'eſt pas tant de voſtre grandeur, & de voſtre dignité Eccleſiaſtique que vous deſirez tirer voſtre gloire & voſtre joye, que de vos vertus Paſtorales, & des ſoins ardens que vous avez de vous troupeaux. J'eſpere auſſi que ceux que vous avez choiſis, & appellez au S. Miniſtere, & ceux que deſormais vous y appellerez avec un prudent diſcernement, reglez non ſeulement par la douceur, mais auſſi par la ſeverité de la Diſcipline, quand la ſeverité ſera neceſſaire, marcheront ſur vos traces, & ſuiront heureuſement l'exemple que vous leur donnerez, pour eſtre eux-mêmes en exemple, & en edification aux Egliſes qui leur ſont commiſes. Je finis, Monſeigneur, par des prieres tres-ardentes que je préſent à Dieu de tout mon cœur, afin qu'il luy plaiſe de vous conſerver à jamais le flambeau de ſon Evangile, de repandre ſur tout le corps de voſtre Miniſtere, une abondante meſure de ſon onction & de ſa benediction celeſte, dont celle de l'ancien Aaron n'eſtoit que l'ombre, afin qu'elle ſoit non l'emblême & l'image de la concorde fraternelle comme cette ancienne, mais qu'elle en ſoit la cauſe & le lien. Je le prie qu'il veuille de plus en plus ramener le cœur des enfans aux peres, & des peres aux enfans, afin que voſtre Egliſe ſoit heureuſe, & agreable comme un Eden de Dieu. Je le prie enfin qu'il vous conſerve, vous Monſeigneur, en parfait & longue ſanté pour ſa gloire, & pour le bien & l'avantage de cette grande & conſiderable partie de ſon champ qu'il vous a donné cultiver, & que vous cultivez ſi heureuſement. Je vous demande auſſi le ſecours de vos ſaintes prieres, & la continuation de l'honneur de voſtre affection, en vous Proteſtant que je ſeray toute ma vie avec tout le reſpect que je vous dois,

MONSEIGNEUR,

CLAUDE.

Paris Novemb. 29. Stilo Novo.

MY LORD,

Monſieur de L'Angle having given me the Letter which you have been pleaſed to write to me, I was ſurprized to ſee by that, that you had done me the honour to write me another, which I have not received, and to which I had not failed to make an anſwer. You do me a great deal of honour to deſire that I ſhould tell you my thoughts of the difference that has troubled you ſo long, betwixt thoſe they call Epiſcopal, and thoſe they name Preſbyterians. Although I have already explained my ſelf about this divers times, both by Letters which I have written upon this Subject to ſeveral perſons, and in my Book too of the Defence of the Reformation, where ſpeaking of the diſtinction betwixt the Biſhop and the Prieſt, I have ſaid expreſly, That I do not blame thoſe that obſerve it as a thing very ancient, and that I would not that any one ſhould make it an occaſion of quarrel in thoſe places where it is eſtabliſhed, pag. 366. And though I otherways know my ſelf ſufficiently not to believe that my opinion ſhould be much conſidered, I will not forbear to aſſure you upon this occaſion, as I ſhall always do upon any other, of my Chriſtian eſteem, my reſpect, and my obedience. This I ſhall do the rather, becauſe I ſhall not ſimply tell you my private Thoughts, but the opinion of the generality of our Churches.

Firſt then, my Lord, we are ſo very far from believing that a man cannot live with a good Conſcience under your Diſcipline and under your Epiſcopal Government, that in our ordinary practice we make no difficulty, neither to beſtow our Chairs, nor to commit the care of our Flocks to Miniſters received, and ordained by my Lords the Biſhops; as might be juſtified by a great number enough of Examples both old and new: And a little while ſince Mr. Dupleſſis that was ordained by my Lord Biſhop of Lincoln, has been eſtabliſhed and called in a Church of this Province. And Monſieur Wicart, whom you, my Lord, received to the Holy Miniſtery, did us the honour, but ſome months ago, to preach at Charenton, to the general edification of our Flock. So that they who in this reſpect do impute unto us any opinions diſtant from peace, and Chriſtian concord, do certainly do us wrong.

I ſay Peace and Chriſtian concord; for, my Lord, we believe that the obligation to preſerve this Peace, and this Brotherly concord, which make up the external unity of the Church, is of a neceſſity ſo indiſpenſable, that St. Paul has made no difficulty to join it with the internal unity of the ſame Faith, and the ſame Regeneration; not only as two things which ought never to be ſeparated, but likewiſe as two things depending the one upon the other; becauſe if the external unity be as it were the Daughter of the internal, ſhe is likewiſe the preſerver of it. Walk, ſays he, Epheſ. 4. worthy of the calling wherewith ye are called, with all lowlineſs and meekneſs, with long-ſuffering, forbearing one another in love: Endeavouring to keep the unity of the ſpirit in the bond of peace. On the one ſide he makes this brotherly love, which joins us one with another, to depend upon our common vocation; and on the other ſide he teaches us that one of the principal means to preſerve our common vocation entire, which he calls the unity of the ſpirit, is to keep peace among our ſelves. According to the firſt of theſe maxims we cannot have peace, or Eccleſiaſtical communion with thoſe that have ſo degenerated from the Chriſtian vocation, that one cannot perceive in them a true and ſaving Faith; eſpecially when with mortal errors they join tyranny over the Soul, and that they will force the Conſcience, by impoſing a neceſſity to believe that which they believe, and to practiſe that which they practiſe. For in this caſe the foundation and true cauſe of external communion being no more, the external communion too its ſelf ceaſes of right, and there is not any that is lawful to be had any more with ſuch. According to the ſecond maxim, we do not believe that a ſingle difference of Government or Diſcipline, nor even a difference of Ceremonies innocent in their own nature is a ſufficient occaſion to break the ſacred bond of Communion. Wherefore our Churches have always looked upon and conſidered yours, not only as a Siſter, but as an Elder Siſter, for which we ought to have a kindneſs accompanied with reſpect and veneration, and for which we do preſent moſt ardent prayers unto God without ceaſing. We do not enter into the compariſon of your Order, with that under which we live. We know that there is not, neither can there be any amongſt men, which by reaſon of our natural corruption is not ſubject to inconveniencies, ours has hers, as well as yours; and the one and the other without doubt have their advantages, and diſadvantages in divers reſpects: alternis vincunt, & vincuntur. It is enough for us to know that the ſame Divine Providence which by an indiſpenſable neceſſity, and by the conjuncture of affairs, did at the beginning of the Reformation put our Churches under that of the Preſbytery, has put yours under that of the Epiſcopacy; and as we are aſſured that you do not deſpiſe our ſimplicity, ſo neither ought we to oppoſe our ſelves againſt your preeminence. So that, my Lord, we utterly diſapprove, and ſee with grief, certain extremes whereinto ſome of the one ſide, and the other do caſt themſelves. The one looking upon Epiſcopacy as an Order ſo abſolutely neceſſary, that without it there can be no Eccleſiaſtical ſociety, nor lawful vocation, nor hope of Salvation, and the other looking upon it with indignation, as a Relique of Antichriſtianiſm. Theſe are equally heats and exceſſes which do not come from him that calls us, and which do offend againſt the Laws of wiſdom and charity.

Theſe, my Lord, are our true and ſincere common Opinions. For what concerns you, ſince you deſire that I would deſcend a little more particularly into the ſtate that your own Church is in, by reaſon of the inteſtine diviſions that trouble it; give me leave not to tell you my thoughts, without declaring my wiſhes, and the deſires of my heart, upon a matter ſo important as this is. I could wiſh then with all my ſoul that thoſe that are gone ſo far as this point, to think to break the external bonds, and the mutual dependence of your Flocks, to give every particular Church a kind of ſovereignty of Government, would conſider well, whether that they pretend to do be not directly contrary to the ſpirit of Chriſtianity, which is a ſpirit of union, and ſociety, and not of diviſion. That they would conſider, that under the pretence that the principle of the Reformed was to abhor mens domineering over Faith, and Conſcience, as a thing deſtructive of Religion, we ought not for all that to reject the bridle of Diſcipline, nor to ſhake off the whole yoke of Government, nor deprive our ſelves of the ſuccours we might draw out of a general Union, for to ſtrengthen us in the true Faith, and in true Piety. That they would conſider, in fine, that the ſame reaſon which makes them deſire the Independency of the Flocks, may be likewiſe employed to eſtabliſh the Independency of the perſons in every Flock. For a Flock has no more right to deſire to be Independent upon other Flocks, than a perſon might have to deſire to be Independent upon other perſons. But this would be to bring all Diſcipline to nothing, to throw the Church, as much as in us lies, into a horrible confuſion, and to expoſe the heritage of the Lord to the reproach of its Adverſaries.

For what concerns thoſe which amongſt you they call Preſbyterians, as I am perſwaded that they have light, and wiſdom, and zeal, ſo I could wiſh with all my heart, that they would obſerve more moderation in the ſcandal they believe they have heretofore received from the Epiſcopal Order, and that they would diſtinguiſh the Perſons from the Miniſtry. The perſons that poſſeſs the places have not only their faults, but it may happen too ſometimes that the moſt holy, and moſt eminent places may be poſſeſſed by wicked men; and in that caſe reaſon and piety do equally require that we ſhould not confound the Miniſtry with the Miniſter. At preſent that God by his grace has taken away this ſcandal from before their eyes, and made them ſee piety, zeal, and conſtancy for the preſervation of Religion in the perſons of the Biſhops, I hope that this will not a little contribute to the ſweetning of their ſpirits. Beſides, I could wiſh that they would be pleaſed to conſider that if there be ſome unpleaſant inconveniencies in the Epiſcopal Government, as I do not doubt but there are, there are too ſome very unpleaſant ones in the Presbyterian, as I have ſaid already. No order whoſe execution is in the hands of men, is exempt from them; an equality has its faults and exceſſes to be feared, as well as a ſuperiority. Therefore it is not the moſt ſafe and wiſe way to leap from the one to the other, nor to hazard the making a general concuſſion, upon the hopes of being better, though one ſhould be in authority and power to do it. Chriſtian prudence, juſtice and charity do not permit us to proceed to ſuch daring and dangerous extremes, for a ſingle difference of Government. It is moſt ſafe and wiſe to endeavour to provide ſome kind of temper to avoid, or to leſſen as much as may be, the inconveniencies that are feared, and not have recourſe to violent remedies.

I ſhall not be afraid to give that name to the holding of aſſemblies apart, and ſeparating from the publick aſſemblies, and withdrawing themſelves from under your government. There is no man that does not ſee that this would be real ſchiſm, which in it ſelf and of its own nature cannot chooſe but be always odious to God and men, and of which the Authors and Patrons cannot avoid the rendring an account before the Tribunal of our common Maſter. When Saint Paul forbad us to forſake the aſſembling of our ſelves together, he did not only condemn thoſe that did not come thither, but ſtayed at home; but thoſe too without doubt that held other aſſemblies in oppoſition to the publick ones. For this is to break the bond of Chriſtian charity, which does not only join us with ſome of our brethren, but with all our brethren, to receive from them, and to give them edification by living together in the ſame communion. And it would be to no purpoſe to pretend that our conſcience did oppoſe our being preſent at thoſe aſſemblies that are held under a Government that we do not approve; and that that would be to approve outwardly, what we inwardly condemn. For beſides that it would be neceſſary to examin well the queſtion, whether theſe oppoſitions do not proceed from a conſcience miſtaken by a precipitate judgment; ſince that the beſt men are often ſubject to frame themſelves ſuch ſcruples, as are not altogether lawful at the bottom. Farther then it is neceſſary to diſtinguiſh three kinds of things; the one thoſe which the conſcience approves, and admits of, and in which it does fully acquieſce; the other which ſhe looks upon as intolerable, and deſtructive to the glory of God, and the true faith, or true piety, and the hopes of ſalvation; and others laſtly which are between theſe, that is to ſay ſuch as we do not fully approve as to the truth, but yet we do not believe them mortal enemies to true piety and ſalvation; in a word ſuch as we look upon as ſtains, and tolerable infirmities. I affirm that when we find things of this ſecond rank in any Aſſemblies, or thoſe which the Conſcience judges ſuch, we cannot be preſent there; and the whole queſtion will be reduced to this, to know, whether we be not miſtaken, where we ought to take good heed that we do not make a raſh judgment. But to imagin that we cannot with a good Conſcience be preſent at Aſſemblies, but only when we do fully and generally approve of all things in them, it is certainly not to know neither the uſe of charity, nor the laws of Chriſtian ſociety. This principle would overturn all Churches, for I cannot tell whether there be any, whoſe government, diſcipline, outward form, uſages, and practices be of ſuch perfection, that there is nothing at all in them to blame; and however it be, as the judgments of men are very different, this would be to open the gate to continual ſeparations, and to aboliſh all Aſſemblies. It is therefore certain that Conſcience does not oblige us to withdraw from the Aſſemblies, but on the contrary it obliges us to join with them, when the things that offend us are tolerable, and do not hinder the ſalutary efficacy of the Word, of the Divine Worſhip, and of the Sacraments. 'Tis the favour of this charitable patience that juſtifies our being preſent at thoſe things which we do not perfectly approve. See what St. Paul ſays to the Philippians, chap. 3. If in any thing ye be otherways minded, God ſhall reveal even this unto you. Nevertheleſs, whereto we have already attained, let us walk by the ſame rule, let us mind the ſame thing. This is very far from ſaying, as ſoon as ye have the leaſt contrary ſentiment ſeparate your ſelves, Conſcience will not allow you to remain together. Conſilia ſeparationis, ſays St. Auguſtin againſt Parmenian, inania ſunt & pernicioſa, & plus perturbant infirmos bonos, quam corrigant animoſos malos. What deadly effects would not ſuch a ſeparation produce if it were eſtabliſhed amongſt you? As the diſpoſitions of men are, one ſhould quickly ſee to ſpring from hence a difference of intereſts, of parties, of opinions, even in reſpect of the civil ſociety, mutual hatred, and all the other ſad conſequences which a diviſion not tempered with charity does naturally produce. I let alone the ſcandal which all the Reformed Churches of Europe would receive by it, the joy which their Adverſaries would have, and the advantages which they would draw from it, which in all appearance would not be ſmall. I have too good an opinion of thoſe Gentlemen who believe that the Presbyterian Government is to be preferred before the Epiſcopal, not to be perſuaded that they make wiſe and ſerious reflections upon all theſe things, and many more which their own knowledge furniſhes them with; and that conſcience, and the love of the Proteſtant Religion will always hinder them from doing any thing, that may be blamed before God and men. For in fine I cannot believe that there is any one amongſt them that looks upon your Epiſcopacy, or your Diſcipline, or certain Ceremonies which you obſerve, as blots, and capital errors, which hinder a man from obtaining ſalvation, even with facility in your Aſſemblies, and under your Government. The queſtion here is not about the Eſſe, or the bene Eſſe, but only about the melius Eſſe, that they diſpute with you; and this being ſo, juſtice, charity, the love of peace, prudence, and zeal for Religion in the general will never allow that they ſhould divide themſelves from you.

But, my Lord, ſince you have put the pen into my hand upon this ſubject, I beſeech you pardon my freedom if it go ſo far as to tell you what I think you alſo ought to do on your part. I hope then that on theſe opportunities that God preſents unto you, you will make all the world ſee, and convince the moſt incredulous, that you have piety, zeal, and the fear of God, and that you are worthy labourers, and worthy ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt. This is the teſtimony which all good Men do already give you, and none how ſpightful ſoever he be dares to contradict it, and I do not doubt but that you will carry on your calling to the end. But beſides this, my Lord, I hope you will not be wanting in the duties of charity, and the ſpirit of peace, and that when the diſpute ſhall be only of ſome temperaments, or of ſome Ceremonies that are a ſtumbling-block, and which in themſelves are nothing in compariſon of an intire re-union of your Church under your holy Miniſtry, you will make it ſeen that you love the Spouſe of your Maſter more than your ſelves; and that it is not ſo much from your greatneſs, and your Eccleſiaſtical dignity that you deſire to receive your glory, and your joy, as from your paſtoral vertues, and the ardent care you take of your Flocks. I hope too that thoſe you have choſen and called to the holy Miniſtry, and thoſe which hereafter you ſhall with a prudent diſcretion call unto it, being governed not only by ſweetneſs, but likewiſe by ſeverity of diſcipline, when ſeverity ſhall be neceſſary, will tread in your ſteps, and happily follow the example which you ſhall give them, that they may be themſelves for an example, and edification to the Churches that are committed to them.

I conclude, my Lord, with very earneſt prayers which I preſent to God with all my heart, that it would pleaſe him always to preſerve unto you the light of his Goſpel, and to pour out upon the whole body of your Miniſtry, an abundant meaſure of his unction and heavenly benediction, of which that of the old Aaron was but a ſhadow; that it may be not the emblem, and image of brotherly concord, like the unction of old, but the cauſe and bond of it. I pray him that he would more and more bring back the heart of the Children to the Fathers, and of the Fathers to the Children, that your Church may be happy and pleaſant as the Paradiſe of God.

Laſtly I pray that he would preſerve you, my Lord, in perfect and long health, for his glory, and the good and advantage of that great and conſiderable part of his field which he has given you to cultivate, and which you do cultivate ſo happily. I deſire too the help of your holy prayers, and the continuance of the honour of your affection, proteſting to you that I will be all my life with all the reſpect that I owe you,

G.R. III.

My Lord,

Your moſt humble
